PREFACE.

My preface prefixed to the firſt volume of this edition of the STATE-TRIALS promiſed, that the preſent volume ſhould conſiſt wholly of trials not contained in any former edition; and I was underſtood to be the perſon, who would point out what were the materials proper to be adopted.

In conformity to this engagement, I uſed conſiderable diligence to diſcover what trials were omitted in the period of the former editions, and what trials of importance have occurred ſince. But the reſult of my purſuit for new matter proved very inadequate to my expectation; the induſtry of former collectors having ſcarce left any deficiencies, which I could ſupply without too far paſſing the line I had preſcribed to myſelf of merely ſelecting additional trials. Yet the few, which I have gleaned, may ſuffice to convince the reader, that I have not been ſparing of reſearch.

In the courſe of my enquiries for new trials, I reſorted to the Britiſh Muſeum, in hopes, that the immenſe collection of manuſcripts in that repoſitory of learning and ſcience would ſupply me with ſome new materials of importance; and I was particularly encouraged in this expectation by the promiſing titles of various articles in the catalogue of Harleian manuſcripts. But I was wholly diſappointed; for on examination, the few trials I met with proved, either too meagre and inſignificant to be made uſe of, or nothing more than mere tranſcripts from ſome of our old printed chronicles. And here I take great pleaſure in bearing teſtimony of the exemplary conduct of thoſe gentlemen, who by their offices have the ſuperintendance of the manuſcripts and printed books in the Britiſh Muſeum. Though I have had frequent occaſion to give ſeveral of thoſe gentlemen much trouble; yet I have ever found them uniformly ſtudious to render the acceſs to the valuable collections entruſted to them eaſy and agreeable. I have alſo had the full opportunity of noticing, that their deportment and attentions to others are of the ſame obliging kind. So honourable a diſcharge of their duty well entitles them to ſome rewards beyond the ſmall emoluments of their reſpective offices; and I heartily wiſh, that they may in future attract a greater ſhare of patronage from the great, than they have hitherto experienced.

There is one very ſtriking and capital defect in the former editions of this collection; I mean, in the article of parliamentary trials, under which head may be included, not only trials on impeachments, but proceedings on bills of attainder, and on bills inflicting pains and penalties. In the ten volumes, which conſtitute the work as it was before the preſent edition, there are not, as I calculate, thirty articles which fall under ſuch a deſcription. Yet from a very imperfect liſt, which I formed on a ſlight examination of the rolls of parliament, and various other books of parliamentary information, I found, that many more than a hundred ſuch trials might be extracted. It was my wiſh to have ſupplied this omiſſion; more eſpecially as by ſo doing infinite light would be thrown on a ſubject moſt intereſting to all lawyers and politicians; namely, the criminal judicature of parliament. But ſuch a vaſt undertaking would not only have far exceeded the limits of my engagements to the proprietors of this edition of STATE-TRIALS, but would alſo have ſwelled the preſent collection greatly beyond the terms of the propoſals to the ſubſcribers.

Before each trial in this volume, I have given notice to the reader whence it is extracted, with ſuch other explanations, as were neceſſary to enable the forming a judgment on the authority of the trial. It would have been of no ſmall advantage to the readers, if the collectors of the former volumes had been equally explanatory.

My introductory note to ſome of the trials in this volume is extended into an illuſtration of the ſubject of the trial; and occaſionally I have interſperſed ſimilar notes elſewhere. The fulleſt annotations of this kind are thoſe prefixed to the Caſe of Impoſitions, the Caſe of the POSTNATI, the Bankers Caſe, and the reſpective Caſes of Mr. Whitlock and Mr. Oliver St. John. Theſe and the other notes I commit to the candid conſtruction of the reader, with an aſſurance, that I have endeavoured to form and expreſs my opinions with the utmoſt impartiality and moderation; and that I ſhall even think myſelf obliged by a good-humoured correction of any errors into which I may have fallen.

In the trials and caſes in this volume, the reader will find an ample diſcuſſion of various great conſtitutional queſtions.—The Caſe of Impoſitions furniſhes a profuſion of learning on the point ſo long controverted, whether the king could by prerogative impoſe duties at the ports. In the courſe too of the arguments on that head, the learned reader will be pleaſed to ſee ſome important remarks on the king's power of laying embargoes. Some perſons, juſtly of high authority in the preſent times, have been inclined to reſtrict the exerciſe of this power to time of war. But I confeſs, that I do not ſee, why the prerogative ſhould be thus limited. The ſafety of the ſtate, which is the ground of entruſting the king with the power of laying embargoes, may require an exerciſe of it in times both of war and peace; and on the eve of a war it is obviouſly as neceſſary as in a war itſelf. Alſo from what I remember having formerly read on the ſubject, I have little doubt, but that the precedents and authorities, whenever they ſhall be well collected, will be found greatly to preponderate againſt the diſtinction I have ſtated. That profound parliamentary lawyer, Mr. Hakewill, when he was arguing in the houſe of commons againſt the claimed prerogative of impoſitions at the ports, candidly admitted the prerogative of embargoes to the full extent of its principle, and conſequently, as I conceive, without reſtricting its exerciſe to times of war. Yet he well knew, that the power of ſhutting up the ports was one great branch of the argument for the power of taxing at the ports; and alſo, that the power of laying embargoes had been often exerciſed under ſpecial acts of parliament. Nor did Mr. St. John, in his argument againſt ſhip-money, ſcruple to admit the power of laying embargoes, and that it was exerciſeable, not merely in times of war, but generally in times of imminent danger, whether ariſing from war, from dearth, or from any other cauſe. Perhaps ſome readers may wonder, that I ſhould be thus unreſerved in contending for the prerogative of embargoes. But I refer ſuch to my note before the Caſe of Impoſitions. They will there find a ſhort but connected view of the various means practiſed to eſtabliſh in the crown a power of taxing out of parliament from the acceſſion of James the firſt to the Reſtoration; and I preſume to hope, that on a conſideration of the freedom, with which I have in that note animadverted on ſuch unconſtitutional attempts, I ſhall be ſufficiently guarded againſt any ſuſpicion of the leaſt wiſh to extend the royal prerogative beyond its due limits.—The Iriſh Caſe of Præmunire muſt be intereſting to every perſon, who wiſhes to be informed, in a ſummary and accurate way, how the church of Rome gradually encroached on the king's eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction; and how at length the Engliſh church and kingdom were compleatly exonerated from the expence tyranny and diſgrace of foreign uſurpation. My note at the end of that caſe is intended to aſſiſt the inquiries of ſuch as may be curious to purſue the ſubject more in detail.—In the Caſe of the Poſtnati, the doctrine of allegiance to the crown is enlarged upon, with a ſurprizing variety of learning and hiſtorical information; tending to explain the relation between England and the countries which at any time before the acceſſion of the firſt James had been dependant upon England, or connected with it by being under the dominion of the ſame prince. To render this great political Caſe more intelligible, I have prefixed a fuller account of its origin, and all the proceedings in it, than is commonly to be met with; to which I have added a reference to almoſt every book of conſequence likely to ſupply the leaſt further information about the caſe. The Caſe of Mr. Oliver St. John for writing againſt benevolences, deſerves attention on account of its connection with the Caſe of Ship Money and the Caſe of Impoſitions. In my note on Mr. St. John's Caſe, I have pointed out this connection; and I have therein riſqued ſome remarks on the ſubject of benevolences to the Crown; with a view to ſhew, how far they have been condemned and are clearly unlawful.—In the Caſe of the Bankers, ſome curious ſubjects are diſcuſſed; more eſpecially the general power of the Crown to alienate its revenues before the reſtraining ſtatute of queen Anne; whether ſome particular revenues, on account of their ſpecial nature, were not privileged and exempt from the Crown's general power of alienating; and whether the barons of the Exchequer could compel the lord treaſurer to iſſue money for payment of the king's debts, or, in other words, whether the receipt of the Exchequer is under the controul of the barons. The moſt remarkable of the arguments in this famous caſe, or, at leaſt, of thoſe which have reached the preſent times, is lord Somers's. It not only unfolds the conſtitution of the Exchequer with great minuteneſs; but in other reſpects is moſt excellent, having a ſcope and compaſs, which will ever render it of infinite value to the profeſſion of the law. So anxious, indeed, was his lordſhip to ſuſtain his opinion by the moſt authentic materials, that the records referred to and ſtated in his argument are ſaid to have coſt him ſeveral hundred pounds. My note on this Caſe, explains how it aroſe, the progreſs of it, and how the claims of the bankers and their creditors were finally adjuſted by act of parliament, with ſome other particulars, which I thought might be conducive to a thorough underſtanding of the caſe, and of the points decided by it.—In reſpect to the remainder of the Caſes in this volume, moſt of them relate to very intereſting ſubjects; amongſt which the chief are, the effect of matrimonial ſentences of the eccleſiaſtical courts, the extent of the privilege of parliament, the queſtion of general warrants, the queſtion on the ſeizure of papers, the powers claimed by ſecretaries of ſtate and privy counſellors, the queſtion on the ſlavery of negroes in England, and the power of preſſing mariners. However, ſome of the early caſes I have introduced do, I confeſs, require an apology; being certainly too looſe and imperfect in the ſtatement to deſerve the name of trials. My inducement to inſert them was, that I wiſhed to give the reader ſome proof, how very extenſive I was in my enquiries and reſearches for new matter to ſupply the omiſſions of former collectors; and I do hope, that the notes wich precede theſe ſhort accounts of trials, will be received as a full teſtimony of my induſtry in that reſpect.—Thus much may ſuffice to appriſe the reader what he is to expect from the contents of the preſent volume.

In my preface to the firſt volume of this edition of STATE TRIALS, I thought, that I had ſufficiently explained myſelf to guard againſt any reſponſibility beyond what really belongs to me. But from the manner of placing my name in the title to the collection, which I now think might have been leſs ambiguous, a very erroneous notion has prevailed, as to the extent of my very limited ſhare in the undertaking. I therefore deem it proper to be more explicit on this head; and with that view, I here take the opportunity of declaring, that the only parts of the work for which I am in any reſpect accountable, excluſive of the preſent preface, are the preface with my name in the firſt volume; and the ſelection of the trials and caſes for this volume, with ſuch annotations as I have given in the courſe of it, particularly thoſe before the ſeveral trials. As to the trials in the ten preceding volumes, they were printed literally from the laſt of the former editions; nor did I ſee ſo much as one ſheet of thoſe volumes before it was printed and publiſhed, except only the ſheet containing my preface and the title to the firſt volume. I am equally free from reſponſibility for the alphabetical and chronological tables of all the trials in this collection, and for the general index of matter; all of which are placed at the end of this volume. Theſe tables and index were prepared by another gentleman. The chronological table of the trials is quite a new acceſſion to the work; there being no ſuch table to the former editions; though the utility of it is apparent, as it in great meaſure obviates the diſadvantage from the diſorderly arrangement of many of the trials in point of time. This diſorder was a neceſſary conſequence of continuing the firſt ſix volumes of the work by ſupplemental volumes. The merit of leſſening this inconvenience belongs wholly to the framer of the tables and Index to this edition; that is, both the propoſal of ſuch an improvement and the execution of it originated from him. All that I can pretend to ſay further concerning the tables and index is, that the latter has been executed at a much greater expence than would have been incurred, if I had not made it a particular requeſt to the proprietors of the edition to be liberal in their allowance for ſo uſeful and laborious a part of the undertaking; and further, that I have every reaſon to believe, that the gentleman who compiled the general index of matter, has been extremely diligent in endeavouring to render it acceptable.

I. The Trial of Sir William Stanley, Knight, for High Treaſon, 10 Hen. VII. 1494-5.

[There is not a regular account of the trial of this eminent perſon, in any book we have met with. Old Fabian, with his uſual dryneſs and brevity, only writes, that about Chriſtmas 1494 ſir Robert Clifford impeached ſir William Stanley, and that ſir William was beheaded the 15th of February following. Fab. 530. Hall, with his followers Grafton and Hollingſhead, explains, by whom ſir William was accuſed to the king, what was reported to be his offence, and how the king acted on the occaſion; adding ſome conjectures as to the cauſe of ſir William's alienation from the king; but as to the trial itſelf, all they ſay is, that he was condemned and executed. Even lord Bacon, though he appears to have taken no ſmall pains to throw every light on the ſubject, owns, that the memory of the caſe was dark; and writes of it only from imperfect tradition, aided by the ſtrength of his own conjecture. However, our readers will ſcarce be averſe to ſeeing what a hiſtorian of ſuch a deep penetration writes on a ſubject ſo intereſting. We ſhall therefore extract the reſult of his inveſtigation, after firſt giving Hall's account, which contains no mean ſpecimen of the abilities of that old chronicler, and will be found to be the groundwork of ſome part of lord Bacon's more ſplendid and enlightened narrative.]

Extract from Hall's Hen. VII. p. 35.

SYR Robert Clyfford, partely truſting on the kynges promes, and partely miſtruſtyng the thing, becauſe he knewe that diverſe that were accuſed to be partakers of that faccion and conſpiracy [in favor of Perkyn Warbeck] were put in execucion: and therfore perceavyng that their could not be a more pernicious nor more deſperate begonne thinge then that develiſhe enterprice, returned ſodeynly agayn into England. The kynge beynge certefied before of his coming, went ſtreight to the Towre of London the morow after the daye of Epiphany, and there taryed til ſuche tyme that ſyr Robert Clyfford was there preſented to hys perſon, which thinge he uſed under this pretence, that if ſyr Robert Clifforde had accuſed any of the nobilitie to be partakers of this ungracious fraternitie and diabolical conjuracion, that then every ſuch perſon might be called thether without ſuſpeccion of any evell, and there ſtreight to be attached and caſt in holde.

But before I go any farther I wil ſhew the opinion that at that tyme ranne in many mens heddes of this knyghtes goynge into Flaunders. Some men helde this opinion, that kyng Henry for a polecy dyd ſende him as a ſpye to Flaunders, or els he woulde not have ſo ſone receaved him into his grace and favour agayn. Neverthceleſſe this is not like to be true by diverſe reaſons and apparant argumentes, firſte, after that attempt begonne by ſyr Robert, he was in no ſmal dangier himſelfe, and by that was not a litle noted, and hys fame blemiſhed, but alſo hys frendes were ſuſpected and had in a gealoſy. Secondarely, he was not after that in ſo great favour, nor ſo eſtemed with the kynge as he had been in tymes paſt, becauſe he was blotted and marked with that cryme and offence. And therfore he bearing his favoure to the houſe of Yorke, entendynge in the beginning to adminiſter diſpleaſure to kyng Henry, ſayled to the lady Margaret, beyng ſeduced and brought in beleſe that Perkyn was the very ſonne of kynge Edward. But to my purpoſe, when ſyr Robert came to the preſence of the kynge, he knelyng on his knees moſt humblye, beſeched hym of grace and pardone, whiche he ſhortely obteyned. And after that beynge requyred of the maner and ordre of the conjuracion and what was done in Flaunders, he opened every pointe to his knowlege, and after diſcloſed the names, aſwell of the aiders and fautoures as of the inceptors and begynners. Amongeſt whome he accuſed ſyr William Stanley, whome the kynge made hys chieſe chamberleyn, and one of hys prevy counſayll. When he had ſo ſayde, the kyng was greatly diſmayed and greved, that he ſhoulde be partaker in that greveous offence, conſiderynge firſt that he had the governaunce of his chambre, and the charge and comptrolment of all ſuche as were next to hys bodye, and alſo callynge to remembraunce the manifolde gratuities, whiche he had receaved at hys hande, but in eſpeciall not forgettynge that benefite above all other, that onely by his aide and ſuccoure, he had vanquiſhed and overthrowen his mortall enemy kynge Rycharde. Wherefore at the begynnynge he coulde in no wyſe be induced nor perſuaded to beleve, that he was ſuch a prevy conſpiratoure or malicious offender; but when the cryme was openly proved and probably affirmed, then the king cauſed hym to be reſtrayned from his libertie in his awne chambre within the Quadrate Towre. And there appoynted hym by his prevy counſayll to be examined. In whiche examinacion he nothinge denyed, but wiſely and ſeriouſly did aſtipulate and agree to all thinges layed to hys charge, if he were in any of theim culpable or blame woorthy.

The reporte is, that this was his offence. When communicacion was had betwene hym, and this ſyr Robert Clyfforde, as concerning Perkyn, whiche falſely uſurped the name of kyng Edwardes ſonne, ſyr William Stanley ſayde and affirmed there, that he would never fight nor beare armure agaynſt the young man, if he knew of a truthe that he was the indubitate ſonne of kyng Edward the IV. Thys poynte argueth and proveth hym at that tyme, beynge moved with melancholy, to beare no great good will to kyng Henry, wherof ſuſpicion firſt grewe, and after this enſued the accuſacion of ſyr Robert Clyfforde.

Then the kyng doubtinge what to do with him, did conſulte and breath with hymſelfe of this ſodeyne chaunce. For he feared leaſt that his brother lorde Thomas Stanley, in whome he had founde great frendſhip, woulde take this mattre greveouſly. And if he ſhould remit that fault, that, abuſynge his lenyte and mercy, he would be the more bolder to offende and treaſpace more highly. Albeit at the laſt, ſeveritee tooke place, and mercy was put backe, and ſo he was arreigned at Weſtmynſter, and adjudged to dye, and accordinge to that judgemente was broughte to the Towre-hill the xvi. daye of February, and there had hys head ſtriken of. What was the occaſion and cauſe, why the ſyncere and faythfull mynde, that ſyr William allways before bare to kyng Henry, was turned into cancarde hatred and diſpite, and why the eſpeciall favoure that the kynge bare towarde hym was tranſmuted into diſdeyne and diſpleaſure, dyverſe men alledge dyverſe cauſes, affirmynge that when kynge Henry (what other mutuall benefites the one had receaved of the other, I wyll nowe pretermyt and overpaſſe) in that battaile, in the whiche he bereft kynge Rycharde bothe of hys life and hys kyngdom, beynge aſſociate and accompanied but with a ſmall numbre, and circumvented by kynge Richardes army, and in great jeopardy of his lyfe, thys ſyr William beynge ſent from the lord Standley hys brother with a good company of ſtronge and hardy men (whiche lorde Stanley was nere the felde with a great army) came ſodeynly and fortunately to the ſuccours of kynge Henry, and ſaved hym from deſtruccion, and overthrewe kynge Rychard as before you have heard. Surely thys was a benefite above all benefites to be remembred, by the which kyng Henry was not onely preſerved alyve, but alſo obteyned the croune and kingdome, which great benefite, after the kingdome once obteyned, he did neither forget nor yet left unrewarded. For the lord Thomas Stanley he inveſted with the ſwoorde of the countie of Darby, and beſide other great giftes and officies geven to William Stanley, he made him his chiefe chamberleyn. This ſyr William, although he were in great favoure with the kyng, and had in great and high eſtimacion, more remembring the benefite done to the kyng, then the rewardes and gratuitees of his liberalite receaved, thinking that the veſſel of oyle, (according to the Goſpel) would overflowe the brymmes, and as ſome ſaye, deſiryng to be erle of Cheſtre and therof denyed, began to grudge and diſdeyne the kyng his high frend: and one thing encoraged him much, which was the riches and treaſure of king Richard, which he onely poſſeſſed at the conflict of Boſwoorth: by reaſon of which haboundance of ryches and greate powre of people, he ſet nought by the kyng his ſovereign lord and maſtre. When the king perceaved that his ſtomack began to canker and waxe ruſty, he was with him not a litle diſpleaſed, and ſo when bothe their hartes were enflamed with melancoly, bothe loſte the fruite of their longe continued amitie and favoure. And ſo it often chaunceth, that when men do not conſider nor yet regard the great benefites to them exhibited, they rendre agayne hatred for liberalitee, and for breade geven, they yelde agayne a ſcorpion. Nowe to returne to the matter.

At thys tyme the kyng thought it beſt, ye and very neceſſary, not onely to take hede about him, but alſo to uſe ſome ſharpe punyſhment and correccion of the offences of his ſubjectes, to the intent that the late begon ſedicion might the ſoner be repreſſed, and for this cauſe ſpecially that ſome perſons voyde of all honeſt feare and reverent dread, had taken ſuch courage and audacitie to them, that they feared not to ſpeake evell of their kyng and ſovereign lord, with mooſt ſpiteful and contumelious wordes, as though thei neither feared nor woulde obey him, or his preceptes and commaundementes, expecting dayly and hourely the arryvall and landing of the feyned Rychard duke of Yorke, now lately ryſen from death to lyfe. But when knowlege of the ſlaunderous and opprobrious woordes were brought to the kynges eares, he cauſed dyverſe perſones to ſuffre condigne punyſhment for their heynous offences, whereby their complices wel perceavyng that their entreprice had no proſperous ſucceſſe nor toke any good effect, and eſpecially ſuch as temerariouſly began to make maſtries and farther ſeyng what preparacion was made and provyded agaynſt theyre tumulteous commocion and frantique entreprice, they of their awne ſwynge paceſied themſelfes, and beganne to turne to their kynge and naturall liege lorde.

Extract from Bacon's Hen. VII. in 1. Kenn. Compl. Hiſt. 2d. ed. p. 610, 611.

UPON Al-hallows-day even, being now the tenth year of the king's reign, the king's ſecond ſon Henry was created duke of York; and as well the duke, as divers others, noblemen, knights batchellours, and gentlemen of quality, were made knights of the Bath, according to the ceremony. Upon the morrow after Twelfth-day, the king removed from Weſtminſter (where he had kept his Chriſtmas) to the Tower of London. This he did as ſoon as he had advertiſement, that ſir Robert Clifford (in whoſe boſom or budget moſt of Perkin's ſecrets were layed up) was come into England. And the place of the Tower was choſen to that end, that if Clifford ſhould accuſe any of the great ones, they might without ſuſpicion, or noiſe, or ſending abroad of warrants, be preſently attached; the court and priſon being within the cincture of one wall. After a day or two, the king drew unto him a ſelected council, and admitted Clifford to his preſence; who firſt fell down at his feet, and in all humble manner craved the king's pardon, which the king then granted, though he were indeed ſecretly aſſured of his life before. Then commanded to tell his knowledge, he did amongſt many others (of himſelf, not interrogated) appeach ſir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain of the king's houſhold.

The king ſeemed to be much amazed at the naming of this lord, as if he had heard the news of ſome ſtrange and fearful prodigy. To hear a man, that had done him ſervice of ſo high a nature, as to ſave his life, and ſet the crown upon his head; a man, that enjoyed by his favour and advancement ſo great a fortune, both in honour and riches; a man, that was tied unto him in ſo near a band of alliance, his brother having married the king's mother; and laſtly, a man, to whom he had committed the truſt of his perſon, in making him his chamberlain; that this man, no ways diſgraced, no ways diſcontent, no ways put in fear, ſhould be falſe unto him. Clifford was required to ſay over again, and again, the particulars of his accuſation, being warned, that in a matter ſo unlikely, and that concerned ſo great a ſervant of the king's, he ſhould not in any wiſe go too far. But the king finding that he did ſadly and conſtantly (without heſitation or varying, and with thoſe civil proteſtations that were fit) ſtand to that that he had ſaid, offering to juſtifie it upon his ſoul and life; he cauſed him to be removed. And after he had not a little bemoaned himſelf unto his council there preſent, gave order that ſir William Stanley ſhould be reſtrained in his own chamber, where he lay before, in the Square Tower. And the next day he was examined by the lords. Upon his examination he denied little of that wherewith he was charged, nor endeavoured much to excuſe or extenuate his fault. So that (not very wiſely) thinking to make his offence leſs by confeſſion, he made it enough for condemnation. It was conceived, that he truſted much to his former merits, and the intereſt that his brother had in the king. But thoſe helps were over-weighed by divers things that made againſt him, and were predominant in the king's nature and mind. Firſt, an over-merit; for convenient merit, unto which reward may eaſily reach, doth beſt with kings. Next the ſenſe of his power; for the king thought, that he that could ſet him up, was the more dangerous to pull him down. Thirdly, the glimmering of a confiſcation; for he was the richeſt ſubject for value in the kingdom; there being found in his caſtle of Holt forty thouſand marks in ready money, and plate, beſides jewels, houſhold-ſtuff, ſtocks upon his grounds, and other perſonal eſtate, exceeding great. And for his revenue in land and fee, it was three thouſand pounds a year of old rent, a great matter in thoſe times. Laſtly, the nature of the time; for if the king had been out of fear of his own eſtate, it was not unlike he would have ſpared his life. But the cloud of ſo great a rebellion, hanging over his head, made him work ſure. Wherefore after ſome ſix weeks diſtance of time, which the king did honourably interpoſe, both to give ſpace to his brother's interceſſion, and to ſhew to the world, that he had a conflict with himſelf what he ſhould do; he was arraigned of high-treaſon, and condemned, and preſently after beheaded.

Yet is it to this day but in dark memory, both what the caſe of this noble perſon was, for which he ſuffered, and what likewiſe was the ground and cauſe of his defection, and the alienation of his heart from the king. His caſe was ſaid to be this: that in diſcourſe between ſir Robert Clifford and him, he had ſaid; that if he were ſure, that that young man were king Edward's ſon, he would never bear arms againſt him. This caſe ſeems ſomewhat an hard caſe, both in reſpect of the conditional, and in reſpect of the other words. But for the conditional, it ſeems the judges of that time (who were learned men, and the three chief of them of the privy council) thought it was a dangerous thing to admit ifs and ands, to qualifie words of treaſon; whereby every man might expreſs his malice, and blanch his danger. And it was like to the caſe (in the following times) of Elizabeth Barton, the holy maid of Kent; who had ſaid, that if king Henry the eighth did not take Katherine his wife again, he ſhould be deprived of his crown, and die the death of a dog. And infinite caſes may be put of like nature. Which (it ſeemeth) the grave judges taking into conſideration, would not admit of treaſons upon condition. And as for the poſitive words, that he would not bear arms againſt king Edward's ſon; though the words ſeem calm, yet it was a plain and direct over-ruling of the king's title, either by the line of Lancaſter, or by act of parliament. Which (no doubt) pierced the king more, than if Stanley had charged his launce upon him in the field. For if Stanley would hold that opinion, that a ſon of king Edward had ſtill the better right, he being ſo principal a perſon of authority, and favour about the king; it was to teach all England to ſay as much. And therefore (as thoſe times were) that ſpeech touched the quick. But ſome writers do put this out of doubt; for they ſay, that Stanley did expreſly promiſe to aid Perkin, and ſent him ſome help of treaſure.

Now for the motive of his falling off from the King; it is true, that at Boſworth Field the king was beſet, and in a manner incloſed round about by the troops of king Richard, and in manifeſt danger of his life; when this Stanley was ſent by his brother with three thouſand men to his reſcue, which he performed ſo, that king Richard was ſlain upon the place. So as the condition of mortal men is not capable of a greater benefit, than the king received by the hands of Stanley; being like the benefit of Chriſt, at once to ſave and crown. For which ſervice the king gave him great gifts, made him his councellour and chamberlain; and, ſomewhat contrary to his nature, had winked at the great ſpoils of Boſworth Field, which came almoſt wholly to this man's hands, to his infinite enriching. Yet nevertheleſs blown up with the conceit of his merit, he did not think he had received good meaſure from the king, at leaſt not preſt down and running over, as he expected. And his ambition was ſo exorbitant, and unbounded, as he became ſuitor to the king for the earldom of Cheſter. Which ever being a kind of appendage to the principality of Wales, and uſing to go to the king's ſon; his ſuit did not only end in a denial, but in a diſtaſte; the king perceiving thereby, that his deſires were intemperate, and his cogitations vaſt, and irregular, and that his former benefits were but cheap, and lightly regarded by him. Wherefore the king began not to brook him well. And as a little leaven of new diſtaſte doth commonly ſour the whole lump of former merit, the king's wit began to ſuggeſt unto his paſſion that Stanley, at Boſworth Field, though he came time enough to ſave his life, yet he ſtayed long enough to endanger it. But yet having no matter againſt him, he continued him in his places until this his fall.

After him was made lord chamberlain, Giles lord Dawbeny, a man of great ſufficiency and valour; the more, becauſe he was gentle and moderate.

There was a common opinion, that ſir Robert Clifford (who now was become the ſtate informer) was from the beginning an emiſſary, and ſpie of the king's; and that he fled over into Flanders with his conſent and privity. But this is not probable; both becauſe he never recovered that degree of grace, which he had with the king before his going over; and chiefly, for that the diſcovery which he had made touching the lord chamberlain (which was his great ſervice) grew not from any thing he learned abroad, for that he knew it well before he went.

II. The Trial of Sir THOMAS EMPSON, Knight, and EDMUND DUDLEY, Eſq. for High Treaſon, at Guildhall, London, 1 Hen. VIII. 1509.

[The moſt exact account of the proceedings againſt theſe two remarkable perſons being to be found in lord Herbert, we ſhall lay it before the reader; who, if he chooſes to purſue the ſubject further, may conſult Polydore Virgil, Hall, and Hollingſhead.—But it is proper to premiſe, what we conceive to be a great error, which is current in reſpect to Empſon and Dudley. Our hiſtorians in general, not excepting lord Herbert and Mr. Hume, repreſent Empſon and Dudley to have been doubly attainted, firſt by judgment on trial before a jury, and ſecondly by an act of parliament. But the ſtatute, thus treated as an act of attainder, was in truth only an act to relieve certain perſons, in truſt for whom Empſon and Dudley were ſeiſed of various eſtates; and to prevent their attainders from hurting innocent perſons. Nor is there a word in the act, either to confirm the attainder or to attaint; as will appear by conſulting the act itſelf, which is extant in Raſtall's edition of the Statutes. Yet even the elaborate writers of the Parliamentary Hiſtory, to whom both lawyers and politicians are ſo much indebted for their uſeful and important labours, have adopted the error; though throughout that work, recourſe is apparently had to the journals and records of parliament, which ſtamps it with great authority. How this happened, we cannot otherwiſe account for, than by conjecturing, that they were confirmed in the error of their predeceſſors, by the particular manner in which the Journals of the Lords take notice of the act, whilſt it was in its progreſs through that houſe as a bill. On the firſt and ſecond reading, which was the ſame day, it is ſtiled a bill concerning Dudley and Empſon, and their attaint and conviction in parliament. Theſe words certainly import a parliamentary attainder, and might well lead any perſon to give credit to the prior repreſentation of its being ſo, without taking the trouble to examine the act, which is not in the later edition of the Statutes. But whether their thus deſcribing the bill was an inaccuracy in the penner of the journal, or the bill was at firſt to attaint, it certainly did not paſs in that form. Indeed the ſubſequent part of the journal takes notice, that the bill was newly formed, before it was ſent to the Commons.]

WHILE the obſequies and rites [of H. VII.] were preparing (a) (the particulars whereof Hall after his manner relates) king Henry retired privately from Richmond (where his father died) to the Tower of London, both that he might with more leiſure adviſe with his council concerning the preſent affairs of his kingdom, as alſo the better to avoid thoſe ſalutes and acclamations of the people, which could not but be unſeaſonable, till the lamentations and ſolemnity of his father's funeral were paſt. He thought not fit to mingle the noiſes. Here then it was in the firſt place reſolved to make good his authority, as having more undoubted right to the crown by the Union of the White-Roſe and the Red in his perſon, than any king ever delivered to us by warrantable hiſtory. For this end he found or took occaſions. In one kind Henry Stafford, brother to the duke of Buckingham, ſerved for example, who (upon I know not what ſuſpicion) was apprehended preſently, and committed to the Tower; which yet ſeemed afterwards ſo frivolous, that, to repair this diſgrace, he was the ſame year made earl of Wiltſhire. In the other kind, doctor Ruthall became the object, being (together with one of his council) made the ſame day biſhop of Dureſme. Thus, though it ſeems he haſted to take upon him the real marks of ſoveraignty, yet he ſo tempered them, as to leave his ſubjects in hope of an even hand. Beſides, that he might ſhew himſelf gracious to his ſubjects, he not only confirmed the pardon his father gave a little before his death for all offences, except murder, felony, and treaſon, (to which general abolitions do not properly reach) but for farther performance of his father's laſt will cauſed a proclamation to be made; that if any man could prove himſelf to be then wrongfully deprived of his goods, by occaſion of a certain commiſſion for forfeitures, he ſhould (upon due complaint) have ſatisfaction; whereupon ſo many petitions were preſently exhibited againſt ſir Richard Empſon and Edmund Dudley, eſq. (employed lately for taking the benefit of penal ſtatutes) that it was thought fit to call them before the council, where Empſon ſpake to this effect: (b)

“ I HAVE remarked two cauſes in general, that move attention. One is the greatneſs, the other is the ſtrangeneſs and novelty of argument. Both theſe concur ſo manifeſtly in the affairs now queſtioned, that I will not much implore your patience. Though on the other ſide, conſidering my violent perſecution, I cannot but think it a favour, that I may ſpeak for myſelf; but (alas) to whom? The king my maſter, to whom I ſhould appeal, as to my ſupreme judge and protector, abandons me to my enemies, without other cauſe, than that I obeyed his father's commands, and upheld the regal authority. The people, on whoſe equal tryal I ſhould put my life, ſeek my deſtruction, only becauſe I endeavour to execute thoſe laws whereof themſelves were authors. What would have happened to me, if I had diſobeyed my king, or broke my country's laws? Surely, if I have any ways tranſgreſſed, it is in procuring, that theſe penal ſtatutes might be obſerved, which your ſelves in open parliament decreed, and to which you then ſubmitted, both your perſons, eſtates, and poſterity; and if this be a crime, why do you not firſt repeal your proper acts? Or if (which is truth) they ſtand ſtill in full force and vertue, why do you not vindicate from all imputation both your ſelves and me? For who ever yet ſaw any man condemn'd for doing juſtice? Eſpecially when by the chief diſpencer thereof (which is the king) the whole frame of the proceeding hath been confirmed and warranted? Nay, whoever ſaw man on theſe terms not rewarded? And muſt that, which is the life and ſtrength of all other actions, be the ſubverſion and overthrow of mine? Have you read or heard in any well-governed country, that the infractors of laws made by publick vote, and conſent, eſcaped without puniſhment, and they only puniſhed who laboured to ſuſtain them? Or when you had not read or heard any ſuch thing, could you imagine a more certain ſign of ruine in that common-wealth. And will you alone hope to decline this heavy judgment? When, contrary to all equity and example, you not only make precedents for injuſtice and impunity, but together with defaming would inflict a cruel death on thoſe who would maintain them; as if this might be a fit guerdon for thoſe who (I muſt tell you) every where elſe would have been thought the beſt patriots; what can we expect then, but a fatal period to us all? But let God turn this away, though I be the ſacrifice. Only, if I muſt die, let me deſire that my enditement may be entered on no record, nor divulged to foreign nations, leſt, if they hear, in my condemnation, all that may argue a final diſſolution in government, they invade and overcome you.”

To this was anſwered briefly, “ That he received a great deal of liberty to ſpeak ill, as well as to do: that he ſhould find at laſt, he was puniſhed for paſſing the bounds of his commiſſion from the late King, and for ſtretching a law which in it's ſelf was ſevere enough to the common and poorer ſort of people, from whom he exacted moſt unjuſtly.” The chief parts of his accuſation (that I can find) were, (c)

“ 1. That he had committed divers perſons to priſon, without ſuffering them to anſwer till they had compounded for their fines.

“ 2. For ſearching unduly mens eſtates, and bringing them wrongfully to hold under that tenure they call in capite; without that the parties could be permitted to a traverſe, till they had payed great fines and ranſoms.

“ 3. That wards, being come to full years, were not allowed to ſue out their livery, till they had paid an exceſſive compoſition.

“ 4. That out lawed perſons could not be allowed to ſue out their charter of pardon, till they had paid half the profit of their lands for two years, upon pretence that it was according to law.

“ 5. That he uſurped upon the juriſdiction of other courts, in hearing and determining divers matters properly belonging to them.

“ 6. Laſtly, That whereas a priſoner being indicted for theft, in the city of Coventry, to the value of one pound, was by the jury acquitted; the ſaid Empſon conceiving the evidence to be ſufficient, committed the jury to priſon, till they entered into bond to appear before the king's council, where the matter being again conſidered, it was ordered, they ſhould pay eight pounds for a fine (which was thought ſo heinous, as, at a ſeſſions being held afterwards at Coventry, a particular indictment was framed againſt him, and he was found guilty).” How many of theſe allegations were verified, or how far they might be warranted by the laſt king's commiſſion, appears not to me. Howſoever, for the preſent, they were (d) committed to the Tower.

This Empſon, reported to be a ſieve-maker's ſon in Torceſter, from this mean beginning, by his wit and induſtry, came to be of council to king Henry VII. and maſter or ſurveyor of his forfeits in divers kinds, in which place he ſerved as an inſtrument for raiſing great ſums to the king; Dudley (a gentleman of birth, and ſuch parts as he was choſen ſpeaker of the parliament-houſe (e) 19 Henry VII.) aſſiſting him. Theſe men (called by Polydore Virgil, Judices Fiſcales) having it ſeems exceeded their bounds, were deteſted of all, but eſpecially the poorer ſort, who found it eaſier to hate than to pay. To ſatisfy their complaints therefore, it was thought fit to permit them to the ordinary ways of juſtice: the promoters they uſed being ſo ſeverely puniſhed in the mean time, betwixt the pillory and ſhame, that they dy'd all (a few days after) in priſon, ſave one Giovanni Baptiſta Grimaldi, who, foreſeeing the ſtorm, took ſanctuary in Weſtminſter.

Empſon and Dudley being (as is aboveſaid) committed to the Tower, new and ſtrange crimes were found and objected againſt them, as appears in their indictments upon record, wherein, they are accuſed of conſpiracy againſt the king and ſtate; and firſt, that during the ſickneſs of the late king in March laſt, they ſummoned certain of their friends to be in arms at an hour's warning; and upon the death of the ſaid king, to haſten to London. Out of which, and other circumſtances, it was collected by the jury, that their intent was to ſeize on the perſon of the new king, and ſo to aſſume the ſole government; or when they could not attain this, to deſtroy him.

Of which crimes, how improbable ſoever, Dudley in his tryal at Guildhall in London, July 16, 1509, and Empſon at Northampton, October 1, were found guilty by their juries, and both condemned of treaſon, and ſo remanded to the Tower.

Empſon and Dudley lying now in priſon, condemned and attainted by parliament, the importunate clamours of the people prevailing with the king in this year's progreſs, he not only reſtored divers mulcts, but for further ſatisfaction to the commonalty (by a ſpecial writ) commanded to have their heads ſtruck off, Auguſt 18, doing therein (as thought by many) more like a good King, than a good Maſter.

[Some account of this trial is to be met with in various writers, excluſive of the notice taken of it by our more modern hiſtorians. It is ſlightly mentioned by Polydore Virgil, whoſe hiſtory firſt came out within eleven or twelve years after the event; and from him it appears, that the proſecution originated from the malice of one Charles Knevet, who, having been removed from the ſtewardſhip of ſome of the duke's eſtates for oppreſſing the tenants, in revenge turned informer againſt his former maſter, and betrayed him to his great and powerful enemy cardinal Wolſey. ABOUT this time Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham, eminent for his high blood, and large revenue, drew on himſelf a dangerous ſuſpicion; which though it was again fomented by the cardinal, who diſaffected him for ſome ſpeeches he had caſt forth, yet, could not have overthrown him, but that ſome indiſcretion of his own concurred. Beſides, he ſuffered much through the ill offices of Charles Knevet, formerly mentioned; who yet durſt not appear, till he ſaw the duke not only diſcountenanced, but weakened in his friends and allies. And of theſe I find two principally; one, Henry Percy earl of Northumberland, whoſe daughter the duke had married; the other, Thomas earl of Surrey, who had married the duke's daughter. Againſt Northumberland, cauſe was taken for claiming certain wards; which, after cloſe commitment, yet, he was forced to relinquiſh. Againſt Surrey the cardinal proceeded otherwiſe: for, though he hated him for drawing his dagger at him on ſome occaſion; yet as the earl was more wary than to give new offence, he thought fit to ſend him away upon ſome honourable employment for which he found this overture.

Gerald Fitz-Gerald, earl of Kildare, made deputy in Ireland to Henry duke of York, (now king, who at (a) four years old was by his father made lieutenant of that country) having done divers good ſervices againſt the rebels, was made (b) knight of the garter, and enjoyed that place till his death (c); when his ſon Gerald being ſubſtitute therein, ſo behaved himſelf, as he likewiſe got much credit: though, as he had the houſe of Ormond his enemy, and particularly ſir Pierce Butler earl of Oſſory, (d) ſecret ill offices were done him. Nor did it avail, that he had given his ſiſter in marriage to the ſaid Butler, and helped him to recover the earldom of Ormond, detained wrongfully, ſince the death of James, by a baſtard of that family: for it was impoſſible to oblige him; eſpecially, where he found ſo advantageous an occaſion to diſſent. For as he watched over the earl of Deſmond, his perpetual adverſary, ſince the diviſion of Lancaſter and York, (in which his anceſtors were on the ſide of Lancaſter, and the Kildares and Deſmonds on that of York), he diſcovered more favours done the preſent earl of Deſmond, (whom he called a traytor) than he thought due to him; inſomuch that he complained to the cardinal, who thereupon ſent for Kildare. Though Polydore ſaith, he came voluntarily into England to match with ſome Engliſh lady, and there behaved himſelf ſo unreſpectfully to the cardinal, that he was caſt into priſon. But whatſoever the cauſe was, his charge was beſtowed on the earl of Surrey, who going to Ireland in April 1520, reduced the earl of Deſmond and others to obedience.

The duke of Buckingham being thus expoſed and unfriended, the cardinal treats ſecretly with Knevet, concerning him; who thereupon diſcovers his late maſter's life; confeſſing, that the duke, by way of diſcourſe, was accuſtomed to ſay, how he meant ſo to uſe the matter, that, if king Henry died without iſſue, he would attain the crown, and that he would puniſh the cardinal. Beſides, that he had ſpoken hereof unto George Nevill lord Abergavenny, who married the ſaid duke's daughter. By what means yet the duke intended particularly to effect theſe deſigns, I do not find exactly ſet down by Charles Knevet. Neither do the authors, who write hereof, relate his pedigree; only our Heralds ſay, he was deſcended from Anne Plantagenet, daughter of Thomas of Woodſtock, ſon to king Edward the third. How far this yet might entitle him to the crown, in caſe king Henry ſhould have no iſſue, I have neither leiſure nor diſpoſition to examine. I ſhall only therefore, for ſatisfaction of the reader, ſelect ſome principal points out of his indictment; leaving the reader, for the reſt, unto the ſearch of the record: In which, the points that in my opinion made moſt againſt the duke, were; 1. That at (e) ſeveral times he had ſent to one Hopkins, a monk in the priory of Henton, to be informed by him, concerning the matters he imagined; and that the monk ſhould return anſwer, the duke ſhould have all; and therefore ſhould labour to procure the love of the people. 2. That the duke (f) afterwards ſhould go in perſon to the ſaid Hopkins, who confirmed the ſaid prediction, adding, that he knew it by revelation. Whereupon the ſaid duke ſhould give him ſeveral rewards. 3. That he ſhould (g) ſpeak to Ralph Nevill earl of Weſtmorland (his ſon-in-law), that, if aught but good come to the king, the duke of Buckingham ſhould be next in blood to the crown, the king having as yet no iſſue. That, to comply herewith, he did many things which argued ambition, and deſire to make himſelf popular. That he (h) ſaid to one Gilbert, his chancellor, that whatſoever was done by the king's father, was done by wrong; murmuring withal againſt the preſent government. 4. And to the ſaid Charles Knevet, that if he had been committed to the Tower, (whereof he was in danger, upon occaſion of one ſir William Bulmer) he would have ſo wrought, that the principal doers thereof ſhould not have cauſe of great rejoycing; for he would have plaid the part which his father intended to have put in practice againſt king Richard the third at Saliſbury, who made earneſt ſuit to come into the preſence of the ſaid king, which ſuit, if he might have obtained, he having a knife ſecretly about him, would have thruſt it into the body of king Richard, as he had made ſemblance to kneel down before him. And that, in ſpeaking theſe words, he maliciouſly laid hands on his dagger, ſwearing, that, if he were ſo evil uſed, he would do his beſt to accompliſh his intended purpoſe. 5. That (i) being in ſpeech with ſir George Nevill, knight, lord Abergavenny, he ſaid, that if the king died, he would have the rule of the realm, in ſpight of whoſoever ſaid the contrary; ſwearing, that if the lord Abergavenny revealed this, he would fight with him. This I conceive to be the ſubſtance of the moſt ſpecial articles in the evidence; which the courteous reader yet may do well to conſider more at large, as they are extant on record. How far yet theſe particulars were proved, and in what ſort, my authors deliver not. Only I find (out of our records) that the duke of Buckingham being committed to the Tower, April 16th, did, under his own hand, declare to ſir Thomas Lovell, conſtable of the Tower, the paſſages betwixt him and Hopkins, in this manner; that is to ſay, That the ſummer before our King made war in France (k), Hopkins ſent for him; but, not being able to go, he commanded one Delacour, his chaplain, to repair thither; howbeit, that Hopkins ſaid nought to him; yet that himſelf came the next Lent; where, in ſhrift, the ſaid monk told him, that our king ſhould win great honour in his journey to France; and that if the king of Scots came to England then, he ſhould never go home again. And that, when he aſked Hopkins how he knew this (l), he ſaid, ex Deo habeo; It is revealed to me of God. And that Hopkins demanding afterward what children the king had had, he told the number; and that Hopkins ſhould ſay thereupon, I pray God his iſſue continue; for that he feared God was not contented, becauſe he made no reſtitution according to his father's will, charging the duke further to adviſe the king's council to make reſtitution. Further, That he told his chancellor thoſe words, and at his return out of France, came to Hopkins again, and ſaid, he had told him true: Alſo, that (another time) he came to Hopkins, together with his ſon Stafford, and the earl of Weſtmorland; and that Hopkins aſked who he was? and thereupon ſhould ſay, that ſome of his blood or name ſhould prove great men. And that, after this, Hopkins ſhould ſend to the duke, to pray him, according to his promiſe, to help their houſe (being at Henton in Somerſetſhire) to make their conduit; the ten pounds, formerly given by him, being ſpent. And more than this he confeſſed not. Notwithſtanding which, when the indictment was openly read, the duke ſaid, it was falſe, untrue, conſpired, and forged (m), to bring him to his death; alledging (as he was an eloquent perſon) many reaſons to falſify the indictment. The king's attorney, on the other ſide, producing the examinations, confeſſions, and proofs of witneſſes; the duke hereupon deſired the witneſſes (n), which were Knevet, Gilbert, Delacour, and Hopkins, to be brought forth. Theſe confirming their depoſitions, the duke was tried by his peers, (being a duke, a marquis, ſeven earls, and twelve barons) before the duke of Norfolk, who was for the time made lord high ſteward of England (a). They condemning him, the duke of Norfolk delivered his ſentence, not without tears. To which he replyed; My lord of Norfolk, you have ſaid as a traytor ſhould be ſaid unto, but I was never one. But, my lords, I nothing malign for what you have done to me; but the eternal God forgive you my death, and I do. I ſhall never ſue to the king for life: howbeit, he is a gracious prince, and more grace may come from him, than I deſire. And ſo I deſire you, my lords, and all my fellows, to pray for me. Whereupon he was brought back to the Tower; where all the favour he received was a meſſage from the king, declaring his ſentence was mitigated ſo far, that, inſtead of receiving the death of a traytor, he ſhould have only his head cut off. Thus ended the duke of Buckingham (b), much lamented by the people, (who libelled the cardinal for it, calling him Carnificis filium, Son of a Butcher,) as being thought rather criminal through folly and raſh words, than any intention declared by overt-act againſt the king's perſon; and therefore not uncapable of his mercy; which alſo it was thought would not have been denyed, had he ſued for it in fitting terms. But ſince at his arraignment, he did, as it were, diſclaim his life, he would not obtrude it; and therefore only cauſed a letter of comfort to be written to the dutcheſs, and lord Stafford. Yet the tragedy ended not ſo; for though George lord Abergavenny, after a few months impriſonment, was, through the king's favour, delivered; yet Hopkins, after a ſerious repentance that he had been an author of ſo much miſchief, dyed of grief. And here I muſt obſerve, that together with this duke, that great place of high-conſtable of England remains extinguiſhed, unleſs ſome extraordinary occaſion revive it.

[Lord Herbert's ſtate of the effect of the indictment, not being nearly ſo full as Stowe's, and there being alſo ſome further particulars in the latter, perhaps his account of the trial may be acceptable to ſome readers. The following extract from Stowe's Chronicle is therefore added.]

Extract from Stowe's Chronicle, Howes's ed. p. 510, to 513.

IN this meane time Edward duke of Buckingham was accuſed of high treaſon, wherefore the king directed his letters to the ſaid duke, being at his mannor of Thornebury in Gloceſterſhire, that incontinently he ſhould come to his preſence, which commandement the duke obeyed, and came to London, where hee was ſtraight wayes arreſted by ſir Henry Marney captaine of the gard, and conveyed to the Tower of London on the 16. of Aprill: before which time ſir Gilbert Parke the dukes chancellor was taken, which had confeſſed matter of high treaſon, concerning the kings perſon. There was alſo attached one Nicholas Hopkins a monk of the order of Carthuſians, being of Henton priory in Somerſetſhire, and John de la Court the dukes confeſſor, and others. Theſe were priſoners in the Tower.

(c) After the apprehenſion of the duke, inquiſitions were taken in divers ſhires of him, ſo that by the knights and gentlemen he was indicted of high treaſon for certaine words ſpoken by the ſaid duke at Blechingly in Surrey, to George Nevill lord Burgaveny, and therewith was the ſame lord attached for concealement, and ſo likewiſe was the lord Montague, and both conveied to the Tower: and ſir Edward Nevill brother to the ſaid lord of Burgaveny was forbidden the kings preſence.

Moreover, in the Guildhall of London, before ſir John Bruge knight, then maior of the ſame city, by an inqueſt, the ſaid duke was indicted of divers points of high treaſon, as by the ſame inditement (which I have ſeene and read) it appeareth, inferring, that the ſaid duke intending to exalt himſelfe, and to uſurpe the crowne, the royall power, and dignity of the realme of England, and to deprive the king thereof, that hee the ſayde duke might take upon him the ſame againſt his allegeance, had the tenth day of March, in the ſecond yeere of the kings raigne and at divers times before, and after, imagined and compaſſed the kings death and deſtruction at London, and at Thornebury in the county of Gloceſter: and for the accompliſhment of the wicked intent and purpoſe, the 24. of Aprill, in the fourth yeere of the kings raygne, he ſent one of his chaplaines called John de la Court, unto the priory of Henton in Somerſetſhire, which was an houſe of Carthuſian monkes, there to underſtand of one Nicholas Hopkins, a monke of the ſame houſe (who was vainely reputed by way of revelation to have foreknowledge of things to come) what ſhould happen concerning this matter, which he had imagined: which monke, cauſing the ſaid de la Court firſt to ſweare unto him, not to diſcloſe his words to any manner of perſon, but onely to the duke his maſter, therewith declared that his maſter the ſaid duke ſhould have all, willing him for the accompliſhment of his purpoſe to ſeeke to winne the favour of the people. De la Court came backe with this anſwere, and told it to the duke at Thornebury the morrow after, being the 25. of Aprill. And on the 22. of July the ſame fourth yeere, the duke ſent the ſame de la Court with letters unto the ſaide monke, to underſtand of him further of ſuch matters, and the monke told to him againe for anſwere, that the duke ſhould have all: and beeing aſked as well now as before at the firſt time, how he knew this to bee true, he ſaide by the grace of God, and with this anſwere, de la Court now alſo returning, declared the ſame unto the duke, on the 24. of July at Thornebury aforeſaid. Moreover, the ſaide duke ſent the ſame de la Court againe unto the ſaid monke with his letters the 26. of Aprill, in the 5. yeere of the kings raigne, when the king was to take his journey into France, requiring to underſtand what ſhould become of theſe warres, and whether the Scottiſh king ſhould in the kings abſence invade this realme or not. The monke among other things, for anſwere of theſe letters, ſent the duke word that the king ſhould have no iſſue male. Againe, the ſaid duke the 20 day of Feb. in the 6. yeere of the kings raigne, being at *Thorneb*ury, ſpake theſe words unto Ralph earle of Weſtmerland: Well, there are two dukes created in England, but if ought but good come to the king, the duke of Buckingham ſhould be next in blood to ſucceede to the crowne. After this the ſaid duke on the 16. day of Aprill, in the ſaid ſixt yeere of the kings raigne, went in perſon unto the priory of Henton, and there had conference with the foreſaid monke Nicholas Hopkins, who told him, that hee ſhould bee king: whereunto the duke ſaid, that if it chanced, hee would ſhew himſelfe a juſt and right wiſe prince. The monke alſo told the duke that he knew this by revelation, and willed him in any wiſe to procure the love of the commons, the better to attayne his purpoſed intention. The duke the ſame time gave, and promiſed to give yeerely unto the ſaide priory 6. pound, therewith to buy a tunne of wine; and further promiſed to give unto the ſaid priory in ready money twenty pounds, whereof ten pounds he gave in hand, towards the conveying the water unto the houſe by conduit. And to the ſaide monke Nicholas Hopkins, he gave at that preſent in reward three pound, and at one other time forty ſhillings, and at another time a marke, and at another time ſixe ſhillings and eight-pence. After this, on the twentieth day of March, in the tenth yeere of the kings raigne, he came to the ſame priory, and eftſoones had conference with the ſaide monke, to bee more fully informed by him in the matters above ſpecified, at what time the monke alſo told him that he ſhould be king, and the duke in talke tolde the monke, that he had done very well to binde his chaplaine John de la Court, under the ſeale of confeſſion, to keepe ſecret ſuch matters, for if the king ſhould come to knowledge thereof, it would be his deſtruction. Likewiſe, the twentieth day of October, in the ſeventh yeere of the kings raigne, and at divers other times, as well before as after, the ſaide duke had ſent his chancellor Robert Gilbert, chaplaine, unto London, there to buy certaine clothes of golde, ſilver, and velvets, every time ſo much as amounted to the value of three hundred pound, to the intent, that the ſaide duke might beſtow the ſame, as well upon knights, eſquires, and gentlemen of the kings houſe, and yeomen of his gard, as upon other the kings ſubjects, to winne their favours and friendſhips to aſſiſt him in his evill purpoſe: which clothes the ſaide Gilbert did buy, and brought the ſame to the ſaid duke, who on the 20. day of January in the ſaide ſeventh yeere, and divers other dayes and yeeres before and after, did diſtribute, and give the ſame to certaine of the kings ſubjects, for the purpoſe before recited. Furthermore, the ſaide duke the tenth of July, in the tenth yeere of the kings raigne, and divers other dayes and times, as well before as after, did conſtitute more ſeverall and particular offices in his caſtles, honors, lordſhips, and lands, than hee was accuſtomed to have, to the end they might bee aſſiſtant to him under colour of offices, to bring his evill purpoſe to paſſe. Moreover, the ſame duke ſent to the king the tenth day of May, in the ninth yeere of his raigne, for licence to retaine any of the kings ſubjects, whom it ſhould pleaſe him, dwelling within the ſhires of Hereford, Glouceſter, and Somerſetſhire: and alſo, that he might at his pleaſure convey divers armours, and habilements for warre into Wales, to the intent to uſe the ſame againſt the king, for the accompliſhment of his naughty purpoſe, which was to deſtroy the king, and to uſurpe the roial government and power to himſelfe: which ſuite for licence to have retayners, and to convey ſuch armours and habilements of war, the ſaid Gilbert the twentieth day of May, in the ſayde ninth yeere, and divers other dayes before and after at London, and Eaſt Greenewich did follow, labouring earneſtly, both to the king and counſell, for obtaining of the ſame. And the twentieth day of July, in the ſaid ninth yeere, the ſaid duke ſent the ſaid Gilbert unto Henton aforeſaide, to underſtand of the aforeſaid monke Nicholas Hopkins what hee heard of him; and the monke ſent him word, that before Chriſtmas next there ſhould be a change, and that the duke ſhould have the rule and government of all England. And moreover, the twentieth day of February, in the eleventh yeere of the kings raigne, at Blechingly in Surrey, the ſayde duke ſayde unto the ſaide Robert Gilbert his chancellor, that he did expect and tarry for a time more convenient to atchieve his purpoſe, and that it might eaſily bee done, if the nobles of the realme would declare their mindes together: but ſome of them miſtruſted and feared to ſhew their mindes. Hee ſayde further the ſame time unto the ſaide Robert Gilbert, that whatſoever was done by the kings father, was done by wrong: and ſtill the duke murmured againſt all that the king then preſently raigning did. And further he ſaid, that he knew himſelfe to be ſo wicked a ſinner, that hee wanted Gods favour, and therefore he knew, that whatſoever he tooke in hand againſt the king had the worſe ſucceſſe. And furthermore, the ſaide duke (to alienate the kings ſubjects mindes from dutifull obedience, towards him and his heires, the twentieth of September, in the firſt yeere of his raigne) beeing then at London, reported to Robert Gilbert, that he had a certaine writing, ſealed with the kings great ſeale, comprehending a certaine act of parliament, in the which it was enacted, that the duke of Somerſet, one of the kings progenitors, was made legitimate. And further, that the ſaid duke meant to have delivered the ſame writing unto king Henry the ſeventh, But (ſaid he) I would not that I had ſo done for ten thouſand pounds. And furthermore, the ſame duke the fourth day of November, in the eleventh yeere of the kings raygne, at Eaſt Greenewich in the county of Kent, ſaid unto one Charles Knevet eſquire, after the king had reprooved the duke for retayning William Bulmer knight unto his ſervice, that if he had perceived that he ſhould have bin committed to the Tower, as he doubted he ſhould have beene, he would have ſo wrought, that the principall doers therein ſhould not have had cauſe of great rejoycing, for he would have played the part, which his father intended to have put in practiſe againſt king Richard the 3. at Saliſbury, who made earneſt ſuit to have come to the preſence of the ſame king Richard, which ſuite if hee might have obtained, he having a knife ſecretly about him, would have thruſt it into the body of king Richard, as he had made ſemblance to kneele downe before him:

and in ſpeaking theſe words, he maliciouſly laid his hand upon his dagger, and ſaid, that if he were ſo evill uſed, he would doe his beſt to accompliſh his pretended purpoſe, ſwearing to confirme his word, by the blood of our Lord. And beſide all this, the ſame duke the 10. of May, in the 12. yeere of the kings raigne at London, in a place called the Roſe, within the pariſh of S. Laurence Poultney in Canwike-ſtreet ward, demanded of the ſaid Charles Knevet eſquire what was the talke amongſt the Londoners, concerning the kings journey beyond the ſeas: and the ſaid Charles told him, that many ſtoode in doubt of the journey, leſt the Frenchmen meant ſome deceit towards the king: whereunto the duke anſwered, it was to be feared leſt it would come to paſſe, according to the words of an holy monke: For there is (ſaith he) a certaine Charter-houſe monke, that divers times hath ſent to mee, willing mee to ſend unto him my chancellor, and I did ſend unto him J. de la Court my chaplain, unto whom hee would not declare any thing, till de la Court had ſworne unto him to keepe all things ſecret, and to tel to no creature living what he ſhould heare of him, except it were to me; and the ſaid monke told de la Court, that neither the king nor his heires ſhould proſper, and that I ſhould endeavour myſelfe to purchaſe the good wils of the communality of England, for I (the ſame duke) and my blood ſhould proſper and have the rule of the realme of England. Then ſaid Charles Knevet, The monke may be deceived through illuſion of the devil, and that it was evill to meddle with ſuch matters. Well, ſaid the duke, it cannot hurt me, and ſo the duke ſeemed to rejoyce in the monkes words. And further, the ſame time the duke told the ſaid Charles, that if the king had miſcarryed now in his laſt ſicknes, hee would have chopped off the heads of the cardinall, of ſir Thomas Lovell knight, and of others: and alſo ſaid, that he had rather die for it, than to bee ſo uſed as he had beene. Moreover, the 10. day of September in the ſaid 11. yeere of this kings raigne, at Blechingly in the county of Surrey, walking in the gallery there with George Nevill knight, l. of Burgaveny, the duke murmuring againſt the kings counſellors, and their government, ſaid unto the ſaid George, that if the king died, he would have the rule of the realme in ſpite of whoſoever ſaid the contrary, and withall ſaid, that if the ſaid l. of Burgaveny would ſay, that the duke had ſpoken ſuch words, hee would fight with him, and lay his ſword upon his pate, and this he bound with many great oaths.---Theſe were the points and articles compriſed in the indictment, and laid to his charge, whereof he was by the inqueſt found guilty.

On the 13. of May, the ſaid duke was brought from the Tower by water unto Weſtminſter-hall, before the duke of Norffolke high ſteward of England, to accompliſh the high appeale of the peere or peeres of the realme, and to diſcerne and judge the cauſe of the peeres. There were alſo appointed to ſit as peeres and judges upon the duke of Buckingham, the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dorſet, the earles of Worceſter, Devonſhire, Eſſex, Shrewſbury, Kent, Oxford, and Darby, the lords of S. Johns, de la Ware, Fitz Waren, Willoughby, Brooke, Cobham, Herbert, and Morley. There was made within the hall at Weſtminſter a ſcaffold for theſe lords, and a preſence for the judge railed, and counter-railed about, and barred with degrees. When the lords had taken their place, the duke was brought to the barre, and upon his arraignement pleaded not guilty, and put himſelfe upon his peeres. Then was the indictement read, which the duke denyed to bee true, and (as he was an eloquent man) alleaged reaſons to falſifie the indictement, very pithily. The kings attorney againſt the dukes reaſons, alleaged the examinations, confeſſions and proofes of witneſſes. The duke deſired the witneſſes might bee brought forth: and then came before him Charles Knevet, ſir Gilbert Perke his chancellor, John de la Court his confeſſor, and Nicholas Hopkins the monke of Henton, that had fed his humour with vaine ſpeeches: divers preſumptions and accuſations were laid to him by Charles Knevet, which hee would have covered. But the depoſitions being read, and the deponents delivered priſoners to the officers of the Tower, finally, he was found guilty by his peeres, and having judgement to ſuffer as in caſe of treaſon is uſed, was led againe to his barge, and ſo conveyed, by water, to the Temple ſtaires, where he was ſet a land, and from thence by land through London to the Tower with the axe afore him, ſir William Sands having him by the right arme, and ſir Nicholas Vaux by the left arme. And on the 17. of May, being the Fryday before Whitſunday, he was delivered to the ſheriffes of London, who led him to the ſcaffold on the Tower-hill, about 11. of the clocke, and there he was beheaded, in the preſence of ſir Thomas Lovel and all the people; his body with the head was borne by the fryers Auguſtines to their church, and there buried in the chappell church for the cloſe. And now followeth the publication at the diſgrading of the ſaide Edward late duke of Buckingham, knight and companion of the moſt noble order of S. George, named the Gartar, which was read and publiſhed by Gartar King at Armes, at the feaſt of Saint George, in the quire of Windſore-Colledge, ſtanding on the high paſe at the dexe, all the other officers of armes about him, there being alſo preſent the lord marques Dorſet knight of the ſame order, then being the kings deputy for the feaſt, the earle of Eſſex, the earle of Wilſhire, the earle of Kent, ſir Thomas Lovel, and the lord la Ware, knights of the ſaid order, with other great audience aſſembled there on the eight of June, the thirteene yeere of Henry the eight, the yeere of Chriſt, 1521.

Bee it knowne unto all men, that whereas Edward late duke of Buckingham, knight and companion of the noble order of Saint George, named the Gartar, hath lately done and committed high treaſon againſt the king our ſoveraigne lord, and ſoveraigne of the ſaide order of the Gartar, in compaſſing and imagining the deſtruction of the moſt noble perſon of our ſaid ſoveraigne lord the king, contrary to his oath and due allegeance, and for the which high treaſon the ſaid Edward hath bin indicted, arraigned, convicted, and attainted, for the which deteſtable offence and high treaſon, the ſaide Edward hath deſerved to bee diſgraded of the ſaid noble order, and expelled out of the ſaide company, and not worthy that his armes, enſignes, and hachments ſhould remaine among other noble enſignes of the other noble, vertuous, and approoved knights of the ſaid noble order, nor have the benefit of the ſaid noble order: wherefore our ſaid ſoveraigne lord the king, ſoveraigne of the ſaid noble order of Saint George, named the Gartar, by the advice of the other knights of the ſaid noble order, for his ſaide offences, and committing of the ſaid high treaſon, willeth and commandeth that the ſaid Edward duke of Buckingham be diſgraded of the ſaid noble order, and his armes, enſignes, and hachments cleerely expelled, and put from among the armes, enſignes, and hachments of the other noble knights of the ſaide order, to the intent, that all other noble men thereby may take enſample hereafter, not to committe any ſuch haynous and deteſtable treaſon and offences, as God forbid they ſhould.

God ſave the King.

It is to be remembred, that Somerſet Herault was in the roode loft behind the hachments of the ſaide duke Edward: and when Gartar ſpake theſe words, expelled and put from the armes, then the ſaide Somerſet violently caſt downe into the quire, his creaſt, his banner, and ſword. And when the publication was all done, the officers of armes ſpurned the ſaide hachment with their feete out of the quire into the body of the church, firſt the ſword, and then the banner, and then was the creaſt ſpurned out of the ſaid quire through the church out at the weſt doore, and ſo to the bridge, where it was ſpurned over into the ditch. And thus was the ſaid Edward late duke of Buckingham fully diſgraded of the order of Saint George, named the Gartar.

[It is well known, that, by the attainder of the duke of Buckingham, *the ſubject of the preceding trial, the great office of high conſtable, which was hereditary in his family, reverted to the crown, and has ever ſince reſted dormant, except when granted for particular occaſions, ſuch as a coronation, and the holding of a court of the high conſtable. The execution of the duke of Buckingham was ſoon after followed with a parliamentary attainder of him; the reaſon of which is not very obvious; unleſs indeed this ſanction was added, that the two houſes might have their ſhare of the odium of his death with the king, his then miniſter cardinal Wolſey, and the particular peers by whom the duke was condemned. Ro. But the attainder was ſoon afterwards reverſed by act of parliament, and ſo the titles revived in his eldeſt ſon, who in* 1688 was created earl of Stafford. But after three deſcents the earldom, for want of heirs male, became extinct in 1762. Whether the titles of viſcount and baron are alſo extinct for the like reaſon, we cannot inform the reader. See Dugd. Baron. ubi ſupra, and Collins's Peer. tit. duke of Norfolk. In the lateſt book of extinct peerage, the titles baron and viſcount are included with the earldom. But unleſs they were confined to heirs male in the ſame manner, which is not very probable as to the barony, it being of great antiquity, it is poſſible, that the right to them, or at leaſt the barony, may ſtill be ſubſiſting in ſome perſon who is ignorant of it. To ſuch as are allied to either of the noble families of Stafford, and Stafford Howard, this notice cannot prove unacceptable; unleſs they are ſo blameably deficient in ſenſibility, as to be indifferent about the remnant of the ſplendid titles, offices, and honours, which rendered the laſt Stafford, who poſſeſſed the dukedom, dukedom, an object of jealouſy even to his ſovereign. Of other readers we beg pardon for rather exceeding what, in ſtrictneſs, is the proper purpoſe of our annotations.

Since the foregoing note was written, we have been honoured with ſome information, which confirms our conjecture, that the barony of Stafford is not extinct. It ſeems, that the heirs of the laſt earl of Stafford but one, at his death, were three ſiſters, in conſequence of which the barony became in abeyance. Mary, one of them, married count Rohan Chabot in France, but is now dead without iſſue. Her two ſiſters are both nuns in France. But on their deaths, which, as they are profeſſed perſons, is moſt likely to be without iſſue, the abeyance will probably ceaſe; the preſent lady Jerningham, who is niece of the laſt earl of Stafford, being ſingly, as we are told, the next in the ſucceſſion to the barony, and having ſeveral ſons. We alſo underſtand, that part of the family eſtates is now in the poſſeſſion of this latter lady, under the will of her couſin the counteſs of Rohan Chabot.]

IV. The Trial of John Fisher, Biſhop of Rocheſter, before Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, at Weſtminſter, for High Treaſon, 17*th* June, 27 Hen. VIII. 1535.

[The reverend prelate, whoſe trial we now offer to the reader, was one of the moſt eminent ſufferers in the reign of Henry the eighth, for oppoſing the king's divorce from his firſt queen, and his claim to the ſupremacy over the church of England. Opinions ſo averſe to that prince's views and paſſions, involved the biſhop in three different proſecutions. The firſt was on a charge of miſpriſion of treaſon, in concealing the predictions againſt the king, made by the famous viſionary Elizabeth Barton, known by the name of the Holy Maid of Kent; one of whoſe prophecies denounced, that, if the king did not deſiſt from the divorce, but married again, he ſhould not continue king more than a month after. For this offence the biſhop was included in the act for puniſhing Elizabeth Barton and her accomplices; but was one of thoſe, whom the act attainted of miſpriſion of treaſon only. This act was paſſed in January 1533-4. See 25 Hen. VIII. c. 12. Raſtall's edit. of Stat. The ſame parliament paſſed a law, which declared Henry's firſt marriage void, confirmed his marriage with Anna Bolloigne, made it treaſon to do or ſay any thing in derogation from the latter marriage, and required every perſon to take an oath to adhere to the contents of the ſtatute, making it miſpriſion of treaſon to refuſe the oath. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 22. and 26 Hen. VIII. c. 2. It was for refuſing the oath formed on the 25 Hen. VIII. that the biſhop endured a ſecond proſecution; for on that account the next parliament attainted him of miſpriſion of treaſon, and deprived him of his biſhoprick. See 26 Hen. VIII. c. 3. of private acts. The third proſecution, which terminated with the biſhop's life, ſoon followed. The ſtatute of the 26 Hen. VIII. annexed the title of ſupreme head of the church to the crown; and by another ſtatute of the ſame parliament, it was made high treaſon by words or writing to attempt depriving the king of any of his titles. 26 Hen. VIII. c. 1, and 13. The operation of theſe two laſt ſtatutes gave the opportunity of reaching the life of the biſhop, who, as will appear from the following trial, having been enſnared into a denial of the king's being ſupreme head of the church, after the acceſſion of that title, was therefore deemed to come within the ſucceeding ſtatute, which made it treaſon to deny the king any of his titles.

The following trial is extracted from a very ſcarce book, which was printed in 1655, with a title deſcribing it as the life of biſhop Fiſher, by Dr. Thomas Bailey. But the real author, according to Biſhop Tanner and others, was Dr. Richard Hall, who wrote ſeveral pieces in the reign of Elizabeth. Tann. Bibliothec. Britannic. Hibern. voce Hall Edwardus. In number 7049 of the Harleian MSS. at the Britiſh Muſeum, there is a life of biſhop Fiſher, which contains an account of his trial in the ſame words as the printed life.

It is proper to apprize the reader, that the book, whence we borrow the trial, was certainly written by a very zealous Roman Catholic, and that on other accounts he ſhould be believed with caution. The writer throughout ſtrenuouſly ſupports the Pope's claim of the ſupremacy. He relates a very improbable ſtory of queen Anna Bolleyne, accuſing her of great indignity to the head of biſhop Fiſher after his execution, and of even ſtriking it. His book is alſo full of miracles; one of which is, that, though the biſhop's head was parboiled, and the weather was very warm, when exhibited on London-Bridge, it not only continued fourteen days without waſting, but in that time daily grew ſo much freſher, that the biſhop was never ſeen to look ſo well. However, ſo far as regards the relation of the trial, it muſt be confeſſed, that it carries with it great appearance of truth; and more eſpecially ſeems to deſerve credit, becauſe the hard meaſure it repreſents the biſhop to have experienced at his trial, ſo much reſembles what we read in the trial of his eminent fellow-ſufferer Sir Thomas More. Nor in theſe liberal and humane times can we imagine, that many will be found, however averſe to bigotry and ſuperſtition, who will not concur in the ſentiment, that the proceedings againſt both ſir Thomas and the biſhop, were attended with extreme cruelty and injuſtice. This cenſure more particularly belongs to the biſhop's caſe. His crime was ſimply an opinion againſt the king's ſupremacy, which he was urged to give by a meſſage from his ſovereign, who at the ſame time ſent a promiſe of indemnity. If this was really ſo, which there ſeems too much reaſon to believe, the biſhop's death was one of the worſt paſſages which polluted the reign of Henry; becauſe the injuſtice of the caſe was highly aggravated by ſuperadding inſidiouſneſs and breach of faith. What an idea muſt we form of a prince, who could ſtoop to deviſe ſuch unworthy means to accompliſh his cruel purpoſe? What muſt we think of the ſubject, who could be ſo void of feeling, as to become the inſtrument of ſuch perfidy? What muſt we conceive of the times, in which judges and juries could be found to give the form and colour of juſtice on ſuch bad proceedings?]

AFTER this good biſhop was recovered to ſome better ſtrength, by the help of his phyſitians, and that he was more able to be carried abroad, he was on Thurſday the 17. of June, brought to the King's Bench at Weſtminſter, from the Tower, with a huge number of holberts, bills, and other weapons about him, and the ax of the Tower born before him with the edge from him, as the manner is; and becauſe he was not yet ſo well recovered, that he was able to walk by land all the way on foot, he rode part of the way on horſeback in a black cloth gown, and the reſt he was carried by water, for that he was not well able to ride through for weakneſſe. As ſoon as he was come to Weſtminſter, he was there preſented at the barre before the commiſſioners, being all ſet ready in their places againſt his coming, whoſe names were theſe: Sir Thomas Audely, knight, lord chancellor of England; Charles duke of Suffolk; Henry earle of Cumberlande; Thomas earle of Wiltſhire; Thomas Cromwell ſecretary; ſir John Fitz-James chief juſtice of England; ſir John Baldwin chief juſtice of the Common Pleas; Sir William Pawlet; ſir Richard Lyſter chief baron of the Exchequer; ſir John Port, ſir John Spilman, and ſir Walter Luke, late juſtices of the King's Bench; and ſir Anthony Fitzherbert one of the juſtices of the Common Pleas. Being thus preſented before theſe commiſſioners, he was commanded, by the name of John Fiſher late of Rocheſter, clerk, otherwiſe called John Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter, to hold up his hand, which he did, with a moſt cheerful countenance and rare conſtancy. Then was his indictment read, which was very long and full of words; but the effect of it was thus, That he maliciouſly, treacherouſly, and falſely, had ſaid theſe words, The King, our ſoveraigne lord, is not ſupreme head in the earth of the church of England: and being read to the end, it was aſked him, whether he was guilty of this treaſon, or no? Whereunto he pleaded, not guilty. Then was a jury of twelve men (being free-holders of Middleſex) called to try this iſſue, whoſe names were theſe: Sir Hugh Vaughan knight, Sir Walter Langford knight, Thomas Burbage, John Nudygate, William Browne, John Hewes, Joſper Leak, John Palmer, Richard Henry Young, Henry Lodiſman, John Elrington, and George Heveningham, eſquires. Theſe twelve men being ſworne to trie whether the priſoner were guilty of this treaſon or no, at laſt came forth to give evidence againſt him Mr. Rich, the ſecret and cloſe meſſenger that paſſed between the king and him, as ye have read before, who openly, in the preſence of the judges, and all the people there aſſembled, depoſed and ſwore, that he heard the priſoner ſay in plaine words, within the Tower of London, that he believed in his conſcience, and by his learning he aſſuredly knew, that the king neither was, nor by right, could be ſupreme head in earth of the church of England. When this bleſſed father heard the accuſations of this moſt wretched and falſe perſon, contrary to his former oath and promiſe, he was not a little aſtoniſhed thereat; wherefore he ſaid to him in this manner: Mr. Rich, I cannot but mervaile to hear you come in, and beare witneſs againſt me of theſe words, knowing in what ſecret manner you came to me: but ſuppoſe I ſo ſaid unto you, yet in that ſaying I committed no treaſon; for upon what occaſion, and for what cauſe it might be ſaid, your ſelf doth know right well; and therefore being now urged (ſaid he) by this occaſion, to open ſomewhat of this matter, I ſhall deſire my lords, and others here, to take a little patience in hearing what I ſhall ſay for myſelf.

This man (meaning Mr. Rich) came to me from the king, as he ſaid on a ſecret meſſage with commendations from his grace, declaring at large, what a good opinion his majeſty had of me, and how ſorry he was of my trouble, with many more words than are here needfull to be recited, becauſe they tended ſo much to my praiſe, as I was not onely aſhamed to hear them, but alſo knew right well that I could no way deſerve them. At laſt he broke with me of the matter of the king's ſupremacy, lately granted unto him by act of parliament, to the which he ſaid, Although all the biſhops in the realme have conſented, except your ſelfe alone, and alſo the whole court of parliament, both ſpirituall and temporall, except a very few; yet he told me, that the king, for better ſatisfaction of his owne conſcience, had ſent him unto me in this ſecret manner, to know my full opinion in the matter, for the great affiance he had in me more than any other. He added further, that if I would herein frankly and freely advertiſe his majeſty my knowledge, that upon certificate of my miſliking, he was very like to retract much of his former doings, and make ſatisfaction for the ſame, in caſe I ſhould ſo advertiſe him. When I had heard all this meſſage, and conſidered a little upon his words, I put him in minde of the new act of parliament, which ſtanding in force as it doth againſt all them that ſhall directly ſay, or do any thing that is againſt it, might thereby endanger me very much, in caſe I ſhould utter unto him any thing that were offenſive againſt the law. To that he told me, that the king willed him to aſſure me on his honour, and in the word of a king, that whatever I ſhould ſay unto him by this his ſecret meſſenger, I ſhould abide no danger, no perill for it, neither that any advantage ſhould be taken againſt me for the ſame, no, although my words were never ſo directly againſt the ſtatute, ſeeing it was but a declaration of my minde ſecretly to him, as to his owne perſon: and for the meſſenger himſelfe, he gave me his faithfull promiſe that he would never utter my words in this matter to any man living, but to the king alone. Now therefore, my lords, quoth he, ſeeing it pleaſed the king's majeſty to ſend to me thus ſecretly under the pretence of plaine and true meaning, to know my poore advice and opinion in theſe his weighty and great affaires, which I moſt gladly was and ever will be willing to ſend him in; methinks it is very hard in juſtice to heare the meſſenger's accuſation, and to allow the ſame as a ſufficient teſtimony againſt me in caſe of treaſon. To this the meſſenger made no direct anſwer, but (neither denying his words as falſe, nor confeſſing them as true) ſaid, that whatever he had ſaid unto him on the king's behalf, he ſaid no more than his majeſty commanded; And, ſaid he, if I had ſaid to you in ſuch ſort as you have declared, I would gladly know what diſcharge this is to you in law againſt his majeſty, for ſo directly ſpeaking againſt the ſtatute; whereat ſome of the judges taking quick hold one after another, ſaid, that this meſſage, or promiſe from the king to him, neither could, nor did by rigour of the law, diſcharge him; but in ſo declaring of his minde and conſcience againſt the ſupremacy, yea though it were at the king's own commandment or requeſt, he committed treaſon by the ſtatute, and nothing can diſcharge him from death but the king's pardon.

This good father perceiving the ſmall account made of his words, and the favourable credit given to his accuſer, might then eaſily finde in which doore the wind blew. Wherefore directing his ſpeeches to the lords his judges, he ſaid, Yet I pray you, my lords, conſider, that by all equity, juſtice, worldly honeſty, and courteous dealing, I cannot (as the caſe ſtandeth) be directly charged therewith as with treaſon, though I had ſpoken the words indeed, the ſame being not ſpoken maliciouſly, but in the way of advice and counſell, when it was requeſted of me by the king himſelf; and that favour the very words of the ſtatute do give me, being made onely againſt ſuch as ſhall maliciouſly gainſay the king's ſupremacy, and none other: wherefore, although by rigour of law, you may take occaſion thus to condemn me, yet I hope you cannot finde law, except you adde rigour to that law, to caſt me downe, which herein I hope I have not deſerved. To which it was anſwered by ſome of the judges, that the word maliciouſly is but a ſuperfluous and void word; for if a man ſpeak againſt the king's ſupremacy by any manner of meanes, that ſpeaking is to be underſtood, and taken in law as maliciouſly.

My lords, ſaid he, if the law be ſo underſtood, then it is a hard expoſition, and (as I take it) contrary to the meaning of them that made the law. But then let me demand this queſtion, whether a ſingle teſtimony of one man may be admitted as ſufficient to prove me guilty of treaſon for ſpeaking theſe words, or no? and whether my anſwer, negatively, may not be accepted againſt his affirmative, to my availe and benefit, or no? To that the judges and lawyers anſwered (that being the king's caſe) it reſted much in the conſcience and diſcretion of the jury; and as they upon the evidence given before them ſhall finde it, you are either to be acquitted, or elſe by judgement to be condemned. The jury having heard all this ſimple evidence, departed (according to the order) into a ſecret place, there to agree upon the verdict; but before they went from the place, the caſe was ſo aggravated to them by my lord chancellour, making it ſo hainous and dangerous a treaſon, that they eaſily perceived what verdict they muſt returne; otherways heap ſuch danger upon their owne heads, as none of them were willing to undergo. Some other of the commiſſioners charged this moſt reverend man with obſtinacy and ſingularity, alledging, that he being but one man, did preſumptuouſly ſtand againſt that, which was in the great councell of parliament agreed upon, and finally was conſented unto by all the biſhops of this realme, ſaving himſelfe alone. But to that he anſwered, that indeed he might well be accounted ſingular, if he alone ſhould ſtand in this matter (as they ſaid); but having on his part the reſt of the biſhops in Chriſtendome, far ſurmounting the number of the biſhops of England, he ſaid they could not juſtly account him ſingular. And having on his part all the Catholicks and biſhops of the world from Chriſt's aſcention, till now, joyned with the whole conſent of Chriſt's univerſall church, I muſt needs, ſaid he, account mine own part farre the ſurer: and as for obſtinacy, which is likewiſe objected againſt me, I have no way to cleare my ſelf thereof, but my owne ſolemne word and promiſe to the contrary, if you pleaſe to believe it, or elſe, if that will not ſerve, I am here ready to confirme the ſame by my oath. Thus in effect he anſwered their objections, though with many more words, both wiſely and profoundly uttered, and that with a mervailous, couragious, and rare conſtancy, inſomuch as many of his hearers, yea ſome of his judges, lamented ſo grievouſly, that their inward ſorrow in all ſides, was expreſſed by the outward teares in their eyes, to perceive ſuch a famous and reverend man in danger to be condemned to a cruell death, upon ſo weak evidence given by ſuch an accuſer, contrary to all faith and promiſe of the king himſelf. But all pity, mercy, and right, being ſet aſide, rigour, cruelty, and malice, took place; for the twelve men being ſhortly returned from their conſultation, verdict was given that he was guilty of the treaſon, which although they thus did, upon the menacing and threatning words of the commiſſioners, the king's learned councell, yet was it (no doubt) full ſore againſt their conſcience, as ſome of them would after report, to their dying daies, onely for ſafety of their goods and lives, which they were well aſſured to loſe, in caſe they had acquitted him. After the verdict thus given by the twelve men, the lord chancellour commanding ſilence to be kept, ſaid unto the priſoner in this ſort, My lord of Rocheſter, you have been here arraigned of high treaſon, and putting your ſelfe to the triall of twelve men, you have pleaded not guilty, and they notwithſtanding have found you guilty in their conſcience; wherefore, if you have any more to ſay for your ſelfe, you are now to be heard, or elſe to receive judgement according to the order and courſe of law. Then ſaid this bleſſed father againe, Truly, my lord, if that which I have before ſpoken be not ſufficient, I have no more to ſay, but onely to deſire Almighty God to forgive them that have thus condemned me, for I think they know not what they have done. Then my lord chancellour, framing himſelfe to a ſolemnity in countenance, proclaimed ſentence of death upon him, in manner and forme following: You ſhall be led to the place from whence you came, and from thence ſhall be drawn through the city to the place of execution at Tyborne, where your body ſhall be hanged by the neck, half alive you ſhall be cut down and throwne to the ground, your bowels to be taken out of your body before you, being alive, your head to be ſmitten off, and your body to be divided into four quarters, and after your head and quarters to be ſet up, where the king ſhall appoint; and God have mercy upon your ſoule.

After the pronouncing of this cruell ſentence, the lieutenant of the Tower, with his band of men, ſtood ready to receive and carry him back again to his priſon. Before his departure he deſired audience of the commiſſioners for a few words, which being granted, he ſaid thus in effect: My lords, I am here condemned before you of high treaſon, for deniall of the king's ſupremacy over the church of England, but by what order of juſtice I leave to God, who is the ſearcher both of the king's majeſty's conſcience and yours. Nevertheleſs, being found guilty (as it is termed) I am, and muſt be, contented with all that God ſhall ſend, to whoſe will I wholly referre and ſubmit myſelfe. And now to tell you more plainly my minde, touching this matter of the king's ſupremacy, I think indeed, and alwaies have thought, and do now laſtly affirm, that his grace cannot juſtly claime any ſuch ſupremacy over the church of God, as he now taketh upon him, neither hath it ever been ſeen or heard of, that any temporall prince, before his daies, hath preſumed to that dignity. Wherefore if the king will now adventure himſelfe in proceeding in this ſtrange and unwonted caſe, no doubt but he ſhall deeply incurre the grievous diſpleaſure of Almighty God, to the great dammage of his owne ſoule, and of many others, and to the utter ruine of this realme, committed to his charge, whereof will enſue ſome ſharp puniſhment at his hand: wherefore I pray God his grace may remember himſelfe in time, and hearken to good counſell, for the preſervation of himſelfe and his realme, and the quietneſſe of all Chriſtendome. Which words being ended, he was conveyed back againe to the Tower of London, part on foot, and part on horſeback, with a number of men, bearing holberts and other weapons about him, as was before at his coming to arraignment: and when he was come to the Tower-gate, he turned him back to all his traine that had thus conducted him forward and backward, and ſaid unto them, My maſters, I thank you all for the great labour and paines you have taken with me this day: I am not able to give you any thing in recompence, for I have nothing left; and therefore I pray you accept in good part my hearty thanks. And this he ſpake with ſo luſty a courage, ſo amiable a countenance, and with ſo freſh and lively a colour, as he ſeemed rather to have come from ſome great feaſt, or banquet, than from his arraignment, ſhewing by all his geſture, and outward countenance, nothing elſe but joy and gladneſſe.

Thus being after his condemnation, the ſpace of three or four daies, in his priſon, he occupied himſelfe in continuall prayer moſt fervently; and although he looked daily for death, yet could ye not have perceived him one whit diſmayed thereat, neither in word nor countenance, but ſtill continued his former trade of conſtancy and patience, and that rather with a more joyfull cheere and free minde than ever he had done before, which appeared well by this chance that I will tell you: There hapned a falſe rumour to riſe ſodainely among the people, that he ſhould be brought to his execution by a certain day; whereupon his cook, that was wont to dreſs his dinner, and carry it daily unto him, hearing, among others, of his execution, dreſſed him no dinner at all that day; wherefore at the cook's next repaire unto him, he demanded the cauſe why he brought him not his dinner as he was wont to doe: Sir, ſaid the cook, it was commonly talked all the towne over, that you ſhould have died that day, and therefore I thought it but vaine to dreſſe any thing for you. Well, ſaid he merrily unto him againe, for all that report thou ſeeſt me yet alive, and therefore whatſoever newes thou ſhalt heare of me hereafter, let me no more lack my dinner, but make it ready as thou art wont to do; and if thou ſee me dead when thou comeſt, then eat it thy ſelfe: but I promiſe thee, if I be alive, I minde, by God's grace, to eat never a bit the leſſe.

Thus while this bleſſed biſhop lay daily expecting the houre of his death, the king (who no leſſe deſired his death than himſelfe looked for it) cauſed at laſt a writ of execution to be made, and brought to ſir Edmond Walſingham lieutenant of the Tower. But where by his judgement at Weſtminſter, he was condemned (as ye have read before) to drawing, hanging, and quartering, as traitors alwaies uſe to be, yet was he ſpared from that cruell execution. Wherefore order was taken that he ſhould be led no further than Tower-hill, and there to have his head ſtruck off.

After the lieutenant had received this bloody writ, he called unto him certaine perſons, whoſe ſervice and preſence were to be uſed in that buſineſſe, commanding them to be ready againſt the next day in the morning: and becauſe that was very late in the night, and the priſoner aſleep, he was loath to diſeaſe him of his reſt for that time; and ſo in the morning before five of the clock, he came to him in his chamber in the Bell-tower, finding him yet aſleep in his bed, and waked him, ſhewing him that he was come to him on a meſſage from the king; and after ſome circumſtance uſed, with perſwaſion that he ſhould remember himſelf to be an old man, and that for age he could not, by courſe of nature, live long; he told him at laſt, that he was come to ſignifie unto him, that the king's pleaſure was he ſhould ſuffer death that forenoone. Well (quoth this bleſſed father) if this be your errand, you bring me no great newes, for I have long time looked for this meſſage: I moſt humbly thank his majeſty, that it pleaſeth him to rid me from all this worldly buſineſſe; and I thank you alſo for your tidings. But I pray you, Mr. Lieutenant (ſaid he) when is mine houre that I muſt go hence? Your houre (ſaid the lieutenant) muſt be nine of the clock. And what houre is it now (ſaid he)? It is now about five (ſaid the lieutenant). Well then (ſaid he) let me by your patience, ſleep an houre or two, for I have ſlept very little this night: And yet to tell you the truth, not for any feare of death (I thank God) but by reaſon of my great infirmity and weakneſſe. The king's further pleaſure is (ſaid the lieutenant), that you ſhould uſe as little ſpeech as may be, eſpecially any thing touching his majeſty, whereby the people ſhould have any cauſe to think of him or his proceedings otherwiſe than well. For that (ſaid he) you ſhall ſee me order myſelf, as, by God's grace, neither the king, nor any man elſe, ſhall have occaſion to miſlike my words. With which anſwer the lieutenant departed from him; and ſo the priſoner falling againe to reſt, ſlept ſoundly two houres and more. And after he was waked, he called to his man to help him up: but firſt of all he commanded him to take away the ſhirt of haire (which accuſtomably he wore on his back) and to convey it privily out of the houſe, and inſtead thereof to lay him forth a clean white ſhirt, and all the beſt aparrell he had, as cleanly bruſhed as may be: and as he was arraying himſelfe, his man perceiving in him more curioſity and care for the fine and cleanly wearing of his aparrell that day, than ever was wont to be before, demanded of him what this ſodain change meant, ſaying that his lordſhip knew well enough he muſt put off all againe within two houres, and loſe it. What of that (ſaid he)? Doeſt thou not mark, that this is our marriage-day, and that it behoveth us therefore to uſe more cleanlineſſe for ſolemnity of the marriage-ſake?

About nine of the clock the lieutenant came againe to his priſoner, and finding him almoſt ready, ſaid that he was come now for him. I will wait upon you ſtraight (ſaid he) as faſt as this thin body of mine will give me leave. Then ſaid he to his man, Reach me my furred tippet to put about my neck. O my Lord, ſaid the lieutenant, what need you be ſo carefull for your health for this little time, being (as your ſelf knoweth) not much above an houre? I think no otherwiſe (ſaid this bleſſed father), but yet in the mean time I will keep myſelfe as well as I can, till the very time of my execution: for I tell you truth, though I have (I thank our Lord) a very good deſire, and a willing minde, to die at this preſent, and ſo truſt of his infinite mercy and goodneſſe he will continue it, yet will I not willingly hinder my health, in the mean time, one minute of an houre, but ſtill prolong the ſame as long as I can, by ſuch reaſonable waies and meanes as Almighty God hath provided for me. With that taking a little book in his hand, which was a N. Teſt. lying by him, he made a croſſe on his forehead, and went out of his priſon-doore with the lieutenant, being ſo weak that he was ſcarce able to go downe ſtaires: wherefore at the ſtaires foot he was taken up in a chaire between two of the lieutenants men, and carried to the Tower-gate, with a great number of weapons about him, to be delivered to the ſheriffs of London for execution. And as they were come to the uttermoſt precinct of the liberty of the Tower, they reſted there with him a ſpace, till ſuch time as one was ſent before to know in what readineſſe the ſheriffs were to receive him: during which ſpace he roſe out of his chaire, and ſtanding on his feet leaned his ſhoulders to the wall, and lifting his eyes towards heaven, opened his little book in his hand, and ſaid, O Lord, this is the laſt time that ever I ſhall open this book; let ſome comfortable place now chance unto me, whereby I thy poore ſervant may glorifie thee in this my laſt houre; and with that, looking into the book, the firſt thing that came to his ſight were theſe words, Hæc eſt autem vita æterna, ut cognoſcant te, ſolum verum Deum, & quem miſiſti Jeſum Chriſtum. Ego te glorificavi ſuper terram, opus conſummavi quod dediſti mihi ut faciam: Et nunc clarifica tu me, Pater, apud temet ipſum claritate quam habui priuſquam, &c. and with that he ſhut the book together, and ſaid, Here is even learning enough for me to my live's end. And ſo the ſheriffs being ready for him, he was taken up again among certain of the ſheriffs men, with a new and much greater company of weapons than was before, and carried to the ſcaffold on the Tower-hill, otherwiſe called Eaſt-Smithfield, himſelfe praying all the way, and recording upon the words which he before had read; and when he was come to the foot of the ſcaffold, they that carried him offered to help him up the ſtaires. But then ſaid he, Nay, maſters, ſeeing I am come ſo farre, let me alone, and ye ſhall ſee me ſhift for my ſelf well enough; and ſo went up the ſtaires without any helpe, ſo lively, that it was mervaile to them that knew before of his debility and weakneſſe; but as he was mounting up the ſtaires, the ſouth-eaſt ſun ſhined very bright in his face, whereupon he ſaid to himſelfe theſe words, lifting up his hands, Accedite ad eum, & illuminamini, & facies veſtra non confundetur. By that time he was upon the ſcaffold it was about ten of the clock; where the executioner being ready to do his office, kneeled downe to him (as the faſhion is) and aſked him forgiveneſſe: I forgive thee (ſaid he) with all my heart, and I truſt thou ſhalt ſee me overcome this ſtorme luſtily. Then was his gown and tippet taken from him, and he ſtood in his doublet and hoſe, in ſight of all the people, whereof was no ſmall number aſſembled to ſee this execution. There was to be ſeen a long, lean, and ſlender body, having on it little other ſubſtance beſides ſkin and bones, inſomuch as moſt of the beholders mervailed to ſee a living man ſo farre conſumed, for he ſeemed a very image of death, and as it were death in a man's ſhape, uſing a man's voice; and therefore it was thought the king was ſomething cruell to put ſuch a man to death, being ſo neere his end, and to kill that which was dying already, except it were for pity ſake to rid him of his pain.

When the innocent and holy man was come upon the ſcaffold, he ſpake to the people in effect as followeth:

Chriſtian people, I am come hither to die for the faith of Chriſt's holy Catholique church; and I thank God hitherto my ſtomack hath ſerved me very well thereunto, ſo that yet I have not feared death; wherefore I deſire you all to help and aſſiſt with your prayers, that at the very point and inſtant of death's ſtroke, I may in that very moment ſtand ſtedfaſt, without fainting in any one point of the Catholique faith, free from any fear. And I beſeech Almighty God of his infinite goodneſſe, to ſave the king and this realme, and that it may pleaſe him to hold his hand over it, and ſend the king good councel.

Theſe or the like words he ſpake, with ſuch a cheerefull countenance, ſuch a ſtout and conſtant courage, and ſuch a reverend gravity, that he appeared to all men not only void of feare, but alſo glad of death. Beſides this, he uttered his words ſo diſtinctly, and with ſo loud and cleare a voice, that the people were aſtoniſhed thereat, and noted it for a miraculous thing, to heare ſo plain and audible a voice come from ſo weak and ſickly an old body; for the youngeſt man in that preſence, being in good and perfect health, could not have ſpoken to be better heard and perceived, than he was. Then after theſe few words by him uttered, he kneeled down on both his knees, and ſaid certain prayers, among which one was the hymn of Te Deum Laudamus, to the end, and the pſalm of In te Domine Speravi. Then came the executioner, and bound a handkerchief about his eyes; and ſo this holy father lifting up his hands and heart towards heaven, ſaid a few prayers, which were not long, but fervent, and devout: which being ended, he laid his head down on the middle of a little block, where the executioner being ready with a ſharp and heavy ax cut aſunder his ſlender neck at one blow, which bled ſo abundantly, that many wondered to ſee ſo much blood iſſue out of ſo ſlender and leane a body.

But both accounts are ſo ſhort, that we fear they will be deemed too trivial for inſertion. Againſt ſuch a cenſure, we have only to ſay, that it is* the fact of lord Dacres's acquittal, which was our chief inducement for admitting the mention of this trial into the collection. In antient times, more eſpecially in the reign of Henry the eighth, when, from the devaſtation made by the civil wars amongſt the ancient nobility, and other cauſes diſturbing the ballance of the conſtitution, the influence of the crown was become exorbitant, and ſeems to have been in its zenith, to be accuſed of a crime againſt the ſtate and to be convicted were almoſt the ſame thing. The one was uſually ſo certain a conſequence of the other, that, excluſively of lord Dacres's caſe in the reign of Henry the eighth, and that of ſir Nicholas Throckmorton in his daughter Mary's, the examples to the contrary are very rare. But thoſe which do occur ought to be remembered in juſtice to the times they belong to, as a ſort of ballance for the reproach deſervedly caſt upon them, for the culpable facility of condemnation ſo conſpicuous in moſt other inſtances.]

THE nynth day of July was the lorde Dacres of the north arreigned at Weſtminſter of high treaſon, where the duke of Norffolke ſate as judge and high ſteward of England. The ſayd lorde Dacres beyng brought to the barre with the axe of the Tower before him, after his inditement red, not only improved the ſayd inditement as falſe and maliciouſly deviſed againſt him, and anſwered every part and matter herin contained, but alſo ſo manly, wittily, and directly confuted his accuſors, whiche there were ready to avouche their accuſacions, that to their great ſhames, and to his great honor, he was found that day by his peres not giltie, whiche undoubtedly the commons excedyngly joyed and rejoyſed of, inſomuche as there was in the hall at thoſe woordes, not giltie, the greateſt ſhoute and crye of joy that the like no man livyng may remembre that ever he heard.

THE lord Dacres of the north (July 9, as our hiſtorians have it) was arraigned at Weſtminſter of high treaſon, but as the principal witneſſes produced againſt him by his accuſers (ſir Ralph Fenwick and one Muſgrave) were ſome mean and provoked Scottiſh men, ſo his peers acquitted him, as believing they not only ſpoke maliciouſly, but might be eaſily ſuborned againſt him, as one who (having been warden of the Marches) by frequent inroads had done much harm in that country. And thus eſcaped that lord to his no little honour, and his judges, as giving example thereby how perſons of great quality, brought to their tryal, are not ſo neceſſarily condemned, but that they ſometimes may eſcape, when they obtain an equal hearing.

THOMAS duke of Norfolke, lord high ſteward of England, att the tryall of queene Anne Boleyn, who on the 15th day of May, in the 28th yeare of the raigne of kinge Henry the eight, was arraigned in the Tower of London, on a ſcaffold for that purpoſe made in the kings hall, the duke of Norfolke ſittinge under the cloath of ſtate, the lord chauncellor on his right hand, and the duke of Suffolke on his lefte, the earle of Surrey, ſonne of the duke of Norfolke, ſittinge directly before his father, a degree lower, as earle marſhall of England, to whome were adjoyned 26 other peeres, and among them the queenes father (a), by whome ſhee was to be tryed. The kings commiſſion beinge read, the accuſers gave in theire evidence, and the wittneſſes were produced; the queene ſittinge in her chaire made for her, (whether in regard of any infirmity, or out of honor permitted to the wife of the ſoveraigne) haveinge an excellent quick witt, and being a ready ſpeaker, did ſo anſweare to all obiections, that had the peeres given in theire verdict accordinge to the expectacion of the aſſembly, ſhee had beene acquitted: but they (among whome the duke of Suffolke the kings brother-in-law was cheife, and wholy applyinge himſelfe to the kings humor) pronounced her guilty; wherevpon the duke of Norfolke, bound to proceed accordinge to the verdict of the peeres, condemned her to death, either by beinge burned in the Tower-Greene, or beheaded, as his majeſtie in his pleaſure ſhould thinke fitt.

The ſentence beinge denounced the court aroſe, and ſhe was conveyed back againe to her chamber, the lady Boleyn her aunt, and the lady Kingſton, wife to the conſtable of the Tower, only attendinge her.

And on the 19th of May, the queene was brought to the place of execucion in the Greene within the Tower, ſome of the nobility and company of the cittie beinge admitted rather to bee wittneſſes then ſpectators of her death, to whome the queene (haveinge aſcended the ſcaffold) ſpake on this manner.

Freinds and good Chriſtian people, I am here in your preſence to ſuffer death, whereto I acknowledge my ſelfe adjudged by the lawe, how iuſtly I will not ſay; I intend not an accuſacion of any one. I beſeech the Almighty to preſerve his majeſtie longe to raigne over you, a more gentle or mild prince never ſwayed ſepter; his bounty and clemency towards mee I am ſure hath beene ſpeciall; if any one intend an inquiſitive ſurvey of my actions, I intreate him to judge favourably of mee, and not raſhly to admitt any cenſorious conceit. And ſoe I bid the world farewell, beſeeching you to commend mee in your prayers to God.

(a) [The queen's father was not one of her judges. See page 12, and the note there.]

This ſpeech ſhee vttered with a ſmylinge countenaunce; then kneelinge downe, with a fervent ſpirit ſaid: To Jeſus Chriſt I commend my ſoule, Lord Jeſu receaue my ſoule; and repeatinge theſe words very often, ſuddenly the ſtroake of the ſword ſealed the debt that ſhee owed vnto death.

Nowe the court of England was like a ſtage, whereon are repreſented the viciſſitudes of ever various fortunes; for within one and the ſame moneth, that ſaw queene Anne floriſhinge, accuſed, condemned, executed, and another aſſumed into her place both of bedd and honour. The firſt of May (yt ſeemeth) ſhee was informed againſt, the ſecond impriſoned, the fifteenth condemned, the ſeaventeenth deprived of her brother and friends, who ſuffered in her cauſe, and the nyneteenth executed. On the twentyeth the kinge married Jane Seimour, who on the nyne and twentieth was publiquely ſhewed queene.

Extract from Burnet's Reformation, vol. 1. p. 196.

IN January, 1536, the queen brought forth a dead ſon. This was thought to have made ill impreſſions on the king: and that, as he concluded from the death of his ſons by the former queen, that the marriage was diſpleaſing to God; ſo he might upon this misfortune, begin to make the like judgment of this marriage. Sure enough the Popiſh party were earneſtly ſet againſt the queen, looking on her as the great ſupporter of hereſie. And at that time, Fox then biſhop of Hereford was in Germany at Smalcald, treating a league with the Proteſtant princes, who inſiſted much on the Augſburg confeſſion. There were many conferences between Fox and doctor Barnes, and ſome others, with the Lutheran divines, for accommodating the differences between them, and the thing was in a good forwardneſs. All which was imputed to the queen. Gardiner was then ambaſſador in France, and wrote earneſtly to the king, to diſſuade him from entering into any religious league with theſe princes: for that would alienate all the world from him, and diſpoſe his own ſubjects to rebel. The king thought the German princes and divines ſhould have ſubmitted all things to his judgment, and had ſuch an opinion of his own learning, and was ſo puft up with the flattering praiſes that he daily heard, that he grew impatient of any oppoſition, and thought that his dictates ſhould paſs for oracles. And becauſe the Germans would not receive them ſo, his mind was alienated from them.

But the duke of Norfolk at court, and Gardiner beyond ſea, thought there might eaſily be found a mean to accommodate the king, both with the emperor and the pope, if the queen were once out of the way; for then he might freely marry any one whom he pleaſed, and that marriage, with the male iſſue of it, could not be diſputed: whereas, as long as the queen lived, her marriage, as being judged null from the beginning, could never be allowed by the court of Rome, or any of that party. With theſe reaſons of ſtate, others of affection concurred. The queen had been his wife three years; but at this time he entertained a ſecret love for Jane Seimour, who had all the charms both of beauty and youth in her perſon; and her humor was tempered, between the ſevere gravity of queen Katharine, and the gay pleaſantneſs of queen Ann. The queen, perceiving this alienation of the kings heart, uſed all poſſible arts to recover that affection, of whoſe decay ſhe was ſadly ſenſible. But the ſucceſs was quite contrary to what ſhe deſigned. For the king ſaw her no more with thoſe eyes, which ſhe had formerly captivated; but grew jealous, and aſcribed theſe careſſes to ſome other criminal affections, of which he began to ſuſpect her. This being one of the moſt memorable paſſages of this reign, I was at more than ordinary pains to learn all I could concerning it, and have not only ſeen a great many letters that were writ by thoſe that were ſet about the queen, and catcht every thing that fell from her, and ſent it to court, but have alſo ſeen an account of it, which the learned Spelman, who was a judge at that time, writ with his own hand in his common-place book, and another account of it writ by one Anthony Anthony a ſurveyour of the ordnance of the Tower. From all which I ſhall give a juſt and faithful relation of it, without concealing the leaſt circumſtance, that may either ſeem favourable or unfavourable to her.

She was of a very cheerful temper, which was not always limited within the bounds of exact decency and diſcretion. She had rallied ſome of the kings ſervants more than became her. Her brother, the lord Rochford, was her friend as well as brother; but his ſpiteful wife was jealous of him: and being a woman of no ſort of vertue, (as will appear afterwards by her ſerving queen Katherine Howard in her beaſtly practices, for which ſhe was attainted and executed,) ſhe carryed many ſtories to the king, or ſome about him, to perſuade, that there was a familiarity between the queen and her brother, beyond what ſo near a relation could juſtifie. All that could be ſaid for it, was only this: that he was once ſeen leaning upon her bed, which bred great ſuſpition. Henry Norris, that was groom of the ſtole, Weſton, and Brereton, that were of the kings privy-chamber, and one Mark Smeton, a muſician, were all obſerved to have much of her favour; and their zeal in ſerving her was thought too warm and diligent to flow from a leſs active principle than love. Many circumſtances were brought to the king, which working upon his averſion to the queen, together with his affection to miſtreſs Seimour, made him conclude her guilty. Yet ſomewhat which himſelf obſerved, or fancied, at a tilting at Greenwich, is believed to have given the criſis to her ruin. It is ſaid, that he ſpied her let her handkerchief fall to one of her gallants to wipe his face, being hot after a courſe. Whether ſhe dropt it careleſly, or of deſign; or whether there be any truth in that ſtory, the letters concerning her fall, making no mention of it, I cannot determine; for Spelman makes no mention of it, and gives a very different account of the diſcovery in theſe words. As for the evidence of this matter, it was diſcovered by the lady Wingfield, who had been a ſervant to the queen, and becoming on a ſudden infirm ſome time before her death, did ſwear this matter to one of her ····· and here unluckily the reſt of the page is torn off. By this it ſeems, there was no legal evidence againſt the queen, and that it was but a witneſs at ſecond hand, who depoſed what they heard the lady Wingfield ſwear. Who this perſon was we know not, nor in what temper of mind the lady Wingfield might be, when ſhe ſwore it. The ſafeſt ſort of forgery, to one whoſe conſcience can ſwallow it, is to lay a thing on a dead perſons name, where there is no fear of diſcovery before the great day: and when it was underſtood that the queen had loſt the kings heart, many, either out of their zeal to popery, or deſign to make their fortune, might be eaſily induced to carry a ſtory of this nature. And this it ſeems was that which was brought to the king at Greenwich, who did thereupon immediately return to Whitehall, it being the 1ſt of May. The queen was immediately reſtrained to her chamber, the other five were alſo ſeized on: but none of them would confeſs any thing, but Mark Smeton, as to any actual thing, ſo Cromwell writ. Upon this they were carried to the Tower. The poor queen was in a ſad condition; ſhe muſt not only fall under the kings diſpleaſure, but be both defam'd and deſtroyed at once. At firſt ſhe ſmiled and carryed it cheerfully; and ſaid, ſhe believed the king did this only to prove her. But when ſhe ſaw it was in earneſt; ſhe deſired to have the ſacrament in her cloſet, and expreſſed great devotion, and ſeemed to be prepared for death.

The ſurprize and confuſion ſhe was in, raiſed fits of the mother, which thoſe about her did not ſeem to underſtand: but three or four letters, which were writ concerning her to court, ſay, that ſhe was at ſome times very devout, and cryed much; and of a ſudden would burſt out in laughter, which are evident ſigns of vapours. When ſhe heard that thoſe who were accuſed with her, were ſent to the Tower, ſhe then concluded her ſelf loſt; and ſaid, ſhe ſhould be ſent thither next; and talked idlely, ſaying, “ That if her biſhops were about the king, they would all “ ſpeak for her. She alſo ſaid, that ſhe would be a ſaint in heaven, “ for ſhe had done many good deeds; and that there ſhould be no rain, “ but heavy judgments on the land, for what they were now doing to “ her.” Her enemies had now gone too far, not to deſtroy her. Next day ſhe was carryed to the Tower, and ſome lords, that met her on the river, declared to her what her offences were. Upon which, ſhe made deep proteſtations of her innocence, and begged leave to ſee the king; but that was not to be expected. When ſhe was carried into the Tower, “ She fell down on her knees, and prayed God to help her, as ſhe was “ not guilty of the thing for which ſhe was accuſed.” That ſame day the king wrote to Cranmer, to come to Lambeth; but ordered him not to come into his preſence. Which was procured by the queens enemies, who took care, that one who had ſuch credit with the king, ſhould not come at him, till they had fully perſuaded him that ſhe was guilty. Her uncles lady, the lady Boleyn, was appointed to lye in the chamber with her. Which ſhe took very ill; for, upon what reaſon I know not, ſhe had been in very ill terms with her. She engaged her into much diſcourſe, and ſtudied to draw confeſſions from her. Whatſoever ſhe ſaid, was preſently ſent to the court. And a woman full of vapours, was like enough to tell every thing that was true, with a great deal more; for perſons in that condition, not only have no command of themſelves, but are apt to ſay any thing that comes in their fancy.

The duke of Norfolk, and ſome of the kings council, were with her; but could draw nothing from her, though they made her believe, that Norris and Mark had accuſed her. But when they were gone, ſhe fell down on her knees and wept, and prayed often, Jeſu have mercy on me; and then fell a-laughing: when that fit was over, ſhe deſired to have the ſacrament ſtill by her, that ſhe might cry for mercy. And ſhe ſaid to the lieutenant of the Tower, ſhe was as clear of the company of all men, as to ſin, as ſhe was clear from him; and that ſhe was the kings true wedded wife. And ſhe cryed out, “ O Norris, haſt thou accuſed me? “ Thou art in the Tower with me, and thou and I ſhall dye together; “ and Mark, ſo ſhall thou too.” She apprehended they were to put her in a dungeon; and ſadly bemoaned her own, and her mothers miſery; and aſked them, whether ſhe muſt dye without juſtice. But they told her, the pooreſt ſubjects had juſtice, much more would ſhe have it. The ſame letter ſays, that Norris had not accuſed her; and that he ſaid to her almoner, that he could ſwear for her, ſhe was a good woman. But ſhe being made believe that he had accuſed her, and not being then ſo free in her thoughts, as to conſider that ordinary artifice for drawing out confeſſions, told all ſhe knew, both of him and Mark. Which though it was not enough to deſtroy her, yet certainly wrought much on the jealous and alienated king. She told them, “ That ſhe once aſked “ Norris, why he did not go on with his marriage? who anſwered her, “ that he would yet tarry ſome time. To which ſhe replyed, You “ look for dead mens ſhoes; for if ought come to the King but good, “ you would look to have me. He anſwered, if he had any ſuch thought, “ he would his head were cut off. Upon which, ſhe ſaid, ſhe could “ undoe him if ſhe pleaſed, and thereupon ſhe fell out with him.” As for Mark, who was then laid in irons, ſhe ſaid, he was never in her chamber, but when the king was laſt at Wincheſter; and then he came in to play on the virginals: ſhe ſaid, that “ ſhe never ſpoke to him “ after that, but on Saturday before May-day, when ſhe ſaw him ſtanding in the window, and then ſhe aſked him, why he was ſo ſad; he “ ſaid, it was no matter: ſhe anſwered, You may not look to have me “ ſpeak to you, as if you were a nobleman, ſince you are an inferior “ perſon. No, no, madam, ſaid he, a look ſufficeth me.” She ſeemed more apprehenſive of Weſton, than of any body. For on Whitſun-Munday laſt he ſaid to her, “ That Norris came more to her chamber upon “ her account, than for any body elſe that was there. She had obſerved, “ that he loved a kinſwoman of hers, and challenged him for it, and “ for not loving his wife. But he anſwered her, that there were women “ in the houſe, whom he loved better than them both; ſhe aſked who “ is that; yourſelf, ſaid he; upon which, ſhe ſaid, ſhe defied him.”

This miſery of the queens drew after it the common effects that follow perſons under ſuch a diſgrace; for now all the court was againſt her, and every one was courting the riſing queen. But Cranmer had not learned theſe arts, and had a better ſoul in him, than to be capable of ſuch baſeneſs and ingratitude. He had been much obliged by her, and had conceived an high opinion of her, and ſo could not eaſily receive ill impreſſions of her; yet he knew the kings temper, and that a down-right juſtification of her would provoke him: therefore he wrote the following letter, on the 3d of May, with all the ſoftneſs that ſo tender a point required; in which he juſtified her as far as was conſiſtent with prudence and charity. The letter ſhows of what a conſtitution he was that wrote it; and contains ſo many things that tend highly to her honour, that I ſhall inſert it here, as I copied it from the original.

“ Pleaſeth it your moſt noble grace, to be advertiſed, that at your graces commandment by Mr. Secretary his letters, written in your graces name, I came to Lambeth yeſterday, and do there remain to know your graces further pleaſure. And forſomuch as without your graces commandment, I dare not, contrary to the contents of the ſaid letters, preſume to come unto your graces preſence; nevertheleſs of my moſt bounden duty, I can do no leſs than moſt humbly to deſire your grace, by your great wiſdom, and by the aſſiſtance of Gods help, ſomewhat to ſuppreſs the deep ſorrows of your graces heart, and to take all adverſities of Gods hands both patiently and thankfully. I cannot deny, but your grace hath great cauſes many ways of lamentable heavineſs: and alſo that in the wrongful eſtimation of the world, your graces honour of every part is ſo highly touched (whether the things that commonly be ſpoken of, be true or not,) that I remember not that ever Almighty God ſent unto your grace, any like occaſion to try your graces conſtancy throughout, whether your highneſs can be content to take off Gods hand, as well things diſpleaſant, as pleaſant. And if he find in your moſt noble heart ſuch an obedience unto his will, that your grace, without murmuration and overmuch heavineſs, do accept all adverſities, not leſs thanking him, than when all things ſucceed after your graces will and pleaſure, nor leſs procuring his glory and honour; then I ſuppoſe your grace did never thing more acceptable unto him, ſince your firſt governance of this your realm. And moreover, your grace ſhall give unto him occaſion to multiply and encreaſe his graces and benefits unto your highneſs, as he did unto his moſt faithful ſervant Job; unto whom, after his great calamities and heavineſs, for his obedient heart, and willing acceptation of Gods ſcourge and rod, Addidit ei Dominus cuncta duplicia. And if it be true, that is openly reported of the queens grace, if men had a right eſtimation of things, they ſhould not eſteem any part of your graces honour to be touched thereby, but her honour only to be clearly diſparaged. And I am in ſuch a perplexity, that my mind is clean amazed. For I never had better opinion in woman, than I had in her; which maketh me to think, that ſhe ſhould not be culpable. And again, I think your highneſs would not have gon ſo far, except ſhe had ſurely been culpable. Now I think that your grace beſt knoweth, that next unto your grace, I was moſt bound unto her of all creatures living. Wherefore I moſt humbly beſeech your grace, to ſuffer me in that, which both Gods law, nature, and alſo her kindneſs, bindeth me unto; that is, that I may with your graces favour wiſh and pray for her, that ſhe may declare her ſelf inculpable and innocent. And if ſhe be found culpable, conſidering your graces goodneſs towards her, and from what condition your grace of your only meer goodneſs took her, and ſet the crown upon her head; I repute him not your graces faithful ſervant and ſubject, nor true unto the realm, that would not deſire the offence without mercy to be puniſhed, to the example of all other. And as I loved her not a little, for the love which I judged her to bear towards God and his goſpel; ſo if ſhe be proved culpable, there is not one that loveth God and his goſpel, that ever will favour her, but muſt hate her above all other; and the more they favour the goſpel, the more they will hate her: for then there was never creature in our time that ſo much ſlandered the goſpel. And God hath ſent her this puniſhment, for that ſhe feignedly hath profeſſed his goſpel in her mouth, and not in heart and deed. And though ſhe have offended ſo, that ſhe hath deſerved never to be reconciled unto your graces favour; yet Almighty God hath manifoldly declared his goodneſs towards your grace, and never offended you. But your grace, I am ſure, knowledgeth that you have offended him. Wherefore I truſt that your grace will bear no leſs entire favour unto the truth of the goſpel, than you did before: forſomuch as your graces favour to the goſpel, was not led by affection unto her, but by zeal unto the truth. And thus I beſeech Almighty God, whoſe goſpel he hath ordained your grace to be defender of, ever to preſerve your grace from all evil, and give you at the end the promiſe of his goſpel. From Lambeth, the 3d day of May.

“ After I had written this letter unto your grace, my lord chancellor, my lord of Oxford, my lord of Suſſex, and my lord chamberlain of your graces houſe, ſent for me to come unto the Star-Chamber; and there declared unto me ſuch things as your graces pleaſure was they ſhould make me privy unto. For the which I am moſt bounden unto your grace. And what communication we had together, I doubt not but they will make the true report thereof unto your grace. I am exceedingly ſorry, that ſuch faults can be proved by the queen, as I heard of their relation. But I am, and ever ſhall be, your faithful ſubject,

Your graces moſt
and chaplain.

But jealouſy, and the kings new affection, had quite defaced all the remainders of eſteem for his late beloved queen. Yet the miniſters continued practiſing, to get further evidence for the tryal; which was not brought on, till the 12th of May; and then Norris, Weſton, Brereton, and Smeton, were tryed by a commiſſion of oyer and terminer in Weſtminſter-hall. They were twice indicted, and the indictments were found by two grand juries, in the counties of Kent and Middleſex; the crimes with which they were charged, being ſaid to be done in both theſe counties. Mark Smeton confeſſed, he had known the queen carnally three times. The other three pleaded not guilty; but the jury, upon the evidence formerly mentioned, found them all guilty; and judgment was given, that they ſhould be drawn to the place of execution, and ſome of them to be hanged, others to be beheaded, and all to be quartered, as guilty of high treaſon. On the 15th of May, the queen and her brother the lord Rochford (who was a peer, having been made a viſcount when his father was created earl of Wiltſhire) were brought to be tryed by their peers; the duke of Norfolk being lord high ſteward for that occaſion. With him ſate the duke of Suffolk, the marqueſs of Exeter, the earl of Arundel, and twenty-ſeven more peers, of whom their father the earl of Wiltſhire was one (a). Whether this unnatural complyance was impoſed on him by the imperious king, or officiouſly ſubmitted to by himſelf, that he might thereby be preſerved from the ruin that fell on his family, is not known. Here the queen of England by an unheard-of precedent was brought to the bar, and indicted of high treaſon. The crimes charged on her were, that ſhe had procured her brother and the other four to lye with her, which they had done often; that ſhe had ſaid to them, that the king never had her heart, and had ſaid to every one of them by themſelves, that ſhe loved them better than any perſon whatſoever. Which was to the ſlander of the iſſue that was begotten between the king and her. And this was treaſon, according to the ſtatute made in the 26th year of this reign (ſo that the law, that was made for her and the iſſue of her marriage, is now made uſe of to deſtroy her). It was alſo added in the indictment, that ſhe, and her complices, had conſpired the kings death; but this it ſeems was only put in to ſwell the charge, for if there had been any evidence for it, there was no need of ſtretching the other ſtatute, or if they could have proved the violating of the queen, the known ſtatute of the twenty-fifth year of the reign of Edward the third had been ſufficient. When the indictment was read, ſhe held up her hand, and pleaded not guilty, and ſo did her brother, and did anſwer the evidence was brought againſt her diſcreetly. One thing is remarkable, that Mark Smeton, who was the only perſon that confeſſed any thing, was never confronted with the queen, nor was kept to be an evidence againſt her; for he had received his ſentence three days before, and ſo could be no witneſs in law. But perhaps, though he was wrought on to confeſs, yet they did not think he had confidence enough to aver it to the queens face. Therefore the evidence they brought, as Spelman ſays, was the oath of a woman that was dead, yet this, or rather the terror of offending the king, ſo wrought on the lords, that they found her and her brother guilty; and judgment was given, that ſhe ſhould be burnt, or beheaded at the kings pleaſure. Upon which Spelman obſerves, that whereas burning is the death which the law appoints for a woman that is attainted of treaſon, yet ſince ſhe had been queen of England, they left it to the king to determine, whether ſhe ſhould dye ſo infamous a death, or be beheaded. But the judges complained of this way of proceeding, and ſaid, ſuch a disjunctive in a judgment of treaſon, had never been ſeen. The lord Rochford was alſo condemned to be beheaded and quartered. Yet all this did not ſatisfie the enraged king, but the marriage between him and her muſt be annulled, and the iſſue illegitimated. The king remembred an intrigue that had been between her and the earl of Northumberland, which was mentioned in the former book; and that he then lord Piercy ſaid to the cardinal, “ That he had gone ſo far before witneſſes, that it lay upon his conſcience, ſo that he could not go back.” This it's like might be ſome promiſe he made to marry her, per verba de futuro, which though it was no precontract in itſelf, yet it ſeems the poor queen was either ſo ignorant or ſo ill-adviſed, as to be perſwaded afterwards it was one; though it's certain that nothing, but a contract per verba de præſenti, could be of any force to annul the ſubſequent marriage. The king and his council, reflecting upon what it ſeems the cardinal had told him, reſolved to try what could be made of it, and preſſed the earl of Northumberland to confeſs a contract between him and her. But he took his oath before the two arch-biſhops, that there was no contract, nor promiſe of marriage ever between them, and received the ſacrament upon it, before the duke of Norfolk, and others of the kings privy council; wiſhing it might be to his damnation, if there was any ſuch thing (concerning which I have ſeen the original declaration under his own hand). Nor could they draw any confeſſion from the queen, before the ſentence; for certainly if they could have done that, the divorce had gone before the tryal; and then ſhe muſt have been tryed only as marchioneſs of Pembroke. But now ſhe lying under ſo terrible a ſentence, it is moſt probable, that either ſome hopes of life were given her; or at leaſt, ſhe was wrought on by the aſſurances of mitigating that cruel part of her judgement, of being burnt, into the milder part of the ſentence, of having her head cut off; ſo that ſhe confeſſed a pre-contract, and on the 17th of May was brought to Lambeth; and in court, the afflicted arch-biſhop ſitting judge, ſome perſons of quality being preſent, ſhe confeſſed ſome juſt and lawful impediments; by which it was evident, that her marriage with the king was not valid. Upon which confeſſion, her marriage between the king and her was judged to have been null and void. The record of the ſentence is burnt; but theſe particulars are repeated in the act that paſſed in the next parliament, touching the ſucceſſion to the crown. It ſeems this was ſecretly done, for Spelman writes of it thus; It was ſaid, there was a divorce made between the king and her, upon her confeſſing a precontract with another before her marriage with the king: ſo that it was then only talkt of, but not generally known.

The two ſentences that were paſt upon the queen, the one of attainder for adultery, the other of divorce becauſe of a precontract, did ſo contradict one another, that it was apparent, one, if not both of them muſt be unjuſt; for if the marriage between the king and her was null from the beginning, then ſince ſhe was not the kings wedded wife, there could be no adultery: and her marriage to the king was either a true marriage, or not; if it was true, then the annulling of it was unjuſt, and if it was no true marriage, then the attainder was unjuſt; for there could be no breach of that faith which was never given: So that it is plain, the king was reſolved to be rid of her, and to illegitimate her daughter, and in that tranſport of his fury, did not conſider that the very method he took, diſcovered the unjuſtice of his proceedings againſt her. Two days after this, ſhe was ordered to be executed in the Green on Tower-Hill. How ſhe received theſe tidings, and how ſtedfaſt ſhe continued in the proteſtations of her innocence, will beſt appear by the following circumſtances. The day before ſhe ſuffered, upon a ſtrict ſearch of her paſt life, ſhe called to mind, that ſhe had played the ſtep-mother too ſeverely to lady Mary, and had done her many injuries. Upon which, ſhe made the lieutenant of the Tower's lady ſit down in the chair of ſtate; which the other, after ſome ceremony, doing, ſhe fell down on her knees, and with many tears charged the lady, as ſhe would anſwer it to God, to go in her name, and do as ſhe had done, to the lady Mary, and aſk her forgiveneſs for the wrongs ſhe had done her. And ſhe ſaid, ſhe had no quiet in her conſcience, till ſhe had done that. But though ſhe did in this what became a Chriſtian, the lady Mary could not ſo eaſily pardon theſe injuries; but retained the reſentments of them her whole life.

(a) [This is a miſtake. The queen's father was not one of her judges, as biſhop Burnet acknowledges in another part of his work. See Addend. to 1. Burn. Reformat. p. 363.]

This ingenuity and tenderneſs of conſcience about leſſer matters, is a great preſumption, that if ſhe had been guilty of more eminent faults, ſhe had not continued to the laſt denying them, and making proteſtations of her innocency. For that ſame night ſhe ſent her laſt meſſage to the king, and acknowledged her ſelf much obliged to him, that had continued ſtill to advance her. She ſaid, he had, from a private gentlewoman, firſt made her a marchioneſs, and then a queen; and now, ſince he could raiſe her no higher, was ſending her to be a ſaint in Heaven: She proteſted her innocence, and recommended her daughter to his care. And her carriage that day ſhe died, will appear from the following letter writ by the lieutenant of the Tower, copied from the original, which I inſert, becauſe the copier imployed by the lord Herbert has not writ it out faithfully; for I cannot think that any part of it was left out on deſign.

“ Sir, Theſe ſhould be to advertiſe you, I have received your letter, “ wherein you would have ſtrangers conveyed out of the Tower, and ſo
“ But the number of ſtrangers paſt not thirty, and not many of thoſe “ armed; and the ambaſſador of the emperor had a ſervant there, and “ honeſtly put out: Sir, if we have not an hour certain, as it may be “ known in London, I think here will be but few, and I think a reaſonable “ number were beſt, for I ſuppoſe ſhe will declare her ſelf to be a “ good woman, for all men but for the king, at the hour of her death.
“ For this morning ſhe ſent for me, that I might be with her at ſuch
“ time as ſhe received the Good Lord, to the intent I ſhould hear her ſpeak
“ as touching her innocency alway to be clear. And in the writing of “ this, ſhe ſent for me, and at my coming ſhe ſaid: Mr. Kingſton, I hear
“ ſay I ſhall not die aforenoon, and I am very ſorry therefore, for I “ thought to be dead by this time, and paſt my pain. I told her, it “ ſhould be no pain, it was ſo ſottle. And then ſhe ſaid, I heard ſay
“ the executioner was very good, and I have a little neck, and put her “ hands about it, laughing heartily. I have ſeen many men, and alſo “ women, executed; and that they have been in great ſorrow, and to “ my knowledge this lady has much joy and pleaſure in death. Sir, her “ almoner is continually with her, and had been ſince two a clock after “ midnight. This is the effect of any thing that is here at this time,
“ and thus fare you well,

Yours,
William Kingſton.”

A little before noon, being the 19th of May, ſhe was brought to the ſcaffold, where ſhe made a ſhort ſpeech to a great company that came to look on the laſt ſcene of this fatal tragedy: the chief of whom were the dukes of Suffolk and Richmond, the lord chancellor, and ſecretary Cromwell, with the lord mayor, the ſheriffs and aldermen of London. “ She “ ſaid, ſhe was come to die, as ſhe was judged by the law; ſhe would “ accuſe none, nor ſay any thing of the ground upon which ſhe was “ judged. She prayed heartily for the king; and called him a moſt merciful and gentle prince, and that he had been always to her, a good, “ gentle, ſoveraign lord: and if any would meddle with her cauſe, ſhe “ required them to judge the beſt. And ſo ſhe took her leave of them, “ and of the world; and heartily deſired they would pray for her.” After ſhe had been ſome time in her devotions, her laſt words being, To Chriſt I commend my ſoul; her head was cut off by the hangman of Calais, who was brought over as more expert at beheading than any in England: her eyes and lips were obſerved to move after her head was cut off, as Spelman writes; but her body was thrown into a common cheſt of elm-tree that was made to put arrows in, and was buried in the chappel within the Tower before twelve a clock.

Her brother with the other four did alſo ſuffer; none of them were quartered, but they were all beheaded, except Smeton, who was hanged. It was generally ſaid, that he was corrupted into that confeſſion, and had his life promiſed him; but it was not fit to let him live to tell tales. Norris had been much in the kings favour, and an offer was made him of his life, if he would confeſs his guilt, and accuſe the queen. But he generouſly rejected that un-handſom propoſition, and ſaid, “ That in “ his conſcience he thought her innocent of theſe things laid to her “ charge; but whether ſhe was or not, he would not accuſe her of any “ thing, and he would die a thouſand times, rather than ruin an innocent perſon.”

Theſe proceedings occaſioned as great variety of cenſures, as there were diverſity of intereſts. The Popiſh party ſaid, the juſtice of God was viſible, that ſhe who had ſupplanted queen Katherine, met with the like, and harder meaſure, by the ſame means. Some took notice of her faint juſtifying her ſelf on the ſcaffold, as if her conſcience had then prevailed ſo far, that ſhe could no longer deny a thing, for which ſhe was ſo ſoon to anſwer at another tribunal. But others thought her care of her daughter made her ſpeak ſo tenderly; for ſhe had obſerved, that queen Katherines obſtinacy had drawn the kings indignation on her daughter; and therefore that ſhe alone might bear her misfortunes, and derive no ſhare of them on her daughter, ſhe ſpake in a ſtile, that could give the king no juſt offence: and as ſhe ſaid enough to juſtifie her ſelf, ſo ſhe ſaid as much for the kings honour, as could be expected. Yet in a letter that ſhe wrote to the king from the Tower, (which will be found in the Collection,) ſhe pleaded her innocence, in a ſtrain of ſo much wit, and moving paſſionate eloquence, as perhaps can ſcarce be parallel'd: certainly her ſpirits were much exalted when ſhe wrote it, for it is a pitch above her ordinary ſtile. Yet the copy I take it from, lying among Cromwells other papers, makes me believe it was truly written by her.

Her carriage ſeemed too free, and all people thought that ſome freedoms and levities in her had encouraged thoſe unfortunate perſons to ſpeak ſuch bold things to her, ſince few attempt upon the chaſtity, or make declarations of love, to perſons of ſo exalted a quality, except they ſee ſome invitations, at leaſt in their carriage. Others thought that a free and jovial temper might, with great innocence, though with no diſcretion, lead one to all thoſe things that were proved againſt her; and therefore they concluded her chaſte, though indiſcreet. Others blamed the king, and taxed his cruelty in proceeding ſo ſeverely againſt a perſon whoſe chaſtity he had reaſon to be aſſured of, ſince ſhe had reſiſted his addreſſes near five years, till he legitimated them by marriage. But others accuſed him. It is certain her carriage had given juſt cauſe of ſome jealouſie, and that being the rage of a man, it was no wonder if a king of his temper, conceiving it againſt one whom he had ſo ſignally obliged, was tranſported into unjuſtifiable exceſſes.

Others condemned Cranmer, as a man that obſequiouſly followed all the kings appetites; and that he had now divorced the king a ſecond time, which ſhewed that his conſcience was governed by the kings pleaſure as his ſupreme law. But what he did was unavoidable. For whatever motives drew from her the confeſſion of that precontract, he was obliged to give ſentence upon it: and that which ſhe confeſſed, being ſuch as made her incapable to contract marriage with the king, he could not decline the giving of ſentence upon ſo formal a confeſſion. Some loaded all that favoured the Reformation: and ſaid, It now appeared what a woman their great patroneſs and ſupporter had been. But to thoſe it was anſwered, That her faults, if true, being ſecret, could caſt no reflection on thoſe, who being ignorant of them, made uſe of her protection. And the church of Rome thought not their cauſe ſuffered by the enraged cruelty and ambition of the curſed Irene, who had convened the ſecond council of Nice, and ſet up the worſhip of images again in the eaſt; whom the popes continued to court and magnifie, after her barbarous murder of her ſon, with other acts of unſatiated ſpite and ambition. Therefore they had no reaſon to think the worſe of perſons for claiming the protection of a queen, whoſe faults (if ſhe was at all criminal,) were unknown to them when they made uſe of her.

Some have ſince that time concluded it a great evidence of her guilt, that during her daughters long and glorious reign, there was no full nor compleat vindication of her publiſhed. For the writers of that time thought it enough to ſpeak honourably of her; and in general, to call her innocent, but none of them ever attempted a clear diſcuſſion of the particulars laid to her charge. This had been much to her daughters honour, and therefore, ſince it was not done, others concluded it could not be done; and that their knowledge of her guilt reſtrained their pens. But others do not at all allow of that inference, and think rather, that it was the great wiſdom of that time not to ſuffer ſuch things to be called in queſtion; ſince no wiſe government will admit of a debate about the clearneſs of the princes title. For the very attempting to prove it weakens it more, than any of the proofs that are brought can confirm it; therefore it was prudently done of that queen and her great miniſters, never to ſuffer any vindication or apology to be written. Some indiſcretions could not be denied, and theſe would all have been catched hold of, and improved by the buſie emiſſaries of Rome and Spain.

Extract from 3 Burn. Reformat. p. 118, to 121.

THE tragedy of queen Anne followed ſoon after this: it broke out on the firſt of May 1536, but it ſeems it was concerted before; for a parliament was ſummoned, at leaſt the writs were teſted the 27th of April before.

There is a long account of her ſufferings given by Meteren, in that excellent hiſtory that he wrote of the wars in the Netherlands, which he took from a full relation of it, given by a French gentleman, Criſpin, who was then in London, and as Meteren relates the matter, wrote without partiality. He begins it thus. “ There was a gentleman who blamed “ his ſiſter for ſome lightneſs that appeared in her behaviour: ſhe ſaid “ the queen did more than ſhe did; for ſhe admitted ſome of her court “ to come into her chamber at undue hours: and named the lord Rochford, Norris, Weſton, Brereton, and Smeton the muſician: and ſhe ſaid “ to her brother, that Smeton could tell much more: all this was carried “ to the king.”

When the matter broke out on the firſt of May, the king who loved Norris, ſent for him, and ſaid, if he would confeſs thoſe things with which the queen was charged, he ſhould neither ſuffer in his perſon, nor his eſtate; nor ſo much as be put in priſon: but if he did not confeſs, and were found guilty, he ſhould ſuffer the extremity of the law. Norris anſwered, he would much rather die than be guilty of ſuch falſhood: that it was all falſe, which he was ready to juſtify in a combat againſt any perſon whatſoever: ſo he was ſent with the reſt to the Tower: the confeſſion of Smeton was all that was brought againſt the queen: he, as was believ'd, was prevailed on to accuſe her: yet he was condemned contrary to the promiſe that had been made him: but it was pretended that his crime was, that he had told his ſuſpicions to others, and not to the king: and when it was alledg'd that one witneſs was not ſufficient, it was anſwered that it was ſufficient. He adds, that the queen was try'd in the Tower; and that ſhe defended her honour, and modeſty, in ſuch a way, as to ſoften the king (for ſhe knew his temper) by ſuch humble deportment, to favour her daughter. She was brought to her trial without having any advocate allow'd her; having none but her maids about her. A chair was ſet for her, and ſhe looked to all her judges with a chearful countenance, as ſhe made her curtſies to them, without any fear: ſhe behaved her ſelf as if ſhe had been ſtill queen: ſhe ſpoke not much in her own defence; but the modeſty of her countenance pleaded her innocence, much more than the defence that ſhe made; ſo that all who ſaw or heard her, believed her innocent. Both the magiſtrates of London, and ſeveral others who were there, ſaid, they ſaw no evidence againſt her; only it appear'd, that they were reſolv'd to be rid of her.

She was made to lay aſide all the characters of her dignity: which ſhe did willingly; but ſtill proteſted her innocence. When ſhe heard the ſentence, that ſhe was to be beheaded, or burnt, ſhe was not terrified; but lifted up her hands to God, and ſaid, " O Father! O Creator! Thou, " who art the way, the truth, and the life; thou knoweſt that I have " not deſerved this death." And turning herſelf to her judges, (her uncle, the duke of Norfolk, being the lord high ſteward) ſhe ſaid, " My lords, " I will not ſay that your ſentence is unjuſt; nor preſume, that my " opinion ought to be preferred to the judgment of you all. I believe " you have reaſons, and occaſions of ſuſpicion and jealouſy, upon which " you have condemned me: but they muſt be other, than thoſe that have " been produced here in court; for I am entirely innocent of all theſe " accuſations; ſo that I cannot aſk pardon of God for them. I have " been always a faithful and loyal wife to the king. I have not, perhaps, " at all times ſhewed him that humility and reverence, that his goodneſs " to me, and the honour to which he raiſed me, did deſerve. I confeſs, " I have had fancies and ſuſpicions of him, which I had not ſtrength nor " diſcretion enough to manage: but God knows, and is my witneſs, " that I never failed otherwiſe towards him: and I ſhall never confeſs " any other, at the hour of my death. Do not think that I ſay this, on " deſign to prolong my life: God has taught me to know how to die; " and he will fortify my faith. Do not think that I am ſo carried in my " mind, as not to lay the honour of my chaſtity to heart; of which I " ſhould make ſmall account now in my extremity, if I had not maintained it my whole life long, as much as ever queen did. I know, " theſe my laſt words will ſignify nothing, but to juſtifie my honour and " my chaſtity. As for my brother, and thoſe others, who are unjuſtly " condemned, I would willingly ſuffer many deaths, to deliver them: " but ſince I ſee it ſo pleaſes the king, I muſt willingly bear with their " death, and ſhall accompany them in death, with this aſſurance, that " I ſhall lead an endleſs life with them in peace." She ſaid all this, and a great deal more: and then, with a modeſt air, ſhe roſe up, and took leave of them all. Her brother, and the other gentlemen, were executed firſt. " He exhorted thoſe who ſuffered with him, to die without fear; " and ſaid to thoſe that were about him, that he came to die, ſince it " was the king's pleaſure that it ſhould be ſo. He exhorted all perſons, " not to truſt to courts, ſtates, and kings, but in God only. He had " deſerved a heavier puniſhment for his other ſins; but not from the " king, whom he had never offended. Yet he prayed God to give " him a long, and a good life. With him, all the reſt ſuffer'd a death, " which they had no way deſerved. Mark Smeton only confeſſed, he " had deſerved well to die: which gave occaſion to many reflections.

" When the queen heard how her brother and the other gentlemen " had ſuffered, and had ſealed her innocence with their own blood; but " that Mark had confeſs'd, he deſerved to die; ſhe broke out into ſome " paſſion, and ſaid; Has he not then clear'd me of that publick ſhame he " has brought me to? Alas! I fear his ſoul ſuffers for it, and that he is " now puniſhed for his falſe accuſation. But for my brother, and thoſe " others, I doubt not, but they are now in the preſence of that Great " King, before whom I am to be to-morrow."

It ſeems, that gentleman knew nothing of the judgment that paſſed at Lambeth, annulling the marriage: for it was tranſacted ſecretly. It could have no foundation or colour, but from that ſtory mention'd in Cavendiſh's life of Wolſey, of the lord Percy's addreſſes to her. He was now examined upon that: but it will appear from his letter to Cromwell, that he ſolemnly purged both himſelf and her, from any precontract; being examined upon oath by the two archbiſhops: and that he received the ſacrament upon it, before the duke of Norfolk, and ſome of the king's council that were learned in the ſpiritual law; aſſuring them by his oath, and by the ſacrament that he had received, and intended to receive, that there was never any contract, or promiſe of marriage, between her and him. This he wrote on the 13th of May, four days before the queen's execution; which will be found in the Collection.

This ſhews plainly, that ſhe was prevailed on, between fear and hope, to confeſs a precontract, the perſon not being named.

The French gentleman gives the ſame account of the manner of her death, and of her ſpeech, that all the other writers of that time do. " When ſhe was brought to the place of execution, within the Tower, " he ſays, her looks were chearful; and ſhe never appeared more beautiful, than at that time. She ſaid to thoſe about her, Be not ſorry to " ſee me die thus; but pardon me from your hearts, that I have not expreſſed to all about me, that mildneſs that became me; and that I " have not done that good, that was in my power to do. She prayed for " thoſe who were the procurers of her death. Then, with the aid of " her maids, ſhe undreſſed her neck with great courage, and ſo ended her " days."

This long recital I have tranſlated out of Meteren; for I do not find it taken notice of by any of our writers. I leave it thus, without any other reflections upon it, but that it ſeems all over credible.

Thevet, a Franciſcan fryar, who for 17 or 18 years, had wandred up and down Europe, to prepare materials for his Coſmography, (which he publiſhed in the year 1563,) ſays, that many Engliſh gentlemen aſſured him, that king Henry expreſſed great repentance of his ſins, being at the point of death; and among other things, of the injury and the crime committed againſt queen Anne Boleyn, who was falſly accuſed, and convicted of that which was laid to her charge. It is true, Thuanus has very much diſgraced that writer, as a vain and ignorant plagiary: but he having been of the order that ſuffered ſo much for their adhering to queen Katherine, is not to be ſuſpected of partiality for queen Anne. We muſt leave thoſe ſecrets to the great day.

The earl of Northumberland's letter to Cromwell, denying any contract, or promiſe of marriage, between queen Anne and himſelf.

MR. Secretary, this ſhall be to ſignifie unto you, that I perceyve by ſir Raynold Carnaby, that there is ſuppoſed a precontract between the queen and me; whereupon I was not only heretofore examined upon my oath before the archbiſhopps of Canterbury and York, but alſo received the bleſſed ſacrament upon the ſame before the duke of Norfolk, and other the king's highnes council learned in the ſpirituall law; aſſuring you, Mr. Secretary, by the ſaid oath, and bleſſed body which affore I received, and hereafter intend to receive, that the ſame may be to my damnation, if ever there were any contracte, or promiſe of marriage between her and me. At Newyngton-Green, the xiijth day of Maye, in the 28th. year of the reigne of our ſoveraigne lord king Henry the VIIIth.

Your aſſured,

Northumberland.

Extract from Appen. to 1 Burn. Reformat. p. 154.

Queen Ann Boleyn's laſt letter to king Henry.

SIR,

YOUR grace's diſpleaſure, and my impriſonment, are things ſo ſtrange unto me, as what to write, or what to excuſe, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you ſend unto me (willing me to confeſs a truth, and ſo obtain your favour) by ſuch an one whom you know to be mine antient profeſſed enemy; I no ſooner received this meſſage by him, than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you ſay, confeſſing a truth indeed may procure my ſafety, I ſhall with all willingneſs and duty perform your command.

But let not your grace ever imagine that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault, where not ſo much as a thought thereof preceded. And to ſpeak a truth, never prince had wife more loyal in all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Ann Boleyn, with which name and place I could willingly have contented my ſelf, if God and your grace's pleaſure had been ſo pleaſed. Neither did I at any time ſo far forget my ſelf in my exaltation, or received queenſhip, but that I alwayes looked for ſuch an alteration as now I find; for the ground of my preferment being on no ſurer foundation than your grace's fancy, the leaſt alteration, I knew, was fit and ſufficient to draw that fancy to ſome other ſubject. You have choſen me, from a low eſtate, to be your queen and companion, far beyond my deſert or deſire. If then you found me worthy of ſuch honour, good your grace let not any light fancy, or bad counſel of mine enemies, withdraw your princely favour from me; neither let that ſtain, that unworthy ſtain of a diſloyal heart towards your good grace, ever caſt ſo foul a blot on your moſt dutiful wife, and the infant princeſs your daughter: try me, good king, but let me have a lawful trial, and let not my ſworn enemies ſit as my accuſers and judges; yea, let me receive an open trial, for my truth ſhall fear no open ſhame; then ſhall you ſee, either mine innocency cleared, your ſuſpicion and conſcience ſatisfied, the ignominy and ſlander of the world ſtopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatſoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from an open cenſure; and mine offence being ſo lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute worthy puniſhment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection, already ſettled on that party, for whoſe ſake I am now as I am, whoſe name I could ſome good while ſince have pointed unto; your grace being not ignorant of my ſuſpicion therein.

But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous ſlander muſt bring you the enjoying of your deſired happineſs; then I deſire of God, that he will pardon your great ſin therein, and likewiſe mine enemies, the inſtruments thereof; and that he will not call you to a ſtrict account for your unprincely and cruel uſage of me, at his general judgment-ſeat, where both you and my ſelf muſt ſhortly appear, and in whoſe judgment I doubt not (whatſoever the world may think of me) mine innocence ſhall be openly known, and ſufficiently cleared.

My laſt and only requeſt ſhall be, that my ſelf may only bear the burthen of your grace's diſpleaſure, and that it may not touch the innocent ſouls of thoſe poor gentlemen, who (as I underſtand) are likewiſe in ſtrait impriſonment for my ſake. If ever I have found favour in your ſight, if ever the name of Ann Boleyn hath been pleaſing in your ears, then let me obtain this requeſt; and I will ſo leave to trouble your grace any further, with mine earneſt prayers to the Trinity to have your grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful priſon in the Tower, this 6th of May.

Your moſt loyal and ever faithful wife,

Ann Boleyn.

Extract from Strype's Memorials, vol. 1, p. 279.

THIS year, [1536] in the month of May, queen Anne Boleyn was beheaded: a great friend and patroneſs of the reformed religion.

She was very nobly charitable, and expended largely in all manner of acts of liberality, according to her high quality. And among the reſt of her ways of ſhewing this Chriſtian virtue, ſhe being a favourer of learning, together with her father, the lord Wiltſhire, and the lord Rochford her brother, maintained divers ingenious men at the univerſities. Among the reſt, were theſe men of note, Dr. Hethe, afterward archbiſhop of York, and lord chancellor; Dr. Thirlby, afterward biſhop of Ely; and Mr. Paget, afterward lord Paget, and ſecretary of ſtate: all which in her time were favourers of the Goſpel, though afterwards they relapſed. Of Paget one hath obſerved, that he was a moſt earneſt Proteſtant, and being in Cambridge, gave unto one Raynold Weſt, Luther's book, and other books of the Germans, as Franciſcus Lambertus de Sectis: and that, at that time he read Melancthon's rhetorick openly in Trinity-hall; and was a maintainer of Dr. Barnes, and all the Proteſtants then in Cambridge, and helped many religious perſons out of their cowles.

This queen was alſo a great favourer of thoſe that ſuffered for religion. Let this letter enſuing, writ by her to Crumwel, ſtand upon record here, ſhewing both her love to ſuch ſufferers, and her high eſteem of the word of God.

By the Queen.

“ Anne the Queen. Truſty and right well beloved, wee greet you well.
“ And whereas, we be credibly enformed, that the bearer hereof, Rychard “ Herman, merchant, and citizen of Antwerp in Brabant, was, in the “ time of the late lord cardinal, put and expelled from his freedom and “ fellowſhip of and in the Engliſh Houſe there, for nothing elſe, as he af-“ firmeth, but only for that, that he did, both with his goods and policy,
“ to his great hurt and hindrance in this world, help to the ſetting forth
“ of the New Teſtament in Engliſh. Wee therefore deſire and inſtantly “ pray you, that with all ſpeed and favour convenient, ye woll cauſe this “ good and honeſt merchant, being my lords true, faithful and loving “ ſubject, to be reſtored to his priſtin freedom, liberty and fellowſhip “ aforeſaid. And the ſooner at this our requeſt: and at your good ple“ ſure to hear him in ſuch things as he hath to make further relation “ unto you in this behalf. Yeven under our ſignet, at my lord's mannor
“ of Grenewich, the xiv. day of May.”

Such a material piece of hiſtory in the king's reign, beſides what is written by our hiſtorians, may deſerve divers particular remarks to be ſhewn, concerning this queen's behaviour and her ſpeeches, from the time of her commitment to the Tower, to her execution. Which I am enabled to give from five or ſix letters of ſir William Kyngſton, conſtable, or (as others) lieutenant, of the Tower, to ſecretary Crumwel. And I do it the rather, to repreſent matters concerning this queen in her afflictions the more largely, exactly and diſtinctly; which biſhop Burnet hath ſet down from the ſame papers, more briefly and imperfectly. And perhaps upon the reading of what follows, ſome things which that reverend author attributes to fits and vapours in the queen, may find a better and truer interpretation The lord Herbert alſo has given us only ſome ſhort hints of theſe things.

After the duke of Norfolk, and ſome other of the kings council who had conducted queen Anne to the Tower, (which was on the 2d of May) were departed, the ſaid conſtable of the Tower went before her into her lodging. And then ſhe ſaid to him, Mr. Kyngſton, ſhall I go into a dungeon? he anſwered her, No, madam; you ſhall go into your lodging, that you lay in at your coronation. Upon which ſhe ſaid, It is too good for me. And further ſaid, Jeſu! have mercy on me. And then kneeled down, weeping a great pace. And in the ſame ſorrow, fell into a great laughing. And ſo ſhe did ſeveral times afterwards. Then ſhe deſired Mr. Kyngſton, to move the king's highneſs, that ſhe might have the ſacrament in the cloſet by her chamber, that ſhe might pray for mercy. For I am as clear, ſaid ſhe, from the company of man, as for ſin, as I am clear from you: and again, the king's true wedded wife. And then ſhe ſaid, Mr. Kyngſton, do you know wherefore I am here? and he ſaid, Nay. And then ſhe aſked him, when he ſaw the king? he ſaid, not ſince he ſaw him in the Tilt Yard, [which was but the day before at Greenwich, when he ſeemed firſt to take a diſpleaſure againſt her.] And then ſhe aſked him, I pray you tell me, where my lord my father is. He told her, he ſaw him afore dinner in the court. O! where is my ſweet brother? [for ſhe feared the king's diſpleaſure againſt her, would reach unto all her relations.] Kingſton replyed, I left him at York-Place: thinking it convenient to conceal it from her, though he was committed the ſame day. I hear ſay, ſaid ſhe, that I ſhall be accuſed by three men. And I can ſay no more, but, Nay: though you ſhould open my body; and therewith ſhe opened her gown. Adding, O! Norris, haſt thou accuſed me? thou art in the Tower with me. And thou and I ſhall die together. And Mark, [another that accuſed her] thou art here too. And then with much compaſſion ſhe ſaid, O! my mother, thou wilt die with ſorrow. And then ſhe much lamented my lady Worceſter, (being with child) becauſe her child did not ſtir in her body. And wnen the conſtable's wife, being preſent, aſked, what might be the cauſe, ſhe ſaid, It was for the ſorrow ſhe took for me.

Then ſhe ſaid, Mr. Kyngſton, ſhall I die without juſtice? to which he replyed, The pooreſt ſubject the king had, had juſtice. And therewith ſhe laughed. All theſe ſayings happened that night. The next morning in converſation with her, theſe ſpeeches happened; related by ſir William Kyngſton in his foreſaid letter. Mrs. Coſins, a gentlewoman appointed to wait upon the queen here, and that lay on her palate bed, ſaid, that Norris (one of thoſe that were accuſed about her) did ſay on Saturday laſt unto the queen's amner, that he would ſwear for the queen, that ſhe was a good woman. And then the ſaid gentlewoman added, ſpeaking to the queen, [as minding to enquire of her concerning the occaſion of her preſent trouble] Madam, why ſhould there be any ſuch matters ſpoken of? Marry, ſaid the queen, I bade him do ſo. For I aſked him, why he did not go through with his marriage [with ſome lady, it ſeems, Norris courted]. And he made anſwer, he would tarry a time. Then ſaid ſhe, You look for dead men's ſhoes. For if ought ſhould come to the king, but good, you would look to have me. Then he ſaid, If he ſhould have any ſuch thought, he would his head were off. And then ſhe ſaid, ſhe could undo him, if ſhe would. And therewith they fell out.

And then ſhe ſaid, I more fear Weſton [another that was caſt into the Tower about her buſineſs]. For Weſton had ſaid unto her, that Norris came more unto her chamber for her, than he did for Mage [the name, I ſuppoſe, of one of the queen's maids, that he courted]. And further, Kyngſton related another ſaying, which the queen ſpake to him concerning Weſton, [whom alſo ſhe had ſometimes talk with, coming often in her way; which might create a jealouſy concerning him] That ſhe had ſpoke with him, becauſe he did love her kinſwoman, Mrs. Skelton. And ſaid to him, that he loved not his wife [ſpoken by way of reproof]. And he made anſwer to her again, that he loved one in her houſe better than them both. And the queen ſaid, Who is that? he gave this anſwer, It is yourſelf. And then ſhe defied him, as ſhe ſaid to Kyngſton [in ſcorne and diſpleaſure, as reflecting upon her honour, undoubtedly]. Theſe paſſages between the queen and them, was the cauſe of all their deaths; coming ſome way or other to the jealous king's ears. For ſhe, being of a free and courteous nature, would exchange words ſometimes, and enter into ſome talk with ſuch as ſhe met in the court; and with theſe gentlemen, who were of the privy chamber: and ſo happened often to come where ſhe was. And ſome of their diſcourſe happened to be brought to the king by ſome officious perſon, that owed her no good will.

In another letter to ſecretary Crumwel, he wrote theſe paſſages concerning the ſaid queen: That ſhe much deſired to have there in her cloſet the ſacrament; and alſo her amner for one hour, when ſhe was determined to die [that is, to ſuffer death]. After an examination of her at Greenwich, before ſome of the council, the ſaid Kyngſton ſent for his wife and Mrs. Coſins (who both were appointed to be always with her) to know of them, how ſhe had done that day. They ſaid, ſhe had been very merry, and made a good dinner: and after, called for a ſupper. And then called for him, and aſked him, where he had been all day. And after ſome words, ſhe began talk, and ſaid, ſhe was cruelly handled at Greenwich with the king's council: namely, with my lord of Norfolk [who was indeed her enemy]. And that he ſaid, [to what ſhe had ſpoken, as it ſeems in her own defence[Tut, tut, tut; and ſhaking his head three or four times. And as for Mr. Treaſurer, he was, ſaid ſhe, in the foreſt of Windſor. You know, added the writer of the letter, what ſhe meant by that. And then named Mr. Comptroler (another of the council) to be a very gentleman. But ſhe to be a queen, and ſo cruelly handled, it was never ſeen. But I think the king doth it to prove me. And then laughed withal: and was very merry. And then ſhe ſaid, I ſhall have juſtice. Then ſaid the conſtable, Have no doubt therein. Then ſhe ſaid, If any man accuſe me, I can ſay but nay. And they can bring no witneſs.

And in ſome communication with the lady Kyngſton and Mrs. Coſins, I would to God, ſaid ſhe, I had my biſhops. For they would all go to the king for me. For I think the moſt part of England prayeth for me. And if I die, you ſhall ſee the greateſt puniſhment for me within this ſeven years, that ever came to England. [This ſhe ſpake no doubt in the confidence of her innocency; and God's righteous and viſible judgments for the moſt part, for ſhedding innocent blood. And indeed within the ſeventh year following, happened a dreadful peſtilence in London, and many commotions and inſurrections to the end of this reign.] And then, ſaid ſhe, ſhall I be in Heaven. For I have done many good deeds in my days. Then ſhe took notice of divers women ſet about her, that ſhe liked not; ſaying, I think much unkindneſs in the king to put ſuch about me, as I never loved. Then Kyngſton ſhewed her, that the king took them to be honeſt and good women. But I would have had of my own privy chamber, replyed ſhe, which I favour moſt, &c.

In another letter of Kyngſton to Crumwel, he relates, how ſhe deſired of him to carry a letter to the ſaid Crumwel [of whoſe friendſhip ſhe had a belief]. But he (it ſeems not thinking it ſafe for him to carry letters from her) ſaid to her, that if ſhe would tell it him by mouth, he would do it. For which ſhe gave him thanks: and added, that ſhe much marvelled, that the king's council came not to her, as ſeeming to be ready to juſtify her ſelf. The ſame day ſhe ſaid, we ſhould have no rain, till ſhe was delivered out of the Tower: it being a ſeaſon that wanted rain: [thinking probably that God (who takes care of innocency) would vindicate her, by giving, or withholding the clouds of Heaven.] To which Kyngſton replyed, I pray, it may be ſhortly, becauſe of the fair weather: adding, you know what I mean [that is, the king's reconciliation to her].

Other occaſional ſpeeches of hers, were theſe. She ſaid concerning ſuch women as was ſet about her, that the king wiſt what he did, when he put two ſuch about her, as my lady Boleyn, and Mrs. Coſins. For they could tell her nothing of my lord, her father, and nothing elſe. But that ſhe defied them all. [Meaning any about her whoſoever, to be able to charge her with any diſhonourable act.] But then upon this, my lady Boleyn [her kinſwoman] ſaid to her, Such deſire as you have had to ſuch tales, [tale-carriers or tellers, as ſome perhaps of her women were] have brought you to this. Then ſaid Mrs. Stoner, [another gentlewoman about her] Mark [Smeton, the muſician, another committed to the Tower, an accuſer of the queen] is the worſt cheriſhed of any in the houſe. For he weareth irons. The queen ſaid, that was becauſe he was no gentleman. And he never was at my chamber; [and ſo could know leſs, ſhe meant, than any, what was done by her, or any with her there] but at Wincheſter, and there ſhe ſent for him, to play on the virginals: for there my lodging was above the king's. And I never ſpake with him ſince, but upon Saturday before May day [that fatal day, when the king firſt conceived his jealouſy].

jealouſy]. And then I found him ſtanding in the round window in my chamber of preſence. And I aſked him, why he was ſo ſad. And he anſwered and ſaid, it was no matter. And then ſhe ſaid, You may not look to have me ſpeak to you as I would do to a noble man: becauſe ye be an inferior perſon. No, no, ſaid he, a look ſufficeth me: and thus fare you well. This ſhews him to be ſome haughty perſon; and thought the queen gave him not reſpect enough. And ſo might take this opportunity to humble her; and revenge himſelf by this means on her: not thinking it would coſt him his own life.

Another letter of ſir William Kyngſton to Crumwel, giving an account of this queen's behaviour at her execution, is publiſhed in the Hiſtory of the Reformation. Which began thus; "Sir, this ſhall be to advertiſe you, "that I have received your letter; wherein you would have ſtrangers "conveyed out of the Tower. And ſo they be, by the means of Richard "Greſham, and William Loke, and Withepole. But the number of ſtrangers "paſt not thirty; and not many hothe [other.]" Armed is added in the ſaid Hiſtory, which word is not in the original letter. Other miſtakes there, this more exact tranſcription will rectify thus far in the letter.

Another letter of hers to the king, beginning, Sir, your grace's diſpleaſure, &c. is publiſhed in the ſaid Hiſtory. But this paſſage following wrote at the end of her letter, I think worthy to be tranſcribed, and ſet here, the reverend author of that book relating it imperfectly, viz.

The king ſending a meſſage to the queen Anne, being priſoner in the Tower; willing her to confeſs the truth, ſhe ſaid, "She could confeſs no "more, then ſhe had already ſpoken. And ſhe ſaid, ſhe muſt conceal "nothing from the king, to whom ſhe did acknowledge her ſelf ſo much "bound for many favours: for raiſing her firſt from a mean woman to "be a marqueſs; next to be his queen. And now, ſeeing he could be"ſtow no further honour upon her on earth, for purpoſing to make her, "by martyrdom, a ſaint in Heaven."

I add one remark more concerning this queen: that at this time of her being in the Tower, a former charge was revived againſt her: namely, the contract of marriage between her and the preſent earl of Northumberland, before her marrying with the king: deſigning, if they could prove this, to make her former marriage with the king unlawful and void; and to make the ſmoother way for his marrying with the lady Jane. But whatſoever the afflicted queen confeſſed to ſave her life, or to change the way of her execution, from burning to beheading, that there never was any ſuch precontract, the ſaid earl proteſted ſolemnly in a letter to ſecretary Crumwel: who it ſeems had now deſired to know the truth from himſelf. Therein telling him, how he had formerly before the two archbiſhops, viz. Warham and Wolſey, utterly denied it upon his oath, and the receiving of the ſacrament: ſo he now confirmed it in this letter.

VII. The Trial of Sir EDMOND KNEVET, Knight, at Greenwich, for ſtriking a Perſon within the King's Palace there, 10th June, 33 Hen. VIII. 1541.

Cutting off the hand is a rare puniſhment by the Engliſh law; and the cruelty of it being conſidered, it muſt give pleaſure to the humane reader to know, that there are very few inſtances of inflicting it. We are not aware, that there are any crimes, which by our law are liable to be ſo puniſhed, except drawing a weapon on one of the king's judges, and ſtriking in the king's courts or his palaces; and ſo unfrequent have been both thoſe crimes, that perhaps all our books do not furniſh ten caſes of the ſort. 3. Inſt. 140. Dy. 188. and the marginal caſes in the edition of 1688.

The manner in which ſir Edmond Knevet obtained a pardon of his offence, muſt ſtrike every reader of ſenſibility. The circumſtances do equal honour to ſir Edmond and his ſovereign; to the former for his manly requeſt to pay the forfeit by his left hand inſtead of his right, that he might be better able to ſerve his king and country; to the latter, for feeling the greatneſs of mind which ſuch a requeſt denoted.]

Extract from Stowe's Annals, Howe*'s edit. p.* 581.

THE tenth of June, ſir Edmond Knevet, knight of Norffolke, was arraigned before the kings juſtices (ſitting in the great hall at Greenewich, maſter Gage comptrollor of the kings houſhold, maſter Suthwell, ſir Anthony Browne, ſir Anthony Winkfield, maſter Wriſley, and Edmond Pecham cofferer of the kings houſholde) for ſtriking of one maſter Clere of Norffolke, ſervant with the earle of Surrey, within the kings houſe in the Tenice Court. There was firſt choſen to goe vpon the ſaid Edmond a queſt of gentlemen, and a queſt of yeomen, to enquire of the ſaid ſtripe, by the which inqueſts he was found guilty, and had judgement, to looſe his right hand; whereupon was called to do the execution, firſt the ſergeant chirurgion, with his inſtrument appertaining to his office: the ſergeant of the woodyard with the mallet and a blocke, whereupon the hand ſhould lie: the maſter cooke for the king with the knife: the ſergeant of the larder to ſet the knife right on the ioynt: the ſergeant farrier with his ſearing yrons to ſeare the veines: the ſergeant of the poultry with a cocke, which cocke ſhould have his head ſmitten off vpon the ſame blocke, and with the ſame knife: the yeoman of the chandry with ſeare clothes: the yeomen of the ſcullery with a pan of fire to heate the yrons: a chafer of water to coole the ends of the yrons: and two fourmes for all officers to ſet their ſtuffe on: the ſergeant of the ſeller with wine, ale, and beere: the yeomen of the ewry in the ſergeants ſteed, who was abſent, with baſon, ewre, and towels. Thus every man in his office ready to doe the execution, there was called forth ſir William Pickering knight marſhall, to bring in the ſaid Edmond Knevet, and when hee was brought to the barre, the cheife juſtice declared to him his treſpaſſe, and the ſaid Knevet confeſſing himſelfe to be guilty, humbly ſubmitted him to the kings mercy: for this offence he was not onely iudged to looſe his hand, but alſo his body to remaine in priſon, and his landes and goods at the kings pleaſure. Then the ſayd ſir Edmond Knevet deſired that the king of his benigne grace, would pardon him of his right hand, and take the left: for (quoth he) if my right hand be ſpared, I may heareafter doe ſuch good ſeruice to his grace, as ſhall pleaſe him to appoint. Of this ſubmiſſion and requeſt the juſtices forthwith informed the king, who of his goodnes, conſidering the gentle heart of the ſaid Edmond, and the good report of lords and ladies, granted him pardon, that he ſhould looſe neither hand, land, nor goods, but ſhould go free at liberty.

VIII. The Trial of Lord LEONARD GREY, at Weſtminſter, for High Treaſon, 25*th* June, 33 Hen. VIII. 1540.

[Hall, Grafton, Stow, and lord Herbert, all make mention of this trial. It is alſo noticed in Ware's Annals of Ireland. But Hollingſhead in the Chronicles of Ireland, and ſir Richard Cox in his Hiſtory of Ireland, are moſt particular; and therefore what we ſhall give will be an extract from theſe latter writers.

In the earl of Strafford's caſe, Mr. St. John, arguing before the lords for the bill of attainder againſt the earl, cited this trial of lord Leonard Grey, particularly to prove, that treaſons committed in Ireland are triable here; and ſaid, that he had read the whole record of the caſe. 8 Ruſhw. 689 694. 695. But Mr. St. John repreſents the charges againſt lord Leonard Grey differently from the author of the Iriſh Chronicles and ſir Richard Cox; for, according to Mr. St. John, lord Leonard was attainted of high treaſon, for letting diverſe rebels out of the Caſtle of Dublin, and diſcharging Iriſh hoſtages given to ſecure the king's peace, and for not puniſhing one, who ſaid, that the king was an heretick.---It is obſervable, too, that Mr. St. John argues for a trial in England, independently of any ſtatute; and to prove his point, takes notice, that lord Leonard Grey's caſe was before the 35. Hen. VIII. c. 2. as if that was the only ſtatute for trying foreign treaſons in England. But there are two other ſtatutes about the trial of foreign treaſons, which, being prior to lord Leonard Grey's caſe, were material to be conſidered. See 26. Hen. VIII. c. 13. § 4. 32. Hen. VIII. c. 4. The 33. Hen. VIII. c. 24. on the ſame ſubject, ſeems ſubſequent ſeveral months; otherwiſe that alſo would have required obſervation.----We are the more particular in adverting to this omiſſion of Mr. St. John; becauſe there is a like one in our principal writers on Criminal Law, not one of whom, as well as we can recollect, pointedly attends to all the ſtatutes. We do not even except Staundford, though his work contains a chapter on the trial of crimes committed out of the realm. See Staundf. Pl. c. 89. a.]

Extract from Hollingſhead's Chronicle in the Iriſh Hiſtory, p. 102.

THE gouernor, [lord Leonard Grey] turning the oportunitie of this ſkirmiſh [with ſome Iriſh revolters] to his aduantage, ſhortlie after rode to the north, preiding & ſpoiling Oneale with his confederats, who by reaſon of the late ouerthrow were able to make but little reſiſtance. In this iornie he raſed Saint Patrike his church in Downe, an old ancient citie of Ulſter, and burnt the monuments of Patrike, Brigide, and Colme, who are ſaid to haue beene there intoomed, as before is expreſſed in the deſcription of Ireland. This fact loſt him ſundrie harts in that countrie, alwaies after deteſting and abhorring his prophane tyrannie, as they did name it. Wherevpon conſpiring with ſuch of Mounſter as were enimies to his gouernment, they booked vp diuerſe complaints againſt him, which they did exhibit to the king and councell. The articles of greateſt importance laid to his charge were theſe.

1 Inprimis, That notwithſtanding he were ſtrictlie commanded by the king his maieſtie, to apprehend his kinſman the yong Fitzgirald, yet did he not onlie diſobeie the kings letters as touching that point by plaieng bopeepe, but alſo had priuie conference with the ſaid Fitzgirald, and laie with him two or three ſeuerall nights before he departed into France.

2 Item, That the cheefe cauſe that mooued him to inuegle Thomas Fitzgirald with ſuch faire promiſes, proceeded of ſet purpoſe to haue him cut off, to the end there ſhould be a gap ſet open for the yong Fitzgirald to aſpire to the earledome of Kildare.

3 Item, That he was ſo greedilie addicted to the pilling and polling of the king his ſubiects, namelie of ſuch as were reſiant in Mounſter, as the beds he laie in, the cups he dranke in, the plate with which he was ſerued in anie gentlemans houſe, were by his ſeruants againſt right and reaſon packt vp, and carried with great extortion awaie.

4 Item, That without anie warrant from the king or councell, he prophaned the church of Saint Patrikes in Downe, turning it to a ſtable, after plucked it downe, and ſhipt the notable ring of bels that did hang in the ſteeple, meaning to haue ſent them to England: had not God of his iuſtice preuented his iniquitie, by ſinking the veſſell and paſſengers wherein the ſaid belles ſhould haue beene conueied.

Theſe and the like articles were with ſuch odious preſumptions coloured by his accuſers, as the king and councell remembring his late faults, and forgetting his former ſeruices (for commonlie all men are of ſo hard hap, that they ſhall be ſooner for one treſpaſſe condemned, than for a thouſand good deſerts commended) gaue commandement, that the lord Greie ſhould not onelie be remooued from the gouernment of the countrie, but alſo had him beheaded on the Tower-hill the eight and twentith of June. But as touching the firſt article, that brought him moſt of all out of conceipt with the king, I mooued queſtion to the erle of Kildare, whether the tenor therof were true or falſe? His lordſhip thereto anſwered bona fide, that he neuer ſpake with the lord Greie, neuer ſent meſſenger to him, nor receiued meſſage or letter from him. Whereby maie be gathered, with how manie dangers they are inwrapped that gouerne prouinces, wherein diligence is twhackt with hatred, negligence is loden with tawnts, ſeueritie with perils menaced, liberalitie with thankleſſe vnkindneſſe contemned, conference to vndermining framed, flatterie to deſtruction forged, each in countenance ſmiling, diuerſe in heart pouting, open fawning, ſecret grudging, gaping for ſuch as ſhall ſucceed in gouernment, honouring magiſtrates with cap and knee as long as they are preſent, and carping them with toong and pen as ſoone as they are abſent.

Extract from 1 Cox's Hiſtory of Ireland, p. 264.

BEFORE we proceed farther in the affairs of Ireland, it will be fit to pay that reſpect to the memory of the late lord deputy (the lord Grey) as to give ſome account of his misfortunes and deſtiny. He had certainly performed conſiderable atchievements in Ireland, and great commendations of him are contained in moſt of the letters from the council to the king; and his majeſty did ſo well approve of his good ſervices, that he created him viſcount Grany; and although the earl of Ormond, the lord chancellor Allen, the vice-treaſurer Brabazon, and ſir John Travers, went with him, or immediately followed him into England, to impeach him, yet he was kindly received by the king, and carried the ſword before him on Whitſunday: nevertheleſs he was in a ſhort time after impriſoned in the Tower, and accuſed of very many articles; the principal of which are theſe;

Firſt, That O Connor feaſted him, and mended Toghercroghan for him; and that in favour of O Molloy, a rebel, he took a caſtle from Dermond O Molloy, whoſe father-in-law O Carol was a good ſubject; for which the lord Grey had a bribe, and Stephen ap Harry had twenty cows.

Secondly, That he took the caſtle of Bir from a loyal O Carol, and gave it to a rebel O Carol, who married the earl of Kildare's daughter, and alſo took Moderhern, a caſtle belonging to the earl of Ormond, and gave it to the rebel O Carol, and waſted the earl of Ormond's lands: for which, he had an hundred and forty kine, and Stephen ap Harry had forty, and Girald Mac Gerrot had a black hackny.

Thirdly, That he took forty kine from O Kenedy, a tenant of the earl of Ormond's and his ſon for hoſtage.

Fourthly, That he held ſecret and private familiar correſpondence with James of Deſmond, and went to viſit him in his tents in his night-gown, and forced the abbot of Owny to give him forty pounds ſterling to preſerve that abby from ruine, and O Brian to give him thirty kine and hoſtages; and Ulick Bourk, a baſtard, gave him 100 marks to have Ballimacleere-Caſtle, and to be made Mac William; and that he carried the artillery in a ſmall veſſel to Galway, and made the town of Galway pay thirty-four pounds for that carriage.

Fifthly, That the exploits at Bryans bridge, &c. were in favour of O Bryan a rebel, Deſmond's ſon-in-law, and to the prejudice of Donough O Bryan, a good ſubject; and that he took a bribe of eighty kine from Macnemarra.

Sixthly, That truſting Deſmond and O Bryan, he hazarded the king's army in a long and dangerous journey, wherein Deſmond quarrelled, and deſerted him, and O Bryan ſent but one man with a battle-ax to guide him.

Seventhly, That he rifled the abby of Ballyclare, and left neither chalice, croſs nor bell in it.

Eighthly, That he deſtroyed the caſtles of Lecagh and Derriviclaghny, in favour of Ulick Burk, though the rightful proprietor offered ſubmiſſion and rent to the king.

Ninthly, That he had ſecret conference with, and received a horſe from O Connor Roe, who was the chief inſtrument in conveying away the young Fitz-Girald.

Tenthly, That he took eighty kine from O Maddin, and forced O Mlaghlin's ſon from Mr. Dillon, whoſe lawful priſoner he was; for which he had ſeventy kine.

And there was a commiſſion ſent to Ireland, to examine witneſſes; and they ſay that theſe articles were proved by the teſtimony of above ſeventy perſons; whereof ſome were of quality, that is, ſome of them ſwore to one article, and ſome to another; ſo that the lord Grey (who was ſon to the marqueſs of Dorſet, and viſcount Grany in Ireland, but no peer in England) being tried by a common jury, thought it his beſt way to confeſs the indictment, in hopes of the king's grace and pardon; but in that he was miſtaken; and although his ſervices did infinitely over-balance his faults, yet he was publickly executed on the twenty-eighth day of July 1541.

There are four other articles mentioned by others, to be laid to his charge.

1. His partiality to his nephew Fitz-Girald (afterwards earl of Kildare) whom they ſay he might have taken.

2. That his ſervants pillaged the gentlemen in Munſter, that entertained them.

3. That he had inveigled Thomas Fitz-Gerald to ſubmit, by promiſes which he had no commiſſion to perform; and that he did it, to deſtroy that lord, that his own nephew might come to be earl of Kildare (as afterwards he did.)

4. His ſacrilege at Down; but however that be, it was not long after his execution, before a commiſſion was directed to archbiſhop Brown, and Cowly maſter of the rolls, to make an eſtimate or ſurvey of the lord Grey's eſtate in Ireland, and to deliver it to the lord deputy Saintleger, to be diſpoſed of as the king ſhall direct.

IX. The Trial of Henry Earl of Surrey, for High Treaſon, before Commiſſioners of Oyer and Terminer, at Guildhall, London, the 13*th* Dec. 1546; with the Proceedings againſt his Father Thomas Duke of Norfolk, for the ſame Crime.

[The old chronicles give a very ſhort and unſatisfactory account of the intereſting proceſs againſt theſe two eminent noblemen. But lord Herbert and biſhop Burnet enter into the detail of it; and therefore we ſhall extract from them.]

Extract from Lord Herbert's Hen. VIII. p. 263 of 2 Kenn. Compl. Hiſt. 2d ed.

I SHALL conclude this year [1546.] with the diſaſter of the renowned lord the duke of Norfolk, and the execution of his ſon Henry the earl of Surrey, which paſs'd in this manner, as our records tell us.

The dutcheſs Elizabeth, daughter to Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham, having for many years entertain'd ſo violent jealouſies of the duke her huſband's matrimonial affection and loyalty, as it broke out at laſt to open rancour, divers occaſions of ſcandal were given: inſomuch, that not being content with having ſurmized a long while ſince two articles againſt him, ſhe again, in ſundry letters to the lord privy-ſeal, both averr'd the articles, and manifeſtly accus'd ſome of his minions, repeated divers hard uſages ſhe pretended to receive from them, and briefly diſcover'd all the ordinary paſſions of her offended ſex. This again being urg'd in a time when the king was in his declining age, and for the reſt, diſquieted with ſcruples that the duke's greatneſs or intereſt in ſequent times might interrupt the order he intended to give, was not unwillingly heard. So that notwithſtanding his many important and faithful ſervices, both in war and peace, at home and abroad, he and his ſon Henry earl of Surrey were expos'd to the malignity and detraction of their accuſers. This again fell out in an unfortunate time: for beſides that the lady his dutcheſs had now for above four years been ſeparated from him; his ſon the earl of Surrey was but newly, and perchance, ſcarce reconcil'd with him; his daughter Mary dutcheſs of Richmond not only inclined to the proteſtant party, (which lov'd not the duke) but grown an extream enemy of her brother: ſo that there was not only a kind of inteſtine diviſion in his family, but this again many ſecret ways fomented.

Among which, the induſtry of one Mrs. Holland, thought to be the duke's favourite, appear'd not a little, as deſirous (at what price ſoever) to conſerve her ſelf. Beſides, divers at the king's council diſaffected him, and particularly the earl of Holland, as knowing that after the king's death (now thought to be imminent) none was ſo capable to oppoſe him in the place he aſpir'd to of protector. All which circumſtances concurring, and being voiced abroad, incouraged divers of his adverſaries to declare themſelves: and the rather, becauſe it was notorious, how the king had not only withdrawn much of his wonted favour, but promiſed impunity to ſuch as could diſcover any thing concerning him.

The firſt that manifeſted himſelf was ſir Richard Southwel, (a) who ſaid that he knew certain things of the earl, that touched his fidelity to the king. The earl, before the lord chancellor Wriotheſley, the lord St. John, the earl of Hertford, and others, vehemently affirmed himſelf a true man, deſiring to be try'd by juſtice, or elſe offering himſelf to fight in his ſhirt with Southwel. (b) But the lords for the preſent only committed them. The duke this while, hearing his ſon was in trouble, ſends to divers of his friends to know the cauſe, and particularly to the biſhop of Wincheſter. (c) Thoſe letters yet (it is probable) fell into the king's council's hands; but could not preſerve him from being involved in his ſon's fortune: (d) So that he was ſent for, and the ſame day, not long after his ſon, committed to the Tower. Divers perſons alſo were examined concerning his affairs. Mrs. Elizabeth Holland being diſpoſed, confeſs'd, that the duke had told her, that none of the king's council loved him, becauſe they were no noblemen born themſelves; as alſo becauſe he believ'd too truly in the ſacrament of the altar. Moreover, that the king loved him not, becauſe he was too much lov'd in his country; but that he would follow his father's leſſon, which was, that the leſs others ſet by him, the more he would ſet by himſelf. As alſo, that the duke complain'd that he was not of the moſt ſecret (or, as it is there term'd, the privy council. And that the king was much grown of his body, and that he could not go up and down the ſtairs, but was let up and down by a device. And that his majeſty was ſickly, and could not long endure; and the realm like to be in an ill caſe thro' diverſity of opinions. And that if he were a young man, and the realm in quiet, he would aſk leave to ſee the vernacle; which he ſaid, was the picture of Chriſt given to women by himſelf as he went to death. As touching his arms, that ſhe had not heard the duke ſpeak of his own, but of his ſon's, that he liked them not, and that he had gather'd them, himſelf knew not from whence; and that he placed the Norfolk's arms wrong, and had found fault with him: and therefore that ſhe ſhould take no pattern of his ſon's arms to work them with her needle in his houſe, but as he gave them. Furthermore, ſhe confeſs'd that the earl of Surrey lov'd her not, nor the dutcheſs of Richmond him; and that ſhe addicted her ſelf much to the ſaid dutcheſs.

Mary dutcheſs of Richmond being examin'd, confeſs'd, that the duke her father wou'd have had her marry ſir Thomas Seymour, brother to the earl of Hertford, which her brother alſo deſir'd, wiſhing her withal to endear her ſelf ſo into the king's favour, as ſhe might the better rule here as others had done; and that ſhe refuſed: and that her father would have had the earl of Surrey to have matched with the earl of Hertford's daughter, which her brother likewiſe heard of (and that this was the cauſe of his father's diſpleaſure) as taking Hertford to be his enemy. And that her brother was ſo much incens'd againſt the ſaid earl, as the duke his father ſaid thereupon, his ſon would loſe as much as he had gather'd together.

Moreover, that the earl her brother ſhould ſay, theſe new men loved no nobility; and if God call'd away the king, they ſhould ſmart for it. And that her brother hated them all ſince his being in cuſtody in Windſor-Caſtle; but that her father ſeemed not to care for their ill will, ſaying, his truth ſhould bear him out. Concerning arms, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe thought that her brother had more than ſeven rolls; and that ſome, that he had added more of Anjou, and of Lancelott Du-lac. And that her father ſince the attainder of the duke of Buckingham (who bare the king's arms) where the arms of her mother (daughter to the ſaid duke) were rayned in his coat, had put a blank-quarter in the place, but that her brother had reaſſum'd them. Alſo that inſtead of the duke's coronet, was put to his arms a cap of maintenance purple, with powdred furr, and with a crown, to her judgment, much like to a cloſe crown; and underneath the arms was a cipher, which ſhe took to be the king's cipher, HR. As alſo that her father never ſaid that the king hated him, but his counſellors; but that her brother ſaid, the king was diſpleaſed with him (as he thought) for the loſs of the great journey. Which diſpleaſure, he conceiv'd, was ſet forward by them who hated him, for ſetting up an altar in the church at Boulogne. And that her brother ſhould ſay, God long ſave my father's life; for if he were dead, they would ſhortly have my head. And that he reviled ſome of the preſent council, not forgetting the old cardinal. Alſo that he diſſuaded her from going too far in reading the ſcripture. Some paſſionate words of her brother ſhe likewiſe repeated, as alſo ſome circumſtantial ſpeeches, little for his advantage; yet ſo, as they ſeemed much to clear her father.

Sir Edmund Knevet being examined, ſaid, he knew no untruth directly by the earl of Surrey, but ſuſpected him of diſſimulation and vanity; and that a ſervant of his had been in Italy with cardinal Poole, and was receiv'd again at his return. Moreover, that he kept one Paſquil an Italian as a jeſter, but more likely a ſpy, and ſo reputed. He mentioned alſo one Peregrine an Italian entertain'd by the ſaid earl; adding, that he lov'd to converſe with ſtrangers, and to conform his behaviour to them. And that he thought he had therein ſome great ill device.

One Thomas Pope alſo informed the council, that John Freeman told him, that the duke (at Nottingham, in the time of the commotion of the North) ſhould ſay, in the preſence of an hundred perſons, that the Act of Uſes was the worſt act that ever was made, and that Freeman affirm'd thoſe words before the lord Audeley, late lord chancellor. Theſe depoſitions, together with others (as it ſeems) being brought to the king's judges at Norwich, they ſignified by their letter unto the lords of the council, dated Jan. 7. that the king's ſolicitor and Mr. Stamford had brought the indictments, and that they were found true, and the duke and his ſon indicted thereupon of high-treaſon; and that they made haſte to bring the ſaid indictment to London; deſiring further to know whether ſir Thomas Paſton, ſir Edmund Knevet, ſir John Peer, and others, ſhould be of the ſame jury. Upon the thirteenth (the king being now dangerouſly ſick) the earl of Surrey was arraign'd in Guild-hall in London, before the lord chancellor, the lord mayor, and other commiſſioners. Where the earl, as he was of a deep underſtanding, ſharp wit, and deep courage, defended himſelf many ways: ſometimes denying their accuſations as falſe, and together weakning the credit of his adverſaries; ſometimes interpreting the words he ſaid, in a far other ſenſe than that in which they were repreſented. For the point of bearing his arms (among which thoſe of Edmund the Confeſſor are related) alledging that he had the opinion of heralds therein. And finally, when a witneſs was brought againſt him viva voce, who pretended to repeat ſome high words of the earl's by way of diſcourſe, which concern'd him nearly, and that thereupon the ſaid witneſs ſhould return a braving anſwer; the earl reply'd no otherwiſe to the jury, than that he left it to them to judge, whether it were probable that this man ſhould ſpeak thus to the earl of Surrey, and he not ſtrike him again. In concluſion, he pleaded not guilty; but the jury (which was a common inqueſt, not of the peers, becauſe the earl was not a parliament lord) condemn'd him. Whereupon alſo judgment of death was given, and he beheaded at Tower-hill. And thus ended the earl; a man learned, and of an excellent wit, as his compoſitions ſhew.

This while the king (though his ſickneſs increaſed) omitted not to give order to ſeize on the duke's goods, and together to inform himſelf of all which might be material againſt him. Not forgetting alſo to cauſe Wriotheſley to advertiſe the king's ambaſſadors in foreign parts, that the duke of Norfolk and his ſon had conſpir'd to take upon them the government of the king, during his majeſty's life, as alſo after his death to get into their hands the lord prince; but that their devices were revealed, and they committed to the Tower. And that for preventing uncertain bruits, they were willing to communicate the premiſſes. But the duke, who had now as much merit of ancient ſervice to plead for him, as any ſubject of his time could pretend to, thought fit, from the Tower, to write unto the king in this manner (a).

Moſt Gracious and moſt Sovereign Lord,

I YOUR moſt humble ſubject proſtitute at your foot, do moſt humbly beſeech your highneſs to be my good and gracious lord. I am ſure ſome great enemy of mine hath informed your majeſty of ſome untrue matter againſt me. Sir, God doth know, in all my life, I never thought one untrue thought againſt you, or your ſucceſſion, nor can no more judge or caſt in my mind what ſhould be laid to my charge, than the child that was born this night. And certainly, if I knew that I had offended your majeſty in any point of untruth, I would declare the ſame to your highneſs. But (as God help me) I cannot accuſe my ſelf ſo much as in thought. Moſt noble and merciful ſovereign lord, for all the old ſervice I have done you in my life, be ſo good and gracious a lord unto me, that either my accuſers and I together may be brought before your royal majeſty; or if your pleaſure ſhall not be to take that pains, then before your council: then if I ſhall not make it apparent that I am wrongfully accus'd, let me, without more reſpite, have puniſhment according to my deſerts: Alas! moſt merciful prince, I have no refuge but only at your hands, and therefore at the reverence of Chriſt's paſſion have pity of me, and let me not be caſt away by falſe enemies informations. Undoubtedly, I know not that I have offended any man, or that any man was offended with me, unleſs it were ſuch as are angry with me for being quick againſt ſuch as have been accuſed for ſacramentaries. And as for all cauſes of religion, I ſay now, and have ſaid to your majeſty and many others, I do know you to be a prince of ſuch virtue and knowledge, that whatſoever laws you have in times paſt made, or hereafter ſhall make, I ſhall to the extremity of my power ſtick unto them as long as my life ſhall laſt. So that if any men be angry with me for theſe cauſes, they do me wrong. Other cauſe I know not why any man ſhould bear me any ill-will: and for this cauſe I know divers have done, as doth appear by caſting libels abroad againſt me. Finally, (moſt gracious ſovereign lord) I moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to have pity of me, and let me recover your gracious favour, with taking of me all the lands and goods I have, or as much thereof as pleaſeth your highneſs to take, leaving me what it ſhall pleaſe you to appoint; and that according as is before-written, I may know what is laid to my charge, and that I may hear ſome comfortable word from your majeſty. And I ſhall during my life, pray for your proſperous eſtate long to endure.

Your moſt ſorrowful ſubject,

THO. NORFOLK.

To the lords he wrote thus:

Item, Moſt humbly to beſeech, my lords, that I might have ſome of the books that are at Lambeth; for unleſs I may have books to read ere I fall on ſleep, and after I wake again, I cannot ſleep, nor did not this dozen years.

Alſo to deſire that I might have a ghoſtly father ſent to me, and that I might receive my Maker.

Alſo that I might have maſs, and to be bound upon my life to ſpeak no word to him that ſhall ſay maſs, which he may do in the other chamber, and I to remain within.

Item, To have licenſe in the day-time to walk in the chamber without, and in the night to be lock'd in, as I am now. At my firſt coming I had a chamber without a-days. I would gladly have licenſe to ſend to London, to buy one book of St. Auguſtin's, De Civitate Dei; and of Joſephus, De Antiquitatibus; and another of Sabellicus; who doth declare moſt of any book that I have read, how the biſhop of Rome from time to time hath uſurp'd his power againſt all princes, by their unwiſe ſufferance.

Item, For ſheets.

Nevertheleſs, the duke remained as condemn'd to perpetual priſon, without that his great ſervices formerly render'd, or his ſubmiſſion on this occaſion could reſtore him; which was in theſe words, as I find by our records in an original.

I THOMAS duke of Norfolk, do confeſs and acknowledge my ſelf moſt untruly, and contrary to my oath and allegiance, to have offended the king's moſt excellent majeſty, in the diſcloſing and opening of his privy and ſecret counſel, at divers and ſundry times, to divers and ſundry perſons, to the great peril of his highneſs, and diſappointing of his moſt prudent and regal affairs.

T. N.

Alſo, I likewiſe confeſs, That I have concealed high treaſon, in keeping ſecret the falſe and traiterous act, moſt preſumptuouſly committed by my ſon Henry Howard earl of Surrey, againſt the king's majeſty and his laws, in the putting and uſing the arms of St. Edward the Confeſſor, king of the realm of England before the Conqueſt, in his ſcutchion or arms: Which ſaid arms of St. Edward appertain only to the king of this realm, and to none other perſon or perſons; whereunto the ſaid earl by no means or way could make any claim or title, by me, or any of mine or his anceſtors. T. N.

Alſo, I likewiſe confeſs, That to the peril, ſlander, and diſinheriſon of the king's majeſty, and his noble ſon prince Edward, his ſon and heir apparent, I have againſt all right, unjuſtly, and without authority, born in the firſt quarter of my arms, ever ſince the death of my father, the arms of England, with a difference of the labels of ſilver, which are the proper arms of my ſaid prince, to be born for this realm of England only; whereby I have not only done prejudice to the king's majeſty, and the ſaid lord the prince, but alſo given occaſion that his highneſs might be diſturbed or interrupted of the crown of this realm, and my ſaid lord prince might be deſtroy'd, diſturb'd, and interrupted in fame, body, and title of the inheritance to the crown of this realm. Which I know and confeſs, by the laws of the realm, to be high treaſon.

T. N.

For the which my ſaid heinous offences, I have worthily deſerv'd, by the laws of the realm, to be attainted of high treaſon, and to ſuffer the puniſhment, loſſes and forfeitures that appertain thereunto. And although I be not worthy to have or enjoy any part of the king's majeſty's clemency and mercy to be extended to me, conſidering the great and manifold benefits that I and mine have received of his highneſs: Yet I moſt humbly, and with a moſt ſorrowful and repentant heart, do beſeech his highneſs to have mercy, pity, and compaſſion on me. And I ſhall moſt devoutly and heartily make my daily prayer to God for the preſervation of his moſt noble ſucceſſion, as long as life and breath ſhall continue in me.

Written the twelfth day of the month of January, in the year of our Lord God 1546. after the computation of the church of England, and in the thirty-eighth year of our ſovereign lord Henry VIII. by the grace of God king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith; and of the church of England, and alſo of Ireland the ſupream head. In witneſs of all the premiſſes, I the ſaid duke have ſubſcribed my name with my own hand, in the preſence of the lord Wriotheſley, lord chancellor; the lord St. John, lord preſident of the council; the earl of Hertford, lord great chamberlain; the viſcount Liſle, lord high admiral; ſir Anthony Brown, maſter of the horſe; ſir William Paget, ſecretary; ſir Richard Rich, ſir John Baker, of our ſaid ſovereign lord's privy-council; ſir Richard Liſter, ſir Edward Montague, the two chief juſtices.

Without compulſion, without force, without advice or counſel, I have and do ſubſcribe the premiſſes, ſubmitting me only to the king's moſt gracious pity and mercy, moſt humbly beſeeching his highneſs to extend the ſame unto me his moſt ſorrowful ſubject.

Notwithſtanding all which ſubmiſſion, joined with the merits of his ſervices, it was thought that the duke would hardly eſcape, had not the king's death, following ſhortly after, reſerved him to more merciful times.

Extract from 1 Burn. Reformat. p. 345.

THE duke of Norfolk had been long lord treaſurer of England: He had done great ſervices to the crown on many ſignal occaſions, and ſucceſs had always accompanied him. His ſon the earl of Surrey was alſo a brave and noble perſon, witty and learned to an high degree, but did not command armies with ſuch ſucceſs. He was much provoked at the earl of Hertfords being ſent over to France in his room, and upon that had ſaid, that within a little while they ſhould ſmart for it; with ſome other expreſſions that ſavoured of revenge, and a diſlike of the king, and a hatred of the counſellors. The duke of Norfolk had endeavoured to ally himſelf to the earl of Hertford, and to his brother ſir Thomas Seimour, perceiving how much they were in the kings favour, and how great an intereſt they were like to have under the ſucceeding prince; and therefore would have engaged his ſon, being then a widower, to marry that earls daughter: and preſſed his daughter, the dutcheſs of Richmond, widow to the kings natural ſon, to marry ſir Thomas Seimour. But though the earl of Surrey adviſed his ſiſter to the marriage projected for her, yet he would not conſent to that deſigned for himſelf, nor did the propoſition about his ſiſter take effect. The Seimours could not but ſee the enmity the earl of Surrey bore them, and they might well be jealous of the greatneſs of that family; which was not only too big for a ſubject of it ſelf, but was raiſed ſo high by the dependence of the whole popiſh party, both at home and abroad, that they were like to be very dangerous competitors for the chief government of affairs, if the king were once out of the way; whoſe diſeaſe was now growing ſo faſt upon him, that he could not live many weeks. Nor is it unlikely that they perſuaded the king, that if the earl of Surrey ſhould marry the lady Mary, it might embroil his ſons government, and perhaps ruine him. And it was ſuggeſted, that he had ſome ſuch high project in his thoughts, both by his continuing unmarried, and by his uſing the arms of Edward the Confeſſor, which of late he had given in his coat, without a diminution. But to compleat the duke of Norfolks ruine, his dutcheſs, who had complained of his uſing her ill, and had been ſeparated from him about four years, turned informer againſt him. His ſon and daughter were alſo in ill terms together. So the ſiſter informed all that ſhe could againſt her brother. And one Mrs. Holland, for whom the duke was believed to have an unlawful affection, diſcovered all ſhe knew. But all amounted to no more, than ſome paſſionate expreſſions of the ſon, and ſome complaints of the father, who thought he was not beloved by the king and his councellors, and that he was ill uſed, in not being truſted with the ſecret of affairs. And all perſons being encouraged to bring informations againſt them, ſir Richard Southwell charged the earl of Surrey in ſome points that were of a higher nature: which the earl denied, and deſired to be admitted, according to the martial law, to fight in his ſhirt with Southwell. But that not being granted, he and his father were committed to the Tower. That which was moſt inſiſted on was, their giving the arms of Edward the Confeſſor, which were only to be given by the kings of England. This the earl of Surrey juſtified, and ſaid, they gave their arms, according to the opinion of the kings heraulds. But all excuſes availed nothing, for his father and he were deſigned to be deſtroyed, upon reaſons of ſtate; for which, ſome colours were to be found out.

The earl of Surrey being but a commoner, was brought to his tryal at Guildhall; and put upon an inqueſt of commoners conſiſting of nine knights and three eſquires, by whom he was found guilty of treaſon, and had ſentence of death paſſed upon him, which was executed on the 19th of January at Tower-hill. It was generally condemned, as an act of high injuſtice and ſeverity, which loaded the Seimours with a popular odium that they could never overcome. He was much pitied, being a man of great parts and high courage, with many other noble qualities.

But the king, who never hated nor ruined any body by halves, reſolved to compleat the misfortunes of that family, by the attainder of the father. And as all his eminent ſervices were now forgotten, ſo the ſubmiſſions he made, could not allay a diſpleaſure, that was only to be ſatisfied with his life and fortune. He wrote to the king, proteſting his innocency: ‘ That he had never a thought to his prejudice, and could not imagine ‘ what could be laid to his charge: He had ſpent his whole life in his ‘ ſervice, and did not know that ever he had offended any perſon; or that ‘ any were diſpleaſed with him, except for proſecuting the breakers of ‘ the act about the ſacrament of the altar. But in that, and in every ‘ thing elſe, as he had been always obedient to the kings laws, ſo he was ‘ reſolved ſtill to obey any laws he ſhould make. He deſired he might be ‘ examined with his accuſers face to face, before the king, or at leaſt before his council; and if it did not appear that he was wrongfully accuſed, let him be puniſhed as he deſerved. In concluſion he begged ‘ the king would have pity on him, and reſtore him to his favour; taking ‘ all his lands, or goods from him, or as much of them as he pleaſed.’ Yet all this had no effect on the king. So he was deſired to make a more formal ſubmiſſion; which he did on the 12th of January under his hand, ten privy councellors being witneſſes. In it he confeſſed, ‘ Firſt, his diſcovering the ſecrets of the kings councel. Secondly, his concealing his ‘ ſons treaſon, in uſing to give the arms of St. Edward the Confeſſor, ‘ which did only belong to the king, and to which his ſon had no right. ‘ Thirdly, that he had ever ſince his fathers death, born in the firſt ‘ quarter of his arms, the arms of England: with a difference of the labells of ſilver, that are the proper arms of the prince; which was done ‘ in prejudice of the king and the prince: and gave occaſion for diſturbing or interrupting the ſucceſſion to the crown of the realm. This he ‘ acknowledged was high treaſon; he confeſſed he deſerved to be attainted ‘ of high treaſon; and humbly begged the kings mercy and compaſſion.’ He yielded to all this, hoping by ſuch a ſubmiſſion and compliance to have overcome the kings diſpleaſure. But his expectations failed him.

A parliament was called, the reaſon whereof was pretended to be the coronation of the prince of Wales. But it was thought the true cauſe of calling it, was, to attaint the duke of Norfolk: for which they had not colour enough, to do it in a tryal by his peers. Therefore an attainder by act of parliament was thought the better way. So it was moved, that the king intending to crown his ſon, prince of Wales, deſired they would go on with all poſſible haſte in the attainder of the duke of Norfolk; that ſo theſe places, which he held by patent, might be diſpoſed of by the king to ſuch as he thought fit, who ſhould aſſiſt at the coronation. And upon this ſlight pretence, ſince a better could not be found, the bill of attainder was read the firſt time on the 18th of January; and on the 19th and 20th it was read the ſecond and third time. And ſo paſſed in the houſe of lords: and was ſent down to the commons, who on the 24th ſent it up alſo paſſed. On the 27th the lords were ordered to be in their robes, that the royal aſſent might be given to it: which the lord chancellor, with ſome others joyned in commiſſion, did give by vertue of the kings letters patents. And it had been executed the next morning, if the kings death had not prevented it. Upon what grounds this attainder was founded, I can only give this account from the 34th act of the firſt parliament of queen Mary; in which this act is declared null and void, by the common law of the land; for I cannot find the act it ſelf upon record. In the act of repeal it is ſaid, ‘ That there was no ſpecial matter in the act ‘ of attainder, but only general words of treaſons and conſpiracies; and ‘ that out of their care of the preſervation of the king and the prince, ‘ they paſſed it. But the act of repeal ſays alſo, That the only thing ‘ with which he was charged, was, for bearing of arms which he and his ‘ anceſtors had born, both within and without the kingdom; both in ‘ the kings preſence, and in the ſight of his progenitors; which they ‘ might lawfully bear and give, as by good and ſubſtantial matter of record it did appear. It is alſo added, that the king dyed after the date ‘ of the commiſſion. That the king only empowered them to give his aſſent, but did not give it himſelf: and that it did not appear by any record, that they gave it. That the king did not ſign the commiſſion ‘ with his own hand, his ſtamp being only ſet to it, and that not to the ‘ upper, but the nether part of it, contrary to the kings cuſtom.’ All theſe particulars though cleared afterwards, I mention now, becauſe they give light to this matter.

As ſoon as the act was paſſed, a warrant was ſent to the lieutenant of the Tower, to cut off his head the next morning; but the king dying in the night, the lieutenant could do nothing on that warrant. And it ſeems it was not thought adviſable to begin the new kings reign with ſuch an odious execution. And thus the duke of Norfolk eſcaped very narrowly.

Extract from 3 Burn. Reformat. p. 167.

THE laſt tranſaction of importance in this reign, was the fall of the duke of Norfolk, and of the earl of Surrey, his ſon. I find in the council-book, in the year 1543, that the earl was accuſed for eating fleſh in Lent, without licence; and for walking about the ſtreets in the night, throwing ſtones againſt windows, for which he was ſent to the Fleet. In another letter, he is complained of for riotous living. Towards the end of the year 1546, both he and his father were put in priſon: And, it ſeems, the council wrote to all the king's ambaſſadors beyond ſea, an account of this, much aggravated, as the diſcovery of ſome very dangerous conſpiracy; which they were to repreſent to thoſe princes, in very black characters. I put in the Collection an account given by Thirlby, of what he did upon it. The letter is long; but I only copy out that which relates to this pretended diſcovery: Dated from Hailbron, on Chriſtmaſs-day 1546.

“ He underſtood by the council's letters to him, what ungracious and “ ingrateful perſons they were found to be. He profeſſes, he ever loved “ the father, for he thought him a true ſervant to the king: He ſays, “ he was amazed at the matter, and did not know what to ſay. God “ had not only on this occaſion, but on many others, put a ſtop to treaſonable deſigns againſt the king, who (next to God) was the chief “ comfort of all good men. He enlarges much on the ſubject, in the ſtile “ of a true courtier. The meſſenger brought him the council's letters, “ written on the 15th of December, on Chriſtmas-eve; in which he ſaw “ the malicious purpoſe of theſe two ungracious men: So, according to “ his orders, he went immediately to demand audience of the emperor; “ but the emperor intended to repoſe himſelf for three or four days, and ſo “ had refuſed audience to the nuncio, and to all other ambaſſadors; but “ he ſaid, he would ſend a ſecretary, to whom he might communicate “ his buſineſs. Joyce, his ſecretary, coming to him, he ſet forth the “ matter as pompouſly as the council had repreſented it to him. In particular, he ſpoke of the haughtineſs of the earl of Surrey, of all which “ the ſecretary promiſed to make report to the emperor, and likewiſe to “ write an account of it to Grandvil. Thirlby excuſes himſelf that he “ durſt not write of this matter to the king: He thought, it would renew “ in him the memory of the ingratitude of theſe perſons, which muſt “ wound a noble heart.”

After ſo black a repreſentation, great matters might be expected: But I have met with an original letter of the duke of Norfolk's, to the lords of the council, writ indeed in ſo bad a hand, that the reading it was almoſt as hard as deciphering. It gives a very different account of that matter, at leaſt with relation to the father. “ He writes, that the lord great “ chamberlain, and the ſecretary of ſtate, had examined him upon divers particulars: The firſt was, Whether he had a cypher with any “ man? He ſaid, he had never a cypher with any man, but ſuch as he “ had for the king's affairs, when he was in his ſervice. And he does “ not remember that ever he wrote in cypher, except when he was in “ France, with the lord great maſter that now is, and the lord Rochford: “ Nor does he remember whether he wrote any letters then, or not; but “ theſe two lords ſigned whatſoever he wrote. He heard, that a letter of “ his was found among biſhop Fox's papers, which being ſhewed to the “ biſhop of Dureſme, he adviſed to throw it into the fire. He was examined upon this: He did remember, the matter of it was, the ſetting “ forth the talk of the northern people, after the time of the commotions: “ But that it was againſt Cromwell, and not at all againſt the king:” (ſo far did they go back, to find matter to be laid to his charge) “ but whether that was in cypher, or not, he did not remember. He was next “ aſked, If any perſon had ſaid to him, that if the king, the emperor, “ and the French king came to a good peace, whether the biſhop of Rome “ would break that by his diſpenſation; and whether he inclined that way. “ He did not remember he had ever heard any man ſpeak to that purpoſe: “ But, for his own part, if he had twenty lives, he would rather ſpend “ them all, than that the biſhop of Rome ſhould have any power in this “ kingdom again. He had read much hiſtory, and knew well how his “ uſurpation began, and increaſed: And both to Engliſh, French, and “ Scots, he has upon all occaſions ſpoken vehemently againſt it. He was “ alſo aſked, if he knew any thing of a letter from Gardiner and Knevet, “ the king's ambaſſadors at the emperor's court, of a motion made to “ them for a reconciliation with that biſhop, which was brought to “ the king at Dover, he being then there.

“ In anſwer to this, he writes, He had never been with the king at “ Dover ſince the duke of Richmond died: But for any ſuch overture, he “ had never heard any thing of it; nor did any perſon ever mention it “ to him. It had been ſaid in council, when ſir Francis Bryan was like “ to have died, as a thing reported by him, that the biſhop of Wincheſter “ had ſaid, he could deviſe a way to ſet all things right between the king “ and the biſhop of Rome. Upon which, as he remembers, ſir Ralph “ Sadler was ſent to ſir Francis, to aſk the truth of that: But ſir Francis “ denied it; and this was all that ever he heard of any ſuch overture. It “ ſeems, theſe were all the queſtions that were put to him; to which, thoſe were his anſwers. He therefore prayed the lords, to intercede with the king, that his accuſers might be brought face to face, to ſay what they had againſt him: And he did not doubt, but it ſhould appear, he was falſely accuſed. He deſir'd to have no more favour than Cromwell had; he himſelf being preſent when Cromwell was examined. He adds, Cromwell was a falſe man; but he was a true, poor gentleman. He did believe, ſome falſe man had laid ſome great thing to his charge. He deſired, if he might not ſee his accuſers, that he might at leaſt know what the matters were; and if he did not anſwer truly to every point, he deſired not to live an hour longer.

“ He had always been purſued by great enemies about the king; ſo that his fidelity was tried like gold. If he knew wherein he had offended, he would freely confeſs it. On Tueſday in the laſt Whitſon-week, he moved the king, that a marriage might be made between his daughter (the dutcheſs of Richmond) and ſir Thomas Seymour; and that his ſon Surrey's children might, by croſs-marriages, be allied to my lord great chamberlain's children (the earl of Hertford). He appealed to the king, whether his intention in theſe motions did not appear to be honeſt. He next reckons up his enemies. Cardinal Wolſey confeſſed to him at Aſher, that he had ſtudied for fourteen years, how to deſtroy him, ſet on to it by the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, and the lord Sandys, who often told him, that if he did not put him out of the way, he would undo him. When the marquis of Exeter ſuffered, Cromwell examined his wife more ſtrictly concerning him, than all other men; of which ſhe ſent him word by her brother, the lord Mountjoy. And Cromwell had often ſaid to himſelf, that he was a happy man, that his wife knew nothing againſt him, otherwiſe ſhe would undo him. The late duke of Buckingham, at the bar, where his father ſate lord high ſteward, ſaid, that he himſelf was the perſon in the world, whom he had hated moſt, thinking he had done him ill offices with the king: But he ſaid, he then ſaw the contrary. Rice, that married his ſiſter, often ſaid, he wiſhed he could find the means to thruſt his dagger in him. It was well known to many ladies in the court, how much both his two nieces, whom it pleaſed the king to marry, had hated him. He had diſcovered to the king That for which his mother-in-law was attainted of miſpriſion of treaſon. He had always ſerved the king faithfully, but had of late received greater favours of him, than in times paſt: What could therefore move him to be now falſe to him? A poor man, as I am, yet I am his own near kinſman. Alas! alas! my lords, (writes he) that ever it ſhould be thought any untruth to be in me. He prays them to lay this before the king, and jointly to beſeech him, to grant the deſires contained in it. So he ends it with ſuch ſubmiſſions, as he hoped might mollify the king.”

Here I muſt add a ſmall correction, becauſe I promiſed it to the late ſir Robert Southwell, for whoſe great worth and virtues I had that eſteem, which he well deſerved. Sir Richard Southwell was concerned in the evidence againſt the duke of Norfolk: He gave me a memorandum, which I promiſed to remember when I reviewed my Hiſtory. There were two brothers, ſir Richard and ſir Robert, who were often confounded, an R ſerving for both their chriſtned names. Sir Richard was a privy-councellor to Henry the VIIIth, king Edward, and queen Mary: The ſecond brother, ſir Robert, was maſter of the rolls, in the time of Henry the eighth, and in the beginning of Edward the ſixth. I had confounded theſe, and in two ſeveral places called ſir Richard maſter of the rolls.

I have now ſet forth all that I find concerning the duke of Norfolk; by which it appears, that he was deſigned to be deſtroyed only upon ſuſpicion; and his enemies were put on running far back to old ſtories, to find ſome colours to juſtify ſo black a proſecution. This was the laſt act of the king's reign, which, happily for the old duke, was not finiſh'd, when the king's death prevented the execution.

Biſhop Thirleby's letter concerning the duke of Norfolk and his ſon.

An Original.

I WOULD write unto you my harte (if I coulde) againſt thoſe two ungracious, ingrate, and inhumane non homines, the duke of Norfolk and his ſonne. The elder of whom, I confeſs that I did love, for that I ever ſuppoſed hym a true ſervant to his maſter; like as both his allegiance, and the manifold benefits of the king's majeſtie bounde him to have been; but nowe when I ſholde begyn to wright to you herin, before God I am ſo amaſed at the matter, that I know not what to ſay; therefore I ſhall leave them to receyve for their deeds, as they have worthily deſervyd; and thank God of his grace that hath openyd this in tyme, ſo that the king's majeſtie may ſee that reformed. And in this point, wher Almighty God hath not nowe alone, but often and ſondry tymes hertofore, not only letted the malice of ſuch as hathe imagenyd any treaſon againſt the king's majeſtie, the chiefe comforte, wealth, and proſperite of all good Engliſhmen next unto God; but hath ſo wonderfully manifeſt, that in ſuche tyme that his majeſties high wiſdom myght let that malice to take his effecte, all good Engliſhe cannot therſore thanke God enough. And for our parts, I pray God, that we may thorough his grace, ſo contynue his ſervants, that herafter we be not founde unworthy to receyve ſuche a benefyte at his hands. On Chriſtmas-even, about 10 of the clocke after noon here aryved Somerſet with the letters of the king's majeſties moſt honourable counſell, dated the 15th of December at Weſtminſter, whereby I perceyved the malicious purpoſe of the ſaid two ungracious men: and for the execution of the king's majeſties commandment declared in the ſame letters, I ſuyd immediately for audience to the emperor, who entred this town within halfe an houer after Somerſet was come. The emperor praied me of pacience, and to declare to the ſecretarie Joyſe, That I wolde ſaie to him. For he ſaid he had determyned to repoſe him ſelfe for 3 or 4 days; and had therfore for that tyme refuſed audience to the nuntio, the ambaſſador of France, and the ambaſſador of Venice, which had ſued for audience. On Chriſtmas-day on the morning, at nine of the clocke, Joyſe came to my lodginge, to whom I declared as well as I coulde the great benefits theis ungracious men had receyved at the king's majeſties hands, and how unkindly and traytorouſly they went abought to ſearve him, with the reſt as myn inſtructions led me. The king's majeſtie, my maſter (taking the ſame affection to be in the emperor, his good brother, towards him, that his highnes hathe to the emperor, (ut amicorum omnia ſint communia, gaudere cum gaudentibus, flere cum flentibus,) hath commanded me to open this matter to the emperor: that as naturally all men, and much more princes, ought to abhorre traytors, and ſpecially ſuche as had receyved ſo great benyfites as theis men had; ſo his majeſtie might rejoyſe that the king's highnes his good brother had founde forthe this matter, or the malice coulde be brought to execution. Secretary Joyſe ſaid that he would advertiſe the emperor herof accordingly, and after a little talke of the haughtineſs of the earle of Surrey, and a few ſalutations, he bad me fare well. When I aſked him for monſieur de Grandevela, to whom I ſaid, that I wolde tell this tale, for that I doubted not but that he, and all honeſt men wolde abhorre ſuch traytors; he ſaid that he was not yet come, but he wolde this day advertiſe him herof by his letters; for I wright (quoth he) daily to him. Albeit that this be the hole, and the effecte of that I have done in the execution of the king's majeſties commandment, declared in my ſaid lord's letters, yet I will as my dutie is, anſwer a-part their ſaid letters to the king's majeſtie. Herin I dare not wright. For, to enter the matter, and not to deteſt that as the cauſe requireth, I think it not convenient. And again on the other ſide, to renew the memorie of theſe mens ingratitude, (wherwith all noble and princely hartes above all others be ſore wounded) I thinke it not wiſdome. Therfore I beſeeche you hartely, amongſt other my good lords, there to make my moſt humble excuſe to his majeſtie for the ſame. This ungracious matter that hath happened otherwiſe then ever I could have thought, hath cauſed you to have a longer letter then ever I have bene accuſtomed to wright. Ye ſhall herwith receyve a ſcedule of courte newis, whiche havyng lernyd while I wrote this; ſecretary Joyſe hathe prayed me to ſende the letter herwith encloſed to the emperor's ambaſſador in England, which I pray you to cauſe to be delivered, and hartely fare you well. From Halebourne the Chriſtmas-day at night, 1546.

Your aſſured loving friend,

Tho. Weſtm'

Herewith ye ſhall allſo receyve the copie of my letters of the 19th of this mongth, ſent by Skipperus, &c.

A letter of the duke of Norfolk's, after he had been examined in the Tower.

MY very good lords, whereas at the being here with me of my lord great chamberlayne, and Mr. Secretary, they examynd me of divers thyngs, which as near as I can call to my remembrance were the effects as here after doth enſew.

Firſt, Whether ther was any cipher betwene me and any other man: For anſwer wherunto, this is the truth, there was never cipher between me and any man, ſave only ſuch as I have had for the king's majeſtie, when I was in his ſervice. And as God be my judge, I do not remember that ever I wrote in cipher, but at ſuch time as I was in France; my lord great maſter that now is, and my lord of Rochford being in commiſſion with me. And whether I wrote any then, or not, as God help me, I do not remember; but and I wrote any thing, I am ſure both their hands were at it; and the maſter of the horſe privy to the ſame. I do remember that after the death of the biſhop of Hereford, Fox, it was ſhewed me that the ſaid biſhop had left a letter, which I had ſent him, amongſt his writings, which being found by a ſervant of his, that is now with maſter Deny, who ſhewd the ſame to the biſhop of Durham that now is, he cauſed him to throw the ſame in fier. As I do remember, it was my ſaid lord biſhop of Durebam that adviſed him to burn it; and as I alſo do remember, the matter that was conteyned therin, concerned lewde ſpeaking of the Northern men after the time of the comotion againſt the ſaid Cromwell. If there had been any thyng concerning the king's majeſtys affairs, neyther the biſhope, nor he, were he now alyve, would not have concealed the ſame; and whether any part of that was in cypher, or not, as I ſhall anſwer to God, I do not remember.

Theffect of another queſtion, there aſked me, was, as near as I can call to my remembrance, whether anie man had talked with me, that and ther were a good peace made betwene the king's majeſtie the emperor and the French king, the biſhope of Rome would brek the ſame againe by his diſpenſation? And whether I enclined that waies, or not, to that purpoſe? As God help me now, at my moſt nede, I cannot call to my remembrance, that ever I heard any man living ſpeak like words. And as for mine inclinations, that the biſhope of Rome ſhould ever have aucthority to do ſuch thing; if I had twentie lives, I would rather have ſpent them all againſt him, then ever he ſhould have any power in this realme. For no man knoweth that better then I, by reding of ſtories, how his uſurped power hath increaſed from time to time. Nor ſuch time as the king's majeſtie hath found him his enemy, no living man hath, both in his harte and with his tounge, in this realme, in France, and alſo to many Scotiſh jantlemen, ſpoken more ſore againſt his ſaid uſurped powre, then I have done, as I can prove by good witnes.

Alſo my ſaid lord and Mr. Secretary aſked me, whether I was ever made privy to a letter, ſent from my lord of Wyncheſter and ſir Henry Knevet, of any overture made by Grandville to them, for a way to be taken between his majeſtie and the biſhope of Rome; and that the ſaid letters ſhould have come to his majeſtie to Dover, I being there with him. Wherunto this is my true anſwer. I was never at Dover with his highnes ſince my lord of Richmond died, but at that time, of whoſe death word came to Syttyngborne: and as God be my helpe, I never heard of no ſuch overture, ſave that I do well remember, at ſuch time as ſir Francis Biryan was ſore ſike, and like to have died, it was ſpoken in the councill, that my lord of Wincheſter ſhould have ſaid, he cou'd deviſe a way, how the king's majeſtie might have all things upright with the ſaid biſhope of Rome, and his highnes honour ſaved. Suche were the words, or much like. Wherupon, as I had often ſaid in the councill, one was ſent to the ſaid ſir Francis, to know, if ever he heard the ſaid biſhope ſpeake like words; which he denied: and as I do remember, it was ſir Rauf Sadeler, that was ſent to the ſaid ſir Francis. And to ſay that ever I heard of any ſuch overture made by Grandville, or that ever I commoned with any man conſerning any ſuch mater, other then this of the biſhope of Wincheſter, as God be my help, I never dyd; nor unto more, thenne this, I was never prevye.

Now, my good lords, having made anſwer according to the truth of ſuch queſtions as hath been aſked me, moſt humblie I beſeeche you all to be mediators for me to his moſt excellent majeſtie, to cauſe ſuch as have accuſed me (if it might be with his high pleaſure) to come before his majeſtie, to lay to my charge afore me, face to face, what they can ſay againſt me: and I am in no dout, ſo to declare my ſelfe, that it ſhall appere I am falſly accuſed. And if his pleaſure ſhall not be, to take the paine in his royall perſon, then to give you commandment to do the ſame. My lords, I truſt ye think Cromwell's ſervice and mine hath not be like; and yet my deſire is, to have no more favour ſhew'de to me, than was ſhew'de to him, I being preſent. He was a fals man; and ſewerly I am a trewe poore jantleman.

My lords, I think ſurelie there is ſome fals man, that have laid ſome great cauſe to my charge, or elſe I had not be ſent hither. And therefore, eftſonyts moſt humblie I beſeeche to finde the names, if they and I may not be brought face to face, yet let me be made privy what the cauſes are; and if I do not anſwer truely to every point, let me not live one howre after. For ſewerlie I would hide nothing of any queſtions that I ſhall know, that doth concern my ſelf, nor any other creature.

My lords, there was never gold tried better by fier and watter then I have been, nor hath had greater enemys about my ſoveraign lord, then I have had; and yet (God be thanked) my trouth hath ever tried me, as I dout not it ſhall do in theis cauſes. Suerly, if I knew any thought I had offended his majeſtie in, I would ſuerly have declared it to his perſon.

Upon the Tuyſdaye in Whitſonweek laſt paſt, I broke unto his majeſtie, moſte humbley beſeeching him to helpe, that a mariage might be had between my daughter and ſir Thomas Semour: and wheras my ſon of Surey hath a ſon and divers daughters; that, with his favour, a croſſe mariage might have been made between my lord great chamberline and them: and alſo wher my ſon Thomas hath a ſon, that ſhall (be his mother) ſpend a thouſand marks a yere, that he might be in like wiſe maried to one of my ſaid lord's daughters. I report me to your lordſhips, whether myn intent was honeſt in this motion, or not. And whereas I have written, that my truth hath been ſeverely tried, and that I have had great enemies. Firſt, The cardinall did confes to me at Aſſer, that he had gone about fourteen years to have deſtroyed me; ſaying, he did the ſame by the ſetting upon of my lord of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, and my lord Sands; who ſaid often to him, that if he found not the means to put me out of the way, at length I ſhould ſeuerly undo him.

Cromwell, at ſuch tyme as the marquis of Exeter ſuffred, examined his wife more ſtreitly of me, then of all other men in the realme, as ſhe ſent me word by her brother, the lord Montjoy. He hath ſaid to me himſelf many times, my lord, ye are an happy man, that your wife knoweth no hurt by you; for if ſhe did, ſhe would undo you.

The duke of Buckingham confeſſed openly at the bar, (my father ſitting as his judge) that of all men living he hated me moſt, thinking I was the man that had hurt him moſt to the king's majeſtie: which now, quoth he, I perceive the contrary.

Rice, who had maried my ſiſter, confeſſed, that (of all men living) he hated me moſt; and wiſhed many times, how he might find the meanes to thruſt his dagger in me.

What malice both my neecys, that it pleaſed the king's highnes to marie, did bere unto me, is not unknown to ſuch ladies as kept them in this ſute; as my lady Herberd, my lady Tirwit, my lady Kynſton, and others, which heard what they ſaid of me. Who tried out the falſhod of the lord Darcy; ſir Robert Conſtable, ſir John Bulmer, Aſke, and many others, for which they ſuffer'd for? but only I. Who ſhewed his majeſtie of the words of my mother-in-law, for which ſhe was attainted of miſpriſion? but only I. In all times paſt unto this time, I have ſhewed my ſelf a moſt trewe man to my ſoveraign lord. And ſince theſe things done in tymes paſt, I have received more proffight of his highnes, then ever I did afore. Alas! who can think, that I, having been ſo long a trew man, ſhould now be falſe to his majeſtie? I have received more proffight then I have deſerved: and a poore man, as I am, yet I am his own near kinſman. For whoſe ſake ſhould I be an untrewe man to them? Alas, alas, my lords, that ever it ſhould be thought any ontruthe to be in me.

Fynally my good lords eftſonys moſt humble I beſeech you to ſhew this ſcrible letter to his majeſtie, and all joyntle to beſeech his highnes to grante me the peticions that are conteyned in the ſame, and moſt eſpecyall to remyt out of his moſt noble gentle hart ſuch diſpleaſure as he hath conceyved againſt me: and I ſhall dewryng my lyff pray for the continuence of his moſt royall eſtate long to endure,

By his highnes poor priſoner,

T. Norfolk.

X. Proceedings againſt various Perſons in the Reign of Henry VIII. for Treaſon, in denying the King's Supremacy, and other capital Crimes, principally relating to Religion.

[Biſhop Burnet cloſes the firſt volume of his Hiſtory of the Reformation with a ſummary account of various trials and attainders, in the reign of Hen. VIII. in order to exhibit at one view the ſeverities practiſed by that prince againſt the popiſh party; and as very few of the trials mentioned are included in the preſent collection of State Trials, we flatter ourſelves, that our inſertion of this part of the biſhop's work will not be deemed foreign to the preſent undertaking. 1 Burn. Reform. 351. to 362. It is obſervable, that, though by the biſhop's own acknowledgment, the king's ſeverity to the popiſh party furniſhes great ground for juſt cenſure; and though he ſtates many inſtances of violating the firſt principles of juſtice and humanity; yet he denies, that there is any thing to juſtify all the clamours of the Roman Catholicks againſt his memory, inſiſting too, that his cruelties were far ſhort both in number and degree of thoſe in queen Mary's reign. But really this is writing too tenderly of Henry; for there is not only grievous, but almoſt equal cauſe to deteſt the memories of both him and Mary, the barbarities exerciſed in the reign of each being too numerous to leave room for much diſtinction between them. When two princes both with characters of ſo dark a complection are to be delineated, it calls for very nice touches to diſcriminate them in the colouring.]

Extract from 1 Burn. Reformat. from p. 351. to 362.

IN the latter part of his reign, there were many things that ſeem great ſeverities, eſpecially as they are repreſented by the writers of the Roman party; whoſe relations are not a little ſtrengthened by the faint excuſes, and the miſtaken accounts, that moſt of the proteſtant hiſtorians have made. The king was naturally impetuous, and could not bear provocation; the times were very tickliſh; his ſubjects were generally addicted to the old ſuperſtition, eſpecially in the northern parts; the monks and friers were both numerous and wealthy; the pope was his implacable enemy; the emperor was a formidable prince, and being then maſter of all the Netherlands, had many advantages for the war he deſigned againſt England. Cardinal Pole, his kinſman, was going over all the courts of Chriſtendom, to perſwade a league againſt England; as being a thing of greater neceſſity and merit than a war againſt the Turk. This being, without the leaſt aggravation, the ſtate of affairs at that time, it muſt be confeſſed he was ſore put to it. A ſuperſtition that was ſo blind and headſtrong, and enemies that were both ſo powerful, ſo ſpiteful, and ſo induſtrious, made rigour neceſſary: nor is any general of an army more concerned to deal ſeverely with ſpies and intelligencers, than he was to proceed againſt all the popes adherents, or ſuch as kept a correſpondence with Pole. He had obſerved in hiſtory, that upon much leſs provocation than himſelf had given, not only ſeveral emperors and forreign princes had been diſpoſſeſſed of their dominions; but two of his own anceſtors Henry the 2d and king John had been driven to great extremities, and forced to unuſual and moſt indecent ſubmiſſions by the means of the popes and their clergy.

The popes power over the clergy was ſo abſolute, and their dependence and obedience to him was ſo implicite; and the popiſh clergy had ſo great an intereſt in the ſuperſtitious multitude, whoſe conſciences they governed, that nothing but a ſtronger paſſion could either tame the clergy, or quiet the people. If there had been the leaſt hope of impunity, the laſt part of his reign would have been one continued rebellion; therefore to prevent a more profuſe effuſion of blood, it ſeemed neceſſary to execute laws ſeverely in ſome particular inſtances.

There is one calumny that runs in a thread through all the hiſtorians of the popiſh ſide, which not a few of our own have ignorantly taken up; that many were put to death for not ſwearing the kings ſupremacy. It is an impudent falſhood; for not ſo much as one perſon ſuffered on that account; nor was their any law for any ſuch oath before the parliament in the 28th year of the kings reign, when the unſufferable bull of pope Paul the 3d, engaged him to look a little more to his own ſafety. Then indeed in the oath for maintaining the ſucceſſion of the crown, the ſubjects were required, under the pains of treaſon, to ſwear that the king was ſupream head of the church of England; but that was not mentioned in the former oath, that was made in the 25th, and enacted in the 26th year of his reign. It cannot but be confeſſed, that to enact under paine of death that none ſhould deny the kings titles, and to proceed upon that againſt offenders, is a very different thing from forcing them to ſwear the king to be the ſupream head of the church. (a)

The firſt inſtance of theſe capital proceedings was in Eaſter-Term, in the beginning of the 27th year of his reign. Three priors, and a monk, of the Carthuſian order, were then endited of treaſon, for ſaying, that the king was not ſupream head under Chriſt of the church of England. Theſe were John Houghton prior of the Charter-houſe near London, Auguſtin Webſter prior of Axholme, Robert Laurence prior of Bevoll, and Richard Reynolds a monk of Sion. This laſt was eſteemed a learned man, for that time, and that order. They were tried in Weſtminſter-Hall by a commiſſion of oyer and terminer: they pleaded not guilty, but the jury found them guilty, and judgment was given that they ſhould ſuffer as traitors. The record mentions no other particulars; but the writers of the popiſh ſide make a ſplendid recital of the courage and conſtancy they expreſſed both in their tryal, and at their death. It was no difficult thing for men ſo uſed to the legend, and the making of fine ſtories for ſaints and martyrs of their orders, to dreſs up their narratives with much pomp. But as their pleading not guilty to the endictment, ſhews no extraordinary reſolution, ſo the account that is given by them of one Hall a ſecular prieſt that died with them, is ſo falſe, that their is good reaſon to ſuſpect all. He is ſaid to have ſuffered on the ſame account; but the record of his attaindor gives a very different relation of it.

He and Robert Feron were endited at the ſame time for having 'ſaid 'many ſpiteful and treaſonable things; as, that the king was a tyrant, 'an heretick, a robber, and an adulterer; that they hoped he ſhould die 'ſuch a death as king John and Richard the 3d died; that they looked 'when thoſe in Ireland and Wales ſhould invade England; and they were 'aſſured that three parts of four in England would be againſt the king: 'they alſo ſaid that they ſhould never live merrily till the king and the 'rulers were plucked by the pates, and brought to the pot, and that it 'would never be well with the church till that was done.' Hall had not only ſaid this, but had alſo written it to Feron the 10th of March that year. When they were brought to the bar, they at firſt pleaded not guilty; but full proof being brought, they themſelves confeſſed the enditement, before the jury went aſide, and put themſelves on the kings mercy: upon which, this being an imagining and contriving both war againſt the king, and the kings death, judgment was given as in caſes of treaſon: but no mention being made of Ferons death, it ſeems he had his pardon. Hall ſuffered with the four Carthuſians, who were hanged in their habits.

They proceeded no further in Eaſter-Term: but in Trinity-Term there was another commiſſion of oyer and terminer, by which Humphrey Middlemore, William Exmew, and Sebaſtian Nudigate, three monks of the Charter-houſe near London, were endited of treaſon, for having ſaid on the 25th of May, 'that they neither could nor would conſent to be obedient to 'the kings highneſs, as true lawful and obedient ſubjects; to take him 'to be ſupream head on earth of the church of England.' They all pleaded not guilty, but were found guilty by the jury; and judgment was given. When they were condemned, they deſired that they might receive the body of Chriſt before their death. But (as judge Spelman writ) the court would not grant it, ſince that was never done in ſuch caſes but by order from the king. Two days after that, they were executed. Two other monks of that ſame order, John Rocheſter and James Wolver, ſuffered on the ſame account at York in May this year. Ten other Carthuſian monks were ſhut up within their cells, where nine of them dyed. The tenth was hanged in the beginning of Auguſt. Concerning thoſe perſons I find this ſaid in ſome original letters, that they had brought over into England, and vented in it, ſome books that were written beyond ſea, againſt the kings marriage, and his other proceedings; which being found in their houſe, they were preſſed to peruſe the books that were written for the king, but obſtinately refuſed to do it. They had alſo been involved in the buſineſs of the Maid of Kent, for which, though all the complices in it, except thoſe who ſuffered for it, were pardoned by act of parliament, yet ſuch as had been concerned in it, were ſtill under jealouſie: and it is no wonder that upon new provocations they met with the uttermoſt rigor of the law.

Theſe tryals made way for two others that were more ſignal: of the biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſir Thomas More. The firſt of theſe had been a priſoner above a year, and was very ſeverely uſed: he complained in his letters to Cromwell, that he had neither cloaths nor fire, being then about fourſcore. This was underſtood at Rome, and upon it, pope Clement, by an officious kindneſs to him, or rather in ſpite to king Henry, declared him a cardinal, and ſent him a red-hat. When the king knew this, he ſent to examine him about it; but he proteſted he had uſed no endeavours to procure it, and valued it ſo little, that if the hat were lying at his feet, he would not take it up. It never came nearer him than Picardy: yet this did precipitate his ruine. But if he had kept his opinion of the kings ſupremacy to himſelf, they could not have proceeded further. He would not do that, but did upon ſeveral occaſions ſpeak againſt it, ſo he was brought to his tryal on the 17th of June. The lord chancellor, the duke of Suffolk, and ſome other lords, together with the judges, ſate upon him by a commiſſion of oyer and terminer. He pleaded not guilty, but being found guilty, judgment was paſſed on him to die as a traitor; but he was by a warrant from the king, beheaded. Upon the 22d of June, being the day of his execution, he dreſſed himſelf with more than ordinary care; and when his man took notice of it, he told him, he was to be that day a bridegroom. As he was led to the place of execution, being ſtopt in the way by the croud, he opened his New Teſtament, and prayed to this purpoſe; that, as that book had been his companion and chief comfort in his impriſonment, ſo then ſome place might turn up to him, that might comfort him in his laſt paſſage. This being ſaid, he opened the book at a venture, in which theſe words of St. Johns Goſpel turned up: this is life eternal to know thee the only true God, and Jeſus Chriſt whom thou haſt ſent. So he ſhut the book with much ſatiſfaction, and all the way was repeating and meditating on them. When he came to the ſcaffold he pronounced the Te Deum, and after ſome other devotions his head was cut off.

Thus died John Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter, in the 80th year of his age. He was a learned and devout man, but much addicted to the ſuperſtitions in which he had been bred up: and that led him to great ſeverities againſt all that oppoſed them. He had been for many years confeſſor to the kings grand-mother, the counteſs of Richmond; and it was believed that he perſuaded her to thoſe noble deſigns for the advancement of learning, of founding two colledges in Cambridge, St. Johns and Chriſts Colledge, and divinity profeſſors in both univerſities. And in acknowledgment of this, he was choſen chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge. Henry the 7th gave him the biſhoprick of Rocheſter, which he, following the rule of the primitive church, would never change for a better. He uſed to ſay his church was his wife, and he would never part with her, becauſe ſhe was poor. He continued in great favour with the king, till the buſineſs of the divorce was ſet on foot; and then he adhered ſo firmly to the queens cauſe, and the popes ſupremacy, that he was carried by that headlong into great errors; as appears by the buſineſs of the Maid of Kent. Many thought the king ought to have proceeded againſt him rather upon that, which was a point of ſtate, than upon the ſupremacy, which was matter of conſcience. But the king was reſolved to let all his ſubjects ſee, there was no mercy to be expected by any that denied his being ſupream head of the church; and therefore made him and More, two examples for terrifying the reſt. This being much cenſured beyond ſea, Gardiner, that was never wanting in the moſt ſervile compliances, wrote a vindication of the kings proceedings. The lord Herbert had it in his hands, and tells us it was written in elegant Latin, but that he thought it too long, and others judged it was too vehement, to be inſerted in his hiſtory.

On the 1ſt of July, ſir Thomas More was brought to his tryal. The ſpecial matter in his endictment, is, that on the 7th of May preceding, before Cromwell, Bedyll, and ſome others that were preſſing him concerning the kings ſupremacy, he ſaid he would not meddle with any ſuch matter, and was fully reſolved to ſerve God, and think upon his paſſion, and his own paſſage out of this world. He had alſo ſent diverſe meſſages by one George Gold to Fiſher to encourage 'him in his obſtinacy; 'and ſaid, the act of parliament is like a ſword with two edges; for if a 'man anſwer one way, it will confound his ſoul; and if he anſwer another 'way, it will confound his body.' He had ſaid the ſame thing on the 3d of June, in the hearing of the lord chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, and others; and that he would not be the occaſion of the ſhortning his own life. And when Rich the kings ſollicitor came to deal with him further about it, but proteſted that he came not with any authority to examine him, they diſcourſed the matter fully. Rich preſſed him, 'that 'ſince the parliament had enacted that the king was ſupream head, the 'ſubjects ought to agree to it; and ſaid Rich, what if the parliament 'ſhould declare me king, would you not acknowledge me? I would, 'ſaid More, quia (as it is in the indictment) rex per parliamentum fieri 'poteſt, & per parliamentum deprivari. But More turned the argument on

(a) [This ſounds more like an apology, than juſt reaſoning. Enforcing the oath of ſupremacy by the penalty of treaſon, was reſorting to the higheſt puniſhment known to our law. Wherein, too, conſiſted the material difference, in point of rigor, between treaſon for not ſwearing to the king's ſupremacy, and treaſon for denying it? Was it not equally the object of the ſtatutes creating both crimes, to compel an acknowledgment of the king's ſupremacy by the ſame extremity of puniſhment? Can there be any reaſon to ſuppoſe, that thoſe who were concerned in the deaths of biſhop Fiſher and ſir Thomas More for denying the ſupremacy, if it had been requiſite, would have been ſo ſcrupulous as to heſitate about conſtruing the refuſal of the oath a denial? When it is objected to Henry as a cruelty, that many were put to death for not ſwearing to his ſupremacy, without doubt every denial of it, whether impliedly by refuſing the oath, or expreſsly by words, was meant: Therefore it is foreign to the ſpirit of the remark to ſay, that they were thus puniſhed for denying the ſupremacy, not for refuſing to ſwear to it. So verbal an anſwer to the animadverſion of Henry's enemies would ſcarce have eſcaped the learned biſhop, if he had not been inſenſibly influenced by a fear, leſt the juſtice and propriety of the Reformation ſhould be prejudiced by the cruelty of Henry's meaſures in its commencement. But the cauſe of truth is never finally helped by an ill-founded argument. The Reformation reſts on a better foundation than the humanity of Henry's actions; nor is there any neceſſary connection between the one and the other, bad and cruel princes being frequently the caſual inſtruments of great good to ſociety.]

‘ Rich, and ſaid, what if the parliament made an act that God was not God? Rich acknowledged it could not bind, but replyed to More, that ſince he would acknowledge him king, if he were made ſo by act of parliament, why would he not acknowledge the king ſupream head, ſince it was enacted by parliament? To that More anſwered, that the parliament had power to make a king, and the people were bound to acknowledge him, whom they made; but for the ſupremacy, though the parliament had enacted it, yet thoſe in foreign parts had never aſſented to it.’ This was carried by Rich to the king, and all theſe particulars were laid together, and judged to amount to a denyal of the ſupremacy. Judge Spelman writ, that More, being on his tryal, pleaded ſtrongly againſt the ſtatute that made it treaſon to deny the ſupremacy, and argued that the king could not be ſupream head of the church. When he was brought to the bar, he pleaded not guilty, but being found guilty, judgment was given againſt him as a traitor. He received it with that equal temper of mind, which he had ſhewed in both conditions of life, and then ſet himſelf wholly to prepare for death. He expreſſed great contempt of the world, and that he was weary of life, and longed for death; which was ſo little terrible to him, that his ordinary facetiouſneſs remained with him even on the ſcaffold. It was cenſured by many, as light and undecent. But others ſaid, that way having been ſo natural to him on all other occaſions, it was not at all affected; but ſhewed that death did no way diſcompoſe him, and could not ſo much as put him out of his ordinary humour. Yet his rallying every thing on the ſcaffold was thought to have more of the Stoick than the Chriſtian in it. After ſome time ſpent in ſecret devotions, he was beheaded on the 6th of July.

Thus did ſir Thomas More end his days, in the 53d year of his age. He was a man of rare vertues, and excellent parts. In his youth he had freer thoughts of things, as appears by his Utopia, and his letters to Eraſmus; but afterwards he became ſuperſtitiouſly devoted to the intereſts and paſſions of the popiſh clergy: and as he ſerved them when he was in authority, even to aſſiſt them in all their cruelties; ſo he employed his pen in the ſame cauſe, both in writing againſt all the new opinions in general, and in particular againſt Tindal, Frith, and Barnes, as alſo an unknown writer, who ſeemed of neither party, but reprooved the corruptions of the clergy, and condemned their cruel proceedings. More was no divine at all, and it is plain to any that reads his writings, that he knew nothing of antiquity, beyond the quotations he found in the canon-law and in the maſter of the ſentences (only he had read ſome of St. Auſtins treatiſes): for upon all points of controverſie, he quotes only what he found in theſe collections; nor was he at all converſant in the critical learning upon the ſcriptures; but his peculiar excellency in writing, was, that he had a natural eaſie expreſſion, and preſented all the opinions of popery with their fair ſide to the reader, diſguiſing or concealing the black ſide of them with great art; and was no leſs dextrous in expoſing all the ill conſequences that could follow on the doctrine of the reformers: and had upon all occaſions great ſtore of pleaſant tales, which he applied wittily to his purpoſe. And in this conſiſts the great ſtrength of his writings, which were deſigned rather for the rabble, than for learned men. But for juſtice, contempt of money, humility, and a true generoſity of mind, he was an example to the age in which he lived.

But there is one thing unjuſtly added to the praiſe of theſe two great men, or rather feigned, on deſign to leſſen the kings honour; that Fiſher and he penned the book which the king wrote againſt Luther. This Sanders firſt publiſhed, and Bellarmin and others ſince have taken it up upon his authority. Strangers may be pardoned ſuch errors, but they are inexcuſable in an Engliſhman. For in Mores printed works there is a letter written by him out of the Tower to Cromwell, in which he gives an account of his behaviour concerning the kings divorce and ſupremacy. Among other particulars one is, ‘ that when the king ſhewed him his book againſt Luther, in which he had aſſerted the popes primacy to be of divine right, More deſired him to leave it out; ſince as there had been many conteſts between popes and other princes, ſo there might fall in ſome between the pope and the king; therefore he thought it was not fit for the king to publiſh any thing, which might be afterwards made uſe of againſt himſelf; and adviſed him either to leave out that point, or to touch it very tenderly: but the king would not follow his counſel,’ being perhaps ſo fond of what he had writ, that he would rather run himſelf upon a great inconvenience, than leave out any thing that he fancied ſo well written. This ſhews that More knew that book was written by the kings own pen; and either Sanders never read this, or maliciouſly concealed it, leſt it ſhould diſcover his foul dealing.

Theſe executions ſo terrified all people, that there were no further provocations given: and all perſons either took the oaths, or did ſo dextrouſly conceal their opinions, that till the rebellions of Lincolnſhire, and the north, broke out, none ſuffered after this upon a publick account. But when theſe were quieted, then the king reſolved to make the chief authors and leaders of thoſe commotions publick examples to the reſt. The duke of Norfolk proceeded againſt many of them by martial law. There were alſo tryals at common law of a great many more that were taken priſoners, and ſent up to London. The lords Darcy and Huſſie were tryed by their peers, the marqueſs of Exceter ſitting ſteward. And a commiſſion of oyer and terminer being iſſued out for the tryal of the reſt, ſir Robert Conſtable, ſir John Bulmer and his lady, ſir Francis Pigot, ſir Stephen Hamilton, and ſir Thomas Piercy, and Aſk, that had been their captain, with the abbots of Whalley, Jerveux, Bridlington, Lenton, Woburn, and Kingſtead, and Mackrall the monk that firſt raiſed the Lincolnſhire rebellion, with ſixteen more, were indicted of high treaſon, for the late rebellions. And after all the ſteps of the rebellion were reckoned up, it is added in the indictment, that they had met together on the 17th of January, and conſulted how to renew it, and proſecute it further, being encouraged by the new riſings that were then in the north; by which they had forfeited all the favour to which they could have pretended, by vertue of the indemnity that was granted in the end of December, and of the pardons which they had taken out. They were all found guilty, and had judgment as in caſes of treaſon. Divers of them were carried down into Lincolnſhire and Yorkſhire, and executed in the places where their treaſons were committed; but moſt of them ſuffered at London, and among others the lady Bulmer (whom others call ſir John Bulmers harlot) was burnt for it in Smithfield.

The only cenſure, that paſſed on this, was, that advantages were taken on too ſlight grounds to break the kings indemnity and pardon: ſince it does not appear, that after their pardon they did any thing more than meet and conſult. But the kingdom was ſo ſhaken with that rebellion, that, if it had not been for the great conduct of the duke of Norfolk, the king had by all appearance loſt his crown. And it will not ſeem ſtrange, that a king (eſpecially ſo tempered as this was) had a mind to ſtrike terror into the reſt of his ſubjects, by ſome ſignal examples, and to put out of the way the chief leaders of that deſign: nor was it to be wondered at, that the abbots and other clergymen, who had been ſo active in that commotion, were ſeverely handled. It was by their means that the diſcontents were chiefly fomented. They had taken all the oaths that were enjoyned them, and yet continued to be ſtill practiſing againſt the ſtate; which, as it was highly contrary to the peaceable doctrines of the Chriſtian religion, ſo it was in a ſpecial manner contrary to the rules, which they profeſſed. That obliged them to forſake the world, and to follow a religious and ſpiritual courſe of life.

The next example of juſtice was a year after this, of one Forreſt an Obſervant frier. He had been, as Sanders ſaid, confeſſor to queen Katharine, but it ſeems departed from her intereſts; for he inſinuated himſelf ſo into the king, that he recovered his good opinion. Being an ignorant and lewd man, he was accounted by the better ſort of that houſe, to which he belonged in Greenwich, a reproach to their order (concerning this, I have ſeen a large account in an original letter written by a brother of the ſame houſe). Having regained the kings good opinion, he put all thoſe, who had favoured the divorce under great fears, for he proceeded cruelly againſt them. And one Rainſcroft, being ſuſpected to have given ſecret intelligence of what was done among them, was ſhut up, and ſo hardly uſed, that he dyed in their hands, which was (as that letter relates) done by frier Forreſts means. This frier was found to have denyed the kings ſupremacy: for though he himſelf had ſworn it, yet he had infuſed it into many in confeſſion, that the king was not the ſupream head of the church. Being queſtioned for theſe practices, which were ſo contrary to the oath that he had taken, he anſwered, ‘ that he took that oath with his outward man, but his inward man had never conſented to it.’ Being brought to his tryal, and accuſed of ſeveral heretical opinions that he held, he ſubmitted himſelf to the church. Upon this, he had more freedom allowed him in the priſon; but ſome coming to him diverted him from the ſubmiſſion he had offered; ſo that when the paper of abjuration was brought him, he refuſed to ſet his hand to it: upon which he was judged an obſtinate heretick. The records of theſe proceedings are loſt; but the books of that time ſay, that he denied the goſpel. It is like it was upon that pretence, that without the determination of the church it had no authority; upon which ſeveral writers of the Roman communion have ſaid undecent and ſcandalous things of the holy ſcriptures. He was brought to Smithfield, where were preſent the lords of the council, to offer him his pardon if he would abjure. Latimer made a ſermon againſt his errors, and ſtudied to perſuade him to recant; but he continued in his former opinions, ſo he was put to death in a moſt ſevere manner. He was hanged in a chain about his middle, and the great image that was brought out of Wales, was broken to pieces, and ſerved for fewel to burn him. He ſhewed great unquietneſs of mind, and ended his life in an ungodly manner, as Hall ſays, who adds this character of him, ‘ that he had little knowledge of God and his ſincere truth, and leſs truſt in him at his ending.’

In winter that year a correſpondence was diſcovered with cardinal Pole, who was barefaced in his treaſonable deſigns againſt the king. His brother ſir Geofrey Pole diſcovered the whole plot. For which the marqueſs of Exceter, (that was the kings couſin-german by his mother, who was Edward the 4ths daughter), the lord Montacute, the cardinals brother ſir Geofrey Pole, and ſir Edward Nevill, were ſent to the Tower in the beginning of November. They were accuſed for having maintained a correſpondence with the cardinal, and for expreſſing an hatred of the king, with a diſlike of his proceedings, and a readineſs to riſe upon any good opportunity that might offer it ſelf.

The ſpecial matter brought againſt the lord Montacute, and the marqueſs of Exceter, who were tried by their peers on the 2d and 3d of December, in the 30th year of this reign, is, ‘ that whereas cardinal Pole, and others, had caſt off their allegiance to the king, and gone and ſubmitted themſelves to the pope, the kings mortal enemy, the lord Montacute did on the 24th of July in the 28th year of the kings reign, a few months before the rebellion broke out, ſay, that he liked well the proceedings of his brother the cardinal, but did not like the proceedings of the realm; and ſaid, I truſt to ſee a change of this world; I truſt to have a fair day upon thoſe knaves that rule about the king; and I truſt to ſee a merry world one day.’ Words to the ſame purpoſe were alſo charged on the marqueſs. The lord Montacute further ſaid, ‘ I would I were over the ſea with my brother, for this world will one day come to ſtripes: it muſt needs ſo come to paſs, and I fear we ſhall lack nothing ſo much as honeſt men.’ He alſo ſaid, ‘ he had dreamed that the king was dead, and though he was not yet dead, he would die ſuddenly; one day his leg will kill him, and then we ſhall have jolly ſtirring;’ ſaying alſo, ‘ that he had never loved him from his childhood, and that cardinal Wolſey would have been an honeſt man, if he had had an honeſt maſter.’ And the king having ſaid to the lords he would leave them one day, having ſome apprehenſions he might ſhortly die, that lord ſaid, ‘ If he will ſerve us ſo, we ſhall be happily rid; a time will come, I fear we ſhall not tarry the time, we ſhall do well enough.’ He had alſo ſaid, ‘ he was ſorry the lord Abergavenny was dead, for he could have made ten thouſand men; and for his part he would go and live in the weſt, where the marqueſs of Exceter was ſtrong:’ and had alſo ſaid upon the breaking of the northern rebellion, ‘ that the lord Darcy played the fool, for he went to pluck away the council, but he ſhould have begun with the head firſt, but I beſhrew him for leaving ‘ off ſo ſoon.’ Theſe were the words charged on thoſe lords, as clear diſcoveries of their treaſonable deſigns; and that they knew of the rebellion that broke out, and only intended to have kept it off to a fitter opportunity: they were alſo accuſed of correſpondence with cardinal Pole, that was the kings declared enemy. Upon theſe points the lords pleaded not guilty, but were found guilty by their peers, and ſo judgment was given.

On the 4th of December were indicted ſir Geofrey Pole, for holding correſpondence with his brother the cardinal, and ſaying that he approved of his proceedings, but not of the kings; ſir Edward Nevill, brother to the lord Abergavenny, for ſaying, the king was a beaſt, and worſe than a beaſt; George Crofts, chancellor of the cathedral of Chicheſter, for ſaying, the king was not, but the pope was, ſupream head of the church; and John Collins, for ſaying, the king would hang in hell one day for the plucking down of abbeys. All thoſe, ſir Edward Nevill only excepted, pleaded guilty, and ſo they were condemned; but ſir Geofrey Pole was the only perſon of the number that was not executed, for he had diſcovered the matter. At the ſame time alſo, cardinal Pole, Michael Throgmorton gentleman, John Hilliard and Thomas Goldwell clerks, and William Peyto a Franciſcan of the Obſervants, were attainted in abſence; becauſe they had caſt off their duty to the king, and had ſubjected themſelves to the biſhop of Rome, Pole being made cardinal by him; and for writing treaſonable letters, and ſending them into England. On the 4th of February following, ſir Nicholas Carew, that was both maſter of the horſe, and knight of the garter, was arraigned for being an adherent to the marqueſs of Exeter, and having ſpoke of his attaindor as unjuſt and cruel. He was alſo attainted and executed upon the 3d of March. When he was brought to the ſcaffold, he openly acknowledged the errors and ſuperſtition in which he had formerly lived; and bleſſed God for his impriſonment, ‘ for he then began to reliſh the life and ſweetneſs of Gods holy word, ‘ which was brought him by his keeper, one Phillips, who followed the ‘ Reformation, and had formerly ſuffered for it.’

After theſe executions, followed the parliament in the year 1539, in which not only theſe attaindors that were already paſſed were confirmed, but new ones of a ſtrange and unheard-of nature were enacted. It is a blemiſh never to be waſhed off, and which cannot be enough condemned, and was a breach of the moſt ſacred and unalterable rules of juſtice, which is capable of no excuſe; it was the attainting of ſome perſons, whom they held in cuſtody, without bringing them to a tryal. Concerning which, I ſhall add what the great lord chief juſtice Cook writes: ‘ Although I queſtion not the power of the parliament, for without queſ‘ tion the attaindor ſtands of force in law, yet this I ſay of the manner ‘ of proceeding, Auferat oblivio, ſi poteſt, ſi non utrumque ſilentium tegat. ‘ For the more high and abſolute the juriſdiction of the court is, the more ‘ juſt and honourable it ought to be in the proceedings, and to give ex‘ ample of juſtice to inferior courts.’ The chief of theſe were the marchioneſs of Exceter and the counteſs of Sarum. The ſpecial matter charged on the former, is her confederating her ſelf to ſir Nicolas Carew, in his treaſons; to which is added, ‘ that ſhe had committed divers ‘ other abominable treaſons. The latter is ſaid to have confederated ‘ her ſelf with her ſon the cardinal, with other aggravating words.’ It does not appear by the Journal that any witneſſes were examined; only that day that the bills were read the third time in the houſe of lords, Cromwell ſhewed them a coat of white ſilk, which the lord admiral had found among the counteſs of Sarums cloaths, in which the arms of England were wrought on the one ſide, and the ſtandard that was carried before the rebels was on the other ſide. This was brought as an evidence that ſhe approved of the rebellion. Three Iriſh prieſts were alſo attainted for carrying letters out of Ireland, to the pope and cardinal Pole, as alſo ſir Adrian Forteſcue for endeavouring to raiſe rebellion, Thomas Dingley a knight of St. John of Jeruſalem, and Robert Granceter merchant, for going to ſeveral foreign princes, and perſuading them to make war upon the king, and aſſiſt the lords Darcy and Huſſie in the rebellion they had raiſed. Two gentlemen, a Dominican frier, and a yeoman, were by the ſame act attainted, for ſaying that that venemous ſerpent the biſhop of Rome was ſupream head of the church of England. Another gentleman, two prieſts, and a yeoman are attainted for treaſon in general, no particular crime being ſpecified. Thus ſixteen perſons were in this manner attainted, and if there was any examination of witneſſes for convicting them, it was either in the Star-Chamber, or before the privy council; for there is no mention of any evidence that was brought in the Journals: There was alſo much haſte made in the paſſing this bill: it being brought in the 10th of May, was read that day for the firſt and ſecond time, and the 11th of May for the third time. The commons kept it five days before they ſent it back, and added ſome more to thoſe that were in the bill at firſt; but how many were named in the bill originally, and how many were afterwards added, cannot be known. Forteſcue and Dingley ſuffered the 10th of July. As for the counteſs of Sarum, the lord Herbert ſaw in a record, ‘ that bulls from the pope were found in her houſe, that ſhe ‘ kept correſpondence with her ſon, and that ſhe forbade her tenants to ‘ have the New Teſtament in Engliſh, or any other of the books that ‘ had been publiſhed by the kings authority.’ She was then about ſeventy years of age, but ſhewed by the anſwers ſhe made, that ſhe had a vigorous and maſculine mind. She was kept two years priſoner in the Tower, after the act had paſſed, the king by that reprieve deſigning to oblige her ſon to a better behaviour; but upon a freſh provocation by a new rebellion in the north, ſhe was beheaded, and in her, the name and line of Plantagenet determined. The marchioneſs of Exceter died a natural death. In November this year were the abbots of Reading, Glaſſenbury and Colcheſter attainted of treaſon, of which mention was made formerly.

In the parliament that ſate in the year 1540 they went on to follow that ſtrange precedent, which they had made the former year. By the 56th act Giles Heron was attainted of treaſon, no ſpecial matter being mentioned.

By the 57th act, Richard Fetherſtoun, Thomas Abell, and Edward Powel prieſts, and William Horn a yeoman were attainted, for denying the kings ſupremacy, and adhering to the biſhop of Rome: by the ſame act the wife of one Tirrell eſq. was attainted, for refuſing her duty of allegiance, and denying prince Edward to be prince and heir of the crown; and one Laurence Cook of Doncaſter was alſo attainted for contriving the kings death.

By the 58th act, Gregory Buttolph, Adam Damplip, and Edward Brindeholm clerks, and Clement Philpot gentleman, were attainted, for adhering to the biſhop of Rome, for correſponding with cardinal Pole, and endeavouring to ſurprize the town of Callais: By the ſame act Barnes, Gerrard, and Jerome, were attainted, of whoſe ſufferings an account has been already given.

By the 59th act, William Bird a prieſt, and chaplain to the lord Hungerford, was attainted, for having ſaid to one that was going to aſſiſt the king againſt the rebels in the north, ‘ I am ſorry thou goeſt, ſeeſt thou ‘ not how the king plucketh down images and abbies every day? And ‘ if the king go thither himſelf, he will never come home again, nor any ‘ of them all which go with him, and in truth it were pity he ſhould ‘ ever come home again; and at another time upon ones ſaying, O good ‘ Lord, I ween all the world will be hereticks in a little time: Bird ſaid, ‘ Doeſt thou marvel at that? I tell thee it is no marvel, for the great ‘ maſter of all is an heretick, and ſuch a one as there is not his like in ‘ the world.’

By the ſame act the lord Hungerford was likewiſe attainted. ‘ The ‘ crimes ſpecified are, that he knowing Bird to be a traitor, did entertain ‘ him in his houſe as his chaplain; that he ordered another of his chap‘ lains, ſir Hugh Wood, and one Dr. Maudlin to uſe conjuring, that ‘ they might know how long the king ſhould live, and whether he ſhould ‘ be victorious over his enemies or not; and that theſe three years laſt ‘ paſt he had frequently committed the deteſtable ſin of ſodomy with ſe‘ veral of his ſervants:’ All theſe were attainted by that parliament. The lord Hungerford was executed the ſame day with Cromwell; he dyed in ſuch diſorder that ſome thought he was frenetick, for he called often to the executioner to diſpatch him, and ſaid he was weary of life, and longed to be dead, which ſeemed ſtrange in a man that had ſo little cauſe to hope in his death. For Powel, Fetherſtoun, and Abell, they ſuffered the ſame day with Barnes and his friends, as hath been already ſhewn.

This year Sampſon biſhop of Chicheſter, and one doctor Wilſon were put in the Tower, upon ſuſpition of a correſpondence with the pope. But upon their ſubmiſſion they had their pardon and liberty. In the year 1541, five prieſts and ten ſecular perſons, ſome of them being gentlemen of quality, were raiſing a new rebellion in Yorkſhire; which was ſuppreſſed in time, and the promoters of it being apprehended, were attainted and executed, and this occaſioned the death of the counteſs of Sarum, after the execution of the ſentence had been delayed almoſt two years.

The laſt inſtance of the kings ſeverity was in the year 1543, in which one Gardiner that was the biſhop of Wincheſters kinſman and ſecretary, and three other prieſts, were tryed, for denying the kings ſupremacy, and ſoon after executed. But what ſpecial matter was laid to their charge, cannot be known, for the record of their attainder is loſt.

Theſe were the proceedings of this king againſt thoſe that adhered to the intereſts of Rome: in which, though there is great ground for juſt cenſure, for as the laws were rigorous, ſo the execution of them was raiſed to the higheſt that the law could admit; yet there is nothing in them to juſtifie all the clamours, which that party have raiſed againſt king Henry, and by which they purſue his memory to this day; and are far ſhort, both in number and degrees, of the cruelties of queen Maries reign, which yet they endeavour all that is poſſible to extenuate or deny.

To conclude, we have now gone through the reign of king Henry the 8th, who is rather to be reckoned among the great than the good princes. He exerciſed ſo much ſeverity on men of both perſuaſions, that the writers of both ſides have laid open his faults, and taxed his cruelty. But as neither of them were much obliged to him, ſo none have taken ſo much care to ſet forth his good qualities, as his enemies have done to enlarge on his vices: I do not deny that he is to be numbred among the ill princes, yet I cannot rank him with the worſt.

Extract from one of the Harleian Manuſcripts.

THOMAS duke of Norfolke ſittinge as high ſteward of England, on the eighteenth day of Auguſt were brought before him John Dudley duke of Northumberland, William Parre marqueſſe of Northampton, and the earle of Warwicke, ſonne to the duke of Northumberland.

The duke of Northumberland, att his cominge to the barre, vſed greate reverence towards the judges, and proteſtinge his ffaith and obedience to the queene's majeſty, whome he confeſſed greivouſly to haue offended, he ſaid; that hee meant not to ſpeake any thinge in defence of himſelfe; but would firſt vnderſtand the opinion of the courte in two points.

Firſt, Whether a man, doinge an acte by the authority of the prince and counſell, and by warrant of the greate ſeale of England, and doeinge nothinge without the ſame, may bee charged for treaſon for any thinge which hee might doe by warrant thereof?

Secondly, Whether any ſuch perſons, as were equally culpable in that crime, and thoſe by whoſe letters and commaundements he was directed in all his doeings, might bee his judges, or paſſe vpon his tryall att his death?

Wherevnto was anſweared, that, as concerninge the firſt, the greate ſeale, which hee layd for his warrant, was not the ſeale of the lawfull queene of the realme, nor paſſed by authority, but the ſeale of an uſurper, and therefore would bee noe warrant for him.

And to the ſecond, it was alleadged, that, if any were as deepely to bee touched as himſelfe in that caſe, yet as longe as noe atteindor were of record againſt them, they were neverthleleſſe perſons able in the lawe to paſſe vpon any tryall, and not to bee challenged therefore, but att the princes pleaſure.

After which anſwere, the duke vſinge fewe words, declared his earneſt repentance in the caſe, (for hee ſaw, that to ſtand vpon vtteringe any reaſonable matter would little prevaile) and moved the duke of Norfolke to bee a meanes vnto the queene for mercy, and without further anſweare confeſſed the indictment; by whoſe example alſoe the other priſoners arraigned with him did likewiſe confeſſe the indictment produced againſt them, and therevpon had judgement.

The judgement beinge pronounced, hee craved favour of ſuch a death as was executed on noblemen, and not the other; hee beſeeching alſo that a favourable regard might bee had of his children in reſpect of theire age, and that hee might bee permitted to conferre with ſome learned divine for the ſettlinge of his conſcience; and laſtly, that her majeſtie would bee pleaſed to ſend vnto him fowre of her counſell for the diſcovery of ſome things which might concerne the ſtate.

The marqueſſe of Northampton pleaded to his indictment, that after the beginninge of theſe tumults hee had forborne the execucion of any publique office; and that all the while hee, intent to huntinge and other ſports, did not partake in the conſpiracy; but it beinge manifeſt that hee waſt party with the duke of Northumberland, ſentence paſſed on him likewiſe.

The earle of Warwicke, fyndinge that the judges in ſoe greate a cauſe, admitted noe excuſe of age, with greate reſolucion heard his condemnacion pronounced againſt him, cravinge only this favour; that, whereas the goods of thoſe who are condemned for treaſon are totally confiſcated; yet her majeſtie would bee pleaſed, that out of them his debts might bee payd.

After this they were all returned agayne to the Tower.

ON the 18th of Auguſt, the duke of Norfolk ſitting as lord high ſteward, thoſe concern'd in the rebellion were try'd at Weſtminſter; where the duke of Northumberland, with his eldeſt ſon the earl of Warwick, and the marquis of Northampton, were found guilty of high treaſon. The account of that day's proceedings, and of the day following, I ſhall here tranſcribe from Thuanus, a writer of great fame; becauſe, tho' I do not entirely approve all he has ſet down, I think he keeps very near to truth, and the reader, perhaps, will not be ill entertain'd with the variety of opinions upon this matter.

‘ The duke of Northumberland, ſays he, alledg'd, That he did nothing but by order of the council, yet this would not excuſe him; ſo that he was condemn'd as a traytor. When the ſentence was pronounc'd, he beg'd that it might be mitigated, as to the manner of his death, and that his children, in regard to their tender years, might find mercy; and that he might have the liberty of ſpeaking with ſome learned divine (for the ſettling of his conſcience). And laſtly, that her majeſty wou'd be pleas'd to ſend to him four of her privy-council, to whom he had ſome things to communicate, relating to the publick. Then came on the tryal of the marquis of Northampton, who pretended, that he had not any hand in the rebellion, nor was engag'd in any party, but having no publick poſt, had ſpent all the time in his uſual diverſion of hunting, and other ſports (a). However, it appear'd that he was engag'd on Northumberland's ſide, and therefore he was likewiſe condemn'd. Afterwards, the earl of Warwick, Northumberland's eldeſt ſon, when the plea of his youth wou'd not be admitted in excuſe of ſo great a crime, receiv'd his ſentence of death with a wonderful conſtancy; and only pray'd her majeſty, that out of his eſtate confiſcated, his debts might be diſcharged. Theſe were preſently ſent back to the Tower. The next day, ſir Andrew Dudley, Northumberland's brother, and ſir John Gates, who was ſuppos'd the firſt author of ſetting up lady Jane, with his brother Henry Gates, and ſir Thomas Palmer, were condemn'd. The 22d of Auguſt they were brought out to execution, having two days before receiv'd the ſacrament in priſon. Northumberland, by the perſuaſion of Heath (afterwards archbiſhop of York) made a ſpeech to the people, in which he confeſs'd his crime and repentance, and adviſ'd all who were preſent to adhere to the ancient religion of their forefathers, and rejecting the new opinions, as the ſource of all the evils that had befallen 'em for 30 years paſt, to drive the preachers of 'em, as trumpeters of ſedition, out of the kingdom, if they wou'd approve themſelves innocent before God and the publick. He declar'd that in his heart he had always been for the old religion, and appeal'd for the truth of this to his intimate friend the biſhop of Worceſter, but he had temporiz'd out of ambition, for which he now was a ſincere penitent; and laſtly, that he willingly ſubmitted to his death, which he own'd he had deſerv'd. Having ſaid this, he recommended himſelf to God, and deſiring the prayers of the ſpectators, prepar'd to receive the ſtroke; and immediately the executioner perform'd his office. Northumberland's exhortations variouſly affected the minds of the people, who were amaz'd to hear him ſpeak againſt that religion, which he had profeſs'd for above 30 years; and on the account of which chiefly he had adviſ'd king Edward to exclude his ſiſters. Moſt have written, that being a cunning man, and fond of life, he did this in hopes of a pardon; and that when he look'd round him and ſaw he was deceiv'd, he repented of it (b). He was charg'd (upon no trivial conjectures) with having poiſon'd the late king. But nothing of this was mention'd at his trial, becauſe his judges undertook not the examination into king Edward's death, but only the buſineſs of the rebellion againſt queen Mary. Gates too and Palmer underwent the ſame puniſhment.'

(a) The contrary to which was notorious; for Northampton was one of queen Jane's privy-counſellors, and ſigned a letter, July the 9th, among the reſt of her privy-council, to the lady Mary, (as they ſtiled her) requiring her to deſiſt, and be quiet and obedient; beſides his going along with the duke in all his counſels. Kennet.

(b) Fox, who lived in theſe times, confirms and clears this matter: who writes, that the duke had a promiſe made him of a pardon; yea, though his head were upon the block, on condition he would recant, and hear maſs. On which promiſe he firmly relied, and did what was required; and ſtill born up with the ſame hope, on the ſcaffold denied, in word and outward profeſſion, that true religion which he had often, both in king Henry's and king Edward's days, evidently declared himſelf to favour and further. Id.

XII. The Trial of PHILIP HOWARD Earl of Arundel, for High Treaſon, in the Court of the Lord High Steward of England, the 18*th of* April, in the 32*d of* Eliz. 1589.

[An account of this trial is in the 1*ſt volume of the preſent work, with a reference in a note to* Camden's Elizabeth*, as if the trial was extracted from that work. See* 1*ſt vol. fol.* 163. But the fact is, that they are different relations of the ſame trial; and as Mr. Camden's account, though not ſo full, appears to us more clear and intelligible, and at the ſame time occupies little room, we thought that it would not be unacceptable to our readers. It is therefore here given from the Engliſh tranſlation of Camden, in Biſhop Kennet's Complete Hiſtory of England. 2 Kenn. Compl. Hiſt. 551.

There are two other narratives of this trial; one amongſt the Harleian Manuſcripts at the Britiſh Muſeum; the other in Mr. Collins's Peerage, under the title of The Duke of Norfolk. But on compariſon, we find the former to be only an old tranſlation from the Latin edition of Camden's Elizabeth. As to the latter, though Collins cites a manuſcript in the poſſeſſion of the Howard family, yet he adds ſcarce any thing of conſequence unnoticed by or different from Camden, except that Bennett, one of the witneſſes againſt the earl, is repreſented previouſly to the trial, to have addreſſed a letter to him, in which he acknowledged, that he was forced into a confeſſion to the injury of the earl, by fear of the rack, and therefore prayed his forgiveneſs.—We endeavoured to procure acceſs to the manuſcript cited by Collins, with an intention to have gratified our readers with a copy of it; but the application failed of ſucceſs.]

THE very ſame month [April 18th 1589,] was Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, arraign'd in Weſtminſter-hall, and tried by his peers, before Henry earl of Derby, who was created lord-high-ſteward of England on this particular occaſion.

The perſons ſummoned to attend this trial, were theſe following peers.

William Cecil lord Burleigh, lord-high-treaſurer of England.
William lord marqueſs of Wincheſter.
Edward earl of Oxford, lord-great-chamberlain of England.
Henry earl of Kent.
Henry earl of Suſſex.
Henry earl of Pembroke.
Edward earl of Hertford.
Henry earl of Lincoln.
The lord Hunſdon.
The lord Willoughby of Ereſby.
The lord Morley.
The lord Cobham.
The lord Grey.
The lord Darcy of the north.
The lord Sands.
The lord Wentworth.
The lord Rich.
The lord Willoughby of Parham.
The lord North.
The lord St. John of Bletneſho.
The lord Buckhurſt.
The lord La-Ware. And
The lord Norris.

Being order'd to hold up his hand, he did ſo, and moreover uſed this expreſſion, Behold here a clean hand, and an honeſt heart! The heads of his impeachment were much the ſame with thoſe mention'd before, Ann. 1586. viz. ‘That he held a very ſtrict intimacy and correſpondence ‘ with cardinal Allen, Parſons the Jeſuit, and other conſpirators, who attempted the ruin of their prince and country, by ſtirring up foreigners ‘ and the queen's natural ſubjects to bring in popery, to the total deſtruction of both: That he had engaged by letters convey'd by Weſton, alias Burges, a prieſt, to aſſiſt the ſaid cardinal in advancing the ‘ catholick cauſe, and to that purpoſe had deſign'd to withdraw privately ‘ out of the kingdom: That he was privy to the bull of Sixtus Quintus, ‘ which dethroned the queen, and made over her dominions to the Spaniards: That when he was a priſoner in the Tower, he had cauſed maſs ‘ to be ſaid for the happy ſucceſs of the Spaniſh armada, and had himſelf ‘ compoſed a ſpecial prayer on that occaſion.’

Being demanded to anſwer, whether he was guilty, or not guilty? he turned himſelf to the court and judges, and made theſe challenges one after another, whether ſuch a number of articles might lawfully be put into one and the ſame impeachment? They anſwer'd in the affirmative. Then he demanded, whether preſumptive arguments bore any weight in an indictment? He was anſwer'd, that he might except againſt them as far as he pleas'd. Another demand was, whether he could ſtand accus'd of thoſe things charged to be treaſon in the 13*th of queen* Elizabeth, after the time limited in the ſaid act? They then promiſed him, he ſhould not be try'd upon any other law or act of high-treaſon, but an ancient one of Edward III. In the laſt place, he demanded, if that were a fair indictment, which fail'd groſly as to circumſtances both of place and time? The anſwer was, that theſe things ſignified little, if the matter of fact were proved. After this, being aſked a ſecond time, whether he were guilty or not? he anſwer'd, not guilty, and ſubmitted himſelf to God and his peers; but deſired them to ſpare his memory, which was impair'd by his impriſonment, and ill health, and not to over-charge it with too much variety.

Puckering, the queen's ſerjeant at law, open'd the firſt part of the charge, viz. That cardinal Allen having engag'd with the Jeſuits and others againſt his prince and country, upon which account he was baniſh'd the kingdom; yet he the ſaid earl had kept up a correſpondence with him by letters, and had expreſly written to him to advance the catholick intereſt, which, by a fair and modeſt conſtruction, was a plain inviting of him to invade England. The earl made anſwer, That all he intended by it, was the promotion of that faith, by the acceſſion of new proſelytes. Popham, the queen's attorney-general, endeavour'd to prove, by the confeſſions of Savage, Throckmorton, and Babington, that this could not poſſibly be underſtood of a free converſion upon the ſtrength of argument; but of a publick invaſion by force of arms. Shuttleworth, a ſerjeant at law, made it appear out of the form of the proclamations put out againſt the Jeſuits and ſeminary prieſts, on what deſigns they were ſent into England: That they were traitors, he proved from the earl's own words; who, upon the hearing of Valonger's cauſe in the Star-Chamber, in relation to a ſcandalous libel of his, ſaid publickly, that an hearty papiſt could not but be as thorow a traitor. But for all this, men of this very principle were among the earl's greateſt intimates. 'Twas urged moreover, That he had eſpouſed the faith of the Romiſh church, and became of conſequence a ſubject to the Romiſh ſee; but this he flatly deny'd, and demanded that any evidence might be produced to prove him a profeſſed catholick. He acknowledged indeed, that he had in ſome inſtances made Burges his confeſſor; whereupon it was debated, that none were admitted to the ſacraments of the church of Rome, but ſuch as were reconciled to her doctrine and worſhip; but he was admitted by Gratley, a prieſt, and therefore a papiſt before, at leaſt in his heart. This Popham labour'd to prove from his own letters, and that he intended likewiſe to withdraw beyond ſea; that he was an abſolute creature of cardinal Allen, and conform'd entirely to his meaſures; for which he was guilty of high-treaſon. He then produced Gratley's and Morgan's letters to the queen of Scots, and made from thence this inference, that the earl owed his change in religion more to ſourneſs and ſpleen, than to conſcience and conviction. Then was produced an emblematical piece found in the earl's cabinet, which had on one ſide an hand ſhaking a ſerpent into the fire, with this motto, If God be with us, who ſhall be againſt us? and on the other, a lion rampant, without claws, and with this inſcription, Yet a lion. He moreover added, that the earl deſigning to quit the kingdom, was perſuaded by the cardinal to alter his purpoſe, as being a perſon likely to do the church of Rome more ſervice by his ſtay in England, than his departure thence; that in a letter to the queen, the earl had reflected ſeverely on the juſtice of the laws, in reference to the ſentence of death denounced againſt his grand-father and father; that the queen of Scots had recommended him to Babington, as the great patron of the catholick intereſt; that Allen had owned that the aforeſaid bull was procured by the applications of a perſon of figure in England; which could be no other than the earl, becauſe no one nobleman beſides, was ſo intimate with Allen as himſelf, and whom therefore Allen muſt needs know to be ill-affected to his country, by what he had heard paſs before in the Star-Chamber. Then were read alſo the confeſſions of the lord William, the earl's brother, with thoſe of his ſiſter, the lady Margaret, and his own letters, when he had thoughts of leaving the kingdom. And this gave occaſion to magnify the queen's clemency afreſh, who would not ſuffer him (at that very time) to be examin'd on an article of treaſon, but barely on a point of contempt. To theſe charges the earl anſwer'd in the groſs, ‘That as for the picture, 'twas a trifle preſented him by his man: That ‘ indeed he had promiſed to aſſiſt the cardinal in the promotion of the ‘ catholick faith, but never at the expence of his prince and country: ‘ That what he had written in relation to the ſentence of his grand-father and father, was extant upon record, and ſo any one might read it: ‘ That he was not at all concerned in what the cardinal or the queen of ‘ Scots might write about him, ſince he ſtood clear as to fact: That it ‘ was impoſſible to reſtrain other mens pens: That he had indeed ſome ‘ deſign of acting under the prince of Parma, in the wars abroad, ſince ‘ the rigour of the laws againſt catholicks made it not ſafe for him to ſtay ‘ at home: That the attorney had managed the letters and confeſſions, ‘ at the ſame rate that ſpiders do flowers; that is, ſuck'd all the poiſon ‘ out of them; but he, for his part, was able to extract out of them ‘ ſomething more uſeful, might he be permitted to ſee them.’ Then were read Allen's letters to the queen of Scots, with thoſe of the biſhop of Roſs, about invading England, that very year he deſign'd to quit it; and the bull of Sixtus Quintus, and ſeveral remarks made on Allen's memorial to the Engliſh, printed at Antwerp the year before. He was likewiſe charged with having aſſumed this title, Philip duke of Norfolk, which was found among his papers; and it was Allen's advice, that he ſhould in ſome degree mend his title. Theſe things were brought againſt him as convictions of treaſon before his impriſonment. Egerton, the ſollicitor-general, having ſumm'd up and repeated the particulars of the charge, proceeded upon a threefold diſtinction of time, viz. 'Before the arrival of the Spaniſh fleet; at the inſtant of its coming; and after it fled: And that he had been guilty of treaſon ſince his confinement: Before the fleet appeared, he had been guilty of treaſon, in wiſhing it happy ſucceſs; when it was arrived, in making a form of prayer ſuitable to his wiſhes, and cauſing the maſs of the Holy Ghoſt to be ſaid, and a courſe of devotions to be uſed for 24 hours together: And then when the fleet was gone, in lamenting its defeat with all the marks of an extraordinary ſorrow; as if he had fix'd his laſt hope, and beſt confidence, in the Spaniſh armada, which was fitted out with a deſign to ruin his prince and country.' Theſe particulars were all made out againſt him by ſir Tho. Gerard kt. Will. Shelley, condemn'd for treaſon, ann. 1586. Bennet, a popiſh prieſt, and ſome other priſoners. He then mutter'd in a broken and imperfect kind of tone, that the prayers he made, and the maſſes he perform'd, were in order to deprecate a maſſacre he had heard was deſigned againſt the catholicks. Gerard's evidence he roundly deny'd; and as he adjured him to declare nothing but the truth, and repreſented before him the dreadful ſolemnity of the laſt day, he ſo terrified and ſcared the evidence, that he hardly was able to ſpeak one word to the purpoſe. Bennet's atteſtations he endeavour'd to invalidate, as being a man of a tarniſh'd reputation, and who had contradicted himſelf in his confeſſions. The reſt he taxed as perſons impeach'd, and priſoners, and men likewiſe of a looſe and profligate character; who were far from deſerving credit, and who might be ſuſpected to have the liberty of uſing his converſation with a deſign to enſnare him in the querks of the law. Having received a check for this, as too indecent and bold a challenge upon the evidence for the queen, at the ſolicitor's motion, an ancient law of Richard II. was read, whereby it was declared, that the crown of England was under the command of none but God alone, and that the biſhop of Rome had no manner of authority over it. It now growing towards night, and nothing being produced farther againſt him, the earl was order'd to withdraw: He threw himſelf wholly upon the judgment of his peers, proteſting his obedience to the queen, and heartily praying they might come to ſuch an iſſue, as might be moſt for the glory of God, the ſafety of the queen, and the integrity of their own honour and conſcience. They then went aſide, and held a debate, which laſted an hour, and in points of law they conſulted the opinion of the judges and ſerjeants. Being returned to their ſeats, the clerk of the crown demanded of them, Whether the earl were guilty or not? At which every one of 'em putting his hand to his breaſt, as the cuſtom was, declared upon his honour and conſcience, that he was guilty. Then being aſked if he had any thing farther to ſay, why ſentence of death ſhould not paſs upon him? he only ſaid the ſame words which his father had done before him, in the ſame place, God's will be done. Sentence being pronounced, he deſired leave to ſpeak with his wife, and that he might ſee his young ſon, who was born ſince his confinement; that he might have the liberty to ſpeak with his ſtewards, who had the accounts of his eſtate, and that his debts might be diſcharged: He likewiſe humbly deſired the queen would take his young ſon into her favour and patronage. Then the lord ſteward brake his ſtaff, the badge of his place; and the earl was carry'd back to the Tower, the ax being carry'd before him, with the edge towards him. There were a great many that moſt heartily lamented the untimely fall of this young nobleman, (for he was not above 33 years of age at the moſt) and as many on the other ſide were ready to cry up the queen's wiſdom and caution, who by this example had ſtruck a kind of terror into the more powerful part of the Romiſh faction. The queen after all gave him his life, and was well enough ſatisfy'd in having leſſen'd the power of ſo conſiderable a man, and one who was ſo great a bulwark of the catholick cauſe.

XIII. The Caſe of Impoſitions, on an Information in the Exchequer by the Attorney-General againſt Mr. John Bates Merchant. Michaelmas, 4 James I. 1604.

[This famous caſe involved in it a conſtitutional queſtion of the firſt magnitude; Mr. Bates the defendant having been proſecuted for refuſing to pay a duty on foreign currants impoſed by a mere act of the crown. The attempt, to enforce a ſubmiſſion to this duty by legal proceſs, was certainly a principal and early part of that raſh and unwarrantable ſcheme to eſtabliſh in the crown a right of taxing the ſubject, which diſturbed the reigns of the two firſt princes of the Stuart line. James the firſt claimed the right of impoſing duties on imported and exported merchandize by prerogative. His ſon and immediate ſucceſſor, the unfortunate Charles, not only perſiſted in the claim, but added to it the equally formidable pretenſion of ſhip-money. Realized, theſe claims, with loans benevolences monopolies and the other ſubſidiary branches of the ſame extravagant deſign, would have comprized nearly a compleat ſyſtem of extra-parliamentary taxation; for impoſition at the ports was calculated to ſerve the purpoſe externally, ſhip-money to operate internally. Had they been acquieſced in, parliaments would ſoon have become unneceſſary aſſemblies; the mildneſs of a limited monarchy would gradually have degenerated into the harſhneſs of an abſolute one; a legal government would have been corrupted into a tyranny. To the great diſgrace of the profeſſion of the law, ſome, who in other reſpects were its brighteſt ornaments, gave their aid to theſe attempts againſt the rights of parliament. We make the acknowledgment with concern; but it is a truth, which neither can nor ought to be concealed. The great luminary of ſcience, lord Bacon, exerciſed his eloquence to reconcile parliament to impoſitions by prerogative. Sir John Davis, ſo juſtly admired for his writings about Ireland, compoſed a treatiſe to prove the right of the crown. Both diſplayed the greatneſs of their talents on the occaſion, though they managed the argument in different ways; the former ſpeciouſly profeſſing to claim the prerogative in queſtion from and to limit it by law; the latter boldly adventuring to exalt the ſame prerogative above law, and deſcribing it to be like another Sampſon too ſtrong to be bound. 2. Bac. 4to. ed. 1778. p. 223. Dav. on Impoſit. 131. Even the judges deigned to be inſtruments for ſubjugating their country to an illegal taxation. Though the ſtatute-book was full of legiſlative declarations againſt taxes without conſent in parliament, though not ſo much as one recognition of the claim could be found in the records of juſtice, the court of Exchequer in Bates's caſe gave judgment for impoſitions by prerogative on imports and exports; and in Mr. Hampden's caſe, though ſome very recent admonitions and warnings of duty had intervened, all the judges of Weſtminſter-hall, two only excepted, joined to give the ſanction of a judicial opinion to ſhip-money. Nor were monopolies, loans, and benevolences, wholly uncountenanced by the courts of juſtice. But, during this criſis, the houſes of parliament did not forget their duty. They purſued the ſeveral devices for illegal taxation, till all were hunted down, and had yielded to the tide of law and conſtitution. In 1610, the houſe of commons, alarmed by the judgment in Bates's caſe, formally debated the right of the crown to impoſe on merchandize at the ports; and at length by a petition to the king complained of ſuch impoſitions as a grievance, which in the ſubſequent parliaments was followed with frequent remonſtrances of the like kind. In 1623, monopolies were curbed and regulated by ſtatute. In 1627, gifts, loans, and benevolences, were pointedly declared contrary to law by the Petition of Right, with general words to comprehend all ſorts of taxes and charges out of parliament. In 1640, the legiſlature cruſhed ſhip-money almoſt in its birth, by declaring the judgment for it contrary to law and vacating the record. In the ſame year the final blow was given to taxation by prerogative; an act for tonnage and poundage being paſſed, with a declaration againſt the king's claim to impoſe ſuch duties. Thus the victory over all the ſeveral inventions to tax the ſubject by prerogative became compleat; before the civil wars broke out, before the conteſt with the crown degenerated from reſiſtance of its uſurped powers into an invaſion of its juſt claims. Fortunately too, when the country emerged from the anarchy and miſery of the ſcene which followed, the extravagance of joy did not extinguiſh a due remembrance of the conſtitution. One of the firſt acts, after the Reſtoration, was a grant of tonnage and poundage, with words which renewed a part of the former declarations againſt taxing by prerogative; for it anxiouſly recited, that ' no rates can be impoſed on merchandize ' imported or exported by ſubjects or aliens, but by common conſent in parliament.' 12. Cha. 2. c. 4. §. 6.—It was once our intention to have traced more fully the hiſtory of the long conteſt about taxes out of parliament, from the acceſſion of the houſe of Stuart, till it was finally decided againſt the crown in 1641; our plan being to have minutely and diſtinctly ſtated the proceedings on each ſpecies of device to elude the conſtitution, and to have given a general view of the arguments by which each was ſuſtained or repelled. But though we had already made many reſearches, and collected ſeveral materials on the ſubject, it was found impoſſible to do juſtice to it, without more time, than was conſiſtent with preſent convenience to allow. We therefore reſerve the detail of the ſubject for ſome future occaſion. As to the attempts at extra-parliamentary taxation in the previous period, they are fully inveſtigated in ſome of the pieces which we now preſent to the reader.

The only ſtate of this important caſe, and of the arguments in it, is in Lane's Reports, and in a ſhort note added to Dyer's Reports by the learned editor of the improved edition. See Lane's Rep. p. 22. and Dy. ed. 1688, fo. 165-b. in the margin. The report in Lane, being the fulleſt, ſhall be laid before the reader; to which we ſhall ſubjoin a ſpeech made in parliament by lord Bacon in 1610, when the judgment of the Exchequer in the caſe in queſtion was formally diſcuſſed by the houſe of commons. We ſhall next add a tranſcript from an original manuſcript, deſcribed by Mr. Carte to be in the hand-writing of the famous ſir John Davis; being in ſubſtance like the latter part of the printed Treatiſe on Impoſitions with his name, but differing much in the language, and more likely to be correct. Theſe pieces together comprize the principal arguments for the prerogative of impoſitions claimed by the crown. But, without ſomething more, it would be a very partial view of the ſubject. In juſtice, therefore, as well to that excellent conſtitution, to the injury of which the claim of impoſitions by prerogative operated, as to thoſe who ſo honourably for themſelves and ſo happily for their country reſiſted the invaſion, we ſhall add two moſt learned and able arguments on the oppoſite ſide of the queſtion; one delivered by Mr. Hakewill in the ſame parliament with lord Bacon's argument; the other alſo cotemporary, and ſaid to have been compoſed by ſir Henry Yelverton, afterwards the judge of that name. Both of theſe valuable remnants of the debates in parliament on impoſitions by the crown are very rare; having been printed ſeparately, and not being to be found in any publiſhed collections of the time. What is very remarkable, they are not only unnoticed by Mr. Hume, Mr. Carte, and the authors of the Parliamentary Hiſtory; but have even eſcaped the obſervation of our deſervedly celebrated female hiſtorian. That the two former writers ſhould not be ſtudious to draw the attention of their readers to two arguments, ſo fit to counteract the reception of their particular prejudices, is eaſy to be accounted for; eſpecially in the inſtance of Mr. Carte, whoſe bias in favour of the prerogative is more avowed and apparent than Mr. Hume's. But Mrs. Macaulay's ſilence cannot be explained in the ſame way; and therefore we attribute it to the accident of her not having met with either of the arguments. Perhaps our obſervation on Mr. Hume and Mr. Carte may ſound as harſh to ſome perſons. But we can aſſure ſuch, that it is not intended to write diſreſpectfully of either of thoſe authors. We feel ſtrongly the merit of Mr. Carte, as a moſt elaborate hiſtorian; as one, to whoſe familiar knowledge and ſkilful uſe of records, with the other moſt authentick materials of the hiſtory of his country, all, who follow him in the ſame line, are infinitely obliged. For ſtrength clearneſs and elegance of ſtile, for profoundneſs in remark, for beautiful arrangement and cloſe compreſſion of matter, we conſider Mr. Hume's work as a model of hiſtorical compoſition. Such being the characters of theſe eminent writers, it becomes the more neceſſary to know, on which ſide their prejudices operate. Otherwiſe the authority of their works might have an improper influence in ſettling the opinions of their readers on the controverted points of our government and conſtitution, and ſo lead to the diſſemination of dangerous and pernicious errors. The truth ſeems to be, that a general hiſtory of England, compoſed with that rigid impartiality ſo eſſential to a perfectly juſt idea of our conſtitution, is ſtill wanting. Hitherto the beſt of our writers, who have engaged in that arduous taſk, have been betrayed into extremes. One is ſwayed by predilection for the Stuart family; whilſt another loſes his temper from averſion to them. Some write from favor to abſolute monarchy; others are votaries to the paſſion of republicaniſm. Too many have been ſeduced by zeal for a particular party in the ſtate; and ſo, according to the occaſion, have practiſed the arts of apology, or adopted the ſevere and vehement language of ſatire. But the author, who wiſhes to fix the true point of our antient conſtitution in the ſcale of government, muſt baniſh from his mind all ſuch corruptives of judgment.

Beſides the arguments by Hakewill and Yelverton, againſt impoſitions on merchandize by prerogative, there are ſome very forcible reaſons with the ſame view by lord Coke in his ſecond Inſtitute, where he comments on the 30th chapter of Magna Charta. See 2. Inſt. page 57. to 63.—Some obſervations alſo occur on the ſubject in the 12*th part of lord* Coke's Reports. But, in this latter book, he writes with more favor to the judgment for impoſitions in Bates's caſe; for, though he diſclaims all idea of the crown's having a right to impoſe duties at the ports, in form of a tax and for a revenue, yet he contends, that, for the benefit of the ſubject, and in the way of advancement and regulation of trade, the crown may charge. This diſtinction ſeems to be of dangerous tendency, and not quite reconcileable with the ſame great lawyer's ſentiments in his 2d Inſtitute, where he condemns the judgment in Bates's caſe without any reſerve. However it ſhould be conſidered, that lord Coke's 12th Report contains only his firſt thoughts, before the queſtion had undergone a parliamentary inveſtigation; and further, that the 12th Report is of ſmall authority, being not merely poſthumous, but apparently nothing more than a collection from papers neither digeſted nor intended for the preſs by the writer. 12. Extract from Lane's Reports, page 22.

AN information was exhibited againſt Bates a merchant of the Levant; and it was recited, that the king by his letters patents under the great ſeal had commanded his treaſurer, that he command the cuſtomers and receivers, that they ſhould aſk and receive of every merchant denizen, who brings within any port within his dominions, any currants, five ſhillings a hundred for impoſt, above two ſhillings and ſix pence, which was the poundage by the ſtatute of every hundred; and it was alledged, that Bates had notice thereof, and that he had brought in currants into the port of London, and refuſed to pay the ſaid 5. s. in contempt of the king. Whereunto Bates came, and ſaid, that he is an Engliſh merchant, and adventurer and a denizen, and that he made a voyage to Venice, and there bought currants, and imported them into England; and he recited the ſtatute of the firſt of king James cap. 33. which grants 2. s. 6. d. for poundage, and he ſaid, that he had paid that, and therefore he had refuſed to pay the 5. s. becauſe it was impoſed unjuſtly, and unduly againſt the lawes of the land; whereupon the kings attorney demurred in law.

This matter had been divers times argued at the bar, and at the bench, by Snig and Savil barons, and now by Clark and Flemming chief baron, whoſe arguments only I heard.

And Clark, who argued firſt this day, ſaid, that this caſe being of ſo great conſequence, great reſpect and conſideration is to be had, and it ſeemeth to me ſtrange, that any ſubjects would contend with the king, in this high point of prerogative; but ſuch is the kings grace, that he had ſhewed his intent to be, that this matter ſhall be diſputed and adjudged by us according to the antient law and cuſtome of the realm; and becauſe that the judgement of this matter cannot be well directed by any learning delivered in our books of law, the beſt directions herein are precedents of antiquitie, and the courſe of this court, wherein all actions of this nature are to be judged, and the acts of parliament recited in arguments of this caſe prove nothing to this purpoſe. The beſt caſe in law is the caſe of Mines in Mr. Plowden Com. where this ground is put, that the precedents of every court ought to be a direction to that court, to judge of matters which are aptly determinable therein, as in the Kings Bench for matters of the crown, in the Common Pleas for matters of inheritance and civil contracts, and in the Exchequer for matters of the kings prerogative his revenue and government. And as it is not a kingdome without ſubjects and government, ſo he is not a king without revenues, for without them he cannot preſerve his dominions in peace, he cannot maintain war, nor reward his ſervants, according to the ſtate and honor of a king; and the revenue of the crown is the very eſſential part of the crown, and he who rendeth that from the king pulleth alſo his crown from his head, for it cannot be ſeparated from the crown. And ſuch great prerogatives of the crown, without which it cannot be, ought not to be diſputed; and in theſe caſes of prerogative the judgement ſhall not be according to the rules of the common law, but according to the precedents of this court, wherein theſe matters are diſputable and determinable. As for example, an action of accompt lies not by the common law againſt him, who had the land of the accomptant by mean conveyance. But if one be an accomptant to the king, and had land in fee, and alien it unto A. who alien it unto B. B. by reaſon of this land ſhall be charged with this accompt. In 14. E. 3. a coroner was elected by the king's writ as he ought to be, by the countie, and after he was amerced, and becauſe he was not ſufficient to anſwer the amercement the countie was charged therewith, and that appears of record here. And in 30. E. 3. Rot. 6. as appears alſo of record, in this court, one William Porter was magiſter monetæ, and had received bullion of divers merchants, and coyned it in the kings mint, and did not reſtore the coyne to the merchants, but was inſufficient, and the king paid the merchants, and inquired of the ſureties for the coyne, and it was found that he had none; then it was inquired who recommended him unto the king, and it was found by whom he was recommended; and they, who only recommended him as friends, were charged with the debt. And if one be outlawed in a perſonal action, and debt is due to him upon a contract, this ſhall be forfeited to the king, and this is ordinary by the precedents of this court; and yet this ſeems to be contrary to law, and is againſt our books. And the kings debtor ſhall have a quo minus againſt executors upon a ſimple contract, and therein he cannot releaſe, nor be non-ſuited. And I put theſe caſes to prove, that the precedents of this court ought to be purſued and obſerved, although they ſeem to croſs the common law, and the books thereof. A caſe was here betwixt the king and Jourden. Jourden was receiver, and ſold his office to one D. and he not being able to pay Jourden for his office at the day limited, it was agreed, that Jourden ſhould come to the next receipt, and when D. received the kings money, that Jourden ſhould take it for his office, which was done accordingly. After D. was indebted to the king, and this matter appearing as above, &c. Jourden was charged with the money which he had received. And as Stamford in his firſt cap. of prerogative ſaith, that the king is the moſt worthy part of a common-wealth, ſo is he the preſerver, nouriſher, and defender of the people; and true it is, that the weal of the king is the publick weal of the people, and he for his pleaſure may aforreſt the word of any ſubject, and he thereby ſhall be ſubject to the law of the forreſt; and he may take the proviſion of any man by his purveyor for his own uſe, but at reaſonable prices, and without abuſe, the abuſe of which officer hath been reſtrained by divers ſtatutes; and the king may take wines for his proviſion, and alſo timber for his ſhips, caſtles, or houſes in the wood of any man, and this is for publick benefit; and the king may allay or inhaunce coyne at his pleaſure, for the plentie of the king is the peoples peace. And theſe impoſts are not only for the benefit of the people, and for the kings profit, but are alſo impoſed many times for the increaſe of merchandiſe and commerce, as the ſtatute of Aulnageors made in the 2. E. 3. cap. 14. which was made principally to make cloathes more vendible. And ſo corporations granted by the king with immunities and priviledges, and to ſeclude other ſubjects from them, are well limited and good; for it is for the increaſe of the peoples wealth, and thereby the kings revenue is increaſed. And ſometimes there is contained in grants a prohibition to other ſubjects, that they uſurp not upon the priviledges of ſuch corporations upon a pain, as in the cuſtome of forraign bought and forraign ſold in London, and York; and divers cuſtomes are permitted to ſuch corporations, as in the chamberlain of Londons caſe, Cook 5. and the breach or violation of theſe cuſtomes is a decay of the corporations, and ſo an impairing of the revenues of the crown; and therefore the king may make them, and alſo give them priviledges, and make inhibitions to others, not to uſurp upon them. King Edward the third in the ſixteenth year of his raign proclaimed, that no man ſhould ſell woolfels, or leather, under ſuch a price, ſo that theſe ſtaple commodities might not be debaſed, and this at no place but at Northampton and Anwick; and this proclamation was the cauſe, wherefore the merchant in 43. aſſiſe 38. was puniſhed for uſing deceit to abate the prices. And for precedents in this matter of impoſt, there are many of antiquitie. And firſt for wines. In 16. E 1. the cuſtom for a tun of wine was 4. s. and in 21. and 24. E. 3. it was increaſed to————————and 12. 13. & 14. of H. 8. it was increaſed to 17. s. the tun. And after in the 4th. of Mary it was increaſed to 4 marks; and as it appears by the records of this court, it was anſwered upon accompt for all this time according to that rate. And it is apparent, that no act of parliament gave this to the king, but that it was impoſed by his abſolute power; and ſhall it now be doubted if it be lawful? God defend. Priſage, that the king ſhall have one hogs-head before the maſt, and another hogs-head behinde, is not given to the king by any ſtatute, but was only an impoſt by the kings power. The impoſt upon cloathes in 31. E. 1. was two ſhillings for a ſcarlet, and 18. d. for other cloathes in grain, and after in the 37th year of E. 3. it was raiſed again, and in the 37. E. 3. an act was made for the length of cloathes; in the 33. H. 8. it was raiſed again; and in the time of queen Mary, becauſe that the making of ſo many cloathes made the impoſt of wooll to be of ſo ſmall value, therefore the impoſt of every cloath was raiſed by her to a noble; and in the firſt of Eliz. an impoſt was impoſed, for the overlength of cloathes; and it appears in 30. E. 3. that the impoſt of the cloath was for a ſtranger 2. s. 8. d. and for a denizen 1 s. and all for cloathes. Another impoſt was for woolfels, and leather. The 31 E. 1. it was for wooll half a mark for a ſack, and after that to 10. s. and in the time of E. 3. to 20. s. and after to 40. s. and after to 3. l. and ſo of woolfels and leather; and as the benefit and price of commodities did riſe, ſo was the impoſt raiſed, and no act of parliament for the firſt impoſing, and increaſe thereof. And ſo much for woolfels and leather. Now for allom. Upon every kintal of allom was impoſed 3. s. 4. d. which was anſwered upon accompt; and in the caſe of Smith, it was not doubted, if it ſhall be paid, as here it is, but if it were contained in Smiths patent or not. The impoſition impoſed upon coles. Now the 1. s. increaſe is paid. The impoſition upon tobacco was never doubted to be unjuſt as this is.

And ſo much for precedents. And now for ſtatutes. The ſtatute of Magna Charta, cap. 30. which was objected, that thereby all merchants may have ſafe &c. to buy and ſell, without ill tolnets; but there is a ſaving, viz. by the antient and old cuſtoms. The ſtatute of Articuli ſuper chartas, cap. 2. hath a ſaving in the end of it, that the king or his councel did not intend thereby to increaſe the antient prices due and accuſtomed. So are all the other ſtatutes of purveyors. The ſtatute of the 45. E. 3. cap. 4. which hath been ſo much urged, that no new impoſition ſhall be impoſed upon woolſels, wooll, or leather, but only the cuſtome and ſubſidie granted to the king; this extends only to the king himſelf, and ſhall not binde his ſucceſſors; for it is a principal part of the crown of England, which the king cannot diminiſh. And the ſame king 24. of his raign granted divers exemptions to certain perſons; and becauſe that it was in derogation of his ſtate imperial, he himſelf recalled and adnulled the ſame. As to that which was objected, that the defendant had paid poundage granted by the ſtatute of the firſt of the king, that is nothing to this purpoſe; for that is a ſubſidie, and not a cuſtome; for when any impoſition is granted by parliament, it is only a ſubſidie, and not a cuſtome, for the nature thereof is changed, and the impoſt of wine is paid over and above the poundage, and ſo ſhould it be here. And whereas it was objected, that if it were in the time of war, it is ſufferable, but in peace not, this ſeems no reaſon; for the king cannot be furniſhed to make defence in war, if he provide not in peace, and the proviſion is too late made, when it ought to be uſed. And as to that which was ſaid, that the ſubject ought to have recompence, and valuable ſatisfaction, it ſeemeth to me that he hath; for he hath the kings protection within his ports, and his ſafe conduct upon the land, and his defence upon the ſea. And all the ports of the realm belong to the king, and in this court there is a precedent where one in the time of queen Eliz. claimed to have a port to himſelf as his own, and it was adjudged that he could not, for it belonged to the queen, and it could not be ſevered; and the king only ſhall have the cuſtomes, for landing throughout all the land. And in the 17. of E. 3. there is a notable precedent, where he reciteth all the benefits which the ſubject had in his forraign traffick, by the kings power and protection, and therefore he impoſed a new impoſt. The writ of ne exeat regnum comprehends a prohibition to him to whom it is directed, that he ſhall not go beyond the ſeas; and this may be directed at the kings pleaſure to any man who is his ſubject; and ſo conſequently may he prohibite all merchants; and as he may prohibite the perſons, ſo may he the goods of any man, viz. that he ſhall export or import at his pleaſure. And if the king may generally inhibite that ſuch goods ſhall not be imported, then by the ſame reaſon may he prohibite them, upon condition or ſub modo, viz. that if they import ſuch goods, that then they ſhall pay &c. And if the general be lawful, the particular cannot be unjuſt; and the words in the writ of ne exeat regnum, viz. et quamplurima nobis, et coronæ noſtræ præjudicialia ibidem proſequi intendis are not traverſable by the ſubject, but he ought dutifully to obey his ſovereign. As to that which is ſaid, that this command to the treaſurer is not ſufficient under the great ſeal, that is otherwiſe; for before the ſtatute of R. 2. for matter of cuſtomes no command was directed to the treaſurer, but alwayes the king ſignified his pleaſure to his cuſtomers under his privy ſeal, and this gave authoritie to them to collect cuſtomes, and the ſame authority is given now to the treaſurer, and derived from him to the cuſtomers. As to that which is ſaid, that the concluſion is evil, becauſe it is in contempt of the king; without doubt it is a contempt, for the king may inhibit traffick into any part of the world, if he will, or inflict a pain upon any who ſhall trade into ſuch place inhibited. So may he do upon any commoditie either inhibit it generally, or upon a pain or impoſt; and if a ſubject uſe the trade after ſuch inhibition, or import his wares, and pay not the impoſt, it is a contempt, and the king ſhall puniſh him for it at his pleaſure. And as to that which is ſaid, that it is a burthen to the merchant, that is not ſo; for the burthen layeth it only upon the better part of the ſubjects; and if it were a burthen, it is no more than they themſelves impoſed, which was in their hands by commiſſion in the time of queen Eliz. and they have raiſed the prices to ſubjects more than the value of the impoſt; and it is not to be intended, that the king by any impoſt will prejudice the cauſe of merchants, for the trade in general is to him more beneficial, than any particular impoſt. The caſe of the 11. and 14. H. 4. of Aulnageor is not to be compared to this caſe; for there the king had made a grant to a ſubject, and it was alſo of a thing which was granted before to a maior, and alſo of a commoditie within the land, and not tranſported. And for the caſe of Darcy, for the monopoly of cards, it is not like; for that is of a commoditie within the land, and betwixt the patentee and the king, and not between the king and the ſubject. And as to the exception taken to the information, that it is uſitat. and doth not preſcribe, this needeth not; for it is a prerogative wherein lieth no preſcription, for every prerogative is as antient as the crown. And as to the concluſion of the information it was objected, that it is not good, for the informer ought to pray the forfeiture; but this belongs to the court to judge of what ſhall be loſt or forfeited, the offence being a contempt, and therefore the concluſion good enough. And ſo for all theſe reaſons, judgement ſhall be given for the king.

Flemming chief baron. Touching the exceptions to the information, they are of no force. For the firſt uſitat. &c. it hath been well ſaid, that the king needs not preſcribe in any prerogative, for it is as antient as his crown is, 2. E. 3. and for the concluſion viz. that he in contempt &c. that deſerves no other anſwer, but that which hath been given before, for it is enough, without doubt warranted by infinite precedents. But for the bar, it is an increaſe of the defendants contempt, and no ſufficient matter to anſwer, an indigeſted and confuſed tale, with an improper and diſobedient concluſion, and there is in it multa non multum; but the concluſion is without precedent, or example, for he ſaith, that the impoſition, which the king had laid, is indebitè, injuſtè, et contra leges Angliæ impoſita, and therefore he refuſed &c. In the caſe of Smith for allom, the concluſion was moderate, and beſeeming a ſubject, judgement if he ſhall have impoſt by his grant; and in the caſe of mines, the defendant, being a great peer of the realm, concluded upon his grant and intereſt in the ſoyl, and that he took the mettal, as it was lawful for him, and did not confront his ſoveraign with terms of injuſtè, indebitè, and the like. And the king, as it is commonly ſaid in our books, cannot do wrong; and if the king ſeiſe my land without cauſe, I ought to ſue to him in humble manner, humillimè ſupplicavit &c. and not with ſuch terms of oppoſition in the information; and all his matter had been ſaved to him then as well as now, or he might have pleaded his matter, and ſaid wherefore he refuſed, as it was lawful for him. But for the matter it is of great conſequence, and hath two powerful objects, which it principally reſpecteth. The one is the king, his power, and prerogative, his treaſure, and the revenues of his crown; and to impair and derogate from any of theſe was a part moſt undutiful in any ſubject. The other is the trade and traffick of merchantdiſe, tranſportation in and out of the land of commodities, which further publick benefit ought much to be reſpected, and nouriſhed as much as may be. The ſtate of the queſtion is touching a new cuſtome. The impoſitions or cuſtoms are duties or ſumms of money newly impoſed by the king without parliament upon merchantdiſe, for the augmentation of his revenues. All the queſtions ariſing in the caſe are, aut de perſonis, de rebus, vel de actionibus, viz. form and proceeding. The perſons are firſt the king, his power, and authoritie; ſecondly, not Bates the defendant, nor the Venetians, but all men who import currants. The impoſition is properly upon currants, and for them, and is not upon the defendant, nor his goods, who is a merchant; for upon him no impoſition ſhall be, but by parliament. The things are currants, a forraign commoditie, and a victual; the 5 s. for impoſt, which is ſaid to be great. The action formed or proceſs is the command by the great ſeal, and the words therein are petere et recipere, if they be ſufficient, and if good without proclamation or other notice, and how notice ſhall be given, and if it be good without an ad quod damnum. And the caſe of Mines in Plowden, which is the ſole caſe in the printed books of law, to this purpoſe hath in it foure reaſons of the judgement First, the excellency of the king, or his perſon. Secondly, the neceſſitie of coyn for his ſtate. Thirdly, the utillitie of coyn for commerce. Fourthly, the inconvenience, if the ſubject ſhould have ſuch royal poſſeſſions. And theſe reaſons are not extracted out of the books of law, but are only reaſons of policy; for rex eſt legalis et politicus, and reaſons pollitick are ſufficient guides to judges in their arguments, and ſuch caſes and precedents are good directions in caſes of judgement, for they are demonſtrations of the courſe of antiquitie. Whereupon my judgement ſhall conſiſt upon reaſons pollitick, and precedents. The caſe in Dyer 1. Eliz. fo. 165. was not like to the caſe in queſtion, but only a conference; and the caſe there was for an impoſt upon cloath, a domeſtick commoditie. In this caſe, are recited their grievances, but it was paid, and it is denied here; but there was no reſolution thereof. At the ſame time, was the impoſt of wines increaſed, and paid, and no petition or complaint thereof. And the cuſtoms for Englands commodities were at the firſt impoſed by the king's will, for no ſtatute giveth them, viz. for wool, woolfels and leather, and it was called the great cuſtome; and that it was paid, it will not be denied; and yet now it is doubted, if the king can impoſe it upon forraign commodities. The king may reſtrain the perſon, as it is in Fitz. Nat. Br. à fortiori he may reſtrain the goods. There was no cuſtom for home commodities, but the great cuſtome aforeſaid, which was after increaſed by parliament, which was called the petit cuſtome. It is a great grace in the king to the merchants, that he will command, and permit this matter to be diſputed between him and his ſubject, and the moſt fit place is in this court, and the beſt rules herein are the precedents thereof, and pollitick reaſons, which I ſhall give, and apply them to the particulars before recited. And firſt, for the perſon of the king, omnis poteſtas à Deo, et non eſt poteſtas niſi pro bono. To the king is committed the government of the realm and his people; and Bracton ſaith, that for his diſcharge of his office, God had given to him power, the act of government, and the power to govern. The kings power is double, ordinary and abſolute, and they have ſeveral lawes and ends. That of the ordinary is for the profit of particular ſubjects, for the execution of civil juſtice, the determining of meum; and this is exerciſed by equitie and juſtice in ordinary courts, and by the Civillians is nominated jus privatum, and with us common law; and theſe laws cannot be changed, without parliament; and although that their form and courſe may be changed, and interrupted, yet they can never be changed in ſubſtance. The abſolute power of the king is not that which is converted or executed to private uſe, to the benefit of any particular perſon, but is only that which is applied to the general benefit of the people, and is ſalus populi; as the people is the body, and the king the head; and this power is guided by the rules, which direct only at the common law, and is moſt properly named pollicy and government; and as the conſtitution of this body varieth with the time, ſo varieth this abſolute law, according to the wiſdome of the king, for the common good; and theſe being general rules and true as they are, all things done within theſe rules are lawful. The matter in queſtion is material matter of ſtate, and ought to be ruled by the rules of pollicy; and if it be ſo, the king hath done well to execute his extraordinary power. All cuſtomes, be they old or new, are no other but the effects and iſſues of trades and commerce with forraign nations; but all commerce and affairs with forrainers, all wars and peace, all acceptance and admitting for current forrain coyn, all parties and treaties whatſoever are made by the abſolute power of the king; and he who hath power of cauſes, hath power alſo of effects. No exportation or importation can be, but at the kings ports. They are the gates of the king, and he hath abſolute power by them to include or exclude whom he ſhall pleaſe; and ports to merchants are their harbours, and repoſe; and for their better ſecuritie he is compelled to provide bulwarks, and fortreſſes, and to maintain, for the collection of his cuſtoms and duties, collectors and cuſtomers; and for that charge it is reaſon, that he ſhould have this benefit. He is alſo to defend the merchants from pirates at ſea in their paſſage. Alſo, by the power of the king they are to be relieved, if they are oppreſſed by forraign princes, for they ſhall have his treaty, and embaſſage; and if he be not remedied thereby, then lex talionis ſhall be executed, goods for goods, and tax for tax; and if this will not redreſs the matter, then war is to be attempted, for the cauſe of merchants. In all the kings courts, and of other princes, the judges in them are paid by the king, and maintained by him to do juſtice to the ſubjects, and therefore he hath the profits of the ſaid courts. It is reaſonable that the king ſhould have as much power over forraigners and their goods, as over his own ſubjects; and if the king cannot impoſe upon forrain commodities a cuſtome, as wel as forrainers may upon their own commodities, and upon the commodities of this land when they come to them, then forrain ſtates ſhall be enriched, and the king impoveriſhed, and he ſhall not have equal profit with them; and yet it will not be denied, but his power herein is equal with other ſtates. And ſo much for the perſon of Bates the ſubject. It is ſaid, that an impoſition may not be upon a ſubject without parliament. That the king may impoſe upon a ſubject, I omit; for it is not here the queſtion, if the king may impoſe upon the ſubject or his goods; but the impoſt here is not upon a ſubject, but here it is upon Bates, as upon a merchant, who imports goods within this land, charged before by the king; and at the time when the impoſt was impoſed upon them, they were the goods of the Venetians, and not the goods of a ſubject, nor within the land, but only upon thoſe which ſhall be after imported; and ſo all the arguments, which were made for the ſubject, fail. And where it is ſaid, that he is a merchant, and that he ought to have the ſea open and free for him, and that trades of merchants and merchandiſe are neceſſary to export the ſurplus of our commodities, and then to import other neceſſaries, and ſo is favourably to be reſpected; as to that it is well known, that the end of every private merchant is not the common good, but his particular profit, which is only the means which induceth him to trade and traffick. And the impoſt to him is nothing, for he rateth his merchandiſe according to that. The impoſt is impoſed upon currants; and he, who will buy them, ſhall have them ſubject to that charge; and it is a great contempt to denie the payment. And ſo much for the perſon. I will give a brief anſwer to all the ſtatutes alledged on the contrary part, with this expoſition, that the ſubjects and merchants are to be freed of Maletolt; and this was toll unjuſtly exacted by London, Southampton, and other ports within this realm; but they are with this ſaving, that they pay the duties and cuſtomes, due, or which hereafter ſhall be due to the king; which is a full anſwer to all the ſtatutes. The commoditie of currants is no commoditie of this land, but forrain. And whereas it is ſaid, that it is victual and neceſſary food, it is no more neceſſary than wine, and impoſt for that hath been always paid, without contradiction; and without doubt, there are many drinkers of wine, who are alſo eaters of currants. That which ſhould be ſaid victual for the common-wealth is that, which ariſeth from agriculture, and of the earth within this land, and not nice and delicate things imported by merchants, ſuch as theſe currants are. They are rather delicacy or medicine than a victual; and it is no reaſon that ſo many of our good and ſtaple commodities ſhould be exported to Venice for ſuch a ſlight delicacy, and that all the impoſt ſhall be paid to the Venetians for them, and the king ſhould have none for their commoditie: and although that the price be thereby raiſed, this hurteth not the merchant, nor no other, but only a ſmal number of delicate perſons, and thoſe alſo who are of moſt able and beſt eſtate, for their pleaſure. But when the king is in want, he is to be relieved by a general impoſition or ſubſidie upon all the ſubjects. The impoſition, which is here, is ſaid to be ſo great and intollerable as an evil precedent; for, if he may do ſo much, he may do it in infinitum, and upon all other merchandiſe. For the impoſition I ſay, that it is reaſonable, for it is no more than foure times ſo much than was before; and that there hath been as much done in antient time in other impoſts, as in that of wooll, which was at firſt but a noble a ſack, and is now at 50. s. The impoſt of wine was in antient time 3. s. 4. d. a tun, and now is foure marks. The leſſening of cuſtome and impoſt is much to be guided by intelligence from forrain nations; for the uſage and behaviour of a forrain prince may impoſe a neceſſitie of raiſing cuſtome of theſe commodities. And ſo it was in the particular of currants. The duke of Venice impoſed upon them a ducket by the hundred, which by the wiſdom of the ſtate was foreſeen to be a means, that in time will waſte and conſume the treaſure of the land; whereupon the queen writ to the duke, that he would abate his cuſtome, which he refuſed. Wherefore to prevent, that ſo great a quantitie of this commoditie ſhould not be imported into the land, the queen granted to the company of merchants of the Levant, that none ſhould bring in currants, but by their licence; and thoſe merchants impoſed upon them who did import, which were not of their company, if he were denizen 5. s. if he were a ſtranger 10. s. And this was paid by the merchants without contradiction. But there was a clauſe in the patent, that when the duke of Venice abated his impoſt, that the patent ſhould be void, and after the duke was ſolicited again, that he would abate the impoſt, but he refuſed, and the firſt commiſſion was recalled, and after a new grant was made, which was executed all the queens life time, which was as aforeſaid. And whereas it is ſaid, that if the king may impoſe, he may impoſe any quantitie what he pleaſes, true it is, that this is to be referred to the wiſdom of the king, who guideth all under God by his wiſdome, and this is not to be diſputed by a ſubject; and many things are left to his wiſdome for the ordering of his power, rather than his power ſhall be reſtrained. The king may pardon any fellon; but it may be objected, that if he pardon one fellon he may pardon all, to the damage of the common-wealth; and yet none will doubt, but that is left to his wiſdome. And as the king may grant a protection for one year, ſo it may be ſaid, that he may grant it for many years, which is a miſchief, and ſo ought to grant none, which will not be denied but that he may. So it may be ſaid, that the queen may grant a ſafe conduct to a ſtranger; for if ſhe may do that, then ſhe may grant to all, which would be burthenſome to the inhabitants; and yet it will not be denied but that ſhe may grant to any or all, as in her wiſdome ſhall ſeem convenient. And the wiſdome and providence of the king is not to be diſputed by the ſubject; for by intendment they cannot be ſevered from his perſon, and to argue a poſſe ad actum to reſtrain the king and his power, becauſe that by his power he may do ill, is no argument for a ſubject. To prove the power of the king by precedents of antiquitie in a caſe of this nature may eaſily be done; and if it were lawful in antient time, it is lawful now; for the authoritie of the king is not diminiſhed, and the crown hath the ſame attributes, that then it had. And in antient time ſuch impoſts were never denied; and that which is given by parliament is not an impoſt but a ſubſidie. In antient time ſmall traffick or intercourſe was betwixt the inhabitants of this land and forrain nations, ſo that the principal cuſtom was of the commodities of this land, which were woolfels and leather; and that the cuſtome for wools, which was a noble for a ſack, was an impoſition, appears by the ſtatute of the 14. of Ed. 3. St. 1. cap. 21. It is objected, that merchants cannot be reſtrained, but only perſons ſuſpected, as the writ of ne exeat regnum is. But as it is ſaid in Dyer before cited, it is without doubt, that the cauſe is not traverſable, and that the king may inhibit any man; for if it be not traverſable, it is not material. And the reaſon, wherefore any man may be reſtrained, is for defence of the realm; and it may be done by privie ſeal, privie ſignet, great ſeal, or proclamation; and that appears by the writ of licentia tranſportandi in the regiſter, which containeth licence for one to travail, and limits him to what place he ſhall go, and when he ſhall return, and with what goods, ſo that the king may prohibit body and goods. And when a man is beyond the ſeas, the king may command him to return; and if he doth not obey ſuch command, he ſhall forfeit his goods. Now for reſtraint of commodities many precedents are to prove it. In the time of H. 3. and E. 1. it was forbidden, that the wooll ſhould be tranſported into Flanders; and in E. 1. a commiſſion was awarded to enquire, who had done againſt this ordinance, and the goods of one Freeſton were ſeiſed; and therefore, an attachment awarded againſt the ſhips of Hull, for tranſporting contrary to the ordinance. In the 22. E. 1. it was forbidden, that no merchant ſhould trade with France; for trade with forrainers is a forrain thing, which is only referred to the king. In the 17. H. 6. all merchants were forbidden to import wares from Flanders into this land; and the cittizens of London complained of certain merchants, which had done contrary to this ordinance to the lords of the privie councel, which I have here ready; for the record mentions it, and the kings attorney was commanded to exhibit an information againſt the merchants, which he did; and they pleaded that the proclamation was made here upon Eaſter eve, and that they were then at Bruges, and upon the Wedneſday after Bruges market they bought the wares before notice of the proclamation, and before it were poſſible that they could have notice of it, and pray judgement, &c. And ſo much for reſtraint of the perſon and goods. By the ſtatute of 31. E. 3. cap. 8. times were appointed in which wools ſhould be tranſported; and alſo cap. 9. authoritie was given to the chancellor and treaſurer, to defer the paſſage at their pleaſure. But that this was the common law, and that the king by his ſupream authoritie might do it, it ſeems to me it is apparent by the ſtatute of the 26. H. 8. cap. 10. which gives power to the king by his letters patents, to limit the time for importing of wines againſt the ſtatute of 23. H. 8. cap. 7. which was no more but a reſtoring of his power abridged before; and ſo was the ſtatute of 31. E. 3. for otherwiſe the parliament would never have given him authoritie to contradict an act of parliament by his letters patents, or to revive theſe acts. Impoſitions are meerly a new cuſtome. And ſo are they ſtiled in the margent of the roll of the 3. E. 1. in this court, where it is recorded, that the king had aſſigned merchants to receive (uſing the ſame words which are uſed here) half a mark for every ſack of wool, and a mark of every laſt of leather, and that if the merchant, who is ſo appointed tranſport any after, it ſhall be forfeited; and out of this record I obſerve, that three hundred pelts make a ſack of wool. From the 21. Ed. 1. unto the 28. E. 1. the cuſtoms for wools was 40. s. a ſack, and in 25. E. 1. the impoſition of Maletolt was repealed by act of parliament, which Maletolt was an increaſe of impoſt upon ſtaple commodities; and therefore was given to the king a great ſubſidie with this cauſe, that it ſhould never be drawn into precedent; which ſhews, that this Maletolt was rightly impoſed, otherwiſe the parliament would never have given him ſo great a recompenſe for the abrogation of it. But after in the 13. of E. 3. becauſe it was a thing of ſo great conſequence to the crown, it was revived and made 40. s. for wool, and woolfels, and 3. l. for leather for denizens, and double for ſtrangers. In the 14. Ed. 3. a petition in parliament to abate it; and for a great ſubſidie it was releaſed; and in the 18. of Ed. 3. it was again revived, and a new petition was made in parliament, and this petition was continued until the 36. of Ed. 3. and then it was abated; and alſo by the 45. E. 3. it was again abated; ſo that it ſeems, that between theſe times it was revived; but after it did not continue long, for in 48. E. 3. it was again revived, and for wool the impoſt was 50. s. et ſic de ſingulis, and in 1. R. 2. after it was anſwered to the king, as it appears in the accompts here, and in 5. R. 2. it was again ſuppreſſed by parliament for a ſubſidie granted to the king with a ſaving of antient rights. All theſe ſtatutes prove expreſly, that the king had power to increaſe the impoſt, and that upon commodities of the land, and that he continually uſed this power notwithſtanding all acts of parliament againſt it. And ſo much for commodities of this land. But for forrain commodities it appears by no act of parliament, or other precedent, that ever any petition or ſuit was made to abate the impoſt of forrain commodities, but of them the impoſt was paid without denial. As for example, for wines in the 16. E. 1. as appears in this court upon record, it was commanded to the bailiff of Dover to levie and collect of every tun of wine of a ſtranger 4. s. and in the 22. E. 1. 2. s. thereof was releaſed, at the ſuit of the French ambaſſador. In the 26. of E. 3. the king granted priviledges to merchants ſtrangers; but there was given for it an increaſe of cuſtome; and this was anſwered as it appears upon accompt in the times of E. 1. and E. 2. The caſe of allom was as it hath been recited by my brother Clark. It is objected, that the merchant ought to have free paſſage upon the ſea; but that doth not conclude the king, but that he ſhall have his impoſt if he cometh into his ports, and here the queſtion is for merchandiſe after that they are brought into the port. But it is ſaid, that they cannot come into the port but by the ſea. That is true; but if this reaſon ſhould hold, then the king could not grant murage, pontage, and the like, becauſe the common channel to them is free, and average is for ſecuritie as wel as ports. Another objection, that the defendant here is not reſtrained; but that is anſwered, for if a pain be inflicted upon them who import, this is an inhibition upon a pain to all. Another objection was, that there was no conſideration of the impoſition; and if it be demanded what differences between the caſes, I anſwer, as much as is between the king and a ſubject; and it is not reaſonable, that the king ſhould expreſs the cauſe and conſideration of his actions, for they are arcana regis, and no ſatisfaction needeth, for if the profits to the merchant faileth he will not trade, and it is for the benefit of every ſubject, that the kings treaſure ſhould be increaſed. An objection was made againſt the form of proceeding; becauſe it was by the great ſeal to the treaſurer, and that he by the cuſtomers peteret et reciperet; and this could not be better, as it was anſwered before. It was objected that it ſhould be by proclamation; and that needs not, for it toucheth not all the ſubjects, but only thoſe who are traders in merchandiſing, and the beſt and apteſt means to give them notice is by the cuſtomers, and it is alledged by the information expreſly, that he had notice. It was laſtly objected, that there ought to be a quod damnum in the caſe before the grant. That is not ſo; for that ſhall be only when the king granteth any thing which appertaineth to his prerogative, and not when he maketh charters to his ſervants to levy his duties due to his crown. Wherefore I think, that the king ought to have judgment, which was after given accordingly.

Argument of ſir Francis Bacon, the king's ſollicitor, in the lower houſe of parliament, in 1610, for impoſitions by the crown; from volume 2. of the laſt 4*to. edition of his works, p.* 223.

AND it pleaſe you, Mr. Speaker, this queſtion touching the right of impoſitions is very great; extending to the prerogative of the king on the one part, and the liberty of the ſubject on the other; and that in a point of profit and value, and not of conceit or fancy. And therefore, as weight in all motions increaſeth force, ſo I do not marvel to ſee men gather the greateſt ſtrength of argument they can to make good their opinions. And ſo you will give me leave likewiſe, being ſtrong in mine own perſuaſion, that it is the king's right, to ſhew my voice as free as my thought. And for my part, I mean to obſerve the true courſe to give ſtrength to this cauſe, which is, by yielding thoſe things which are not tenable, and keeping the queſtion within the true ſtate and compaſs; which will diſcharge many popular arguments, and contract the debate into a leſs room.

Wherefore I do deliver the queſtion, and exclude or ſet by, as not in queſtion, five things. Firſt, the queſtion is de portorio, and not de tributo, to uſe the Roman words for explanation ſake; it is not, I ſay, touching any taxes within the land, but of payments at the ports. Secondly, it is not touching any impoſt from port to port, but where claves regni, the keys of the kingdom, are turned to let in from foreign parts, or to ſend forth to foreign parts; in a word, matter of commerce and intercourſe, not ſimply of carriage or vecture. Thirdly, the queſtion is, as the diſtinction was uſed above in another caſe, de vero et falſo, and not de bona et malo, of the legal point, and not of the inconvenience, otherwiſe than as it ſerves to decide the law. Fourthly, I do ſet apart three commodities, wools, woolfells, and leather, as being in different caſe from the reſt; becauſe the cuſtom upon them is antiqua cuſtuma. Laſtly, the queſtion is not, whether in matter of impoſing the king may alter the law by his prerogative, but whether the king have not ſuch a prerogative by law.

The ſtate of the queſtion being thus cleared and freed, my propoſition is, that the king by the fundamental laws of this kingdom hath a power to impoſe upon merchandiſe and commodities both native and foreign. In my proof of this propoſition all that I ſhall ſay, be it to confirm or confute, I will draw into certain diſtinct heads or conſiderations which move me, and may move you.

The firſt is an univerſal negative. There appeareth not in any of the king's courts any one record, wherein an impoſition laid at the ports hath been overthrown by judgment; nay more, where it hath been queſtioned by pleading. This plea, quod ſumma praedicta minus juſte impoſita fuit, et contra leges et conſuetudines regni hujus Angliae, unde idem Bates illam ſolvere recuſavit, prout ei bene licuit, is primae impreſſionis. Bates was the firſt man ab origine mundi, for any thing that appeareth, that miniſtered that plea; whereupon I offer this to conſideration. The king's acts that grieve the ſubject are either againſt law, and ſo void; or according to ſtrictneſs of law, and yet grievous. And according to theſe ſeveral natures of grievance, there be ſeveral remedies. Be they againſt law? Overthrow them by judgment. Be they too ſtrait and extreme, though legal? Propound them in parliament. Foraſmuch then as impoſitions at the ports, having been ſo often laid, were never brought into the king's courts of juſtice, but ſtill brought to parliament, I may moſt certainly conclude, that they were conceived not to be againſt law. And if any man ſhall think that it was too high a point to queſtion by law before the judges, or that there ſhould want fortitude in them to aid the ſubject; no, it ſhall appear from time to time, in caſes of equal reach, where the king's acts have been indeed againſt law, the courſe of law hath run, and the judges have worthily done their duty.

As in the caſe of an impoſition upon linen cloth for the alnage; overthrown by judgment.

The caſe of a commiſſion of arreſt and committing of ſubjects upon examination without conviction by jury, diſallowed by the judges.

A commiſſion to determine the right of the exigenter's place, ſecundum ſanam diſcretionem, diſallowed by the judges.

The caſe of the monopoly of cards overthrown and condemned by judgment.

I might make mention of the juriſdiction of ſome courts of diſcretion, wherein the judges did not decline to give opinion. Therefore, had this been againſt law, there would not have been altum ſilentium in the king's courts. Of the contrary judgments I will not yet ſpeak; thus much now, that there is no judgment, no nor plea againſt it. Though I ſaid no more, it were enough, in my opinion, to induce you to a non liquet, to leave it a doubt.

The ſecond conſideration is, the force and continuance of payments made by grants of merchants, both ſtrangers and Engliſh, without conſent of parliament. Herein I lay this ground, that ſuch grants conſidered in themſelves are void in law: for merchants, either ſtrangers or ſubjects, they are no body corporate, but ſingular and diſperſed perſons; they cannot bind ſucceſſion, neither can the major part bind the reſidue: how then ſhould their grants have force? No otherwiſe but thus; that the king's power of impoſing was only the legal virtue and ſtrength of thoſe grants; and that the conſent of a merchant is but a concurrence, the king is principale agens, and they are but as the patient, and ſo it becomes a binding act out of the king's power.

Now if any man doubt that ſuch grants of merchants ſhould not be of force, I will alledge but two memorable records, the one for the merchants ſtrangers, the other for the merchants Engliſh. That for the ſtrangers is upon the grant of chart. mercator. of three pence in value ultra antiquas cuſtumas; which grant is in uſe and practice at this day. For it is well known to the merchants, that That which they call ſtranger's cuſtom, and erroneouſly double cuſtom, is but three pence in the pound more than Engliſh. Now look into the ſtatutes of ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage, and you ſhall find, a few merchandiſe only excepted, the poundage equal upon alien and ſubject; ſo that this difference or exceſs of three pence hath no other ground than that grant. It falleth to be the ſame in quantity; there is no ſtatute for it, and therefore it can have no ſtrength but from the merchants grants; and the merchants grants can have no ſtrength but from the king's power to impoſe.

For the merchants Engliſh, take the notable record in 17 E. III. where the commons complained of the forty ſhillings upon the ſack of wool as a mal-toll ſet by the aſſent of the merchants without conſent of parliament; nay, they diſpute and ſay it were hard that the merchants conſent ſhould be in damage of the commons. What ſaith the king to them? Doth he grant it or give way to it? No; but replies upon them, and ſaith, it cannot be rightly conſtrued to be in prejudice of the commons, the rather becauſe proviſion was made, that the merchants ſhould not work upon them, by colour of that payment to increaſe their price; in that there was a price certain ſet upon the wools. And there was an end of that matter: which plainly affirmeth the force of the merchants grants. So then the force of the grants of merchants both Engliſh and ſtrangers appeareth; and their grants, being not corporate, are but noun adjectives without the king's power to impoſe.

The third conſideration is of the firſt and moſt ancient commencement of cuſtoms; wherein I am ſomewhat to ſeek; for, as the poet ſaith, ingrediturque ſolo, et caput inter nubila condit, the beginning of it is obſcure: but I rather conceive that it is by common law, than by grant in parliament. For, firſt, Mr. Dyer's opinion was, that the ancient cuſtom for exportation was by the common laws; and goeth further, that that ancient cuſtom was the cuſtom upon wools, woolfells, and leather. He was deceived in the particular, and the diligence of your ſearch hath revealed it; for that cuſtom upon theſe three merchandiſes grew by grant of parliament 3 E. I. But the opinion in general was ſound; for there was a cuſtom before that: for the records themſelves, which ſpeak of that cuſtom, do term it a new cuſtom, alentour del novel cuſtome, as concerning the new cuſtom granted, etc. This is pregnant, there was yet a more ancient. So for the ſtrangers, the grant in 31 E. I. chart. mercator. is, that the three pence granted by the ſtrangers ſhould be ultra antiquas cuſtumas, which hath no affinity with that cuſtom upon the three ſpecies, but preſuppoſeth more ancient cuſtoms in general. Now if any man think, that thoſe more ancient cuſtoms were likewiſe by act of parliament, it is but a conjecture. It is never recited ultra antiquas cuſtumas prius conceſſas, and acts of parliament were not much ſtirring before the great charter, which was 9 H. III. And therefore I conceive with Mr. Dyer, that whatſoever was the ancient cuſtom was by the common law. And if by the common law, then what other means can be imagined of the commencement of it but by the king's impoſing?

The fourth conſideration is of the manner that was held in parliament in the aboliſhing of impoſitions laid: wherein I will conſider, firſt, the manne of the petitions exhibited in parliament; and more ſpecially the nature of the king's anſwers.

For the petitions I note two things; firſt, that to my remembrance there was never any petition made for the revoking of any impoſition upon foreign merchants only. It pleaſed the Decemviri in 5 E. II. to deface chart. mercator. and ſo the impoſition upon ſtrangers, as againſt law. But the opinion of theſe reformers I do not much truſt, for they of their gentleneſs did likewiſe bring in doubt the demy-mark, which it is manifeſt was granted by parliament, and pronounced by them the king ſhould have it, ſ'il avoit le droit: but this is declared void by 1 E. III. which reneweth chart. mercator. and void muſt it needs be, becauſe it was an ordinance by commiſſion only, and that in the time of a weak king, and never either warranted or confirmed by parliament. Secondly, I note that petitions were made promiſcuouſly for taking away impoſitions ſet by parliament as well as without parliament; nay, that very tax of the neufieſme, the ninth ſheaf or fleece, which is recited to be againſt the king's oath and in blemiſhment of his crown, was an act of parliament, 14 E. III. So then to infer that impoſitions were againſt law, becauſe they are taken away by ſucceeding parliaments, it is no argument at all; becauſe the impoſitions ſet by the parliaments themſelves, which no man will ſay were againſt law, were nevertheleſs afterwards pulled down by parliament. But indeed the argument holdeth rather the other way, that becauſe they took not their remedy in the king's courts of juſtice, but did fly to the parliament, therefore they were thought to ſtand with law.

Now for the king's anſwers. If the impoſitions complained of had been againſt law, then the king's anſwer ought to have been ſimple, tanquam reſponſio categorica, non hypothetica; as, let them be repealed, or, let the law run. But contrariwiſe, they admit all manner of diverſities and qualifications: for,

Sometimes the king diſputeth the matter and doth nothing; as 17 E. III.

Sometimes the king diſtinguiſheth of reaſonable and not reaſonable, as 38 E. III.

Sometimes he aboliſheth them in part, and letteth them ſtand in part, as 11 E. II. the record of the mutuum, and 14 E. III. the printed ſtatute, whereof I ſhall ſpeak more anon.

Sometimes that no impoſition ſhall be ſet during the time that the grants made of ſubſidies by parliament ſhall continue, as 47 E. III.

Sometimes that they ſhall ceaſe ad voluntatem noſtram.

And ſometimes that they ſhall hold over their term prefixed or aſſeiſſed.

All which ſheweth, that the king did not diſclaim them as unlawful, for actus legitimus non recipit tempus aut conditionem. If it had been a diſaffirmance by law, they muſt have gone down in ſolido; but now you ſee they have been tempered and qualified as the king ſaw convenient.

The fifth conſideration is of that which is offered by way of objection; which is, firſt, that ſuch grants have been uſually made by conſent of parliament; and ſecondly, that the ſtatutes of ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage have been made as a kind of ſtint and limitation, that the king ſhould hold himſelf unto the proportion ſo granted and not impoſed further; the rather becauſe it is expreſſed in ſome of theſe ſtatutes of tonnage and poundage, ſometimes by way of proteſtation, and ſometimes by way of condition, that they ſhall not be taken in precedent, or that the king ſhall not impoſe any further rates or novelties, as 6 R. II. 9 R. II. 13 H. IV. 1 H. V. which ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage have ſuch clauſes and cautions.

To this objection I give this anſwer. Firſt, that it is not ſtrange with kings, for their own better ſtrength, and the better contentment of their people, to do thoſe things by parliament, which nevertheleſs have perfection enough without parliament. We ſee their own rights to the crown which are inherent; yet they take recognition of them by parliament. And there was a ſpecial reaſon why they ſhould do it in this caſe; for they had found by experience, that, if they had not conſent in parliament to the ſetting of them up, they could not have avoided ſuit in parliament for the taking of them down. Beſides, there were ſome things requiſite in the manner of the levy for the better ſtrengthening of the ſame, which percaſe could not be done without parliament; as the taking the oath of the party touching the value, the inviting of the diſcovery of concealment of cuſtom by giving the money to the informer, and the like.

Now in ſpecial for the ſtatutes of ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, I note three things. Firſt, that the conſideration of the grant is not laid to be for the reſtraining of impoſitions, but expreſsly for the guarding of the ſea. Secondly, that it is true, that the ancient form is more peremptory, and the modern more ſubmiſs; for in the ancient form ſometimes they inſert a flat condition that the king ſhall not further impoſe; in the latter they humbly pray, that the merchants may be demeaned without oppreſſion, paying thoſe rates. But whether it be ſupplication, or whether it be condition, it rather implieth the king hath a power; for elſe both were needleſs, for conditio annectitur ubi libertas praeſumitur, and the word oppreſſion ſeemeth to refer to exceſſive impoſitions. And thirdly, that the ſtatutes of tonnage and poundage are but cumulative and not privative of the king's power precedent, appeareth notably in the three pence overplus, which is paid by the merchants ſtrangers, which ſhould be taken away quite, if thoſe ſtatutes were taken to be limitations; for in that, as was touched before, the rates are equal in the generality between ſubjects and ſtrangers; and yet that impoſition, notwithſtanding any ſuppoſed reſtriction of theſe acts of ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, remaineth at this day.

The ſixth conſideration is likewiſe to an objection, which is matter of practice, viz. that from R. II.'s time to Q. Mary, which is almoſt 200 years, there was an intermiſſion of impoſitions, as appeareth both by records and the cuſtom-books.

To which I anſwer; both that we have in effect an equal number of years to countervail them, namely, 100 years in the times of the three kings Edwards added to 60 of our laſt years; and extrema obruunt media; for we have both the reverence of antiquity and the poſſeſſion of the preſent times, and they but the middle times. And beſides, in all true judgment there is a very great difference between an uſage to prove a thing lawful, and a non-uſage to prove it unlawful: for the practice plainly implieth conſent; but the diſcontinuance may be, either becauſe it was not needful, though lawful; or becauſe there was found a better means, as I think it was indeed in reſpect of the double cuſtoms by means of the ſtaple at Calais.

Tranſcript of part of ſir John Davis's manuſcript argument for impoſitions by the crown, from Carte's Hiſtory, vol. 4. p. 191.—[From the title to the printed treatiſe by ſir John Davis on the ſame ſubject, it appears to have been written the latter end of the reign of James the firſt.]

THE king is the fountain of all juſtice, as well commutative as diſtributive. The firſt is exerciſed chiefly in the ordering and government of trade and commerce; wherein he is to do juſtice, or procure it to be done, not only to his ſubjects who make contracts real or perſonal within the land, but to his merchants alſo, who trade with foreign nations, and to ſtrangers who traffick in his dominions. For the adminiſtration of commutative juſtice within the land, the king receives various profits, which grew firſt by way of impoſition; as fines for original proceſs to recover debts, fines for paſſing lands from one to another in his courts, and in common recoveries, and the ſilver pro licentia concordandi, the profits of the ſeals in his courts for all manner of writs, &c. nor is the taking of theſe and the like duties any breach of Magna Charta; having been impoſed by the king long before that charter was made, and taken as a recompence for the charge of the crown in maintaining the courts of juſtice. There is the ſame reaſon for his charge in doing juſtice, and procuring juſtice to be done abroad to merchants, whoſe commerce is for the moſt part out of the land, being recompenced out of the merchandizes exported and imported, not according to the will of the merchant, or the pleaſure of the people, but in proportion to the king's charge, which being beſt known to himſelf, it is fit that the recompence ſhould be fixed by himſelf. All leagues, truces, and treaties of ſtate, with foreign princes (in which the public trade and commerce of merchants is ever included) are made and concluded at his charge; he maintains a court of admiralty for deciding all marine cauſes, which generally concern merchants; his council of ſtate is applied to, in caſe of injuries contrary to the ſenſe of treaties; he is at a vaſt expence in keeping reſident embaſſadors in different courts, chiefly for procuring juſtice to be done our merchants; and in caſe of their being wronged and denied juſtice abroad, the king, by his prerogative, grants them letters of marque or repriſal, to right themſelves; and if thoſe injuries are multiplied or continued with an high hand, it is his office directly to denounce and make war on ſuch prince or ſtate, as refuſes to do juſtice to his merchants. So king Charles had lately done againſt France. It was for this cauſe (as Appian ſays) the Romans began the firſt Punic war; and Cicero (a) affirms, that they frequently waged war for the injurious treatment of their merchants. The making of war and peace is an undiſputed prerogative of the crown: he maintains a fleet, to protect merchants from ſpoil and piracy (b) (which the Romans thought a juſt reaſon for cuſtoms) at a charge too great to be defrayed by the poundage laid by Edward I. at the rate of three pence, though ſilver being then at twenty pence an ounce, the groat was intrinſically worth near a ſhilling, and it being levied at this laſt rate, in the time of Edward IV. (c) was found inſufficient for the maintenance of his navy. The flow of money from the Eaſt and Weſt Indies vaſtly enhanced the price of merchandize, and the charges of the crown, as well in all other articles as in that of the royal navy. Hence aroſe a neceſſity of new impoſitions, it not being fit, that the king's charges, in ſupporting the trade of merchants, ſhould be unlimited and infinite, and the duty on merchandize be ſtinted and reſtrained to ſuch a proportion only as the ſubject ſhall be pleaſed to grant him. Subjects may live as privately as they pleaſe; but a king, by reaſon of the majeſty of his eſtate, cannot well abridge his charge, and would be in a poor ſituation, if he had no power of himſelf, without their leave, to improve his revenue.

As he protects the merchants, and gives them convoys at ſea, he grants them ſafe conducts at land (no other being allowed by the law of nations, or acknowledged by Magna Charta) and receives their ſhips into his harbours. The king is the cuſtos, or guardian, of the whole realm, but he is more particularly lord of the ports, not only of the Cinque Ports, where he appoints a warden to exerciſe his juriſdiction, but of all the reſt in the kingdom; and our kings have ever enjoyed the prerogative of opening and ſhutting them at their pleaſure. In the reign of Edward III. great part whereof was ſpent in war, there are ſeveral petitions in the rolls of parliament for opening the ſea, when it was ſhut by his prerogative; yet he never opened it again, without laying an extraordinary impoſition upon merchandize. This prerogative was founded on excellent reaſon; for commerce is not to be held with all perſons. Elſe enemies might diſcover the ſecrets of the realm, and corrupt religion or the manners of the people. Nor are all things fit to be exported, particularly ſuch as the kingdom cannot ſpare, or may be of advantage to the enemy, as corn in a time of dearth, warlike ſtores in war, &c. Embargos are of the ſame nature with the ſtopping of ports, and equally appropriated to the king, being an incident annexed to his prerogative of making war and peace. When war is denounced, all trade is ſtopped between the nations engaged therein; and if a king can ſtop it, he muſt of courſe have a power to open it, and lay reaſonable impoſitions on merchants for doing ſo. It is a rule in law, he that may do more may do leſs; and he, that can forbid people to trade or paſs at all, may diſpenſe with the prohibition, and give them leave to traffick under certain conditions. Our kings have forbid (d) trade, ſometimes generally, ſometimes between us and particular nations, ſometimes for particular merchandizes only; of all which there are examples enough in our records and hiſtories. All companies of merchants are inſtituted by the king; and he that gives their privileges may likewiſe preſcribe the terms, on which they are to enjoy them, excluſive of others. The king is lord of the ſea about this iſland, not only as to juriſdiction and protection, but as to property (e). Hence all land drained from the ſea belongs, by the common law, to the crown (as Stamford (f) ſays) de jure gentium; and all ſeas belong to the next potentate, at leaſt ſo long as they are formidable: and all navigable rivers, being like arms of the ſea, ſo far as the tide floweth. Hence, antecedent to any ſtatute, the king (g) might reſtrain all his ſubjects, of what quality ſoever, from going beyond ſea, as Edward I. did in the 22d year of his reign; and the like prohibitions were (h) made in thoſe of his ſucceſſors. If he allows merchants to paſs to and fro, to come in and out of his ſtreams and ports, he may certainly preſcribe the conditions, and what duties they ſhall pay. Trade was carried on by the Engliſh many hundreds of years, before there was ſuch a thing known as an houſe of commons: it was carried on with ſo great profit, that our riches ſerved for admiration to other nations, even to the Normans at the time of the Conqueſt: but if our kings had not the ſame authority, as other princes, both in commerce, and in impoſitions, it could never have been carried on with advantage. They could not without it have held the balance of trade upright, or have preſerved an equality between their own ſubjects and foreigners. Our neighbours might otherwiſe drain off all our wealth, and ruin our trade at their pleaſure: and their princes, having the ſole right to lay impoſitions, might manage the market ſo, that their ſubjects ſhould ſell dear, and buy cheap, unleſs our kings had the ſame powers to prevent the ill effects of their meaſures, and the ruin of our commerce. Thus when the ſtate of Venice laid a ducat upon every hundred weight of currants carried out of their dominions by the Engliſh merchants, queen Elizabeth, by a ſpecial patent, in the 12th year of her reign, enabled her merchants trading to the Levant, to levy a noble upon every hundred weight of currants brought into England by any merchant ſtranger. Thus when the Hanſe Towns had got the emperor to baniſh all Engliſh merchants out of Germany, the ſame queen cauſed their houſe called the Steel-yard to be ſeized, forbade them to traffick with any of her ſubjects, and ordered their merchants to quit England, the ſame day that the Engliſh were to depart out of the empire. Nothing is more evident, than the neceſſity of our kings having the ſame power, in impoſitions as well as commerce, as other princes; they always exerciſed it well, and there was no danger of their abuſing it, whilſt the beſt part of their revenue depended thereon: and whoever will conſider, how light, eaſy, reaſonable, and calculated for the benefit of trade, the impoſitions of our kings were, muſt be allowed an uncommon meaſure of public ſpirit, if he is very fond of the change into heavier, becauſe they are parliamentary impoſitions.

Theſe are ſome of the reaſons that may be aſſigned for the royal prerogative in point of laying impoſitions, which all monarchs enjoyed by the law of nations, and which the civil law conſidered as ſo inherent in the ſcepter, that it could not be taken away without the deſtruction of the ſcepter. In fact, it had been always exerciſed in this iſland; the Britiſh princes, whoſe territories were ſituated on the ſea, laid (as Strabo ſays) heavy duties on the native commodities, which the Gaulic merchants tranſported hence to their own country: and ſome pieces of the tribute money paid to Cunobeline, with his image and ſuperſcription, are ſtill preſerved. The Romans laid the like impoſitions; the power of laying them was incident to the imperial authority; and when the empire was overrun by the Goths and other northern nations, the princes thereof ſucceeded to, and exerciſed the ſame right, in all the countries which they conquered. The Saxon kings did the ſame here: and even Magna Charta atteſts, that there were ancient and right cuſtoms paid by merchants, before the making of that charter, and before an houſe of commons was in being. Theſe cuſtoms were indeed but ſmall; ſuch as half a mark on a ſack of wool, or 300 woolfells, a mark on a laſt of leather, thoſe on tin and lead were proportionably eaſy: and when king John laid 8*d.* a ton on wine; and Edward I. in his Carta Mercatoria, laid 3*d.* in the pound upon merchandize imported by ſtrangers, generally called the petit cuſtom, with an increaſe of all other duties on them; the one was as much a tonnage, and the other a poundage, as if higher rates had been impoſed; and the queſtion is only about the king's right in the thing itſelf, not about the quantum of the impoſition. Nor was the difference in point of the rate or quantity any thing conſiderable, for a poundage of 3*d.* in thoſe days was more worth to the crown, than that of a ſhilling now; and the duty of two ſhillings a tun upon all wine imported by ſtrangers (which Edward I. impoſed by the ſame charter) was, each ſhilling weighing then as much as three now, double the value of the preſent tonnage. Thoſe who were for ſtripping the crown of this branch of its authority, objected to Edward's charter in this point, that it was ſuſpended by his ſucceſſor's writ (i), in the 3d year of his reign, and in the 5th repealed (k) by ordinance: but this was done not by the king and parliament, but by certain rebellious barons, who aſſumed the government of the realm, and called themſelves Ordainers. It is well known, how turbulent a reign this was, and how weak a prince ſate upon the throne, ſcarce ever maſter of himſelf, and ſo diſtreſſed by this violence of the barons (ſeveral of whoſe ordinances were treaſonable) that he was forced to take up large ſums of money by way of loan (l) from the merchants, which being never repaid, the merchants received thence greater detriment, than they would have done by paying double the poundage impoſed by his father. But no ſooner did Edward III. get poſſeſſion of the crown, than (m) he revived his grandfather's charter, and ordered by his writs, the poundage and other cuſtoms therein contained to be levied to his uſe, notwithſtanding the ordinances made, not by the king his father, but per quoſdam magnates.

Edward III. was a great prince; and being embarked in expenſive wars during the moſt part of his reign, he put extraordinary duties, ſometimes of 4*s.* ſometimes 5*s.* upon wool, and the like upon other commodities. This gave occaſion to ſeveral petitions of the commons in parliament, upon which a greater ſtreſs hath been laid than they deſerve. It doth not appear, that theſe petitions were of right, but rather of grace and favour; they are far from inferring, either that the people had received wrong, or that the king had no right to lay impoſitions. It never behoved any prince more, than Edward, to be well with his people, to whom he was obliged to apply every year for the ſupport of his wars; he was infinitely careful in this reſpect: and his anſwers to their petitions were generally gracious, but wary and circumſpect. On ſome heads he was ſilent; on others, his anſwers were general or doubtful; ſometimes he granted them in part, for a certain time, and on condition he received a greater recompence; nor did he ever remit any impoſition, without receiving a ſubſidy of more conſiderable value. In his 14th year (n), the commons prayed him not to take above the half mark on a ſack of wool, nor more than the old cuſtoms on lead, tin, and leather. In his anſwer, he granted their requeſt, not for tin or lead, but only for wool and leather; yet this grace was not to take place, till after the Whitſontide to come twelvemonth; it was granted but in part, to Engliſhmen only, not to foreign merchants: and yet though all theſe new impoſitions were to continue for above a year, he got a parliamentary grant, not only of 20,000 ſacks of wool, but of the 9th lamb, the 9th fleece of wool, and the 9th ſheaf of corn, of all perſons, both clergy and laity, throughout the kingdom. In his 29th year, (o) the commons wanting to get the 40*s.* duty, laid on a ſack of wool, to be taken off, it was agreed in parliament, that the king ſhould have a greater ſubſidy out of wool and leather for ſix years, ſo as, during that time, he laid no other impoſition or charge upon the commons. This is evidently a conditional agreement (p), and the people would ſcarce have bought it ſo dear, if the king had not a right to lay them; and if he ſuſpended his power of impoſing for ſix years, it was in conſideration of a recompence of greater value. The puniſhments of lord Latimer, John Pechy, and Richard Lions, in the fiftieth of this king, when through age and grief at the Black Prince's death, he was become weak, ſickly, languid, melancholy, and almoſt ſtupid, made as little to the purpoſe of thoſe who urge them againſt the royal power in impoſitions. Pechy had got a patent, that none ſhould ſell ſweet wines in the city of London, but himſelf, his deputies, and aſſigns; and under colour thereof, extorted ten groats for every pipe of ſweet wines ſold by others within the city; it doth not appear that he had any warrant for it from his patent, and his being puniſhed for abuſing it, and doing things of his own head, is no argument againſt the king's right of laying the like impoſition. Latimer had, of his own authority, laid ſeveral impoſitions on merchandize at Calais, to the great decay of the ſtaple there. He had likewiſe played the ſtock-jobber in buying the debentures, tallies, and ticquets, due from the king to his ſoldiers and penſioners, at a great diſcompt, giving very little to the parties, and yet, in deceit of his majeſty, had an entire allowance for them in the Exchequer. He had alſo defrauded the king of the pay ſent to his forces in Bretagne, had ſold a large quantity of proviſions for his army there, converting the money to his own uſe; and had delivered up the towns of S. Sauveur in Normandie, and Becherel in Bretagne, to the enemy, not without the ſuſpicion of corruption and treaſon. He was cenſured for all theſe crimes in the groſs, ſo that nothing can be drawn thence againſt the right of the crown in laying impoſitions on merchandize; eſpecially ſince Latimer was charged with laying the impoſt at Calais, without any warrant, and purely of his own authority. Lions, a farmer of the cuſtoms, was accuſed (q) of ſetting on wool and other merchandize, certain new impoſitions without aſſent of parliament, converting them to his own uſe without controul, the lord treaſurer not being acquainted therewith; and of aſſuming to himſelf in divers other things, as a king. He pleaded indeed, that he laid them by the king's command, but he produced no warrant, nor could he have any without the treaſurer's knowledge: and he was juſtly puniſhed by fine, ranſome, and impriſonment. The king's right could not be any ways affected by this ſentence on a man, who had acted of his own head; eſpecially ſince his charge was, 'that being but a ſubject, he had taken 'upon him, as a king, in divers things, particularly in laying impoſi'tions;' which intimates ſufficiently, that a king might do it, but not a ſubject. This is ſtill more plain in the bill exhibited by the commons in this parliament (r), praying, 'that thoſe who ſhould ſet new impo'ſitions by their own authority, accroaching to themſelves royal power, 'might have judgment of life and member;' than which there cannot be deſired a plainer acknowledgment, by parliament, that the ſetting of impoſitions belonged to the crown, and was a mark of ſovereignty and royal power.

Mr. Hakewill's argument in the lower houſe of parliament, in 1610, againſt impoſitions by the crown. (a)

Mr. Speaker:

The queſtion now in debate amongſt us is, Whether his majeſty may, by his prerogative royall, without aſſent of parliament, at his own will and pleaſure, lay a new charge or impoſition upon merchandizes, to be brought into, or out of this kingdome of England; and enforce merchants to pay the ſame.

I MUST confeſſe, that when this point was firſt ſtirred mongſt us, and that wee, not contented to ſeeke redreſſe for the exceſſe of the preſent impoſitions, reſolved to proceed farther, by calling his majeſties right of impoſing into queſtion, I was very ſory: for I ſaw we were then in a faire way to have obtained a very great abatement of the impoſitions that now are; and beſides, we had his majeſties promiſe never to lay any more but in parliament time, by the advice and free conſent of his ſubjects, repayring hither from all parts of the realme. This hope of a preſent eaſe, and gracious promiſe for the time to come, gave me, I confeſſe, a full ſatisfaction; eſpecially, ſeeing I was confidently perſwaded, that his majeſties right to impoſe was very cleere and not to be diſputed; and that therefore by drawing into queſtion the right, wee might give his majeſty juſt occaſion to withdraw from us his gracious purpoſe of the preſent abatement, as alſo his promiſe for the time to come. For, ſyr, when the caſe of Bates, who as you know was called into queſtion for refuſing to pay the impoſition laid upon currants, was argued in the Exchequer, in which caſe his majeſties right to impoſe was ſolemnly diſputed, and there reſolved for his majeſty, I was then preſent at all the arguments both at the bar and at the bench; and I doe confeſſe that by the weighty and unanſwerable reaſons, as I then conceived them, of thoſe grave and reverend judges, ſitting in their ſeate of juſtice, I was much perſwaded. But by thoſe many records vouched by them, I was altogether overcome, and as it were vanquiſh't to yeeld to them; for ſyr, ratio ſuadet, authoritas vincit. But though I were then, and when the queſtion was firſt moved in this houſe, very confident, yet as you ſhall perceive anon, I was not very conſtant in that opinion; for being, amongſt others, imployed by this houſe to make ſearch in the Exchequer for records, which, by the practiſe of former ages, might guide our judgements in this weighty point, and having diligently collected the arguments made in the Exchequer, and not only ſo, but compared my owne collections with reports thereof made by divers other of my friends, and finding that ſome of the records urged in thoſe arguments were untruly vouched, and many miſaplyed, I then began to ſtagger in my opinion, and preſently fell to examine the weight of the reaſons which had been alledged, which in my poore cenſure, I found not of ſtrength ſufficient, without the full concurrence of cleere preſidents of former times, to maintaine the judgement given, or my opinion grounded thereupon. And therefore, ſyr, in love to the truth I did forſake my former opinion as erroneous, and do now embrace the contrary, that is, that his majeſtie hath no right to impoſe, and ſo am now become a convert. Thoſe reaſons that moved mee thus to change, and the weakeneſſe which I diſcovered in the reaſons alledged againſt the opinion which I now hold, I will, with your patience, open unto you, and will therein follow the commandement of Chriſt to Peter, beeing converted, ſeeke to convert my brethren.

As touching the judgement in the Exchequer ſtanding yet in force, ſo often caſt as a block in our way, though I much reverence the perſons of thoſe yet living, and the memory of thoſe that are with God, who gave the judgement: yet ſeeing (as I hope I ſhall bee able evidently to prove) the ſame to bee againſt the great charter of our liberties, I can eſteeme no otherwiſe of it than the ſtatute of 25. Ed. 1. cap. 10. pronounceth of all ſuch judgements; that is, that it is void and to be held for nought. Thus much I thought good to ſay by way of preamble or introduction to the matter. Now, by your favours, I will enter into the debate of the queſtion; in handling of which I will purpoſely avoid the repetition of any thing that hath been ſpoken by any man that hath argued before, as knowing in what preſence I ſpeake. That I may the better convey my ſelfe through my argument, and be the better conceived of you that are to heare me, I will divide that which I have to ſay into certain parts, which I will proſecute in order.

Firſt, I hold it neceſſary to conſider, whether cuſtom were due to the king by the common-law.

Secondly, admitting it to bee due by the common-law, whether it were a ſumme certain, not to be increaſed at the kings pleaſure or otherwiſe.

Thirdly, ſuppoſing that by the common-law the king might, by way of impoſition, have increaſed his cuſtom at his own will, by his abſolute power, without aſſent in parliament, whether or no hee bee not bound to the contrary by acts of parliament. In the handling of which part, I will conſider the ſtrength of every act of parliament hitherto vouched to this purpoſe, anſwering, as I goe, ſuch objections as have been made againſt thoſe ſtatutes by ſuch as have maintained that the king is not bound by them. I will alſo add a ſtatute or two as yet not remembered by any.

Laſtly, I will diſcover unto you the weakneſſe of ſuch reaſons as have been made in maintenance of the kings right to impoſe.

In the proſecuting of which parts I will, as occaſion is offered, give ſome anſwere to that which hath been laſt ſpoken; as knowing it to be expected at my hands.

By ſir Robert Hitcham.

(a) This argument was printed in 1641, with this title, 'The Libertie of the Subject: againſt the pretended Power of Impoſitions. Maintained by an argument in parlia-
' ment an. 7°. Jacobi Regis. By William Hakewill, of Lincolns Inne, Eſq.'

It was preceded with the following addreſs from Mr. Hakewil to the reader. ' Being very ſenſible of a great injury lately done mee, by the extreme falſe printing of a
' ſmal treatiſe of my compoſing, ſtoln out without my conſent, and hearing accidentally that ſome part of this alſo had paſſed the preſſe, I thought good for the preventing
' of the like wrong to ſtay the forwardneſſe of the printer untill I had reviewed and corrected it by mine owne notes. For my part, I ſhould have been contented altogether
' to have reſtrained it, if I might; but now ſeeing it muſt abroad, I ſhall not bee aſhamed to let it beare my name, and owne the errors of it my ſelf (thoſe of the preſſe
' excepted) though heretofore it had gayned ſo much reputation by ſome, as it was attributed to a worthier author. Some there are yet ſurviving that heard this argument
' about thirty yeeres ſince in the commons-houſe of parliament; but it hath now extended itſelfe beyond the probable proportion of a ſpeech or argument, by the inſertion
' of many records and acts of parliament more at large, which, at the delivery of it, were but meerely quoted.

' The endeavour of it is to prove, that the juſt prerogative of our kings never warranted them to raiſe monies at their pleaſure, by laying a charge on merchandize to bee
' exported or imported, without aſſent of parliament. But, on the contrary, the ſetled lawes of the land, the preſidents of former ages, the acts of our moſt neceſſitous
' and powerfull princes, and indeed every thing requiſite to make the truth apparent, doe as it were unanimouſly conſent to diſcharge us of this unjuſt and heavy burthen.

' And you ſhall ſee herein, how the policy of active princes hath by many waies attempted to undermine thoſe fortifications, which the wiſdom of our anceſtors hath
' rayſed to maintaine themſelves from this kinde of aſſault. You ſhall ſee with how great difficulty their prevailing was withſtood. And (which is the glory of truth) you
' ſhall finde thoſe deſignes, which were laid to overthrow our right, mainly to make for the evidence and confirmation of it. For, whatever unjuſt impoſitions were either
' exacted by a pretended lawfullneſſe, or ſet up by a commanding power, were by complaint in parliaments preſently following taken down, and remain on record as (wit-
' neſſes againſt themſelves) unlawfull, and againſt our libertie.

' Theſe reaſons and arguments of mine (how meane ſoever) thoſe times, wherein I urged them, accepted favorably; and ſince, in their private paſſage in manuſcripts,
' were entertained in many judicious hands, which made mee ſomewhat enlarge the conceit that before I had of them. And now ſeeing neceſſitie enforceth mee to make
' them more publique, I muſt adventure them to the cenſure of theſe nice times. Beneficiall (happily) they may be to ſome, prejudiciall I hope to none. In which confi' dence (having the leave of authority) they have likewiſe my leave to goe abroad.'

There are alſo prefixed the following heads of the argument:
' 1. That there was ever ſome cuſtome due to the king by the common-law.
' 2. That it was a ſum certaine by the common-law.
' 3. That all the revenues which the common-law giveth to the king (out of the intereſt of the ſubject) are certaine, or reduceable to a certainty by ſome legall courſe,
' and none left to the kings pleaſure.
' 4. The reaſons why the law requireth ſuch certainty in thoſe revenues which the king hath out of the intereſt of the ſubject.
' 5. Examples of revenues given by the common-law to the king, out of the intereſt of the ſubject, and that they are all certaine.
' 6. Anſwer to an objection, that the king may lay impoſitions upon extraordinary occaſions.
' 7. Arguments drawn from the actions of our kings, that they had no power to impoſe.

' 18. Admitting the kings had power by the common-law to lay impoſitions, yet how they are barred by ſtatutes.
' 19. Magna Charta, cap. 30. urged againſt impoſitions, and the objection made againſt it, anſwered. 1 Objection, that it extendeth onely to merchant-ſtrangers.
' 2. That it was made onely againſt taxes within the land. 3. That by the exception in the end of the ſtatute, the kings prerogative is ſalved.
' 20. The ſtatute de Tallagio non concedendo urged, with the anſwers to the objections made thereunto. The expoſition of the words tallage, ayde, ſubſidie.
' 21. The ſtatute of 25 Ed. 1. cap. 7. urged againſt impoſitions, and cleered from objections: 1. That it is againſt the exceſſe of impoſitions, and not againſt the right.
' 2. That it is onely againſt impoſitions on woolls.
' 22. The ſtatute of 14. Ed. 3. cap. 21. urged againſt impoſitions, and cleered from objections. That it extendeth onely to impoſitions within the land, and not upon ' merchandizes, anſwered, with an expoſition of the word charge.
' 23. Anſwers to the reaſons urged in maintenance of impoſitions: 1. That becauſe it cannot appeare that the ancient cuſtomes were ſet by parliament, therefore they ' were impoſed by the king. The antiquity of parliaments.
' 24. Anſwer to the ſecond reaſon urged for impoſitions, that the king may totally reſtraine importation and exportation, and therefore may reſtraine ſub modo by laying ' impoſitions.
' 25. Anſwer to the third reaſon, that the ports are the kings, and that he may open and ſhut them on what conditions he pleaſeth.
' 26. Anſwer to the fourth reaſon, that the king is bound to protect merchants, and ſafeguard the ſeas, and that therefore he may lay moderate impoſitions, for raiſing
' of money to defray his charges.
' 27. Anſwer to the fifth objection, that all forreign princes have power to impoſe; and if our king ſhould not have the like, it might be very inconvenient to this ſtate.
' 28. A ſummary concluſion of the whole argument.'

Firſt then to conſider whether there were by the common-law any duty belonging to the king upon merchandize to be carried into or out of the kingdom, known by the name of cuſtom. Though the mainteinance of cuſtome to be due by the common-law be a point of ſuch conſequence to them that mainteined the kings right to impoſe, as without the upholding of which their opinion, as I conceive, is not ſo much as colourably to be mainteined, and that to maintein the ſame, it be not at all neceſſary to induce my concluſion; and although to admit it, it may ſeem perhaps no good policy of argument, but rather a great diſadvantage to me to admit that, without which the contrary part cannot uphold their opinion, and which being admitted cannot make any thing for me; yet becauſe we are here not as arguers at the bar, but as judges in a high-court, and that all our ends tend to the diſcovery of the truth: I will therefore not only admit it, but will maintein it as well as I can.

That there was ever ſome cuſtome due by the common-law.

That cuſtome is due by the common-law I collect, firſt by the name thereof, for though at this day it bee (and ſo hath beene for more then 350 yeeres, as I ſhall have occaſion more fully anon to open unto you) called in our law-Latin Cuſtuma, yet in ancient time it had no other name here amongſt us (for I meane not to wander into forreign-learning) then conſuetudo, as may appeare by the ſtatute of Magna Charta cap. 30. Per rectas & antiquas conſuetudines; for I ſhall anon directly prove unto you, that conſuetudo in that place is not to be underſtood an uſage, as hath been ſaid, but in that ſenſe which I take it. This name conſuetudo in the ſame ſenſe is alſo found in many ancient records brought into this houſe upon the late ſearch. That this name then conſuetudo, which implies an approved continuance without a known beginning, ſhould by the common-law be given to this revenue more then to any other revenue belonging to the king; nay, that this terme, which is the common and generall name to all common and approved uſages of what nature or kinde ſoever, ſhould be applied to this dutie rather then to any other amongſt all the ancient uſages and cuſtomes which the common-law imbraceth, cannot but denote the great antiquity thereof, and, more then ſo, the allowance and approbation thereof by the common-law; for doubtleſſe, if, beſide the antiquity of this dutie, the common-law had not alſo alowed the reaſonableneſſe of it, and in a manner the neceſſity of it, it would never have denoted it unto us by this name of excellency above all other cuſtomes which require reaſonablenes as well as antiquity. Therfore doubtleſſe this duty, thus favored, is a childe of the common-law. Nay farther, it is of the very eſſence of a cuſtome to have his only beginning by allowance of the common-law; for that, which beginneth by private contract of partie, or by act of parliament, and dependeth not wholly upon the alowance of the common-law, by one of which three waies all things conſiderable in law have their commencements, cannot bee called or bee a cuſtome, in name or deede. Moreover, conſidering that this cuſtome is not limited to any one place within the realme, wee ſhall ſo little neede to be curious in affirming it to bee due by the common-law, as wee may boldly pronounce it to be part of the common-law it ſelfe. Thus you ſee, that the very name conſuetudo proves cuſtome to bee a dutie by common-law. To this may bee added, that Magna Charta cap. 30. which ſtatute was made little more then 150 yeeres after the Conqueſt, termeth this not only conſuetudo, which, as I have ſaid, implies antiquity beyond all remembrance of a beginning, but antiqua conſuetudo; not onely cuſtome, but old and ancient cuſtome. And in compariſon to this old cuſtome due at common-law, the cuſtome upon ſtaple commodities, given or increaſed by act of parliament 3 E. I. not printed, was called nova conſuetudo: before the making of which ſtatute of 3 E. I. you may further ſee, that cuſtome was due; for an. 52. H. 3. in the ſtatute of the Exchequer, printed, you may read, that the collectors of the cuſtome of wools were to yeeld their accompt twice every yeere into the Exchequer. But that, which moſt of all moveth me to beleeve that this duty was and is due by the common-law, is this; that in all caſes where the common-law putteth the king to ſuſtaine charge for the protection of the ſubject, it alwayes yeeldeth him out of the thing protected ſome gaine towards the maintenance of the charge: as, for the protection of wards lunatiques and ideots, the profits of their lands; for the maintenance of the courts of juſtice, it giveth him fines for purchaſe of originall writs, and fines pro licentia concordandi, which in ſuppoſition of law are no other then fines paid for not proceeding according to the ſurety by pledges put in upon purchaſe of the originall, and for troubling without cauſe the kings juſtices, who are maintained in their places at the kings charge. There are many the like profits of court, given by the common-law to the king for the maintenance of his charge in the adminiſtring of juſtice.

This obſervation, which might be further proved by divers other inſtances in things of other nature, maketh me to think, that becauſe the common-law expecteth that the king ſhould protect merchants in their trades, by maintaining, repairing, and fortifying the havens at home; by clearing the ſea of pirates and enemies in their paſſage; and by maintaining ambaſſadors abroad to treate with forreigne princes upon all ſuch occaſions; that it alſo giveth him out of merchandizes exported and imported, ſome profit for the ſuſtentation of this publique charge. Otherwiſe were the law very unreaſonable and unjuſt. So as to prove, that by the common-law cuſtome is due to the king, I ſhall need to ſay no more; eſpecially conſidering it hath not onely been yeelded to, but proved by thoſe, which maintain a contrary concluſion. I will therefore proceed to my ſecond conſideration: whether that profit upon merchandizes, which the common-law for theſe reſpects gave unto the king, were a duty certaine, not to be increaſed or inhaunced at the kings will and pleaſure, without a common aſſent in parliament; or otherwiſe, whether the common-law hath left an abſolute power in the king, to demand in this caſe more or leſſe at his owne pleaſure, and to compell his ſubjects to pay it? The reſolving of which queſtion will, as I conceive, make an end of this controverſie between us; for what are theſe impoſitions which wee complaine of, other than the enhauncing of the cuſtome by the kings abſolute pleaſure?

That cuſtome due by common law, was a ſum certain.

That this duty given by the common-law, as I have proved, unto the king, was and is a duty certain, not to be enhaunced by the king at his owne pleaſure, without aſſent in parliament, I hope I ſhall be able cleerly to prove unto you: in mainteinance of which, I will uſe ſome arguments of direct proofe, and others of great preſumption and probability. And firſt, I lay this as a ground, which will not be denyed me by any man; that the common-law of England, as alſo all other wiſe lawes in the world, delight in certainty, and abandon incertainty, as the mother of all debate and confuſion, than which nothing is more odious in law: and therfore the rule is, quod certum eſt retinendum eſt, quod incertum eſt dimittendum; nay further, quod incertum eſt nihil eſt. This is the cenſure of law upon all the acts of men, which fall under the judgment of the law. If then the law ſo judge of the acts of men, holding them for nought and voyde, that are incertaine; how much more then doth the law require certainty in her own acts, which are to binde all men? And if in any of the acts of law certainty be to be ſpecially expected, moſt of all is it requiſite that bounds of limitation and certainty be ſet between the king and his poor ſubject, between the mighty and the weak, between the lion and the lamb. And if in any caſe between the king and his ſubject more than other this certainty be required, moſt of all it is requiſite in caſes where the common-law giveth the king a perpetuall profit or revenue to be raiſed out of the intereſt and property of his poor ſubjects eſtate, either in lands or goods. If in all other things the law, as I have ſaid, and wherein I ſuppoſe you have yeelded to me, doe require certainty and limitation, and onely in this caſe where it is moſt requiſite, it hath omitted and neglected it, we muſt conclude the law to be moſt unreaſonable, improvident, and contrary to it ſelfe; which to ſay, were to conclude it to be no law. Out of theſe grounds I may then in my opinion ſafely and with ſome confidence deduce and maintain this poſition; that the common-law of England giveth to the king, as to the head of the common-wealth, no perpetuall revenue or matter of profit out of the intereſt or property of the ſubject, but it either limiteth a certainty therein at the firſt; or otherwiſe hath ſo provided, that if it be uncertaine in it ſelfe, it is reduceable to a certainty onely by a legal courſe, that is to ſay, either by parliament, by judges, or jury; and not by the kings own abſolute will and pleaſure. Though this poſition be grounded upon thoſe ſure foundations, out of which I have, as you perceive, drawn it, and needs no farther proof; yet becauſe you ſhal ſee how plentiful the truth is in reaſons to maintain it ſelfe, I will further open unto you the particular reaſons of this poſition, which are theſe.

That all the revenues which the common-law giveth to the king out of the intereſt of the ſubject, are certain, or reduceable to a certainty by a legall courſe; and none left to the kings pleaſure.

The reaſons why the law requireth ſuch certainty in thoſe revenues.

Firſt, the law requireth certainty in matter of profit, between the king and the poor ſubject; becauſe to make any man judge in his own caſe, eſpecially the mighty over the weake, and that in a point of profit to him that judgeth, were to leave a way open to oppreſſion and bondage.

Secondly, becauſe by reducing it to a certainty, the king may know what certainty to expect; that ſo he may order his charge accordingly.

Thirdly, that the ſubject may know likewiſe what he is to pay, that ſo he may know certainly what ſhall remaine to him as his own.

Finally, that the king may not depend upon the good will of his ſubject for his revenue, ſeeing the law expecteth he ſhould beare the charge, but may know in certainty what to claime as due to him, and may accordingly compell the ſubject to pay it; and that the ſubject may not be under the kings abſolute power to pay what the king pleaſeth, which may perhaps extend to the whole value of the merchandize.

You ſee in generall, how the law, by requiring certainty in matter of profit between the king and the ſubject, preventeth many miſcheifes, which would fall out if the law were otherwiſe; and therefore without more ſaying, I might here conclude, that cuſtome, being due by the common-law, was and is a ſum certain, not to be increaſed at the kings pleaſure by way of impoſition. But becauſe there are many other revenues due to the king by the common-law, as well as cuſtome; if they all, or as many as we can call to minde ſhall fall out to bee, as I have ſaid, ſummes certaine and not ſubject to bee increaſed at the kings will, this will bee a forcible argument, that cuſtome is likewiſe certain and not to be inhaunced at the kings pleaſure; for, this argument drawne à ſimili is of great force, and the moſt uſuall of any other in debate of things doubtfull in law. Quæ legibus deciſa non ſunt, judex ex his quæ deciſa ſunt ſtatuet, & de ſimilibus ad ſimilia procedat. May it pleaſe you to conſider in this reſpect other revenues, which the common-law of this land giveth the king; and according to the rule, to decide that which is in queſtion, by the ſame rule and meaſure, by which other things of the ſame nature have been decided and ordered. The common-law giveth the king a fine for the purchaſe of an original writ. Is it certaine? It is, and ever hath been. If the debt or damages demanded amount to above forty pounds, the fine is, and ever hath been, ſixe ſhillings eight pence, and no more; if to a hundred pounds, then ten ſhillings, and no more. May the king increaſe this fine at his pleaſure? There is no man that will ſay he may. There is a fine due by the common-law, pro licentia concordandi. Is it not certainly known, and ſo hath alwayes been, to be the tenth part of the land compriſed in the writ of covenant? And is not alſo the poſt-fine thereupon due certainly known to be once and a halfe as much more as the fine pro licentia concordandi, or pre-fine; as for example, when the pre-fine is ten ſhillings, the poſt-fine to be fifteen ſhillings. And can the king demand any more of the ſubject? So likewiſe, when, in a writ of right, the demandant, alleadging the ſeiſin of his anceſtor, will not be compelled to prove the ſeiſin alleadged, is he not to tender to the king a ſumme certain of a demy-mark, to have this benefit? Was it ever more or leſſe? Or can it now be more, if the king would? Theſe, amongſt many others, are duties belonging to the king by the common-law from the ſubject, for the mainteinance of his charge in the adminiſtration of juſtice, which the civilians call vectigal judiciarium. There are alſo in divers other caſes duties certain, belonging to the king by the common-law: as for example, the reliefe for an earldome is certainly knowne to be a hundred pounds, for a barony a hundred markes, for a knights fee a hundred ſhillings; all which in the ſtatute of Magna Charta, cap. 2. are called old and ancient duties. This is vectigal patrimoniale; of which ſort I could produce many others, all which have like certainty. Nay, there is one duty well known to us all, which the common-law giveth to the king; and is in his nature a cuſtome (our very caſe) in which the king is bound to a certainty which he cannot exceed; and that is priſage, a duty given by the common-law to the king, upon every ſhip-loading of wine brought into the kingdom by Engliſh merchants; and is one tun of wine before the maſt, and another behinde. I am unwilling to trouble you with any more particulars of this kinde. But let any man ſhew me one particular to the contrary, and I will then yeeld, that my poſition, being falſe in one, may be in more: but till my poſition hath been in this point infringed, this generall concordance of the law in all theſe particulars is argument enough for me, without having alleadged other reaſons, to conclude, that cuſtome being, as all theſe are, a revenue due to the king by the common-law, ariſing out of the property and intereſt of the ſubject, is, as all theſe are, limited and bounded by the common-law to a certainty, which the king hath not power to increaſe. Ubi eadem ratio, eadem lex. It may perhaps be here objected, that the ayd paid to the king upon the knighting of his eldeſt ſonne, or marriage of his eldeſt daughter, was by the common-law uncertaine; and that the king did take more or leſſe at his pleaſure, untill he was bound to the contrary by ſtatute. To this I make divers anſwers. Though it were indeed a ſumme uncertaine, yet the common-law did in ſome ſort give it a limitation; for it is by a ſpeciall name called reaſonable ayd: ſo, as if the ſumme demanded doe exceed reaſon, it became from a reaſonable ayd an unjuſt exaction. Beſides, this revenue was a thing happening very rarely, and therefore the certainty thereof not ſo much regarded by the law. And yet it is to be obſerved, how the frame of this common-wealth could not long indure incertainty even in this caſuall revenue; but it was reduced to a certainty of twenty ſhillings upon a knights fee, and twenty ſhillings upon every twenty pounds ſoccageland, by the ſtat. of Weſt. 1. cap. 35. 3. Ed. 1. If in this caſuall revenue they were ſo carefull to be at a certainty, to avoid unreaſonable exactions, as the words of the ſtatute are, how much more carefull would they have been, for the ſame cauſe, to have reduced the great and annuall revenue of the cuſtome to a certainty, if they had not thought it to have been certaine by the common-law, or limited by ſtatute-law before that time made? But, ſir, that, which I rely upon for anſwer to this objection, is this. Reaſonable ayd was and is by the common-law due as well to meane lords as to the king; but meane lords were not limited to a certainty, otherwiſe than in generall, that it muſt be reaſonable, as I have ſaid. Therefore to limit the king any further, was no reaſon: and this anſwer may be given for all uncertaine revenues belonging to the king, the like of which meane lords have of their tenants; for the incertainty of which there may alſo be given eſpeciall reaſon; becauſe theſe duties firſt began by ſpeciall contract and agreement between the lord and the tenant, and not directly by operation of the common-law, and ſo were certain and uncertain as they did at firſt agree. And therefore you may be pleaſed to remember, how in laying my poſition I was wary to ſay, that ſuch revenues, as are due to the king as to the head of the common-wealth, (by which I purpoſely excluded ſuch revenues as are common to him with other meane lords) are alwayes certaine.

Examples of revenues given by the common-law to the king, out of the intereſt of the ſubject; that they are certaine.

I am now according to promiſe, and in maintenance of a ſecond part of my poſition, to ſhew you, that where the common-law giveth the king a revenue not certaine at the firſt, that is alwayes reduceable to a certainty by a legal courſe, as by act of parliament, judges, or jury, and not at the kings pleaſure. Every man, that by his tenure is bound to ſerve the king in his warres, and faileth, is to pay, according to the quantity of his tenure, a fine by the name of eſcuage. This cannot be aſſeſſed but in parliament. Upon forfeitures for treaſon, or otherwiſe, to the king, though it be a kinde of a certainty that the law giveth, in giving him all the eſtate of the party convict, both in goods and lands, or in goods onely, as the caſe is; yet for reducing it to a more expreſſe certainty, the law requireth, that it be found by office. Wayfe, ſtray, wreck, treaſure-trove, and ſuch like, are no leſſe certaine; for the king hath the things themſelves in kinde. Fines for miſdemeanors are alwayes aſſeſſed by the judges. Amercements in all caſes are to be afferred by the country, and not to be aſſeſſed by the king; though the forme of the judgement be, et ſit in miſericordia domini regis, in the kings mercy, pro contemptu prediƈt. Nay, though for puniſhment of an offence it be by ſtatute-law enacted, that an offendor ſhall make fine and ranſome at the kings pleaſure, the law even in this caſe, which is as ſtrong a caſe as may be, will not leave the aſſeſſing of the fine to the kings pleaſure, to be by him rated privately in his chamber; but it muſt be ſolemnly and legally done in an open court of juſtice by the judges, who in all other caſes are to judge between the king and his people, where the intereſt or property of the ſubject, or any charge or burden upon them doth come in queſtion, as may be proved by the booke of 2 R. 3. fo. 11. Inſomuch that I am of opinion, that if a ſtatute were made, that the king might raiſe the cuſtomes at his pleaſure, yet might it not be done as now it is, by the kings abſolute power, but by ſome other legall courſe, of which the common-law doth take notice; as in the caſe of the fine and ranſome. Much leſſe then will the common-law permit, that it ſhould depend upon the king's abſolute pleaſure, there being no ſuch ſtatute in the caſe.

You have heard out of what grounds I firſt deduced this my poſition, that the law requireth certainty in matter of profit between the king and his people. You have heard likewiſe the particular reaſons of that poſition. You have alſo heard what proofe I have made by particular caſes of like nature to this in queſtion; and how I have applyed them to the point. And ſo leaving the judgement of the whole to your wiſedomes, who can beſt diſcerne whether the argument be of weight, I proceed to my ſecond reaſon, which is drawne from the policy and frame of this common-wealth, and the providence of the common-law: the which, as it requires at the ſubjects hands loyalty and obedience to their ſoveraigne, ſo doth it likewiſe require, at the hands of the ſoveraigne, protection and defence of the ſubject againſt all wrongs and injuries whatſoever, offered either by one ſubject to another, or by the common enemy to them all, or any of them.

This protection, the law conſidereth, cannot be without a great charge to the king; and becauſe, as Chriſt ſaith, no man goeth to warre upon his owne charge, the common-law therefore hath not onely given the king great prerogatives and favours touching his own patrimony, more (I beleeve) than any other prince in the world hath; but alſo hath, for the ſuſtentation of his great and neceſſary expences in the protection of his ſubjects, given him, out of the intereſt and property of the ſubject, an ample and very honorable revenue in very many particular caſes, ſome of which I will call to your remembrance.

He receiveth out of the ſubjects purſe for wardſhips and the dependances thereupon, as we have of late accounted, about forty-five thouſand pounds by the yeare. This is a revenue which no other king of the world hath: and as it appeares by the ſtatute of 14. E. 3. c. 1. it ought to be imployed in maintenance of the warres. And ſo doubtleſſe was the firſt inſtitution of the common-law; for the lord hath the profit of the wards lands to no other end, than to maintain a man in the warre during the infancy of him, who otherwiſe ſhould ſerve in perſon.

He hath likewiſe all forfeitures upon treaſon and outlawry, and upon penall lawes, fines and amerciaments, profits of courts, treaſure-trove, priſage, butlerage, wreck, and ſo many more, as the very enumeration of the particulars would take up long time. To what other end hath the common-law thus provided for the maintenance of the kings charge, by all theſe wayes and meanes of raiſing profit out of the intereſt and property of the ſubjects eſtate in lands and goods, but onely to this end, that, after theſe duties paid, the poore ſubject might hold and enjoy the reſt of his eſtate to his owne uſe, free and cleare from all other burdens whatſoever? To what end hath the law given a part to the king, and left the reſt to the ſubject, if that which is left be alſo at the kings will, to make his profit thereof as he pleaſeth? To give a ſmall portion to him, that may at his pleaſure take more or all, is a vain and an idle act; which ſhall never be imputed to a wiſe law. But it may be objected that as the revenues are ordinary, ſo are they by the law provided onely for the ſuſteyning of the kings ordinary charge; and that if the law have not taken further conſideration, and limitted ſome certain courſe, how upon ſudden and extraordinary occaſions the kings charge may bee ſuſteined, there is yet no reaſon ſhewed to the contrary, why the king may not upon ſuch occaſion take ſome extraordinary courſe for the rayſing of money, as by the laying of impoſitions upon merchandizes, or by a tax within the realme, rather than the common-wealth for want thereof, ſhould periſh or be indangered.

Anſwere to an objection, that the king may lay impoſitions in times of extraordinary occaſions.

And hereupon by the knight that laſt ſpake, it was held, that upon occaſion of a ſudden and unexpected war, the king may not only lay impoſitions, but levy a tax within the realme, without aſſent of parliament, which poſition in my opinion is very dangerous; for to admit this were by conſequence to bring us into bondage. You ſay, that upon occaſion of ſuddaine warre the king may levy a tax. Who ſhall be judge between the king and his people of the occaſion? Can it be tryed by any legall courſe in our law? It cannot. If then the king himſelfe muſt be the ſole judge in this caſe, will it not follow, that the king may levie a taxe at his owne pleaſure, ſeeing his pleaſure cannot be bounded by law? You ſee into what a miſchiefe the admittance of one error hath drawne you. But for a full anſwer to the objection, I ſay, that the providence of the common-law is ſuch, and ſo excellent, as that for the defraying of the kings charge upon any occaſions of a ſudden warre, it hath, over and above all the ordinary revenues which it giveth the king, which in the time of warre cannot indeed but fall ſhort, made an excellent proviſion; for, ſir, the warre muſt needs be either offenſive or defenſive. Offenſive muſt either be upon ſome nation beyond the ſeas, or againſt the Scots, or Welſh, or other borderers within the iland. If it be an offenſive warre upon ſome nation beyond the ſeas, it cannot be a ſudden accident; for it is the kings own act; and he may, and 'tis fitting he ſhould take deliberation; and if it be a juſt and neceſſary warre, he may crave, and eaſily obtaine aſſiſtance of his ſubjects, by grant of ayd in parliament. If an offenſive warre upon ſome of his neighbours within the continent of this iland, as the Scots, or the Welſh, which alſo cannot be ſudden or unexpected to the king, being his own act; you know, how politikely the kings of this realme have provided, by reſerving tenures, by which many of their ſubjects are bound to ſerve them in thoſe warres in perſon, at their own charge. Only a defenſive warre, by invaſion of forreign enemies, may be ſodain: in which caſe the law hath not left the king to warre upon his owne expence, or to rely upon his ordinary revenue, but hath notably provided, that every ſubject within the land, high and low, whether he hold of the king or not, in caſe of forreign invaſion, may be compelled at his own charge to ſerve the king in perſon, as it appears by the opinion of juſtice Thirming, in 7 H. 4. The reaſon of which, in my opinion, was to no other end, than that the king might have no pretence whatſoever for the raiſing of money upon his ſubjects at his owne pleaſure, without their common aſſent in parliament. I doe then conclude this argument, that ſeeing the common-law, for maintenance of the kings ordinary charge, hath given him ſuch an ample revenue out of the intereſt and property of the ſubject, and provided alſo for ſodaine occaſions; in ſo doing it hath ſecluded and ſecured the reſt of the ſubjects eſtate from the kings power and pleaſure; and conſequently, that the king hath not power upon any occaſion at his pleaſure to charge the eſtate of his ſubjects by impoſitions, tallages, or taxes, for I hold them all in one degree, or any other burden whatſoever, without the ſubjects free and voluntary aſſent, and that in parliament. If it were otherwiſe, you ſee how it were to the utter diſſolution and deſtruction of that politike frame and conſtitution of this commonwealth, which I have opened unto you, and of that excellent wiſe providence of the common-law, for the preſerving of property, and the avoydance of oppreſſion.—Theſe two arguments uſed by me, that of certainty, and this of the proviſion made by the common-law, are in my poor opinion, arguments of direct proofe, that the king cannot impoſe.—I will now, according to my diviſion, urge an argument or two of inference and preſumption; the rather, becauſe arguments of this nature have been much enforced by thoſe, who have maintained the contrary opinion, eſpecially by Mr. Solicitor. I call them arguments of inference; and yet in my opinion, thoſe which I ſhall urge, are alſo of good proofe. Such as they are, you ſhall judge of them. They are drawn, either from the actions or forbearances of the kings of this realme, or from the actions and forbearances of the people.

Sir Francis Bacon.

Arguments drawne from the actions of the kings, that they have no power to impoſe.

Firſt, in the actions and forbearances of the kings, I obſerve, that all the kings of this realm ſince Hen. 3. have ſought and obteined an increaſe of cuſtome, more or leſſe, by the name of ſubſidie, of the gift of their ſubjects in parliament. Nay, ſome of them, and thoſe not the weakeſt in ſpirit, or power, but the moſt couragious and potent in that whole ranke, even that mighty and victorious prince, king Ed. 3. being to undertake a juſt and honourable warre, than which there could not happen a better or juſter occaſion to have made uſe of his prerogative of impoſing, did nevertheleſſe at that time ſtoope ſo low in this point, that he did, in full aſſembly of the three ſtates, pray his ſubjects to grant him a reliefe in this kinde for the maintenance of his warre, and that to endure but for a ſhort time; and further, was well content to ſuffer his prayer in that behalfe to be entred of record to the memory of all poſterity. And the ſucceeding kings have alſo ſuffered the ſame to be printed, as may appeare by the printed ſtatutes at large, an. 14. Ed. 3. cap. 21. Is it likely, that if any or all theſe kings had thought they had had in them any lawfull power by juſt prerogative to have laid impoſitions at their pleaſure, they would not rather have made uſe of that, than have taken this courſe by act of parliament, ſo full of delay, ſo prejudiciall to their right, ſo ſubject to the pleaſure of their people, who never undergoe burdens but with murmuring and much unwillingnes? Can there be any thing more hatefull to the high ſpirit of a king, than to ſubject himſelfe to the pleaſure of his people, eſpecially for matter of reliefe, and that by way of prayer, having lawfull power in his hands to relieve himſelfe without being beholding to them?

If perhaps the kings themſelves were ignorant of this great prerogative, which cannot be imagined; had they not alwaies about them wiſe counſellors to aſſiſt them, and ſuch as for the procuring of favor to themſelves would not have failed to have put them in minde of it? Nay, if they had known any ſuch lawfull prerogative, had they not been bound in conſcience ſo to have done? What an overſight was it of king Ed. 3. and all his counſell, ſo much to prejudice his right in ſo beneficiall a prerogative, as to ſuffer him upon record, and that in parliament, to pray for that, which he might have taken out of his abſolute power? Can there almoſt be a more direct diſclaiming in the right? To compare great things with leſſe, if the lord by matter of record claime any thing of his villaine, it is a diſclaimer of the villenage.

The kings of England have other noble and high prerogatives. I will only name two of them, the making of warre and peace, and the raiſing and abaſing of coyne at their pleaſure. Did they ever crave the aſſent of their ſubjects in parliament to make a warre? Their advice indeed they have ſometimes ſought, and their ayd for treaſure to maintaine it. The prerogative of raiſing and abaſing the value of money hath been oftentimes put in practiſe by them, and ſometimes ſtrayned to ſuch a height, that the king might well ſuppoſe the ſubjects could not but be much diſcontent therewith. And yet never any king of this realme did it by aſſent of parliament, which perhaps ſome one milde king among ſo many would have done, and it may be, would alſo have prayed his ſubjects to yield thereto, only to avoid the grudging of the people, if the ſeeking of aſſent in parliament had not been thought to have been prejudiciall to the abſolute power of their ſucceſſors: and yet, as for ſome of theſe kings, it may be ſuppoſed, they made little conſcience to prejudice a ſucceſſor in one point, that made no ſcruple totally to depoſe a predeceſſor from his throne, and all his regalities, and to uſurp it to themſelves.

Edward the 2d.

And ſo I proceed to my next argument of inference drawn from the actions of our kings. Some of the kings of England, as namely Ed. 2. in the yeere of his reigne, and Ed. 3. in the 1. and 24. yeere of his reigne, as may appeare by the records here amongſt us, were contented to accept an increaſe of their cuſtome by way of loane from the merchants, and ſolemnly binde themſelves to repay it againe. Would any wiſe man in the world, that thought he had but a colour of right, ſo much prejudice himſelf, as to borrow that which he might take without leave, and binde himſelfe to repay it? If a poore man perhaps through feare might be enforced ſo farre to yeeld to a mighty adverſary, yet that a powerfull man ſhould ſtoope ſo low to one much weaker than he; nay, that a king, in a point of ſuch conſequence, ſhould ſo farre diſcend from his greatneſſe, as to borrow of his poore ſubject that, which without being beholding to him he might obtein as his right, and binde himſelfe to repay it againe: I ſay, it cannot with any reaſon be imagined; but withall it muſt be concluded, that a king, that ſhall ſo doe, doth not thinke that he hath ſo much as colour of right to impoſe.

Edward the 3d.

I will not much preſſe or enforce the actions of Ed. 2. who (I confeſſe) was but a weake prince; but as for his ſonne and ſucceſſor, Ed. 3. there was not, as I have ſaid, a ſtouter, a wiſer, a more noble and couragious prince than he, and none more careful to preſerve the rights of his prerogative, as may evidently appeare by all his anſwers in parliament, on any complaint of the ſubject. Beſides, never had king of this realme more occaſion than he to ſtraine this prerogative of impoſing to the utmoſt. For beſides his exceſſive expence in the warres of France and Scotland, he had alſo a continuall charge of many expenſive children. His wife queene Philippa had alſo for her maintenance a large allowance out of his revenue. But the dowry of queen Iſabel his mother, who lived till about the 27. yeere of his reigne, was ſo great, as it is reported by ſome writers, that little more than the third part of the certaine revenue of the kingdome was left to him. Inſomuch, as through theſe occaſions of extraordinary expence, and the diminution of his revenue, he was driven to ſuch neceſſity, as his queen in the yeere of his reigne, was enforced to pawne her crowne and jewels to procure money for him, as may appeare by the record of that yeere in the office of the clerke of the pels. Nay, the king himſelfe, in theſe extremities, was oftentimes driven to lay his jewels to pawne for money: and in an. 17. did alſo pledge his crown for 4000. pound, to certaine merchants of Florence, as by the records of that yeere, in the office of the lord treaſurers remembrancer in the Exchequer, is manifeſt. By this you may ſee, that this powerfull king wanted not urgent and juſt occaſion, if any occaſion may be juſt, to have put in practiſe his abſolute power of impoſing; and yet, as you ſee, it appears of record, that in the midſt of his great wants he tooke an increaſe of cuſtome by way of loane, and bound himſelfe to repay it.

It may be here objected, that he did lay impoſitions.

What impoſitions they were, and how to be compared with the impoſitions now in queſtion, I purpoſe to tell you, when I come to anſwer objections, which I have referred to the end of my ſpeech. In the meane time I will goe on with my courſe, and urge one argument more, drawne from the actions of our kings, touching the increaſe of cuſtome.

A man would thinke, that the taking of the increaſe of cuſtome by all the kings, both one and other, with the aſſent of their ſubjects in parliament, and ſometimes by way of prayer and intreaty, for a ſhort time; nay, the taking of it by way of loane, and binding themſelves to repay it; and that to have been done by the moſt powerfull kings, in their greateſt neceſſities; were argument enough, that they did not beleeve they might juſtly claime it as their right by their abſolute power.

Edward the 1ſt.

And yet is not this all; for, ſome of them, by name, Ed. 1. did not onely take it by aſſent in parliament, or by way of loane, but (as one that buyes for his money in the market) did give for it a reall and valuable conſideration, and that to merchant-ſtrangers, of whom there was more colour to demand it as a duty, than of his naturall ſubjects. In proofe of which I produce charta mercatoria, made anno 31. Ed. 1. whereby it is recited, that, in lieu of certaine liberties and immunities granted by the king to the merchant-ſtrangers, as alſo for the releaſe of priſage, they granted to the king an increaſe of cuſtome. What were all the ſpecial liberties that were granted them, I know not, nor whether they continue. But ſure I am, that by vertue of that grant they are at this day free of priſage, paying onely 2 s. upon a tun of wine, by the name of butlerage, which they granted by the ſame charter; whereas Engliſh-men pay priſage in ſpecie, viz. one tun before the maſt, and one tun behinde.

And it is very worthy the obſervation, how the ſame king, E. 1. in the ſame yeer of his reign did command his cuſtomers throughout England, that, whereas certain Engliſh merchants were, as he was informed, of their own accords willing to pay him the like increaſe of cuſtome which the merchant ſtrangers had granted unto him, ſo as they might enjoy the like liberties and benefits; nevertheleſſe they ſhould not compell ſuch Engliſh merchants, againſt their wils, to pay it. The words are worth the hearing. Cum quidam mercatores de regno & poteſtate noſtri, ut ipſi dictis libertat. (having before recited charta mercatoria) uti & gaudere, & de priſis noſtris quieti eſſe poſſint, præſtationes & cuſtumas hujuſmodi, de bonis & mercandizis ſuis, nobis dare & ſolvere velint, ut accepimus; aſſignavimus vos ad præſtationes & cuſtumas prædictas, de his, qui præſtationes & cuſtumas illas gratanter & abſque cohercione ſolvere voluerint, colligendum, & ad opus noſtrum recipiendum; ita tamen quod aliquem mercatorem de dicto regno noſtro ad hujuſmodi præſtationes & cuſtumas nobis invite ſolvendum nullatenus diſtringatis. What ſtronger inference can there almoſt poſſibly be againſt the kings abſolute power of impoſing, than this: that he was contented, and ſo ſpecified to all his officers of the ports, that if the merchants did of their own accords pay more than their ancient cuſtomes, they ſhould have conſideration for it; but if they themſelves were not willing to pay more, then they ſhould not be compelled thereunto?

One other obſervation I draw from the actions of the kings touching the increaſe of their cuſtome, which is this, that thoſe kings, which did lay impoſitions (which as I will ſhew you by and by, was very rarely) though it were never but in time of great neceſſity, and but to indure for a ſhort time; yet they alwayes did it, not with the advice alone of the merchants, as at this day, but the merchants did alwaies ſolemnly grant an increaſe of cuſtome; and the kings were alwayes wary, for the better juſtification of their actions to the people, in their commiſſions for collecting of cuſtome, to recite not onely the great neceſſity which moved them to take an increaſe of cuſtome, but alſo the grant of the merchants, as may appeare by the records, of which we have the copies amongſt us. I dare confidently ſay, there is not above one or two at the moſt that are otherwiſe, if the impoſitions be of that nature, which theſe are of which we complaine; and yet theſe impoſitions alſo, by the grant of merchants, though raiſed upon never ſo great a neceſſitie of ſtate, and to indure but for a ſhort time, were always complained of by the commons, when they met in parliament, as may appeare amongſt other records, by the parliament roll of 27. Ed. 3. No. 27. where in a petition of the commons, exhibited to the king in parliament, are theſe words. Les commons monſtrent, coment que les marchants ayent grant per eux, ſans aſſent de parliament, un ſubſidie de XLs. de ſacc. de layn, outre le droiturel maletout de demy marke; et prion que ſoit amend a ceſt parliament; car eſt encounter reaſon, que le cominaltie de lour biens ſoient per marchants charges. Which I Engliſh thus. The commons ſhew, how the merchants have granted by themſelves, without aſſent of parliament, a ſubſidie of 40s. upon a ſack of wooll, over and above the rightfull cuſtome of halfe a marke; and pray that it may be redreſſed at this parliament; for it is againſt reaſon that the commonalty ſhould be charged in their goods by merchants. With this agreeth the printed ſtatute of 36. Ed. 3. cap. 11. in the Statutes at large, where you ſhall finde an expreſſe proviſion againſt the rayſing of impoſitions upon woolls, by grant of merchants; in which petition I doe obſerve, that the parliament in thoſe dayes did diſtinguiſh, even as we now doe, between impoſitions laid by act of parliament, and impoſitions laid only by the grant of merchants, acknowledging that impoſitions laid by parliament only are lawfull, and condemning all other as unlawfull; for otherwiſe why ſhould they tearme the demy-marke, which was laid by act of parliament, 3. Ed. 1. (Droiturel maletout) a lawful impoſition, but with relation to the unlawfulneſſe of theſe impoſitions granted by merchants, which they then did complaine of? Beſides, I obſerve that they ſay, that it is againſt reaſon, that merchants ſhould by their grant, without aſſent in parliament, charge the whole commonaltie; by which it plainly appears, that they complained not ſo much of the exceſſe or greatneſſe of the impoſitions, as of the unlawfull manner of the raiſing of it by grant of merchants, without aſſent in parliament.

Hitherto I have, according to my diviſion, drawn arguments from that which our kings have done, and put in practiſe for the increaſe of their cuſtome.

I will now make ſome obſervations of their forbearance to put this pretended power in practiſe, conſidering the ſeverall occaſions of the times, which I will proſecute in order.

Arguments drawn from the forbearance of our kings to lay impoſitions, notwithſtanding their great occaſions.

Firſt therefore in generall, I obſerve, that from the Conqueſt, untill the reign of queen Mary, being no leſſe then 480. yeeres ſpace, whatſoever the occaſions were, whatſoever the diſpoſition of the kings were, yet in the practiſe of this pretended prerogative of impoſing the kings have been ſo ſparing, as, notwithſtanding this curious ſearch that hath been made, wherein I ſuppoſe nothing that might make for the cleering of the queſtion hath eſcaped us, it cannot be found or proved by matter of record, that ſix impoſitions, ſuch as we now complaine of, were laid by all thoſe kings, who were in number 22. And thoſe ſixe, if they were ſo many, though they were unlawfull, yet were they in ſome ſort to be born withall. Firſt, by reaſon they were very moderate. Secondly, that they were laid in the times of great and apparent neceſſitie, and that they were to endure but for a yeer or two; for none of them, except onely that upon wine, laid 16. E. 1. laſted longer. They were, I ſay, notwithſtanding their unlawfulneſſe, yet in theſe other reſpects ſo farre to be borne withall, as, if the impoſitions which are now laid had been ſo qualified, we ſhould, I ſuppoſe, never have complained of them. And yet not one of theſe few impoſitions laid in former times, but was complained of, and upon complaint taken away, as may appear by the records here amongſt us. How much more reaſon is there then, that we ſhould expect the like juſtice now; conſidering that not one merchandiſe alone, as then, but very neere all the ſorts and ſeverall kindes of merchandiſes that are, are charged; that not a moderate and eaſy charge is laid upon them, but ſuch, as though we ſhould confeſſe his majeſties abſolute power to lay what he liſt, yet we had juſt cauſe to complain of the exceſſiveneſſe of the burden? For firſt, the rates of merchandiſes, for the ſubſidies of poundage and tonnage, are extreamly rayſed, a thing alſo though lawfull, yet hath been rarely put in practiſe. Then comes the impoſt upon the back of that, and is as much as the ſubſidie it ſelfe is. In ſome few merchandiſes, 'tis true, the impoſt is perhaps leſſe then the ſubſidy; but 'tis as true, that in divers others the impoſt is farre more. Beſides, theſe impoſitions were not laid in the time of warre, but even then when we were at peace with all the world, except perhaps there were ſome ſparks of rebellion in Ireland, then not fully quenched. Laſtly, theſe impoſitions are not, as thoſe in former times were, limited to endure for a yeere or two, but are to come to his majeſtie his heirs and ſucceſſors for ever, as may appeare by his majeſties letters patents in print, prefixed before the new book of rates. So as if thoſe few impoſitions laid in former times had been lawfull, yet can they not by any means be a warrant or preſident for our preſent impoſitions, differing ſo far from them in all theſe points of conſequence. But if even thoſe few, ſo quallified as they were, were complained of and taken away, what ſhall we then ſay of ours, ſo farre exceeding them in all the degrees of irregularitie? Beſides, if ſo few preſidents, as five or ſix in ſo many yeeres ſpace, and thoſe in times of ſo great neceſſitie, without any expreſſe judgment in law, or good authoritie in approbation of them, but accompanied with as many complaints againſt them, be argument enough to prove the lawfulneſſe of the act, I dare undertake, that as well taxes within the land, as impoſitions upon merchandizes, may be proved to be lawfull. But to alledge the acts of kings, in rayſing a profit to themſelves upon their ſubjects, to prove thereby their right, is of all other arguments, that are, the weakeſt. And ſo I leave it, and call to minde, that when I told you, it could not be proved by the records amongſt us, that from the Conqueſt to queen Maries time, there had been any more than ſixe impoſitions laid; I did in that number limit my ſelfe to ſuch impoſitions as thoſe are which we now complain of; for I muſt confeſſe, that in that ſpace, many more impoſitions were laid, but they were of a farre differing nature from ours; differing, I ſay, not only in thoſe circumſtances by which I did even now compare the impoſitions of theſe times to thoſe five or ſix of former ages, but in very eſſence and propertie, inſomuch as they may not properly be called impoſitions. And yet the frequent practiſe of them hath been objected and relyed upon, as ſo many preſidents, to prove the lawfulneſſe of the impoſitions now complayned of. It behoveth me therefore, that in maintenance of my aſſertion, that ſo few impoſitions have been laid, as I have affirmed, that I open unto you the difference betweene the one and the other, which being done, your ſelves will eaſily judge, that the greater part make nothing towards the defence of theſe preſent impoſitions. For theſe impoſitions, which now are in queſtion, are no other then an increaſe of cuſtome at the kings pleaſure, and commanded by him to be taken, the paſſage being free and open to all men. Thoſe other, which make ſuch a great ſhew in number, and are produced as ſo many preſidents in maintenance of theſe, are no other then ſo many diſpenſations or licences for money, to paſſe with merchandizes prohibited by act of parliament to be exported; as will evidently appeare by comparing the times, and examining the ſtatutes. I will therefore in this place, as ſhortly as I can, runne over thoſe preſidents, that have been, or may be alledged by the contrary part, out of thoſe records which are here amongſt us, and leave it to your judgement, whether I maintaine my aſſertion, or be not rather better then my word for the number.

Urged by Flem. Clark. Doderidge.

The firſt impoſition by them alledged, is that of 16. Ed. 1. which, as it appears by the record, was 4. ſhillings upon a tun of wine. This indeed, for aught I know to the contrary, was a meere impoſition, ſuch as are now in queſtion. And yet if I did deny it, and ſay that it was layd by aſſent of parliament, I know not how the contrary could be proved; for though indeed the words of the record are, cum rex precepiſſet, ut de ſingulis doliis vini caperentur 4. ſolidi, it follows not that it was laid therefore only by the kings commandment; for we ſee that even ſome acts of parliament, in thoſe auncient times, though they were made by the full aſſent of all the three eſtates, yet they have theſe words in their preambles, rex precepit, rex vult. But as for recitalls of acts of parliament by the king, in his commiſſions, and otherwiſe, it was in thoſe times uſuall to ſay, cum nuper ordinaverimus; and therefore notwithſtanding the recitall be, cum nuper rex precepiſſet, it is no cleere proof, that therefore it was done onely by the kings commandment. Nevertheleſſe I will, I ſay, admit this to be a meere impoſition, and to be one of the number; and indeed, as this is the firſt they produce, ſo is it their beſt. Only this, (amongſt all the reſt) is not limited to indure for a time certain. But give me leave, I beſeech you, to open unto you, with what circumſtances this impoſition was accompanied, and what followed of it; and then I will leave you to judge, who beſt are able, how far the preſent impoſitions may be juſtifyed by this.

The firſt circumſtance to be obſerved in this impoſition is, that it was laid immediately after the warre againſt Wales was ended, and at the time, when for the ſelling of the eſtate of Gaſcoigne, the king himſelf was in perſon enforced to undertake a voyage thither, as may appeare by our hiſtories of thoſe times, which alſo may bee collected by the very words of the record, which are theſe, cum rex ante ultimum receſſum ſuum ab Anglia precepiſſet, &c. That as theſe times were troubleſome, they were alſo very chargeable to the king, and did put him to try all means for the levying of money, I ſhall not need to urge it: it cannot be otherwiſe.

One other circumſtance is this, that this impoſition laid in this time of great neceſſity was not, as now, upon all merchandizes, nor ſo much as in generall upon one kind of merchandize, comming from all the parts of the world, but onely upon ſuch wines as were brought hither from two towns in Gaſcoigne, Bergerac and St. Emilians, as may appear by the records; and it is probable that theſe towns were then in revolt, and that the ſooner to reduce them to obedience, the king laid this burden upon their commodities, thereby to hinder the vent of them.

Another circumſtance is this, that though that this impoſition were indeed laid without limitation of any time, as touching the continuance thereof, yet within ſix years following, viz. 5. Decemb. a. 22. upon complaint of the merchants the king releaſed two ſhillings of the foure ſhillings, as may appear by the records of 22 E. 1. with which the merchants not holding themſelves contented, the very ſame yeare within eight or nine months following, viz. 23. Julii an. 22. the whole impoſition was releaſed, as may appeare by a recitall in the accompt of one William Randall receiver of the impoſt money, entred an. 26 E. 1. And within three years after the releaſe, viz. an. 25. there followed an act of parliament againſt all impoſitions in generall, as when I come to ſhew you what ſtatutes there are, in the point, I ſhall I hope cleerly prove unto you. In the meane time I will proceed to examine the reſt.

The next preſident urged is an impoſition of 40. ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll laid by E. 1. an. 21. For the proofe of which, a record of the Exchequer of that year hath been vouched. I muſt confeſſe I have not ſeen that record. But by another record of the ſame court, an. 26. E. 1. it is evident, that the ſaid impoſition was not raiſed by the kings abſolute power, but by grant, and that alſo the ſame was in the time of warre, and to endure but two or three yeare, if the warre ſhould ſo long continue, as will beſt appear by the words of the record. Cum cuſtuma 40s. nobis, in ſubſidium guærræ noſtræ contra regem Franciæ, de quolibet ſacco lanæ exeunte regnum noſtrum, percipiendum per biennium vel triennium ſi tantum duraſſet guerra illa, nuper conceſſ. fuit, &c.

By this you perceive, by what means, upon what occaſion, and with what limitation this impoſition was laid. If you will further know, what followed of it, may it pleaſe you to read the printed ſtatute of an. 21. E. 1. c 7. where it is ſaid, that the more part of the commonalty found themſelves ſore agreeved therewithall; and by the ſame ſtatute, not only that impoſition of 40. ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll, which was the occaſion of the great grief and complaint, was taken away; but upon occaſion thereof, there was at the ſame time proviſion alſo made againſt all other impoſitions whatſoever, as, I ſay, I hope I ſhall anon cleerly prove unto you. Inſomuch as this impoſition of 40. ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll ought to be ſo farre from being urged as a preſident for the preſent impoſition, and conſequently of the grievance of the commonwealth which followes thereupon, as that rather on the contrary part it may be thought to be the happieſt accident in the conſequence thereof, that ever befell the common-wealth in this kinde. For it was the occaſion of the making of the firſt law that ever was made againſt impoſitions, and other charges and burdens of that nature to be impoſed by the kings abſolute power without aſſent of parliament.

Vouched by Fleming, Clark, Dodderidge, Bacon, Attorney Hobart.

And ſo I leave their ſecond preſident, and come to the third, which in time was 31. of the ſame king E. 1. It is no other then that increaſe of cuſtome, which by the merchant ſtrangers was granted to king Ed. 1. by that charter now familiarly known unto us by the name of charta mercatoria, which, by all that have maintained his majeſties right to impoſe, hath been ſtood upon and urged, as an impoſition by the kings abſolute power; but more eſpecially by maſter Solicitor hath been ſtrongly inforced with all the advantage poſſible for the mainteinance of his opinion. Nevertheleſſe I doubt not but I ſhall give it a very full anſwer, ſuch as yet this objection hath not received, though divers, that have ſpoken before, and ſome this day, have undertaken to cleere it; wherein I will arrogate nothing to my ſelfe, but leave it wholly to your cenſure. It hath been ſaid by maſter Solicitor, that though this increaſe of cuſtome may ſeem to ſome, to proceed from the grant of merchants, yet that this grant of theirs was to no other purpoſe, nor had other effect, then only thereby to declare their aſſent; for that, thoſe which did grant were no corporation or body in the eſtimation of law, and ſo could not binde any but themſelves alone, and not ſuch as ſhould ſucceed them; and that it was only the authority of the kings pleaſure to accept and take this increaſe of cuſtome, that gave it life at the firſt, and ſtrength to continue as an impoſition till this very day. For even at this day, ſaith he, the 3. pence upon the pound, granted by the ſaid charter, is paid by the merchants ſtrangers, and they likewiſe enjoy ſome priviledges granted by the ſaid charter. And it was further by him obſerved; that notwithſtanding all the ſtatutes that have been urged againſt impoſitions, yet this impoſition hath continually ſtood and hath never been denyed to be paid by any man; and that therefore it is likely that no man till now ever conceived, that theſe ſtatutes were made againſt impoſitions upon merchandizes, but were rather to be underſtood to extend onely to impoſitions within the realme.

27 E. 3. No. 27. 36 E. 3. c. 11.

To this objection I make this anſwer, that it is indeed true, that the grant of merchants in this caſe, cannot binde the whole common wealth; as I have heretofore proved by the petition exhibited in parliament by the commons 27 Ed. 3. No. 27. and by a ſtatute of 36 E. 3. c. 11. And therefore I cannot but confeſſe, that this increaſe of cuſtome may very truely be called an impoſition; for that indeed it did at firſt take ſtrength, onely by the kings pleaſure to accept it, as hath been ſaid, and not by the grant of the merchants. Admitting it therefore to be a meer impoſition; let us conſider with what extraordinary circumſtances it is accompanied.

Firſt, as you may perceive by the record it ſelf, and as it hath partly been ſaid already, the king took it not without yeelding recompence for it; for the merchants ſtrangers, by ſubmitting themſelves unto this charge, obtained divers liberties and immunities from the king, by the ſame charter, amongſt which freedome from priſage is one which at this day they enjoy, in which reſpect this impoſition is in ſome ſort tollerable, though not at all lawfull.

Another conſiderable circumſtance, and difference from our preſent impoſitions, is this, that it was a compoſition made by the king with merchant ſtrangers, which, though it be by ſtrictneſſe of our common law, not of force to binde in perpetuitie; yet how farre by the civil law this doth binde ſtrangers, which are governed by theſe lawes, is not ſo eaſily decided; and this may be a good colour to uphold it.

Theſe ſpeciall reaſons, though they may well ſerve the turne, to make an evident difference betwixt this and our preſent impoſitions, and ſo conſequently to avoid the concluſion drawn from the preſident, and may alſo ſeem colourable, and particular reaſons to uphold the impoſition it ſelf; yet is not this that, which I mean to relie upon for anſwer. For even this impoſition, in recompence of which the king parted with ſo large priviledges and benefits, and which, becauſe it concerned only merchant ſtrangers, did neither in the burden thereof, nor in the preſident, ſo directly touch the Engliſh; yet in the deteſtation, as it ſeems, of all impoſitions, of what nature or kinde ſoever, and upon what pretext or colour ſoever they were grounded, I ſay, even this impoſition alſo was complained of in parliament within few yeeres following; and upon complaint, taken away, as may appeare by the cloſe roll of 3. Ed. 2. membran. 23. where you ſhall finde inrolled a ſuperſedeas, commanding, that the new cuſtome, granted by the merchant ſtrangers, reciting the particulars as they are contained in charta mercatoria, ſhall ceaſe at the kings pleaſure; and this is there ſaid to be yeelded to at the requeſt of the commons, which cannot be but in parliament. But becauſe the renewing of it again reſted at the kings pleaſure, therefore, within two yeeres after, by a publicke ordinance made by the principall prelates earles and barons and other great men of the kingdome, authoriſed by the kings commiſſion, dated the 16. of May, the ſame third yeere of his reigne, the charter it ſelfe was declared to be utterly void; for that it was hurtfull to the commonwealth, againſt magna charta, and made without aſſent in parliament. And not only that charter, but all other new cuſtomes or impoſitions whatſoever, impoſed ſince the coronation of Ed. 1. till that time, were alſo taken away, ſaving onely the old cuſtome upon wooll woollfels and leather. And further it was ordained, that if any man ſhould preſume to take any more then the auncient cuſtom rightfully due, and ſhould be thereof convict, he ſhould anſwere to the partie greeved his coſts and dammages, be impriſoned according to the quantitie of his offence, and be further puniſhed as an offender againſt magna charta, according to the diſcretion of the juſtices. Ro. ordinationum 5. Ed. 2. in the Tower.

37. E. 3. 20.

Though the force and authoritie of this ordinance may perhaps be doubted and blemiſhed; becauſe it was made by the barons, at the time when they had the better hand of the king, as hath been in part objected; yet you ſee, that they deliver not their cenſures, without alledging alſo their reaſons; and this their ordinance is no more in effect, then that which was thought fit by all the commons in the parliament of 5. Ed. 2. before mentioned.

But it hath been yet further ſaid, that, notwithſtanding this ordinance, the impoſition doth nevertheleſſe continue in force, and is at this day paid by the merchant ſtrangers, and that therefore in likely hood the ordinance prevailed not againſt it. 'Tis true, that at this day the merchant ſtranger doth pay three pence more in the pound for ſubſidie of poundage, then the Engliſh doth, and that by vertue of charta mercatoria. But let me tell you, that charta mercatoria in it ſelfe had not ſtrength and vertue ſufficient to ſubſiſt for ſo long a time. It was, as I have ſaid, ſuſpended by the king himſelf an. 3. condemned by the ordinance of 5. E. 2. and had at this day been of no more force, then it was all the time of Ed. 2. after 3°. that is, of none at all, had it not been confirmed by act of parliament an. 36 Ed. 3. cap.—. This was onely that which protected charta mercatoria againſt all thoſe ſtatutes made againſt impoſitions, and that hath kept it in life till this day; and this indeed, I mean an act of parliament, is the only means, that our law acknowledgeth, for the laying or eſtabliſhing of impoſitions, and without which they cannot long laſt.

You have now heard opened three of thoſe ſix preſidents, which are moſt relied upon for maintenance of theſe preſent impoſitions, which are all that have been urged, or can be found to have been practiſed from the Conqueſt till the reigne of Ed. 3. during which time there are, as you ſee, as many publique acts in oppoſition of them, which are of ſo much the more force, in that they are the legall regular acts of great counſells; whereas, on the contrary part, thoſe three impoſitions were the acts of powerfull kings wills, in the times of extream neceſſity. As for Ed. 2. his ſucceſſor, there hath not been one impoſition alledged to have been laid by him of one kinde or other. Nay, all the records touching this buſineſſe found in his time, being onely foure, make directly againſt them.

Edw. 2.

The firſt is anno 3. which was (as you have heard) a releaſe at the kings will, upon complaint of the commons, of the impoſitions raiſed by charta mercatoria.

The ſecond was the ordinance made an. 5. declaring charta mercatoria and all other impoſitions to be void, and inflicting puniſhment upon ſuch as ſhould demand any.

The third was an. 11. which is a ſuperſedeas to diſcharge certain commodities from yeelding an increaſe of cuſtome granted by merchants by way of loane, which in great probability the king would never have releaſed, but upon complaint. The rather I think ſo, becauſe, as the record recites, it was granted in a time of great neceſſity.

The fourth is an. 12. and is much of the ſame nature, the recitall of which contains ſome very obſervable things, which I will open unto you. It ſhewes firſt in very effectuall words the greatneſſe of the kings wants, and the cauſes thereof. The words are, Cum pro expeditione guerræ noſtræ Scotiæ, & aliis arduis neceſſitatibus nobis multipliciter incumbentibus, pro quarum exoneratione quaſi infinitam pecuniam profundere oportebit, pecunia plurimùm indigeamus in preſenti; ac inſuper, pro eo quod exitus regni & terræ noſtræ, ſimul cum pecunia nobis in ſubventionem præmiſſorum tam per clerum quam per communitatem regni noſtri conceſſa ad ſumptus predictos cum feſtinatione, qua expediret, faciend. non ſufficiunt. Here was cauſe, if any cauſe may poſſibly be juſt, for the king preſently to put in practiſe his prerogative of impoſitions. His expence by reaſon of a neceſſary warre in Scotland was ſo great, as the whole revenue of the kingdome, together with an ayd which had been lately granted him, could not with that expedition that was requiſite ſupply his preſent want. Doth hee for all this make uſe of his prerogative of impoſing? Or doth hee haſtily, for want of adviſed proceedings, take ſome other courſe prejudiciall to his right? No. The record further ſayes, that he enquired by all wayes and meanes, how he might moſt commodiouſly and fitly levy money for theſe occaſions. After which adviſed deliberation, the courſe at laſt reſolved upon was, not by abſolute power to lay impoſitions, which of all other courſes, if it had been lawfull, had been the moſt ſpeedy and beneficiall, but a courſe more juſtifiable; which was, that merchants ſhould be called together, and that they ſhould be intreated to lend the king upon every ſack of wooll 10. ſhillings, and upon every laſt of lether 5. ſhillings, above the ancient cuſtome; and that for their ſecurity of true repayment, without fiction or delay, which are the words of the record, whereby it ſeems that onely a pretence of a loane and repayment had been before that time uſed to colour impoſitions, commandment ſhould be given to the cuſtomers to certifie into the Exchequer the names of every particular merchant that ſhould ſo lend unto the king, that they might accordingly receive full ſatisfaction. And 'tis worth the obſerving, that this loane was for no longer time, then from April, till October following. Thus much is warranted by the record. So as you ſee, that in all this time of this king Ed. 2. impoſitions were not only altogether forborn even in the times of his greateſt neceſſity, but they were alſo condemned as unjuſt and utterly unlawfull.

We come now to the reigne of king Ed. 3. in whoſe time there was no practiſe or meanes, that by the policy of man could be thought on to bring the people under this yoke of impoſitions without aſſent of parliament, but it was by him attempted: inſomuch, as I have in my obſervation out of the records collected no leſſe then five or ſix ſeverall waies, all of them very colourable, which in his time were put in practiſe for the raiſing of impoſitions; and yet none of them but was reſiſted by parliament and condemned.

Impoſitions by way of grant of merchants.

That which was moſt uſuall with him was, that merchants ſhould grant to pay him ſo much upon every commodity exported or imported by way of increaſe of cuſtome. This ſeems not unreaſonable, for that every man might grant of his own what he liſted; and this alſo, to make it more colourable, was never attempted but in the time of warre. And yet, as it hath been partly ſaid already, this was alwayes held unlawfull, as may appeare by the record of 17 E. 3. where the commons in parliament ſay, that it is a great miſchiefe, and againſt reaſon, that they ſhould be enforced to pay the deerer for commodities, by reaſon of a charge upon merchandizes, by the grant of merchants, the which is a charge to the people, though none to the merchant. Anno 25. Edw. 3. the commons reciting, that whereas merchants have granted a new increaſe of cuſ-tome to the king, pray, that commiſſions to collect ſuch new increaſe of cuſtome by ſingular grant of merchants be not awarded. Anno 36 Ed. 3. cap. 11. amongſt the printed ſtatutes, grants of ſubſidies upon woolls by merchants without aſſent of parliament are declared to be void, which act was made upon a petition of the commons in anno 36 Ed. 3. deſiring a law to be made to the ſame effect. If impoſitions raiſed by the grant of merchants, which I ſuppoſe to have been by ſome publicke and ſolemne inſtrument, under the hands and ſeals of the principall merchants of all the great towns of England, being called together for that purpoſe, were not of force in this behalf, much leſſe was their bare aſſent without any ſuch ſolemnity, which alſo was a courſe in practiſe in the days of Ed. 3. and was alſo uſed in the laying of theſe preſent impoſitions, which wee now complaine of.

36 E. 3. No. 26. Ro. Parl.

Another meanes of raiſing impoſitions uſed by Ed. 3. was by way of diſpenſation for money with ſome ſtatute in force, which reſtrained the paſſage of merchants. Moſt of his impoſitions of one kinde or other, laid after 11 E. 3. were of this nature. For anno 11. cap. 1. amongſt the printed ſtatutes, you ſhall find it enacted, that no man upon paine of death, loſſe of lands and goods, ſhould export wools. Immediately after the making of this ſtatute, impoſitions by way of diſpenſations for money came to be ſo frequent and burdenſome, that the very yeere following the king, being in perſon to undertake a warre in Scotland, and for the raiſing of treaſure having laid heavy impoſitions in this kinde, which he perceived to be very burdenſome to the people, he wrote to the arch-biſhop of Canterbury. His letter is extant upon record, to this effect; that whereas the people were much burdened with divers charges, tallages, and impoſitions, which he could not mention but with much grief, but being enforced by inevitable neceſſity could not as yet eaſe the people of them, he required the arch-biſhop to exhort the people patiently and humbly to bear the burden for a while, and to excuſe him towards the people, hoping he ſhould ere long recompence his ſaid people, and give them comfort in due time. His neceſſities were nevertheleſſe ſo great, and this means of raiſing money was ſo colourable, ſeeing no man was compelled to pay, that did not himſelf deſire to be diſpenſed with, for the breach of a penal law, by which his life goods and lands were forfeited, as he ſpared not to lay on load in this kinde; inſomuch as you ſhall finde, that in an. 13. he took for diſpenſations to paſſe onely to Antwerp of Engliſhmen 40. ſhillings upon a ſack of wool, 40. ſhillings upon 300. woollfells, and 4. pound upon a laſt of leather; of ſtrangers 3. pound upon a ſack of wooll, 3. pound upon 300. woollfells, and 6. pound for a laſt of leather; whereas the ancient and due cuſtome was no more then 6. ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll, the like upon 300. woollfells, and 13. ſhillings 4 pence upon a laſt of leather. Immediately hereupon, even this very yeere, was this complained of in parliament, and a petition exhibited by the lords and commons, that it might be enacted, that this maletolt or impoſition, becauſe it was taken without aſſent of parliament, might be taken away, and that a law might be made, that no ſuch charge might be laid, but by aſſent of parliament. And they further prayed, that they might have a charter under the great ſeal, confirmed and enrolled in parliament, to the ſame effect, which was performed the next parliament, as may appeare by the ſtatutes printed, where, an. 14. Ed. 3. cap. 21. you ſhall ſee an act of parliament to this effect, and that a moſt effectuall one. And immediately after, follows the charter to the ſame effect, of both which I ſhall have more occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. But ſuch were the kings wants, that, even in the mean time between the petition and the making of the act, he could not forbeare to raiſe money by this meanes; for in an. 14. the eleventh day of March, in the end of which month the next parliament began, as may appeare by the preamble to the ſtatutes of that parliament, he tooke by way of diſpenſation 40. ſhillings upon a ſack of wool, when it ſhould be ſafely landed at Bruxells, and 40. ſhillings at the port within England, which was indeed an intollerable charge. But the better to colour it, the king, in his commiſſions for collection thereof, pretended, that the merchants had been humble ſuiters to him, that the paſſage for woolls might be open till Whitſontide following; and that to obtaine the ſame, they had of their free wills offered to give him the ſaid ſummes, as may appear by the recitall in the beginning of the ſaid record.

In further prevention of this miſchiefe, in an act of parliament printed, made an. 27. Ed. 3. cap. 2. there was a ſpeciall proviſion made againſt all licenſes to tranſport. Nevertheleſſe, as it may be collected by a record of the ſame yeere, the king raiſed 40. ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll, 40. ſhillings upon 300. woollfells, and 4. pound upon a laſt of leather, by the ſame means, I meane by way of diſpenſation. For though indeed it be recited to be granted by merchants, yet was it no otherwiſe granted by them, then for licenſes to tranſport; for at that time the ſtaple of wooll was in England, as may appeare by the printed ſtatute of 27. Ed. 3. cap. 1. and 2.

Orig. de Scac. 27. E. 3. Ro. 7.

27 Ed. 3. cap. 1 and 2.

And here I thinke it fit to make this obſervation in generall, that, whereas in ſome other of the records of Ed. 3. there is mention made of impoſitions upon woolls granted by merchants, becauſe the paſſage of woolls was in thoſe daies ſo often reſtrained by ſtatute, as may appeare by very many printed ſtatutes of that time, it is very likely, that theſe grants of merchants were alſo for diſpenſations to tranſport, as appears that this of 27. was; and it may well be, that ſome of the ſtatutes, being but temporary, were not committed to the preſſe. This kinde of impoſition, by way of diſpenſation, I finde not to have been at all practiſed from 27. till 39. where without any colouring of the matter, with pretence of the grant or gift of merchants, or any recitall of ſuite made by merchants to have the paſſage open, as uſually in former times, but plainly and aptly, the king recites, that whereas Engliſh merchants were by act of parliament reſtrained to tranſport woolls, nevertheleſſe, upon advice with his counſell, he thought fit to give leave, that ſuch as would might tranſport woolls, paying 46. ſhillings 8. pence upon a ſacke, which the king commandeth to be levied. This impoſition laſted a very little while; for the next parliament following, the ſubjects granted to the king a ſubſidie upon woolls woollfells and leather, to endure for a very ſhort time. And yet, as it appears by the words of the record, the king doth thank his people for it, with all his heart. At which time, for the maintenance of his warres in Scotland, he obtaineth the continuance thereof for two yeeres, at the end of which two yeeres he further obtaineth in parliament a continuance of the ſame from Michaelmas following, for three yeeres, for the ſupplie of treaſure for the warre. Two yeeres following, viz. in an. 45. the commons doubting, as it ſeemeth, that the king had ſecretly concluded to increaſe, by way of impoſition, this ſubſidie, which was yeelded to in parliament, and granted for three yeeres, made a conditionall petition, that if any impoſition be laid upon woolls wooll-fells or leather more then the ſubſidie granted in parliament, that it may be taken away. The king anſwereth, that if any be laid ſince the ſtatute, it ſhall be taken away; and then follows the printed ſtatute, an. 45. Ed. 3. cap. 4. that no impoſitions be laid upon woolls, wooll-fells, or leather; which is the firſt place where I finde impoſitions named in our printed books. I finde them firſt named upon my Latine record, 12. Ed. 3. in the kings letter to the archbiſhop; and firſt upon my record in French, not printed, an. 21. Ed. 3. Num. 16. Ro. Parliament.

Yet you ſhall finde an act of parliament for free paſſage an. 15. Ed. 3.

But to proceed. About a yeere following this parliament of 45. neere which time the ſubſidie granted an. 43. for three yeeres was expired, there was another ſubſidie of forty three ſhillings foure pence upon a ſack of wooll, as much upon twelve ſcore wooll-fells, and five pounds upon a laſt of leather, above the ancient cuſtomes, granted in parliament, for the maintainance of the warre in Guyen, to endure for two yeeres; for which, the king likewiſe gave thanks.

46. Ed. 3. No. 10. Ro. Parl.

The next yeere following, the ſubſidie granted the laſt parliament, was continued from Michaelmas for a yeere without any condition, and for the next yeere upon condition, amongſt other things, that no impoſition be laid during the two yeeres, and that the money levied be imployed upon the warres. In the next yeere following, the king took, as by the grant of merchants, upon a ſack of wool, of denizens fifty ſhillings, and of ſtrangers foure marks; upon 240. wooll-fells, of denizens fifty ſhillings, and of ſtrangers foure marks; and upon every laſt of leather, of denizens five pounds, and of ſtrangers eight marks. Though this record pretendeth nothing but the grant of merchants, yet it is upon the matter no other than a diſpenſation for ſo much money; for, at this time, the paſſage was not open, other than to Calliſe, where the ſtaple then was, as may appeare by the two records of 38. Ed. 3. Ro. Parl. & 50. Ed. 3. Num. 24. And yet you may ſee, how hatefull even theſe impoſitions by way of diſpenſation, which are farre more tollerable then our preſent impoſitions, were in thoſe dayes. For within two yeeres following, one Richard Lions, farmer of the cuſtomes, among other things laid to his charge, was accuſed in parliament for ſetting or procuring to be ſet new impoſitions, not ſhewing of what nature, without aſſent of parliament, and was adjudged to forfeit his goods and lands. But more particularly the lord Latymer, lord chamberlain of England, was expreſsly accuſed, that he combined with Richard Lions and others, who for their own profit had procured and counſelled the king to grant many licences for the tranſporting of great quantities of wooll beyond the ſeas, other then to the ſtaple at Calliſe, againſt divers ordinances and commandements to the contrary, and had put upon woolls and wool-fells new impoſitions. Here you ſee, that the device of diſpenſations for money had the name of an impoſition in thoſe dayes, though indeed it be not in its nature a meere impoſition, or at leaſt not ſuch a one as thoſe are which we complain of: but ſuch as it was, you ſee how from time to time it hath beene condemned, and how it is reckoned up amongſt the moſt hainous faults of thoſe two great offenders, who, though perhaps they were condemned alſo for other offences, yet the laying of theſe to their charge did ſhew the great hate generally conceived againſt impoſitions of this kinde. I might here further adde in proofe of the invalidity of theſe diſpenſations, that certain merchants, having obtained ſome of theſe, and having alſo the advantage of the kings proclamation to diſpenſe with the ſtatute which reſtrained their paſſage, yet they never thought themſelves ſecure from this puniſhment of the ſtatute, till they were provided for by act of parliament, as may appeare by a ſtatute printed anno 35 Ed. 3. cap. 21. To alledge therefore any of this kind, thereby to prove the lawfulnes of ours, cannot but argue a weak cauſe.

50 E. 3. No. Ro. Parl.

For firſt, as I have ſaid, there is farre more reaſon and colour for theſe, then for ours; for in this caſe no man was compelled to pay, that did it not to avoide a greater miſcheife; for by paying the impoſition, he was free from a grieveous puniſhment for breach of a penall law which reſtrained his paſſage; whereas in our caſe a charge is laid upon him for exerciſing his lawfull trade, where no ſtatute law or common law is to the contrary, but rather both the one and the other make for him.

But it may bee here objected, that the king may lawfully reſtraine, the breach of which reſtraint is a contempt and againſt law, and that to impoſe doth imply a reſtraint upon a penalty. Suppoſe it were ſo, yet, if in caſe where the reſtraint is not onely by the king, but the whole eſtate aſſembled in parliament, for ſome urgent cauſe, it be unlawful to give licenſe for money, as you perceive it is, how much more is it ſo, where the reſtraint is for no other purpoſe then to raiſe an impoſition, as in our caſe? But of this more largely hereafter.

Another device of raiſing impoſitions without aſſent of the commons in parliament, practiſed by Ed. 3. was by way of ordinance, which indeed is in the next degree of ſtrength unto a ſtatute. For it is a conſtitution made by the king himſelfe, and all the prelates, earls, and barons, not at the counſell table, or in the kings chamber, but ſitting ſolemnly in parliament, and hath alſo the like ſolemnity of inrolement that a ſtatute hath, onely it is enrolled in a roll by it ſelfe, which hath the name of the roll of the ordinances. But the only eſſentiall difference between this and an act of parliament is, that this hath not the aſſent of the commons.

Some ordinances have had that eſtimation amongſt us, that they have at this day the force of ſtatutes; as the ordinance of Merton, made 20 Hen. 3. which, though it were no other then an ordinance made by the king the prelates earls and barons, without aſſent of the commons, yet hath it by continuance of time gotten not onely the ſtrength, but the name alſo of a ſtatute. There be ſome others of this nature, and we finde it uſuall, that the names of ſtatutes and ordinances have been indifferently and confuſedly uſed to expreſſe the one or the other. So as there was not any other more probable deviſe or invention to have brought the people under the yoake of impoſition, without their own aſſent, then was this, by the way of ordinance. Nay, to adde yet a further ſtrength to this high authority of an ordinance in parliament, the aſſent alſo of merchants was uſually joyned therewithall, to make it have the cleerer paſſage with the ſubject; and further it was never, but in the time of warre.

7 Ed. 3. R. 9. Orig. de Scac.

The firſt impoſition of this kinde by way of ordinance, which I finde amongſt the records, was 7 E. 3. amongſt the originals of the Exchequer, where it is ſaid by way of recitall, that the king conſidering how merchants, which make great gaine by trading, ought as well as others to aſſiſt him with treaſure for his warre, eſpecially conſidering how at their intreaty he had placed the ſtaple in England; therefore at his parliament held at Yorke, by the prelates earls and barons it was ordained, that the merchants ſhould yeeld unto the king a ſubſidie upon merchandizes. This ſubſidie or rather impoſition, thus ſolemnly ordained, and in the times of ſo great neceſſity, was no ſooner eſtabliſhed then revoked, as may appear by the words immediately following in the ſame record, whereupon the merchants of their own accords yeelded, and freely gave ten ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll, as much upon three hundred woolfells, and twenty ſhillings upon a laſt of leather, for a ſhort time, by way of diſpenſation or licence, towards the maintenance of the warre.

20 Ed 3. Nu. 78. Ro. Parl.

The like is found anno 20 E. 3. where the commons complaining of an impoſition of this kinde, laid by the prelates earls and barons in parliament, and by the agreement alſo of merchants, it was not denyed unto them, but that their ſuit was juſt. Onely it was anſwered them, that as yet it was not convenient to take it away; for that the king had taken up great ſummes of money of divers merchants, for his preſent neceſſity, to be repayed out of the ſaid ſubſidie, and therefore it could not be as yet diſcharged without great damage to the king and the merchants. But the moſt materiall record, againſt impoſitions by way of ordinance, is the yeere following, where the king, in excuſe of impoſitions complained of, anſwereth, that they were laid in times of great neceſſity, and by the aſſent of the prelates, earles, and barons, and other great men, and ſome of the commons then preſent; neverthleſſe his pleaſure is, that ſuch impoſitions, not duly laid, be not drawn into conſequence, but taken away, 21 E. 3. No. 17.

There are ſome others of this kinde, but never any that did abide the triall, though they have alwayes been accompanied with all ſuch circumſtances, as were moſt likely to give them paſſage without controllment; as to be laid in the time of warre, to be limited to a ſhort time, with conſent of merchants. If the authoritie of an ordinance in parliament, joyned with the aſſent of merchants, were in thoſe dayes not of force ſufficient to uphold impoſitions, much leſſe will an order of the king and his counſell out of parliament uphold them at this day, eſpecially after ſo many yeeres diſcontinuance.

Impoſitions rayſed by way of loane by merchants.

Another invention to raiſe impoſitions, practiſed by Ed. 3. and in former times, was by way of a pretended or feigned loane from the merchants, of ſo much above the old cuſtome upon merchandiſe exported or imported, which loane was never repaid to the merchant. That this was an old practiſe, may be collected by the preſident, 12 of Ed. 2. already cited, where the king promiſeth, that without fiction or delay he would repay them their money; implying thereby, that ſometimes fiction had been uſed: and doubtleſſe that loane which was 11 Ed. 2. the very yeere before, was ſuch a fained loane as I ſpeake of; for otherwiſe, without queſtion, the king would not have releaſed part of it, as may appeare by that record that he did. For if the money be, bona fide, borrowed, and truly intended to be repaid, then doubtleſſe the courſe is lawfull; if otherwiſe, I hold this kinde alſo as unlawfull as any of the reſt.

Edward the third did once or twice borrow in this kinde, as may appeare by records already cited to another purpoſe, with which I will not againe trouble you.

Impoſitions raiſed by grant of merchants, for liberties granted to them.

There was yet another device for raiſing of impoſitions, begun indeed by Ed. 1. and condemned in the time of Ed. 2. but revived, and much practiſed by Ed. 3. which was alſo by way of grant of merchants, and yet not altogether the ſame that I firſt obſerved to have been ſo much practiſed by Ed. 2. but is much more colourable and tollerable. For whereas that was a grant, or rather a meere guiſt, without any thing granted back againe in lieu thereof; this, I now ſpeake of, is a ſolemne grant indeed, made by merchants, of an increaſe of cuſtome, for liberties and freedoms, and other valuable priviledges and exemptions, granted unto them by the king. That former was date nihil expectantes. This is, date & dabitur vobis. And indeed the recompence that the merchants had by this charter granted unto them, made their grant to the king leſſe ſubject to controll, then otherwiſe without ſuch recompence it would have been. I mean the grant of merchant ſtrangers, ſo often remembered amongſt us by the name of charta mercatoria, which though it were damned all the time of Ed. 2. from the third yeere of his reign, yet was it revived by E. 3. even that very yeere, when he likewiſe depoſed the king his father, and uſurped to himſelf his crown. For it appeares by the records, that he commanded the ſame to be levied the very firſt yeere of his reigne. What hath been ſaid againſt this kind of impoſition, I ſhall not need here againe to repeate, only let me call to your remembrance, how this charter, as needing a better prop then his owne ſtrength, and validity in law, was in the ſame kings reigne confirmed by parliament, and onely by that ſtrength continueth in force at this day.

1. Ed. 3. Ro. Fin.

You have heard five or ſixe ſeverall politique inventions and devices for the eaſie drawing on and ſweetning of this yoak of impoſitions, all practiſed by this prudent and potent king, Ed. 3. whoſe times were indeed ſo troubleſom, and his charge every way ſo exceſſive, as it is no marvell, that he left not any way unattempted to raiſe money, without the aſſent of the commons, whom he always found unwillingly and hardly drawne to matters of charge.

Impoſitions laid by expreſſe and direct commandment.

One other way of impoſitions he uſed, not coloured or maſked under any ſuch pretence, or politick invention, as you have heard, but plain and direct, only his owne expreſſe commandment to his officers, to collect of every merchant ſo much for ſuch a commoditie, exported or imported, and to anſwere it into his Exchequer, without any recitall in his commiſſions, of grant, aſſent, guift, loane of merchants, diſpenſation, or ordinance in parliament, or any other ſuch colourable pretext whatſoever.

Theſe indeed, and only theſe, are meer impoſitions, and may be aptly compared with theſe of our times. Of this kind, amongſt all the records of Edward the third's time, I find only two, which I will truly open unto you. The firſt is in the twenty-one of his reigne, where it appears, that Lionell, afterwards duke of Clarence, named upon the record Lionell of Antwerp, becauſe I ſuppoſe he was there borne, the kings ſecond ſonne being then guardian of England, whileſt the king his father was at the ſiege of Calliſe, at a counſell by him held the ſame yeere, which I take to be no other then the privie counſell, aſſeſſed without aſſent of parliament, upon every ſack of wooll two ſhillings, upon every tun of wine two ſhillings, upon every pound of aver de poys of merchandizes imported ſix-pence. This impoſition was, I muſt confeſſe, for ought I know to the contrary, ſuch as our preſent impoſitions are; I mean, in that it was impoſed onely and ſimply by the kings abſolute power, and may in that reſpect be the fourth, of that number of ſixe, which I told you were all that could be found in any degree like to ours, ever to have been practiſed in this commonwealth, from the Conqueſt till queene Maries time. But though in the authoritie of impoſing it be like, yet in circumſtances very materiall you ſhall find an apparent difference between them.

21 Ed 3. No. 11. Ro. Par.

Poundage impoſed.

Firſt, this impoſition is very moderate in the ſum, as you may perceive; for it was but two ſhillings upon a ſack; whereas in 13. Ed. 3. forty ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll was uſuall, and ſometimes fifty ſhillings.

Secondly, it was to continue no longer then till Michaelmas following.

Thirdly, it was laid in the time of a moſt chargeable warre, and ordained to be imployed for the maintenance of ſhips of warre at ſea, for the ſafeguard of merchants in their paſſage, of which it is apparent there was at this inſtant very great neceſſitie; for it was, as I have ſaid, impoſed then, when king Ed. 3. lay at the ſiege of Calliſe.

Beſides, ſuch as it was, and ſo qualified as you perceive, it was neverthleſſe complained of in parliament, by a petition from the commons, as may appeare by the records of the ſame of 21. Edward the third. To which petition or complaint this anſwere was given, that all the ſaid impoſitions were already taken away, ſave only the two ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll, which ſhould laſt no longer then Eaſter; and ſeeing the ſame was ordained for the ſafeguard of merchants, in which there had been greater ſums of money expended by the king, then could be collected between that and Michaelmas, therefore to continue the ſame till Eaſter; he hoped it would not ſeem over-burdenſome or grieveous unto them. In the parliament following, viz. anno 22. the commons pray, that writs may bee directed to the cuſtomers to forbeare at Eaſter next to take the two ſhillings upon a ſack, according as it was granted at the firſt parliament, and that it be not any longer continued by the procurement of any merchant. The king anſwereth, let it ceaſe at Eaſter, as it was agreed the laſt parliament.

22 E 3. N. 16. Ro. Parl.

Here you ſee it was abſolutely taken away; and therefore though it had wanted theſe qualifications and circumſtances which I have obſerved it had, yet, it being a thing ſo publiquely condemned, it ought to be of little force with you to juſtifie theſe preſent impoſitions. But that which I obſerve out of this laſt record, maketh me rather to incline, that this impoſition was onely by way of diſpenſation, then that it was an abſolute impoſition, ſuch as ours are. For to what end, I pray you, ſhould the commons pray that it might not be any longer continued by the procurement of any merchant, except it were likely that merchants for their benefit ſhould pray the longer continuance thereof; and what benefit can any impoſition whatſoever bee to a merchant, except it bee by way of diſpenſation to give him leave to trade, where before ſuch diſpenſation given he ſtood altogether reſtrained? If then it be an impoſition by way of diſpenſation with a penall ſtatute of reſtraint, then is it no preſident for our preſent impoſitions. But whether or no it be a diſpenſation or abſolute impoſition, I leave t to your judgements. You have heard my obſervation.

And ſo I come to the next preſident in the times of Ed. 3. produced for maintenance of our impoſitions, which was in the 24 yeere of his reigne, the record of which and that which followed thereupon, I will, without any inforcement at all, open unto you, and ſo leave it to your cenſures. The king reciting, that whereas the Spanyard and French had joyned in league to make warre againſt him, and that for the withſtanding of his ſaid adverſaries, as alſo for the ſafeguard of merchants againſt pirates, he had ordained, that certaine ſhips ſhould be ſet forth, and that for maintenance of the ſaid ſhips there ſhould be paid by merchants two ſhillings for every ſack of wooll, two ſhillings for three hundred woolfells, foure ſhillings for a laſt of leather, a ſcute of gold, or foure ſhillings for a tunne of wine, and ſixpence of the pound upon all other merchandizes for one yeere following; he commandeth his cuſtomers to levy the ſame accordingly.

Poundage impoſed.

25 E. 3. N. 12. Rot. Par.

The very next yeere and parliament following, the commons exhibite a petition in parliament againſt impoſitions and other like charges, without aſſent of parliament: to which anſwer is given, that it is not the kings intention they ſhould be charged.

I have now gone through all the materiall records here amongſt us, of the times of Ed. 3. in which, though his reigne were very long, and by reaſon of his warres, and other exceſſive charge, more occaſion was given him to try the ſtrength of this point of the prerogative, then ever any king before or ſince; though oftentimes, and by many politicke inventions, as you have heard, he attempted to eſtabliſh this prerogative, of laying impoſitions without aſſent in parliament; yet can there not be produced in all his time, any more then two preſidents of impoſitions like to theſe of ours; that is, impoſed by the kings abſolute authority. And yet theſe two were alſo, as you perceive, qualified with ſuch circumſtances, as, if ours were ſuch, we ſhould have held them tolerable, though perhaps not lawfull. Yet they, ſuch as they were, eſcaped not without being complained of, and condemned alſo in parliament, as you have heard.

It may perhaps be, that ſome one or two of theſe impoſitions, which were by aſſent or grant of merchants in this time of Ed. 3. were in times when the paſſage was open, and not reſtrained by act of parliament, and ſo to be compared to our impoſitions. But whoſoever ſhall, by looking over the ſtatutes and records with never ſo much heed, conſider the times of opening and ſhutting of the ſea by ſtatutes, ſhall finde it ſo intricate, as hee ſhall bee very hardly able directly to ſay, that, at the time when any of theſe impoſitions were granted, the paſſage was open.

If in my obſervation I had found any ſuch, I ſhould have admitted it for an abſolute impoſition, as I have done charta mercatoria, which was by grant of merchants; for certainly, as I have yeelded, the grant of merchants is in this caſe of no other effect, then the declaration only of their aſſent; and the impoſition reſteth meerly upon the king's authority. But I finde none ſuch. If any ſuch could be produced, you have heard, how they have beene from time to time controlled in parliament.

And ſo I paſſe from E. 3. to the times following. From the end of the reign of E. 3. till the reign of queen Mary, who was the eleventh prince of this realme after Ed. 3. (as Ed. 3. was the eleventh after the Conqueſt) being the ſpace of 170. yeeres or thereabouts, it hath been confeſſed by all thoſe that have argued in maintenance of his majeſties right to impoſe, that there hath not been found one record that proves any one impoſition to have been laid. There are indeed in our printed bookes ſome three or foure ſtatutes during that time, in which mention is made of impoſitions. But they are, as I ſhall prove, impoſitions of another nature then thoſe are which we complaine of; and ſo make nothing at all to the proofe of his majeſties right: or if they were ſuch as ours are, yet are they no where found mentioned but with diſgrace, and to the end to be taken away; which may be the reaſon, that notwithſtanding the great uſe that might have been made of three or foure preſidents of impoſitions in theſe times, for the patching up of a continuance of the practiſe, which otherwiſe by this long diſcontinuance receives a great blemiſh; thoſe which argued for impoſitions did not take hold of theſe, but choſe rather to confeſſe, that no impoſitions at all were laid during all this time, and labored to ſeek out the reaſons of the diſcontinuance.

11 R. 2. cap. 9. Statutes in which there is mention made of impoſitions after the end of Ed the thirds raigne untill Qu. Maries.

I will briefely ſhew you what ſtatutes they are, during that time, which mention impoſitions. The firſt is 11 R. 2. cap. 9. No impoſition nor charge ſhall be put upon woolls, leather, or woollfells, other than the cuſtome and ſubſidie granted to the king this preſent parliament; and if any be, the ſame ſhall be repealed and annulled, as it was another time ordained by ſtatute, ſaving alway to the king his ancient right. If by this ſaving the pretended right of impoſing ſhould be excepted, as was ſaid in the Exchequer, the ſaving ſhould then be contrary to the body of the act; and therefore it muſt needs have ſome other interpretation, that it may ſtand with the reſt of the act, and not condemn the law makers of ſo much want of diſcretion. Therefore doubtleſſe this (ſaving) is no other then an exception of the ancient rightfull cuſtomes, due upon thoſe ſtaple commodities. And for my part I am of opinion, that the ſtatute was made, not ſo much to take away any impoſition laid by this king R. 2. as out of a provident and prudent care in the law makers, proceeding from the freſh memory of the practiſe of Ed. 3. in this kinde; for all thoſe that were of this parliament, did live and were at mans age in Ed. 3. time, and could not but well remember the grievouſnes of his impoſitions. Beſides, I obſerve, that they deſire, that no impoſition be laid by way of addition to the ſubſidie upon woolls and leather then granted. It was never heard till of late, that an impoſition upon any merchandize was charged at the ſame time with a ſubſidie; and therefore without queſtion, this was no other then an aboundant proviſion by them, wherein they were no more carefull then any wiſe man would be in the like caſe. When they had of their own free wills given the king a liberall gift, they were carefull not to be further charged by him.

23 H. 6. cap. 18.

The next ſtatute in theſe times, where impoſitions are found mentioned, is, 23 H. 6. cap. 18. By which it appeares, that Engliſh merchants, being reſtrained from repayring to Gaſcoigne and Guien, to buy the wines of that country, they were neverthleſſe ſuffered to repaire thither paying certaine new impoſitions, which were demanded of them. Upon complaint hereof, it was enacted, that all Engliſh merchants might freely paſſe into thoſe parts, and buy wines there at their pleaſure, without any new impoſition or charge to be put upon them; for that ſuch impoſitions were to the damage of merchants, and to the hinderance of all the kings people: if any were demanded by the kings officers, the officers ſo demanding them ſhould forfeit twenty pound, beſides treble damages, to the party grieved.

27 E. 3. c. 6. 38 Ed. 3 c. 10. and 38 Ed 3. cap. 42 E. 3 c. 8. 43 E. 3 c. 12.

That theſe impoſitions were by way of diſpenſation with a ſtatute, which reſtrained the repaire of Engliſh merchants into thoſe parts, and not by the kings abſolute power, thereupon to ground an impoſition, is evident by the ſtatutes in print. For from 27 Ed. 3. till this, 23 H. 6. there are five or ſix ſtatutes in print to this purpoſe, ſome more ſtrict then other, which continued in force till 23 H. 6. The reaſon of the reſtraint by Ed. 3. I ſuppoſe to have been; becauſe Gaſcoigne and Guien were then in his poſſeſſion, and he was deſirous his ſubjects, the merchants of thoſe countries, ſhould have the ſole profit of their own commodities; and that they onely ſhould import them into England, and not the merchants of England. Whatſoever the cauſe of the reſtraint was, it is very cleer the reſtraint was by ſtatute, and that this impoſition raiſed by way of diſpenſation was condemned; which neverthleſſe, ſuppoſe it had not been controled, yet, as I have ſaid oftentimes, it is in nature ſo farre differing from ours, as the practiſe thereof will not ſo much as help to ſalve this long diſcontinuance.

1 R. 3. cap. 12.

The next mention of impoſitions is found 1 R. 3. cap. 12. The words are, the ſubjects and cominality of this realme ſhall not from henceforth be charged by any ſuch charge or impoſition called a benevolence, nor by ſuch like charge. You perceive by the words of the ſtatute, what impoſitions are intended within that ſtatute.

7 H. 7. cap. 7.

The next mention of impoſitions in theſe times, I finde to be, 7 H. 7. where a charge of eighteen ſhillings, laid upon a butt of malmeſie by parliament, is called an impoſition.

12 H. 7. cap. 6.

Another mention of impoſitions, I finde to be, 12 H. 7. cap. 6. In the preamble of the ſtatute the words are, that every perſon ought to uſe himſelfe to his moſt advantage, without exaction, fine, impoſition or contribution to be had, or taken of him, to, or by any Engliſh perſon, or perſons.

Though ſome, that have argued before me againſt impoſitions, have urged this ſtatute, as making againſt our preſent impoſitions, yet for my part, I am not of that opinion, but upon peruſing the ſtatute, doe rather thinke, that it extendeth only to impoſitions laid by the merchants of London, upon the merchants of other cities and townes not incorporate into their companies, as will evidently appeare by the ſtatute: ſo as notwithſtanding this ſtatute, that which I have averred, and hath been yeelded to by the kings counſell, that no impoſition was laid from Ed. 3. to queene Maries reigne, is not yet impeached.

14 H. 8. cap. 4.

There is yet one other ſtatute of later time, in which mention is made of impoſitions, and that is 14. H. 8. cap. 4. The words are, every ſubject borne in England, and ſworne to be ſubjects of other princes, as long as they ſhall ſo abide ſubjects to the other princes, ſhall pay ſuch cuſtoms, ſubſidies, tolls, and other impoſitions, within this realme, as ſtrangers doe. I hold that this word impoſitions, in this place, is uſed as a generall to all the particulars before mentioned, and no otherwiſe, and is no more in effect then charges; a thing uſuall in ſtatutes of this nature, to adde generall words for the more ſecuritie, which I collect by the word (other) going next before it: for to what end ſhould it be ſaid, no (other) impoſitions, if thoſe particulars firſt named, were not contained within that generall word of impoſitions? This word (other) is a relative, and muſt needs be anſwered with words going before, when there are no other words following.

7 H. 7. c. 7.

The ſignification of the words maltolt, and impoſition, or impoſt.

Beſides, it is common in the ſtatutes and records of Ed. 3. No impoſition upon wools ſhall be laid, but in parliament; by which it appears, that a charge laid by parliament may be called an impoſition; which is very evident by a ſtatute made not above 28 yeeres before this, I meane the ſtatute of 7. H. 7. cap. 7. which I ſpake of even now, where a charge of eighteen ſhillings upon a butt of malmſey, laid by that act of parliament, is called an impoſition; and as I have ſhewed you, the word impoſition hath been applyed to all theſe ſeverall inventions, uſed by Ed. 3. for the charging of merchandizes. Nay, the word maltolt, which is Engliſhed by Raſtall an evill toll, as indeed it ſignifies, and in that reſpect is of a farre harder ſenſe then the word impoſition, is uſed indifferently for a charge ſet by parliament, or a charge ſet by the kings abſolute power upon merchandizes.

No impoſition laid, from Ed. the thirds time, till Q. Maries.

What great occaſions all the kings from Ed. 3. till Q. Marie had to lay impoſitions, and yet did it not.

Impoſitio, derived from the verbe imponere, is no other then the act of laying on, or impoſing; and therefore in my opinion, impoſitions are more properly by the merchants called impoſts, which ſignifieth the things impoſed. But I ſhall not need any further to enforce this, conſidering it hath ſo liberally been confeſſed by the kings counſell, that there is no record or ſtatute from Ed. 3. till queen Maries reigne, that giveth any aſſurance that impoſitions, or ſo much as any one impoſition was laid, during all that ſpace of above 170. yeers. Only it behoves me for further opening the truth, to teſtifie, that, being one of thoſe that were by you imployed to make ſearch in the ancient cuſtome books of thoſe times remaining in the Exchequer, together with ſome of the beſt experienced merchants of this houſe, ſome of which had ſate at the receipt of cuſtome, wee had many meetings, and ſpent many whole dayes in turning over the old cuſtome books, and as carefully as we could did ſurvey ſome books of every age and time; but after all our ſearch ended, could not finde any one impoſition from the time of Ed. 3. till queen Maries reigne, to have been received by any cuſtomer or collector. And if you pleaſe to give me leave to remember to you the paſſages of thoſe times, you cannot but marvell, that none of all thoſe princes ſhould ſo much as attempt to trie the ſtrength of this ſo beneficiall a prerogative, ſo much practiſed by Ed. 3. and when you have heard their occaſions, and compared their other actions with their forbearance in this kinde, you will, I think, conclude, and ſay in your hearts, that ſurely none of all thoſe kings had ſo much as any imagination, that any ſuch prerogative belonged unto them, as to raiſe money at their pleaſure, by laying a charge upon merchandizes to be exported or imported, without aſſent in parliament.

Richard 2.

Richard the ſecond, being the grand-childe and next ſucceſſor of Ed. 3. in whoſe times impoſitions of all ſorts did ſo much rage, had little leſſe occaſion then his predeceſſor had. For firſt, he had little treaſure left him, and he was no ſooner in his throne, but news was brought that the French had invaded the realme. They had burned Rye and Haſtings in Suſſex, they had taken and poſſeſſed the Ile of Wight, they had beſieged Winchelſey. From the northern parts, the Scots had burned Roxborough, and were ready to overrunne all the north parts of England. Being thus beſet with warre on all ſides, doth his counſell, which in all likelyhood had moſt of them been of counſell to his grandfather, adviſe him to raiſe money by impoſitions, as his grandfather had done (for this courſe of raiſing money by way of impoſitions, was yet freſh in all their memories)? They do not, but he taketh the ordinary courſe, by calling a parliament, which for mainteinance of his charge in the war, the ſecond yeere of his reign, granteth him a fifteenth. He calleth another parliament, and hath another fifteenth granted, the fourth yeere of his reigne. The warres increaſing, his neceſſities were ſuch, and ſo conceived by the parliament, as they granted him a moſt unuſuall taxe throughout the whole kingdome, upon every eccleſiaſticall perſon, one and other, ſixe ſhillings eight pence; upon every other man or woman within the realm, four pence; which when it came to be levied, cauſed (though cauſeleſly, becauſe it was legally granted) that notorious rebellion, of which Wat Tyler was the captaine. This taxe, as it was levied not without that great rebellion, ſo queſtionleſſe was it unwillingly yeelded to in parliament; and yet becauſe there was no other courſe thought lawfull for the raiſing of treaſure upon the ſubjects goods, then by their own aſſent in parliament, onely that courſe was thought fit to be practiſed, which was ſuch as ought to be obeyed.

From the 5. to the 18. yeere of his reigne, he obtained every other yeere one aide or other in parliament; ſometimes a taxe, ſometimes a fifteenth, ſometimes a ſubſidie of tonnage and poundage. In the eighteenth yeere, he was inforced to go in perſon into Ireland, to ſettle the ſtate of that country, then in rebellion. All theſe troubles he had from abroade, beſides thoſe famous rebellions here at home, which afterwards caſt him out of his ſeat; yet did he never for all this attempt to lay impoſitions, though he wanted not about him to put him in minde of his abſolute power. For Edward Strafford, biſhop of Exeter, lord chancellor of England, in a ſermon made to the parliament held anno 21. as our chronicles report, did publiquely maintain, that the king was not bound by any law, but was of himſelf abſolute and above law, and that to controle any of his actions was an offence worthy of death; at which parliament all that were preſent came armed, for fear of the king; and the parliament houſe it ſelfe was beſet with 4000. archers by his appointment. I will ſpeak no more of him then this. Though he were a king of a weak ſpirit, yet did he not ſpare to practiſe upon his people the moſt grievous things that were; inſomuch that he ſo farre diſcontented them that they depoſed him by common conſent in parliament, the onely deſperate example of that kinde that our hiſtories doe afford, or I hope ever ſhall.

Henry 4.

His ſucceſſor Henry the fourth, in reſpect he held the crown by ſo weak a title, had cauſe to give the people all the content he could poſſible. And yet he was ſo oppreſſed with warres on all ſides, from France and Scotland, but eſpecially by continuall and dangerous invaſions made by the Welſh, as without the aide of his people for the ſupply of his treaſure, it had not been poſſible for him to have held his crown on his head. And therefore he preſſed his people ſo farre, that in a parliament held the fifth yeere of his reigne, they yeelded to him ſo great and ſo unaccuſtomed a tax, as that the grantors thereof, as our chroniclers ſay, tooke ſpeciall order, that no memory thereof ſhould remaine of record onely to avoide the preſident; and yet the very next yeere following, his wants were againe grown ſo great, as his ſubjects, being aſſembled in parliament to give him further ayde, did reſolve, that there was no other way to ſupply his want, then to take from the clergie their temporall lands and goods, and to give them all to the king; which being withſtood by the clergie, a reſumption of all the gifts of Ed. 3. and Ric. 2. was propounded. At laſt, after they had ſate a whole yeere, they gave him two fifteenths. At this time, moſt of his counſell and the great officers of the kingdome were ſpirituall men. Had they not now, if ever, a juſt occaſion given them to have put the king in minde of his prerogative of laying impoſitions, not onely to the intent to have diverted him from the harkning to that deſperate motion, that had been made againſt them to all their utter undoings; but were they not alſo bound in duty and conſcience, in this time of ſo great neceſſitie, ſeeing the parliament knew not otherwiſe how to ſupplie the kings wants, to have adviſed him to have made uſe of his lawfull right of impoſing; by which means, he might, without troubling the parliament, quickly have raiſed great ſummes of money? Certainly it was not, becauſe they were ignorant of any ſuch practiſe in former times; for none of them that were then of the counſell to Henry the fourth, but they lived in Ed. 3. time; and moſt of them, doubtleſſe, were in Ed. 3. time men of age and diſcretion. But in all likelyhood as they knew that Edward the third did lay impoſitions, ſo likewiſe they knew, that impoſitions had been from time to time, in thoſe daies, condemned as unlawfull, and were become hatefull to the people; and onely for that reaſon they did forbeare to adviſe the king to take that courſe, though the neceſſitie were never ſo great.

Another prerogative, as much concerning the intereſt of the ſubject as this of impoſitions, namely the abaſing of coyne, this king made no ſcruple at all to put in practiſe, becauſe he held it to be lawfull.

Hen. 5.

His ſonne, and next ſucceſſor, Hen. 5. who, by his many victories over the French, and his noble diſpoſition and behaviour towards his people, was ſo farre beloved of them, as never was king of this realme more, though the kingdome were now, by one degree of diſcent, more firmely ſetled upon him then it was on his father, who uſurped it; though alſo his expence of treaſure, by reaſon of that great warre in France, were as much, as any king's of England ever were; though he had troubles alſo from his neighbours the Scots, and within his owne realme by rebellions; and laſtly, though he ſpared not, for ſupplie of treaſure, to ſuppreſſe above a 100. priories of aliens; yet neither out of the ſtrength of his love with the people, nor in his extreame neceſſity, by reaſon of theſe honorable warres in France, for the maintenance of which the people would willingly have undergone any burden which he would have laid upon them, eſpecially after the victory at Agencourt, did he ever ſo much as attempt the laying of impoſitions.

Hen. 6.

His ſucceſſor Hen. 6. though indeed of a meek ſpirit, yet he was ſo followed with troubles within the realme, and from abroad, that he was inforced to crave ſuch an extraordinary aide of his ſubjects in parliament, as the levying thereof was the cauſe of that famous rebellion of Jack Cade in his time. Beſides, in the 18 yeere of his reigne, for the eaſe of his charge and ſupply of his wants, all grants by him made, of any lands, rents, annuities, or fees whatſoever, ſince the firſt day of his reigne, were reſumed: and this is never yeelded to, but in caſes of extreame neceſſity. As for impoſitions, notwithſtanding his great wants, he thought not of them.

Edw. 4.

Edw. 4. that ſucceeded him, was no leſſe free from troubles; for he was, as you know, driven to forſake his kingdome, and to live for a while like a baniſhed man with the duke of Burgundy. He was alſo inforced in the 5 yeere of his reigne to make a reſumption; and the ſame yeere to abaſe his coyne. And Comines obſerveth of him, that he obtained a ſubſidie of his ſubjects in parliament, upon condition that he ſhould himſelfe in perſon undertake the war in France; and that only to get the ſubſidie, he paſſed the ſeas into France, but preſently returned without doing any thing. What ſhould ſuch ſhifts as theſe have needed, if he might, without being beholding to his ſubjects, lawfully and without controll have raiſed treaſure by laying of impoſitions? It is well worth the remembring, that which the ſame Comines, ſpeaking in commendation of the frame of this common-wealth, ſaith, that this ſtate is happy, in that the people cannot be compelled by the king to ſuſtein any publique charge, except it be by their own conſent in parliament.

Hen. 7.

H. 7. had a ſubſidy of tunnage and poundage granted to him for his life, as may appear by the Parl. Roll 1 H. 7. which appeares no where in our printed books.

I proceed from Ed. 4. to Hen. 7. omitting Ed. 5. and Ric. 3. becauſe of the ſhortnes of their reignes. Hen. 7. had indeed a more peaceable time than any of his predeceſſors; and yet he was not altogether free from troubles, both within the realme and from abroad. But his naturall inclination was rather to embrace peace. He was ſo provident and politique in the gathering and ſtoring up of treaſure, as never any prince of this realme was therein to be compared to him. He did himſelfe take the accounts of his revenues, which I have ſeen under his own hand. He had for his aſſiſtants about him Empſon and Dudley, men learned in the lawes, and by all probability very cunning in all the profitable points of the prerogative; men that intended or ſtudied little elſe than the advancing of their maſters profit; men even till this day infamous for their wicked counſell, in perſwading that good king to lay ſuch heavy exactions and burdens upon his people as he did. If theſe men, who in all likelihood ſhould have beſt knowne the kings right, eſpecially in ſo high a point of profit, had but had the leaſt notice of ſo profitable a prerogative as this, would they not have been at ſtrife which of them ſhould firſt have put the king in minde thereof? Or if they had held it queſtionable, would they not have put it to ſome triall? Certainly there can be no cauſe imagined, that ſhould make them thus to forbeare, but either they were utterly ignorant of any ſuch prerogative; or, that knowing ſuch a thing to be claimed by ſome of the ancient kings, eſpecially by Ed. 3. they knew likewiſe, that it was in the ſame times continually complained of in parliament, and alwayes condemned; and that there were acts of parliament directly againſt it. And this is more probably to bee conceived of them, being men of ſuch ſearching ſpirits, and ſo well ſtudied in point of prerogative, then that they were ignorant of the practiſe of Ed. 3. conſidering alſo that they were neerer to thoſe times by 120 yeeres then wee are.

But that which moſt of all moves me herein is, that there was in H. 7. time ſuch an occaſion offered of making uſe of this prerogative, as there could not poſſibly happen any other that might better have juſtified the laying of impoſitions, which was this. The Venetians, to the intent to drive our merchants from fetching ſweet wines at Candy, that they might the better imploy their owne ſhips and merchants, did impoſe upon every butt of malmeſey brought thence by Engliſh merchants foure duccats; by which means the Engliſh wholly loſt that trade, and the Venetians made the whole profit thereof. This miſchiefe was no other way better to be remedied, than by impoſing the like, or a greater charge upon merchants of Candy bringing malmeſey into England; that ſo they of Candy not being able to afford them better cheape than the Engliſh, the Engliſh might ſtill fetch them from Candy, as they had wont to doe. I ſay, there could not poſſibly be a more juſtifiable occaſion of laying impoſitions, than this was. And did this king, ſo carefull in other things of preſerving his prerogative, and moſt of all in matters that concerned his profit, take hold of this occaſion to lay an impoſition by his abſolute power? Nay rather, though he ſaw it convenient, and in a manner neceſſary, yet he conceived it to be unlawfull ſo to do; and therefore did it not by his abſolute power, but by aſſent of parliament, as may appeare by the ſtatute of 7 Hen. 7. cap. 7. printed; where, in the preamble of the act, you ſhall ſee the occaſion of the making of the act to be as I have opened it unto you: and you may perceive by the body of the act, that for the counterpoyſing of the impoſition of foure duccats laid by the Venetians upon our merchants, there was impoſed 18s. for a butt of malmeſey, upon their merchants bringing it hither, to laſt as long as the impoſition of foure duccats, which, as appeares by the act, came but to 18s. of our money, ſhould endure. It is not probable, that this king, conſidering his other actions, would have ſuffered this to have been done by parliament, if he had thought he might have lawfully done it by his abſolute power; and therefore it cannot almoſt be gaine-ſaid, that in theſe times this pretended prerogative of laying impoſitions without aſſent of parliament was held to be againſt law.

Henry 8. Hen. 8. had a ſubſidie of tunnage and poundage granted to him for his life, the firſt yeare of his reign, as appeares by the Parl. Roll.

Hen. 8. his ſonne and ſucceſſor, was ſo farre from the diſpoſition of his father, in this point of thrift and providence, as there was not in the whole ranke of our kings any one like to him, for exceſſive prodigality. The great riches ſtored up by his father with ſo much care, and left unto him, hee ſo ſodainly conſumed in triumphs, maſkes, mummeries, banquets, pompous and braving warres, as was that of Turwin and Turney, and in the ſatisfying of his luſt, as he was out of very neceſſity enforced to crave moſt unreaſonable aids of his ſubjects in parliament, ſuch as never before had been granted, which through very dread and feare were yeelded to him. Yet not ſo ſatisfied, that no meanes for the rayſing of money might bee neglected or unattempted, in the 15 yeere of his reigne, by the councell of that proud prelate cardinall Woolſey, he ſpared not to ſend out commiſſions into every ſhire throughout the whole realme, with privy inſtructions to the commiſſioners, how they ſhould with moſt advantage behave themſelves, in perſwading the people to contribute to the king the ſixt part of their whole eſtates, to bee paid preſently, either in money or plate; whereupon followed extreme curſing, weeping and exclamation againſt the king and his councell, and the people were in point to rebell, had not the king ſtayed the proceedings of the commiſſioners by his letters. Finding that this way would not ſerve his turne, hee demanded a benevolence; which not anſwering his expectation, he did the ſame yeere raiſe unto himſelfe a great deale of treaſure by abaſing his gold.

Such things as theſe, princes never put in practiſe, but when all other meanes faile them; and yet hee went many degrees beyond this. For, in the 27. yeere of his reigne he ſuppreſſed above 370 religious houſes, the yeerly value of whoſe revenues I have read to be no leſſe than 32000*l.* per annum in thoſe days: and that of their goods, ſold at very low priſes, he made above 100000*l.* in preſent money. About 4. yeares after he diſſolved all the monaſteries, abbeies, priories, nunneries, and all other religious houſes of what kinde ſoever throughout England. By which meanes, and by the ſale of their goods, he gathered ſuch a maſſe of treaſure, as it might have been imagined that never any king of this realme ſhould have needed to have ſought reliefe at his ſubjects hands. Yet he himſelfe, no longer than within 3. yeeres after following, craved and obteined, as may appeare by the ſtatutes of that time, an exceſſive great ayde by parliament; and yet the yeere following hee did alſo abaſe his coyne more then halfe in halfe, ſuch an abaſement as never before or ſince was heard of, and could not but bee very grievous to the people; but becauſe perhaps they held it lawfull ſo to doe, they made no publique complaint thereof. And it is worth the obſerving, that though this prerogative of abaſing coyne be a thing which trencheth as deepely into the private intereſt of the ſubject as the laying of impoſitions; for by this meanes a man, that this day is worth in revenues a hundred pounds per an. ſhall to-morrow, if the king be ſo pleaſed, be worth but fifty or forty, or leſſe, in reall value; and though alſo the practiſe of this prerogative hath not been forborne by any of the kings of this realme, and that ſome of them have uſed it very immoderately; yet cannot there be found any one publique complaint, that ever I have met withall, upon record againſt it, as from time to time there have beene many againſt impoſitions; which argues that the ſubject did make a difference between theſe two prerogatives; this, of laying impoſitions; and that, of abaſing coyne; thinking the one lawfull and the other not. But to conclude my obſervations upon the actions of Hen. 8. The next yeere after this unconſcionable abaſement of his money, hee craved a benevolence. The yeere following he tooke the profits of all the chantries, colledges and free chappels, &c. during his life, which ended the next yeere. Can any man imagine, that during this kings reigne it was held lawfull, or any ſuch thing ſo much as dreamed of, to rayſe treaſure by laying impoſitions? I will enforce it no farther, but leave it to the judgement of any reaſonable man, that ſhall conſider theſe things which I have remembred, whether or no it bee likely.

Out of the time of his ſonne and ſucceſſor Ed. 6. I can obſerve little, becauſe of the ſhortneſſe of his reigne. But methinkes, if his governors had imagined that any ſuch prerogative had been due unto him, they ſhould not in honor have forborne the practiſe thereof for the ſupplying of the kings great neceſſities, and inſtead thereof have craved of the ſubjects that unaccuſtomed and unreaſonable ſubſidy, granted an. 2. of a certain ſum of money upon every ſheep and every cloth within the realme, for 3. yeeres; which afterwards for the unreaſonablenes thereof was releaſed.

A corolary or connexion of all the times before mentioned.

I have now gone through in ſuch ſort as you have heard, the times of all the kings from Ed. 3. till Q. Maries reigne; during which time what can there be more imagined, that might poſſibly have happened to have awakened impoſitions, if they had not been more than aſleepe? Neither the neceſſity of juſt and honorable warre, nor the ſubtleties and curioſitie of peace, nor the prodigality of ſome of theſe kings for the better ſatisfying of their pleaſures, nor the covetouſneſſe of others, nor the ſoftneſſe of ſome of their diſpoſitions, nor the nonage of others apt to be abuſed by evill counſellors, nor the dreadfull and fearefull awe in which ſome of them held their ſubjects, nor the aſſurance of the peoples extraordinary affection, which might have emboldened ſome others, nor the evil conſcience of uſurpers, nor any other motive whatſoever, which happened during this long time, could revive them; untill Q. Mary did at laſt raiſe them out of the grave, after they had been ſo many yeeres dead and rotten.

Qu. Mary.

The firſt impoſition, that ſhe layd, was that upon cloth, continued till this day, which grew upon a ſpeciall reaſon; as may appeare by the printed booke of the rates of her cuſtomes and ſubſidies; in the end whereof you ſhall finde a declaration expreſſing the loſſe ſuſteined by reaſon of the difference between the cuſtomes and ſubſidies of wool and cloth. By which it appeares, that a ſack of wool yeelded in cuſtome ſix ſhillings eight-pence, and in ſubſidie thirty-three ſhillings four-pence; that the cuſtome upon a ſhort cloth was fourteene-pence, and that a ſack of wool did commonly make foure ſhort clothes, the cuſtome of which was foure ſhillings eight-pence; ſo that the cuſtome of wool made into cloth was leſſe, then the cuſtome and ſubſidie of ſo much wool not cloathed, in every ſack in ſhort clothes thirty-five ſhillings foure-pence; which difference was reduced to an equality by rating upon every ſhort cloth ten ſhillings. After this declaration made of the difference, and of the rate which reduced both to an equality, follow theſe words; 'Which difference conſidered, and the 'great loſſe ſuſteined by us in the ſame, by reaſon that cloathing is 'much increaſed, it is thought convenient by us, with the advice of 'our councell, towards the reliefe of the loſſe, for to aſſeſſe, upon the 'clothes carried out by way of merchandize, ſome larger rate then 'heretofore hath been uſed; and though it were reaſon to appoint ſuch 'a rate as might recompence the full of the loſſe ſuſteined, yet up'on divers conſiderations, at this time, us and our councell moving, we 'are pleaſed only to aſſeſſe upon every ſhort cloth, by the name of cuſ'tome, ſix ſhillings eight-pence, &c.'

I thought good to open this at large unto you, that you might ſee, upon what ſpeciall reaſon of equity this impoſition was grounded, and how it differeth from ours. And it is worthy the obſerving, how the queene commandeth this increaſe of cuſtome to be yeelded unto her, not as an impoſition, or by the name of impoſt, but by the name of cuſtome; becauſe it cometh in lieu of the ancient cuſtome upon wool; which is the reaſon, that at this day it is demanded and paid by that name; whereas no other new raiſed duty hath that priviledge, but they are either called ſubſidie of tonnage or poundage, if they be raiſed by act of parliament; or impoſt, if by the kings abſolute power.

The name of cuſtome was anciently given to none but to wools, woolfells, and leather; and upon this occaſion, to cloth alſo.

This impoſition, though grounded upon ſuch equity as you have heard, yet in Dyer, 1 Eliz. fo. 165. a. and b. it was, as appeares by my L. Dyer, complayned of by the merchants of London with great exclamation, (which are his words,) and ſuit to the queen to be unburdened of it, becauſe it was not granted in parliament, but aſſeſſed by queen Mary of her abſolute power: whereupon there were divers aſſemblies and conferences of the juſtices and others, but their reſolution is no where to be found, at leaſt by us. It is very probable, that, if they had given judgment for the queen, it would not have beene kept cloſe. But howſoever the profit was too great to be taken from the crowne, and therefore it continues till this day.

Plowdens argument againſt it, in Mr. Tates hand.

Howſoever the reaſon in equity in the laying this impoſition upon cloth may ſeeme to bee found unto ſome men, and ſo to allow of this impoſition as differing from ours, yet for my part I hold it not ſo, when I conſider what courſe was taken by Ed. 3. upon the ſame occaſion. An. 11. E. 3. cap. 1. and 2. it was enacted, that no wool ſhould be carried out of England, but by the kings licence; and that no man ſhould weare cloth, other than ſuch as ſhould be made in England. This law tooke ſuch effect, as within ten yeeres the greateſt part of the wool in England was made into cloth; and it became to be tranſported in ſuch abundance, by reaſon that there was no cuſtome at all due upon cloth, and the cuſtome and ſubſidie upon wools was very high, that in the 21 yeere, the king, finding his cuſtome of wools ſo much decreaſed, doth ſeeke to remedy it, not by impoſing a new charge upon cloth by his abſolute power, as queen Mary did, but did it by aſſent of his ſubjects in full parliament, as I collect partly by my L. Dyer in the place laſt mentioned, but more fully by a recitall in a record amongſt us, of 24 E. 3. ro. 13. Orig. de Scaccar. to this effect: that whereas the cuſtomes and ſubſidies due and granted upon wools are much decreaſed, becauſe a great part of the wool of England is made into cloth, for which no cuſtome is due; and whereas in conſideration thereof, at our council held the 21 yeere of our reigne, by the common aſſent of the prelates earles and barons and others, it was ordeined and accorded, that 14d. by denizens, and 20d. by ſtrangers, ſhould be paid for every cloth of aſſiſe, &c. made of Engliſh wool, and tranſported; upon paine of forfeiture of the clothes. And ſo followeth an authority given to collect the ſame.

The next impoſition laid by queen Mary was forty ſhillings upon a tun of French wines, impoſed in the 5 yeere of her reigne: at which time there was firſt a proclamation made, that no wines at all ſhould be brought from France, being then in enmity with England, upon paine of forfeiture of the wines; which, by the way, is a ſtrange clauſe in a proclamation. Immediately after this reſtraint there was an order made by the queen and her privy counſell, that ſuch as would might bring in French wines, notwithſtanding the proclamation, paying forty ſhillings upon every tun by the name of impoſt, as doth appeare by record in the rolls of Eaſter terme, 1 Eliz. in the office of the kings remembrancer of the Exchequer, in the caſe of one Germane Ciol, againſt whom an information was exhibited for not paying the ſaid impoſition. Whereunto, taking it by way of traverſe, that there is any law of the land by which he may be charged with impoſt, he pleads a licence made unto him, an. 1. and 2. Ph. & Mar. to import a certaine number of tunnes of wine within a certaine time, any reſtraint then made, or afterwards to be made to the contrary, notwithſtanding; provided alwayes, that the cuſtome, ſubſidie, and other duties due and accuſtomed to be paid to the king and queen, were duly ſatisfied: and he ſhewes, that, for all wines brought in by him during the life of queen Mary, he paid the ſubſidie of tonnage, viz. three ſhillings for every tun, which was all that was due and accuſtomed to be paid. Upon this plea a demurrer was joyned, and judgement given thereupon againſt the queen. This judgement hath been enforced in the maintenance of impoſitions. Whether or no it make not rather againſt them, I leave to your cenſures.

Germane Ciol's caſe.

Neere about the ſame time there were impoſitions laid alſo by queen Mary upon all French commodities whatſoever to be imported, as may appear by the port-bookes of thoſe times in the Exchequer; which impoſitions were received to the uſe of queene Eliz. in the beginning of the 1 yeere of her reign. But ere the yeer ended they were all taken away, as may appear by the ſame port-bookes; which in my opinion is a great argument, that they were not then held lawfull. For princes doe not ſo eaſily give over their hold in matters of profit, if they be any way able to maintain it. What hath hitherto upheld the impoſition upon wines, I know not, except it be the great profit that comes by it to the crown, and becauſe there was never any late judgement given directly againſt impoſitions.

Admitting the king had power by the common-law to lay impoſitions, yet hee is barred by ſtatutes.

You have hitherto heard what reaſon and direct proofe I have uſed to maintaine, that by the common-law the king cannot at his will increaſe his cuſtome by way of impoſition. You have, ſecondly, heard what the practiſe of former ages hath been in this kinde, till this day; from which I have alſo drawn reaſons of inference, that prove the common-law ſo to be. But now, admitting that by the common-law it had been cleere and without queſtion that the king might at his will have laid impoſitions, and that alſo the ſame could have been cleerly proved by the practiſe of the ancient kings; yet I affirme, that ſo ſtands the law of England at this day, by reaſon of ſtatutes directly in the point, as the kings power, if ever he had any to impoſe, is not onely limited, but utterly taken away; as I hope I ſhall be able evidently to prove, notwithſtanding any objection that hath been made againſt the interpretation of the ſtatutes to this ſenſe.

MagnaCharta cap. 30. enforced, and the objections made againſt it, anſwered.

The firſt ſtatute is in Magna Charta, cap. 30. The words are, All merchants, if they were not openly prohibited before, ſhall have their ſafe and ſure conducts, to enter and depart, to goe and tarrie in the realme as well by land as by water, to buy and ſell without any evill tolls, by the old and rightfull cuſtomes, except in the time of warre. And if they be of the land making warre againſt us, and be found in our realme at the beginning of the warre, they ſhall be attached without harme of body, or goods, untill it be knowne to us, or our juſtices, how our merchants be intreated there in the land making war againſt us, &c.

25. E. 1. cap. 1. 2. 3. 4.

The ſtatute, of which this is a branch, is the moſt ancient ſtatute-law we have, wonne and ſealed with the blood of our anceſtors; ſo reverenced in former times, that it hath been by parliament provided, that tranſcripts thereof ſhould be ſent to all the cathedrall churches of England, there to remaine; that it ſhould be twice every yeere publikely read before the people; that likewiſe twice every yeere there ſhould be excommunication ſolemnly denounced to the breakers thereof; that all ſtatutes and all judgements given againſt it ſhall be held as void; that it ſhould be received and allowed as the common-law, by all ſuch as have the adminiſtration of juſtice; and it hath been no leſſe than 29 times ſolemnly confirmed in parliament. I will, therefore, with ſo much the more care, endeavor to free this law from all the objections, that have been made againſt it.

The firſt objection, that it extendeth only to merchant-ſtrangers, anſwered.

The firſt objection doth tend to the diminiſhing of the extent of this ſtatute, as touching the perſons whom it may concerne; for it hath been collected out of the latter words of the ſtatute, that it ſhould extend onely to merchants-aliens, and not to denizens.

Firſt, it is improbable, that the makers of the law ſhould be more carefull to provide for the indempnity of merchant-ſtrangers than of Engliſh; except perhaps they might imagine, that Engliſh merchants were already ſufficiently provided for by the common-law. If that were their reaſon, as there could be no other that I can imagine, it doth as much maintaine my opinion, as if they had been conteined within the ſtatute.

Again, the words are generall, all merchants; and, qui omnes dixerit, nullos excipit.

Beſides, the ſtatute is a beneficiall law; in which caſe particular and ſpeciall words doe alwayes admit a generall extent: and therefore, to reſtraine generall words, as the objectors would, is againſt all reaſon, and rule of law. As for the latter words, 'tis true, they doe indeed extend onely to merchant-ſtrangers; but the ſenſe of the firſt ſentence is perfect without this: and as long as no abſurdity nor contradiction doth follow by interpreting the firſt words to extend to all merchants in generall, and the latter onely to merchant-ſtrangers, the moſt ample and beneficiall conſtruction is ever the beſt, as in all other ſtatutes of this nature.

But this objection is, in my opinion, cleerly removed by two ſtatutes made by Ed. 3. in declaration of this very clauſe. The firſt is, 2 Ed. 3. c. 8. the words are, All merchants, ſtrangers and privies, may goe and come with their merchandizes into England, after the tenure of the Great Charter. I take it, that privies in this place, being the very word that is found in the originall, which is in French, ought to be underſtood denizens; for, otherwiſe I ſuppoſe it would have been joyned to the word ſtrangers by a conjunction disjunctive, which is uſuall where the words are of one ſenſe; and not by a copulative, as here it is. Beſides, I take the word privy to be derived from the Latine, privatus, which ſignifieth a particular property; as res privata, a mans owne private eſtate; ſo, mercatores privati, our own merchants. That merchant-ſtrangers ſhould be firſt named, is common in ſtatutes and records.

The next ſtatute explaining this of Magna Charta, is, 14 Ed. 3. c. 2. The words are, Whereas it is conteined in the Great Charter, that all merchants ſhall have ſafe conduct, &c. We grant that all merchants, denizens and forreins, may freely paſſe, &c. which I take to be no other than a meere declaration of Magna Charta.

The ſecond objection, that Magna Charta cap. 30. was made only againſt taxes within the land, anſwered.

The ſecond objection made againſt this branch of Magna Charta, is, that the meaning thereof was to ſecure the merchants, not from a new increaſe of cuſtome to be impoſed by the king, to be paid at their entrance or going out of the ports, ſuch as our impoſitions are; but from certaine petty exactions, as tolls and ſuch like, which were then uſually demanded of them within the land, by the townes through which they were to paſſe, and where they ſold their merchandize; for the farther remedy of which there were afterwards divers ſtatutes made, which doe evidently manifeſt that ſuch was the miſchief. And they doe the rather make this collection becauſe of the words, buy and ſell without evill tolls; for, ſay they, impoſitions are not paid upon the buying and ſelling of merchandize, but when they are to ſhip or unſhip. They take hold of the word toll, which properly is an exaction for paſſage within the land, or for ſale in markets or faires. Theſe objections notwithſtanding, I hold it ſomewhat cleere, that the meaning of this ſtatute was principally to ſecure merchants touching impoſitions. My firſt argument is drawn ab authoritate, from the authority of the wiſeſt and moſt ſage men in greateſt places and offices within this kingdom, in the times wherein they lived, and who alſo could ſo much the better judge of the true meaning of this ſtatute, in that they lived ſo neere the time of the making thereof, even in the beginning of the reigne of the next king (ſave one) to him that made this ſtatute. I meane thoſe, who made the ordinance in 5 Ed. 2. heretofore divers times mentioned by me, who, in alledging their reaſon againſt charta mercatoria, doe amongſt other things ſay, that the ſame was made againſt Magna Charta. What was the cauſe of the griefe conceived againſt charta mercatoria, other than the impoſitions by colour thereof laid upon forraine commodities? It appears by the ordinance, that was the onely cauſe. If then charta mercatoria were by them adjudged to be againſt Magna Charta, only becauſe by colour thereof new impoſitions were raiſed without aſſent of parliament, it is evident, that they interpreted the ſtatute of Magna Charta to be made againſt impoſitions. If they had thought it to have extended onely to petty tolls and exactions within the land, as is objected, then could it not have extended to charta mercatoria. As for the words, buy and ſell, without any manner of evill tolls, I denie not but the words may perhaps have that ſenſe which hath been collected out of them, viz. that in buying and ſelling, they ſhould be free alſo from unjuſt exactions within the land. But I ſay further, that theſe words, without any manner of evill toll, by the old and rightfull cuſtomes, do extend not onely to the next precedent words, buy and ſell, but alſo to the former words, enter and returne, and more principally to them then to any other; for to have provided, that they ſhould be free from thoſe petty exactions of tolls in markets, and for paſſing through cities and townes, and to leave them ſubject to impoſitions to be laid on at the kings pleaſure, had been but a ſlender ſecuritie. This expoſition of mine is confirmed by a record here amongſt us, of 16 Hen. 3. no longer than ſeven yeeres after the making of this ſtatute; by which it appears, that the king commanded his officers at the ports, to ſignifie to all merchants, that they might with ſafetie enter into his kingdom, paying the rightfull and ancient cuſtomes, 'Nec timeant ſibi de maletoltis quas faciet rex.'

Derivation of the word toll.

As touching the word toll, which they ſay is to be underſtood of tolls for paſſages, and for buying and ſelling in faires and markets, it behoves me to ſay ſomething of the derivation thereof; the rather, becauſe it is very often uſed in our ancient ſtatutes and records in the ſame ſenſe as it is in this place; and by the derivation thereof the naturall and true meaning of the word ſhall be beſt underſtood. I hold it therefore to be derived from the Latine word teolonium, which ſignifies cuſtome, by cutting off the latter part of the word, and retaining onely the firſt part teol, by contraction toll; of which manner of derivation there are infinite examples in our language. The Latine teolonium, as ſaith Calvin in his Lexicon Juris Civilis, is derived from the Greek telos, which ſignifies as well cuſtom as it doth finis. Hence it is, that the cuſtomers are called in Latine telonarii.

Thus you ſee, that the genuine and primitive ſignification of our word toll is no other than cuſtome upon merchandizes. From the word toll, are come thoſe two barbarous Latine words found in our ſtatutes and records; toltum, which is the word uſed in the record of 16 H. 6. but even now vouched by me; and tolnetum, the originall word in the ſtatute now in queſtion, which I muſt confeſſe is alſo in our law Latine uſed by us for toll in the market and toll for paſſage, as may appear by the regiſter and the book of entries. But in this place, malum tolnetum properly ſignifies, not a toll in the common ſence, but an unlawfull charge laid by the king upon merchandizes, as an increaſe of cuſtome, according to the primitive ſignification; which is evidently proved, in that it is here oppoſed to old and rightfull cuſtomes, ſine omnibus malis tolnetis per certas & antiquas conſuetudines. Wherefore it ought ſo to have been tranſlated, for ſo it ſignifies, without impoſitions, by the old and rightfull cuſtome. This expoſition and tranſlation is further warranted by the uſe of the word maletolt, ſo often found in our ancient ſtatutes and records, which without ſcruple is derived from the Latine, malum tolnetum, the very word of our ſtatute. I find it diverſly written, maletout, maletolt, maletot, and ſometimes maletent; but I never find it any where uſed in any other ſence then for an impoſition by way of increaſe of cuſtome upon merchandizes. Sometimes indeed, but that very rarely, it is taken in the beſt ſence, for lawfull and rightfull cuſtome, as the word impoſition ſometimes is; but then commonly it is accompanied with another word to free it from the worſt ſence, as droiturel maletout, &c. That malis tolnetis in this place ought to be tranſlated impoſitions, may be farther proved by that which I find in a writer of the French hiſtory, one Jean Serres, who ſaies, that in the time of Philip le Beau, king of France, which was about the time of Ed. 3. king of England, there were rebellions in France becauſe of impoſitions laid by the king, which in thoſe days they did, ſaith he, call maletouts, the very word then anciently uſed in Engl. for impoſitions, as may plentifully appeare by the ſtatutes and records of H. 3. Ed. 1. Ed. 2. & Ed. 3. for the word impoſition was not uſed in any French record, ſtatute, or other, for ought I have ſeene, till Ed. 3. I find it once uſed in Latine, 12. Ed. 3. in the letter which king Edward the third writ to the archbiſhop, to excuſe him to the people for laying impoſitions; and as all that letter throughout is of an eloquent ſtile, ſo as it ſeemeth he was carefull to avoid alſo that barbarous word, malum tolnetum, though common and familiar, and inſtead thereof to uſe the pure Latine word impoſitio. Sylvius, writing upon Tullies oration for Marcus Fonteius, where theſe words are uſed by Tully, impoſuit vectigal, ſaith, Ita uſitatum vulgo eſt ut vectigalia nova appellent impoſitiones. The word vectigal, in this place, though in a generall ſence it may be applyed to any revenew whatſoever, yet, with the civill lawyers, it is by way of excellence commonly uſed for cuſtom, as may appear by Calvin in his Lexicon. Vectigal, quod fiſco vel reipubl. portorii nomine penditur, id eſt, pro mercibus, quæ invehuntur vel evehuntur. Sometimes they uſe to joyne with it, for a more cleere diſtinction, the word portorium; as a man would ſay, the revenue of the ports; agreeable with which, upon ſome records of Henry the third's time, I have found it to be called exitus portuum. By this it is evident, that impoſitio in pure Latine, and impoſition in Engliſh, is the ſame with maletolt in French and malum tolnetum in our law Latine; and they doe all ſignifie a new increaſe of cuſtome, and not any thing elſe. Wherefore I conclude, that theſe words, ſine malis tolnetis, in our preſent ſtatute, are naturally and properly to be expounded, and underſtood of impoſitions, and ſo ought to have been tranſlated, and not as they are. And although the word impoſition itſelf, as alſo the word maletout, and malum tolnetum may be, as I have confeſſed, taken as well for a new increaſe of cuſtome by a lawfull means, viz. by aſſent in parliament, as for an increaſe of cuſtome by the kings abſolute power, which is unlawfull; yet by the words that immediately follow it is evident, that this ſtatute doth onely intend unlawfull impoſitions, that is, impoſitions laid by the kings abſolute power, without aſſent in parliament. Otherwiſe would they not have been oppoſed to due and rightfull cuſtomes, as by the words of the ſtatute they are.

The word cuſtom, cuſtuma, and conſuetudo expounded.

But becauſe there hath been ſome exception alſo taken to the expoſition of the word cuſtom in that ſenſe in which I take it, that is, for cuſtome upon merchandize, for that the word in the originall is conſuetudo, which ſignifies an uſage, and not cuſtuma, which is the Latine word we now uſe for cuſtome upon merchandize; it behoves me therefore to ſay ſomething touching theſe words, conſuetudo and cuſtuma, for the cleering of this ſcruple. This word conſuetudo, in his firſt and proper ſignification, doth, I confeſſe, ſignifie an uſage, or practiſe of a thing time out of minde. But it is evident by the records in the time of H. 3. and Ed. 1. this word in a more ſpeciall manner was applied to all, or moſt of the duties belonging to the crowne by reaſon of trade; as, conſuetudo aquæ Thameſis, conſuetudo piſcis venientis ad vicum pontis London. conſuetudo quæ vocatur ſcavagium, conſuetudo quæ vocatur gauge. But yet more ſpecially it was applyed to that dutie, which we, following the ſame rule, becauſe of the greatneſſe of the revenue, doe likewiſe per excellentiam call cuſtom. This may appeare by the pipe roll of 52 Hen. 3. with this title Conſuetudo mercandizorum, and by divers other records of Hen. 3. times. The rolls and records of the beginning of Ed. 1. doe likewiſe prove the ſame very evidently, inſomuch that not onely that, which in this kinde belongs to the king by the common-law and by ancient preſcription, was called conſuetudo; but in later time, if any increaſe were of that dutie, though it came not by preſcription, but by grant in parliament, or otherwiſe, yet it ſtill retained the name conſuetudo, which by continuance of time came to be the proper name to that kinde of dutie howſoever it began. And therefore in 3. Ed. 1. you ſhall finde, that after the old cuſtome of woolls was increaſed to a demy-marke by act of parliament, yet the word conſuetudo was nevertheleſſe ſtill retained, but with an addition; for it was then called nova conſuetudo. Nay, though the increaſe were by the kings abſolute authoritie, and upon the matter a meere impoſition, yet the king in his commiſſion did alwayes call it conſuetudo; as in 16. Ed. 1. the impoſition of foure ſhillings upon a tun of wine is, in the kings commiſſion to collect it, called conſuetudo. Nevertheleſſe, I aſſure myſelf, the people called it by ſome worſe name, as maletolt or the like.

The ſeverall applications of this word conſuetudo to all duties whatſoever belonging to the crowne by reaſon of trade, is the reaſon, as I conceive, that the word is uſed in the plurall number in the ſtatute of Magna Charta, per antiquas & certas conſuetudines; that ſo they might bee ſecure againſt all unjuſt exactions upon merchandizes whatſoever. But, as I have ſaid, the principall ſcope was to provide againſt impoſitions; and by reaſon alſo that the word conſuetudo was taken as well for impoſitions as for rightfull cuſtomes, therefore, to make all ſure, they inſert the words antiquas & rectas. This word conſuetudo in this ſenſe continued till about the twentieth yeere of Ed. 1. after which time I cannot call to minde that I have ſeene it upon any record. In ſtead and place thereof came in the word cuſtuma, which I find firſt in charta mercatoria an. 31. Ed. 1. where the increaſe of cuſtome by the grant of merchant-ſtrangers is called parva cuſtuma; and that which before was called nova conſuetudo, doth now begin to loſe that name, and to bee called magna cuſtuma; which termes of magna cuſtuma, intending thereby that increaſe made by parliament, anno 3. Ed. 1. upon the three ſtaple commodities, wools, woollfells, and leather; and parva cuſtuma, intending thereby the increaſe granted by the merchants-ſtrangers, an. 31 Ed. 1. are the termes uſed at this day by the cuſtomers, and by which they diſtinguiſh their entries. This word cuſtuma I finde to have been alſo promiſcuouſly uſed by E. 1. E. 2. and E. 3. in their commiſſions, and applyed, as well to increaſe of cuſtome by way of impoſition or by acts of parliament of thoſe times, as to ancient cuſtome upon the ſtaple commodities. But regularly none ought to be called cuſtuma, but that which is due upon the ſtaple commodities; and ſo is it uſed at this day, except only cloth; for if it bee laid by act of parliament, it is called a ſubſidie; if without aſſent of parliament, impoſt. You ſee in what ſenſe the words malum tolnetum and the word conſuetudo have been uſed in former times, and are thereby able to judge how they ought to be underſtood in this preſent ſtatute, which, as I have ſaid, ought to have the moſt benign interpretation that the words may beare.

Cuſtuma.

The third objection againſt Magna Chart. cap. 30. that by the exception the kings prerogative to lay impoſitions is ſalved, anſwered.

But it hath beene likewiſe objected, that in this ſtatute there is a ſpeciall clauſe of exception, which leaveth the king at his liberty to lay what impoſitions he pleaſeth, this ſtatute notwithſtanding. And that is the words in the beginning of the ſtatute, All merchants, if they were not openly prohibited before, ſhall have their paſſage, &c. which implies, ſay they, that if they be prohibited, which reſts wholly in the kings power, then they are not to have benefit of this ſtatute touching the freedome from impoſitions; and they ſay farther, that the very laying of impoſitions doth imply a reſtraint ſub modo. Though I purpoſe to ſpeake more fully in anſwere of this objection, when I come to ſhew you the weakneſſe of the reaſons alledged for impoſitions, yet I cannot forbeare in this place to ſpeake a worde or two in anſwere thereof, having the ſtatute now before us. Except they be prohibited, they ſhall have free paſſage (ſaith the ſtatute) without paying evill-toll. This doth imply, ſay they, that if they be prohibited, they may be compelled to pay impoſitions. But that cannot be neceſſarily concluded. It implies indeede ſomewhat ſtrongly, that they may bee prohibited. The ſtatute of 1 R. 2. cap. 12. inhibiteth the warden of the Fleete to deliver any priſoner out of execution, unleſſe it bee by writ or other commandment of the king. It may be as ſtrongly implied out of this ſtatute, that the king may, by his commandment without writ, deliver a priſoner out of execution; but the contrary hath alwaies been held. The ſame objection is made, and the ſame anſwere may be given to another exception in the latter end of this branch, except in the time of war.

4 & 5 P. & M. fo. 162. b. Dyer.

The ſecond ſtatute againſt impoſitions, the ſtatute de Tallagio non concedendo, expounded and cleered.

I come to the ſecond ſtatute againſt impoſitions, which is the ſtatute de Tallagio non concedendo, touching the time of the making of which there is great variety of opinion; for it is not, for ought I could ever learne, found any where upon record. Juſtice Raſtall accounts it to have been made 51 of H. 3. and with him agrees an old manuſcript which I have ſeen. It may well bee; for in one of the ſtatutes you ſhall finde a pardon to Humfrey earle of Boham earle of Hertford and Eſſex conſtable of England, and to Roger Bygott earle of Norfolke and Suffolk marſhal of England, who both lived in that time. Thomas of Walſingham in his Hiſtory of England ſaith it was made in the 25 yeere of Ed. 1. Hee reciteth the ſtatute de verbo in verbum as it is in our printed bookes; otherwiſe I ſhould have thought he had meant another ſtatute againſt impoſitions made indeede 25 Ed. 1. and found upon the records of that yeere. In our printed ſtatutes at large, it is placed laſt of all the ſtatutes of E. 1. Though there be ſome diſagreement about the time of the making of this ſtatute, yet they all agree the occaſion to be the laying of a great impoſition upon wool. The words of Thomas Walſingham; Auxit rex tributum lanæ ad 40s. cum prius ultra dimidiam mercam non daretur. Tota autem communitas ſentit ſe gravatam de vectigali; lana enim Angliæ fere extendit ad medietatem valoris terræ & vectigal ad quintam partem terræ. The cuſtome of wools, as you perceive, was in thoſe dayes eſteemed to bee the fift part of the value of the whole land. It followeth in him, that upon complaint the ſubject at laſt obteined the ſtatute I nowe ſpeake of, the words of which are, No tallage or ayde ſhall bee rayſed or ſet by us or our heires in our realm, without the aſſent and good will of arch-biſhops, earles, barons, knights, burgeſſes, and other freemen of the land. After theſe generall words, by way of proviſion againſt all manner of burthens whatſoever to bee laid in time to come without aſſent of parliament, followeth in the next branch (ſave one) eſpeciall proviſion for the taking away of the impoſition then in demand upon wools; which latter clauſe, as it doth cleerely ſhew the cauſe of their preſent griefe to bee the ſame which our chronicles ſay it was, ſo doth it likewiſe make it evident, what it was which they ſought to be ſecured of for the times to come. Neither are the words themſelves ſo obſcure, by reaſon of the generality of them, but that they alſo without knowing the occaſion of the making of the law doe directly point at impoſitions; for, though indeede the word tallage be, as I conceive, to be underſtood only of charges within the land, yet the word ayde extendeth to all charges of what nature ſoever. Nay, that even impoſitions themſelves have beene called aydes or ſubſidies, which is all one, is evident by almoſt all the records of the Exchequer here amongſt us, eſpecially by thoſe of Ed. 3. time; in which, whereſoever you finde any mention made by the king, in his commiſſions, of an impoſition raiſed by him, hee ever calls it ſubſidium or auxilium. So likewiſe in the printed ſtatute of 36 Ed. 3. cap. 11. you ſhall finde, that the impoſition by grant of merchants there mentioned is called a ſubſidie or ayde. This expoſition of the word ayde, concurring with the occaſion of the making of the ſtatute, doth in my opinion ſtrongly enforce this ſtatute againſt impoſitions. And 'tis to bee obſerved, that in this ſtatute there is no ſaving or exception of the kings antient right, which, as our chronicles ſay, was a point principally inſiſted upon at the making of this law, earneſtly preſſed by the ſubject to bee without that clauſe, and for a long while ſtood upon by the king, but at laſt yeelded unto in ſuch ſort as you have heard.

Tallage.

Aydes.

Subſidies.

The third ſtatute againſt impoſitions, 25 E. 1. cap. 7. cleered from objections.

The next ſtatute againſt impoſitions is 25 Ed. 1. cap. 7. The words are, Foraſmuch as the more part of the cominalty hath found themſelves ſore agrieved with the maletolt of wools, viz. a toll of 40s. for every ſack of wool, and have made petition to bee releaſed of the ſame, wee at their requeſts have cleerely releaſed it, and have granted for us and our heires, that wee ſhall take no ſuch things, without their common aſſent and good will, ſaving to us and our heires the cuſtome of wools, ſkins and leather granted before by the cominalty aforeſaid. I might, in enforcing this ſtatute, rely upon a rule of law for the expoſition of ſtatutes of this nature, Omnis impoſitio eſt odioſa, ideo ſtricta contra impoſitiones, & large ad favorem gravatorum interpretanda eſt lex contra impoſitiones data. But there ſhall not need any ſuch favourable conſtruction; for the words are in themſelves very cleere. The law conſiſteth of three parts. The firſt is the kings grant of a petition made by the commons for the releaſing of an impoſition of 40s. upon a ſack of wool, then in demand. When the preſent grief was ended, the next care was to prevent the like miſchiefe in all times to come. It therefore followes, And wee have granted for us and our heires, that we ſhall take no ſuch thing without their common aſſent, which is the ſecond part of the law. The ſaving in the end is the third part.

Againſt this generall proviſion two objections have beene made.

The firſt objection, that this ſtatute is only againſt the exceſſe of the impoſitions then laid, and not againſt the right of impoſing, anſwered.

Firſt, that the words no ſuch things are to be underſtood only of the burthenſomneſſe and exceſſe of impoſitions, and not otherwiſe. No ſuch things, that is, ſay they, no ſuch grievous impoſitions as this preſent impoſition is. It had beene a poore ſecurity for times to come, to have left it to interpretation, whether or no impoſitions, which might happen to be laid in after ages, be as grievous as the impoſition complained of in this time, by comparing one with the other. 'Tis ſo uncertain a computation, as no man, when hee thinks thoroughly of it, can imagine, that men, worthy to ſit at the making of laws, ſhould ſuffer ſuch a thing to paſſe them. Who can certainly ſay, whether our impoſitions bee more or leſſe grievous then the rate of 40s. upon a ſack of wool? Beſide, how eaſily had this lawe beene to have beene eluded by abating only 12d. or but 1d. in the next impoſition? For, if it be but a penny leſſe, it is no ſuch impoſition, for the burden. Therefore it muſt needes bee expounded of the quality and very nature of the thing complained of, and not of the quantity. No ſuch thing, that is, no ſuch thing as this is, that is to ſay, an impoſition. But that, which will cleere this objection, is a proclamation made the very next yeer after the making of this act, in which the king reciting this act, inſtead of theſe words, wee will take no ſuch thing, uſeth theſe words, nullam aliam cuſtumam ſine communi conſenſu capiemus, not only no ſuch, but no other. By which you may ſee, that the words were then interpreted in that ſence, in which I doe now interpret them.

26 E. 1. Inter brevia retorn. de term. Mich. in Scac in offic. rem thesaurar. ibidem.

The ſecond objection, that it is only againſt impoſitions upon wool, anſwered.

But admitting, ſay they, that it bee ſo to bee expounded that the king will lay no other impoſition without aſſent in parliament, that is to be underſtood, ſay they, no other impoſition upon wools, and not otherwiſe; which is their ſecond objection. It were a very ſtrict conſtruction for a ſtatute of ſo beneficiall an intent as this is ſo to reſtraine it; if there were no other words in the ſtatute that did inlarge the expoſition. But by the words following it is moſt evident, that the ſcope of this law is more liberall then ſo; and that the kings intent was for ever to ſecure his ſubjects, againſt all charges of this nature, I meane impoſitions, not upon wools only, but upon any other merchandiſe whatſoever, which I collect from laying all the parts of the law together.—The petition for preſent eaſe is to be releaſed onely of the maletolt of foure ſhillings upon a ſack of wool, which is yeelded to. The ſecurity for the time to come is, we will take no ſuch thing. The ſaving, which followeth that, is, ſaving the cuſtome of woolls, woolfells, and leather. I obſerve, the ſaving extends not to woolls alone, as the petition doth, but alſo to woolfells and leather, by expreſſe name; by which it is evident, that the ſecuritie for the time to come is of a larger extent than to ſtretch onely to wools, as hath been objected. For elſe, to what end ſhould woolfells and leather be excepted in the ſaving, if they had not been contained in the generall words, no ſuch thing? An exception cannot be but of a thing contained in former words. If therefore the grant would have extended to woolfells, if they had not been ſpecially excepted, then do I conclude by the ſame reaſon, that it doth extend to all other merchandizes not excepted; for the words are generall.

And ſo I leave this law cleered of all objections, and very full againſt impoſitions.

The fourth ſtatute urged againſt impoſitions 14 E. 3. cap. 21. cleered from objections.

The next ſtatute made againſt them is 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21. By the firſt part of which law you may perceive, that, whereas the commons had prayed the king not to take of woolls, woolfells, leather, tyn, or lead, any more than the ancient cuſtome, the king prayed them to grant him forty ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll for a yeer and a halfe, which they granted. Whereupon the king, by way of retribution, and in anſwere of their petition, as touching the wooll cauſeth it to be enacted for their ſecurity in time to come, that neither he nor his heires would demand, aſſeſſe, nor take more cuſtome of a ſack of wooll than ſixe ſhillings eight pence: and ſo likewiſe upon woolls and leather, no more than the ancient cuſtome, without aſſent of parliament. All this while there is no anſwere given touching the tyn and lead mentioned in the petition; upon which, as it appeares, the king had alſo laid impoſitions. But there doe follow certain generall words, by which, not onely tyn and lead, but all other commodities whatſoever are freed from impoſitions. The words are, the king promiſed in the preſence of his earles, barons, and others of his parliament, no more to charge, ſet, or aſſeſſe upon the cuſtome, but in manner aforeſaid. Except theſe words doe extend to lead and tyn, to free them from impoſitions for times to come, as well as woolls woolfells and leather are freed by the former ſpeciall words, their petition touching tyn and lead is no way anſwered. And if they doe extend to tyn and lead, by reaſon of the generality of the words, they doe by the ſame reaſon extend to all commodities; for what more liberall words can there be than theſe; that the king will not charge, ſet, or aſſeſſe upon the cuſtome? Theſe words, the cuſtome, being words indefinite, are, you know, equivalent to an univerſall, according to the rule, indefinitum æquipollet univerſali. And although the king doe but promiſe, yet I doubt not but in this caſe his promiſe is a law. And it is worth the obſerving, that the lords doe in very extraordinary and unuſuall manner ſolemnly undertake, as much as in them lyeth, that they ſhall procure the king to hold the ſame, and that they ſhall in no wiſe aſſent to the contrary, if it be not by the aſſent of the prelates, earles, barons, and commons, and that in full parliament; and for the greater ſurety, and to give cauſe to eſchew all counſell to the contrary of this ordinance, the prelates have promiſed to give ſentence upon them that counſell againſt the ſame in any point; which are the very words of the ſtatute in print.

14 Ed. 3. no. 5. Ro. Par.

The ſtatute of 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21. was yielded unto by the king, upon a petition exhibited the parliament before, both by the lords and the commons, praying that a law might be made againſt impoſitions, as may appeare by the records of the 13 yeere of Ed. 3. at which time they likewiſe prayed, that the king would be pleaſed to grant them a charter to the ſame effect, to be inrolled in parliament. The ſtatute you have heard. The charter followeth in our printed bookes immediately after the ſtatute, where the king, in the preamble thereof, reciting the great gift that he had given him at the ſame parliament, that is to ſay, the 9th fleece, 9th ſheep, and 9th lamb throughout the kingdom, which indeed, was a very extraordinary great gift, (and therefore his grant, in regard thereof, is to be intended ſo much more beneficially) doth in lieu thereof, for him and his heires, grant to his ſubjects in theſe words: From henceforth they ſhall not be charged, nor grieved, to make any ayde, or to ſuſteine charge, if it be not by the common aſſent of the prelates, earles, barons and other great men, and the commons of our ſaid realme of England, and that in parliament. It hath been objectedo, that theſe words, aide and charge, are to be underſtood of charges within the land, ſuch as are taxes and tallages, and not of impoſitions upon merchandizes. And this is the only objection made, or indeed can be made againſt this ſtatute; for the cleering of which, I can ſay no more then already I have proved by matter of record for the opening of the ſence of this ſtatute, viz. that this charter and the laſt ſtatute were made upon a petition exhibited in parliament, for a law and charter to be made againſt impoſitions upon merchandizes. And therefore that conjecture of theirs, that it ſhould extend only to taxes, and not to impoſitions, cannot but fall to the ground; eſpecially ſince there is not in the petition, any mention at all of taxes or tallages, or of any other charge or aide but impoſitions onely, then which there cannot allmoſt be a cleerer proof, then that this law being made upon this petition, is to be expounded againſt impoſitions. Which, if this petition had not been extant, would with no leſſe cleerneſſe have been proved, by conſidering the miſchiefe at the time of the making of this law, which was not tallage or taxes, but thoſe heavie impoſitions of foure pound and five pound upon a ſack of wool, by way of diſpenſation with the ſtatute of 11 E. 3. cap. 1. of which I have formerly made mention. So as this ſtatute, being made in the firſt intention againſt diſpenſations for money with a penall law, though the occaſion were particular, yet, the words being generall, I hold, that with reaſon it may be extended againſt all diſpenſations, with penall lawes for money. In particular, I hold, that the raiſing of money, by diſpenſations with the ſtatutes againſt ale-houſes, is, if not by the common law, yet by the force of this law, unlawfull; for certainly, quod prohibitum eſt una via, non debet alia permitti.

An objection that the ſtat. of 14 Ed. 3. cap. 21, extendeth only to impoſitions within the land and not to impoſition upon merchandizes is anſwered.

The word Charge.

As for the words ayde and charge, I have already proved, that it was a terme by which impoſitions were commonly called in thoſe times. That they were alſo called charges is evident by very many records of thoſe times, where complaint is made againſt them, as 21 Ed. 3. numb. 11. Les commons priont que la charge de 21s. ſur ſack de lane ſoit ouſte, 21 Ed. 3. numb. 16. ‘The commons ‘pray that no charge be ſet upon them without aſſent of parliament.’ The kings anſwere is, if any impoſition be levyed unduely it ſhall bee taken away. Of this kinde there are very many preſidents, ſo as if the precedent petition had not aſſured us of the ſcope of this lawe as it doth, the very words themſelves, rightly underſtood, would have made it cleere.

In the ſame charter there is another clauſe as beneficiall as this, to this effect, all merchants denizens and forreins, except thoſe which be of our enmitie, may without let ſafely come into the relm of England with their goods and merchandizes, and ſafely tarry, and ſafely returne, paying the cuſtomes, ſubſidies and other profits reaſonably thereof due. The objection to this clauſe is very obvious, for what, ſay they, can theſe words, other profits reaſonably due, ſignifie other than impoſitions; for, by the words going before, cuſtome and ſubſidies are expreſly named, and there is, ſay they, no other third profit upon merchandize but impoſitions, and indeed this ſtatute they themſelves have vouched in maintenance of impoſitions. To this objection it might ſerve for a full anſweer, that there are other duties then cuſtomes and ſubſidies due upon the landing of wares; for example wharfage, cranage, ſcavage, and ſuch like, the which with more probability I may conjecture to be intended by theſe words, other duties, then they can conjecture it to bee meant of impoſitions. Sed in planis non opus eſt conjecturis. The beſt expoſitors of this act are thoſe that lived in the ſame times, and they doe cleerely expound this clauſe to be made againſt impoſitions, as may appeare by the record of 21 E. 3. no. 29. for you ſhall there find a petition exhibited in parliament by the commons to bee relieved touching an impoſition upon wools, alledging for a reaſon of their petition, that every man ought freely to paſſe, paying the ancient cuſtome as it was ordained by the kings charter. This petition againſt impoſitions was exhibited by the whole parliament, within ſix yeeres after the making of the charter, as may appeare by comparing the times; and if they had not then thought, that impoſitions had been meant to have beene provided againſt by this charter, they would not certainly have made ſuch a ſpeciall reference thereunto.

Anſwers to the reaſons urged in maintenance of impoſitions.

In diſcovering the weakeneſſe of the reaſons alledged in maintenance of impoſitions, I ſhall not greatly neede to ſay any thing more then hath been ſaid; becauſe the ſtate of the queſtion hath beene already ſo thoroughly opened unto you, that whatſoever can, with any colour of reaſon, be ſaid for impoſitions, may receive an anſwer out of that which hath beene ſpoken againſt them. Nevertheleſs, I will in a few words recall to your memories their reaſons; and in as few apply the anſwers to them, with ſome additions of mine owne, that, by laying both together in your view at one time, the weakeneſſe of the one and ſtrength of the other may the better appeare unto you.

The firſt argument, that becauſe it cannot appear that the ancient cuſtomes were ſet by parliament, therefore they were impoſed by the king, anſwered.

It hath beene ſaid, that the old cuſtome of a demi-marke upon a ſack of wool muſt have his beginning, either by the kings abſolute power, or by a legall aſſent of the people, which can bee no where but in parliament, and cannot but appeare of record; but becauſe no ſuch aſſent can be ſhowne, therefore they conclude, that it began by the kings abſolute power, and inferre that the ſame power remains ſtill. The ſubſtance of this argument is found in my lord Dyer in the place cyted by me. It was much inforced in the Exchequer. But as touching the particular of the old cuſtome of a demi-marke upon a ſack, and the other old cuſtome upon fels and leather, it is now no longer urged; becauſe it appears expreſly by divers records of 3 E. 1. in the Tower, that it was granted per les grandes et al prier des comons et de les merchants de tout Engleterre, and by a record of

Ro. Pat. 3 E. 3. M. 1. ſtat. 25. E. 1. c. 7. Ro. fin. intus 3 E. 1. M. 24.

3 E. 1. M. 1. Ro. Par.

25 E. 1. cap. 7. ſtat. printed, per communitatem regni noſtri Angliæ, which concurres alſo with the ſtatute of 25 E. 1. cap. 7. in print; ‘ ſaving to us and our heires the cuſtomes of ‘ wools, ſkins and leather granted heretofore by the commi- ‘ nalty aforeſaid.’ The pattent roll of 3 E. 1. which hath theſe words, cum prelati magnates ac tota comunitas mercatorum regni noſtri nuper nobis conceſſerunt quandam novam conſuetudinem, viz. de quolibet ſacco lanæ 6s. 8d. &c. being ſomething obſcure, are by the concurrence of all thoſe other records ſo cleerely expounded, as there cannot be, neither now is there, any queſtion made, but that the cuſtome of a demy-marke, and the other old cuſtomes, which by my lord Dyer, and by all thoſe who argued for or againſt impoſitions in the Exchequer, was held to be due by the common-lawe, was by grant in parliament. Neverthelеſſe the ſtrength of the argument they ſtill retaine. Though the demy-mark and thoſe old cuſtomes upon the ſtaple commodities were by act of parliament; yet, ſay they, before that increaſe by parliament the king had cuſtome, and no doubt a ſome certaine. Otherwiſe could not this increaſe be called nova conſuetudo. Beſides, ſay they, the cuſtome reduced to a certainty by 3 E. 1. is only upon three commodities, wool, ſkins, and leather. There are many other commodities, which did likewiſe pay cuſtome. How began that cuſtome, ſay they, if not by the kings abſolute power? And when was that power taken away? I anſwer, admit it were by the kings abſolute power, yet that the king hath cleerely diſcharged himſelf of that power by act of parliament, I hope I have cleerely proved. But this queſtion, how began the firſt cuſtoms, is beſt anſwered by another queſtion, how began the fine for purchaſe of originall writs, the fine pro licentia concordandi, the certainty of priſage? Nay, who reduced it firſt to certaintie, that the tryall of iſſues ſhould be by twelve jurors, no more nor no leſſe; that the full age of a man ſhould be accounted twenty-one yeeres; of a woman fourteene, twelve yeeres her age of conſent, and nine yeeres capable to bee endowed; a yeere and a day given to ſue an appeale; the like limitation of a yeere and day in very many other caſes? In effect, who reduced all the known grounds of the common-law to that certainty that now they are? Becauſe wee cannot tell how or when they began, ſhall wee therefore conclude, that they began by the kings abſolute power, and inferre, that by the ſame reaſon, they may bee changed at his pleaſure? If the king may increaſe his fines upon the purchaſe of originall writts (which by the ſame reaſon hee may doe, that he may doe his cuſtome, nay, hee hath more colour for this then for that, becauſe there is no ſtatute againſt this) hee might eaſily raiſe that revenue to the value of his cuſtomes. But no man can, nor will I hope offer to mainteine it to bee lawfull. You ſee the weakeneſſe and the dangerous conſequence of this argument, by comparing it to other caſes of like nature. To ſay the truth, all theſe things began no man can ſay certainly when or how, but by a tacit conſent of king and people, and the long approbation of time beyond the memory of any man, and yet no man can directly affirm but that moſt of them might begin by act of parliament, though now there bee no records extant of ſuch antient parliaments. The firſt parliament was not kept 9 H. 3. though it be the firſt in our bookes. If we will give credit to other records, and to our beſt chroniclers, we ſhall heare and reade of divers parliaments in the reigne of king John, and of his predeceſſor Rich. 1. and in the reign of H. 2. of two famous parliaments, one at Claringdon in Wiltſhire, the other at Gedington in Northamptonſhire. And although our chronicles ſay, that the firſt parliament kept in this realm was held 19 Aprilis, 16 H. 1. yet I am of opinion, that William the Conqueror held parliaments; for what can be elſe underſtood by theſe words, per commune conſilium totius regni noſtri ſtabilitum fuit, which I finde in Mr. Lamberts collection of the ancient lawes of England, in the beginning of the lawes of William the Conqueror? Many of the ſtatutes of E. 1. have no other words. Nay, long before him, in the yeere of our Lord 712. in the time of Inas king of the Weſt-Saxons, I aſſure my ſelf there were parliaments held, and that of the three eſtates, as at this day; as may appeare by theſe words in the beginning of the lawes of king Inas, in Mr. Lambert, Suaſu & inſtituto epiſcoporum noſtrorum omnium, ſenatorum noſtrorum, & natu majorum populi noſtri in frequentia magna: and more plainly in the concluſion of ſome other of his lawes; hoc factum fuit per commune conſilium & aſſenſum procerum, comitum, & omnium ſapientium ſeniorum, & populorum totius regni, & per præceptum regis Inæ, which are the ſame in Latine which ours is in Engliſh, by the king, the lords ſpirituall and temporall, and the commons. Why might not the cuſtome upon woolls be firſt granted at one of theſe parliaments, as well as to have it firſt begun by the kings abſolute power? There is no more probability of the one than the other. Becauſe moſt of the ancient records were burnt in H. 2. time, when the Exchequer was burnt, ſhall we conclude therefore that there were never any ſuch? You ſee the weaknes of this argument in all the points thereof. I leave it, and paſſe to another.

The anti-quity of Parliaments.

The ſecond argument, that the king may totally reſtrain the importing and exporting of merchandizes, therefore he may do it ſub modo by laying of an impoſition, anſwered.

The king may, ſay they, reſtrain the paſſage of merchants at his pleaſure, which they prove by divers records; 2. E. 1. m. 18. Ro. Par. 2. E. 1. m. 17. Ro. fin. 31. E. 1. n 44. Ro. Pat. 17 H. 6. Ro. Cla. in dorſo. Upon which they inferre, that if he may reſtraine a merchant that he ſhall not paſſe at all, he may much more ſo reſtraine him that he ſhall not paſſe except he pay a certaine ſum of money: for this, ſay they, is leſſe than totally to reſtraine him; and cui licet quod majus, licet etiam quod minus. Of this argument my lord Dyer gave light in his caſe of impoſitions, 1 Eliz. and this hath been diverſly inforced by all that have argued for impoſitions. In anſwer of which, I will conſider, how farre the king may reſtrain the paſſage of merchants; and then will examine the conſequence of the argument.

For my part, I think the king cannot reſtrain the paſſage of merchants, but for ſome ſpeciall cauſe; wherein to define certainly and reſolutely, to ſay for what cauſes he may, and for what not, I will not undertake. Onely let me inform you, that there is not one of theſe preſidents vouched by them to prove the kings power to reſtraine, but they are upon ſpeciall reaſons; as by reaſon of enmity with ſuch a nation from whence they are reſtrained, or becauſe ſuch a commodity may not be ſpared within the kingdome. Beſides, they are not reſtraints from all places, and of all manner of merchandizes, but from certain places onely, and for certain ſorts of merchandizes. And for my part I thinke that reſtraints in all theſe caſes, and of like nature, are by the common-law left to the kings abſolute power; for if it were otherwiſe, it ſhould be in the power of a merchant for a little private lucre to enrich the kings enemies, or to furniſh them with munition to be imployed againſt the ſtate, or utterly to ruine the common-wealth, by carrying out a commodity which may not be ſpared, or by bringing in of ſome that may be hurtfull. Nay, which is more, ſuch may be the occaſion, that the king may, I doubt not, ſtop the paſſages of all merchants from all places for a ſhort time, as upon the death of the late queen it was put in practiſe, to prevent intelligence. There may likewiſe be ſuch neceſſary uſe of their ſhips, as the want of them upon ſome ſodaine attempts may be a cauſe of the overthrow of the whole ſtate. In ſuch caſes as theſe, if the common-law did not give the king leave to reſtraine their paſſage by his abſolute power, it were very improvident in the higheſt points, which cannot be imagined of ſo wiſe a law. And yet the kings of this realme have alwayes been ſparing in the practiſe of their abſolute power in this point; for there are little leſſe then 30. acts of parliament, touching the opening and ſhutting up of the paſſage of merchants, moſt of which, as I conceive, were made rather for the increaſe of puniſhment, then for want of power in the king; for the breach of a reſtraint by abſolute commandment is puniſhable, as all other contempts, onely by fine and impriſonment, and not by forfeiture of the merchandizes, as in the preſident of the wines, an. 5. of queene Mary, vouched by me, and is in ſome of thoſe old preſidents. If it be otherwiſe, I muſt confeſſe I know not the reaſon of the difference of this from other contempts. You ſee, that I have yeelded to their propoſition, that the king may by his abſolute power reſtraine the paſſage of merchants, and have therein granted more then their preſidents prove. But is the conſequence good, that becauſe the king may reſtrain, therefore he may impoſe upon ſuch as paſſe? Firſt I denie, that in our caſe there is any reſtraint at all, as there was in the caſe of the French wines, by queen Mary, by her proclamation going before the impoſition. For proofe of which, I referre you to the kings letters patents prefixed before the laſt book of rates; by which inſtrument, the impoſitions now complained of were altogether raiſed. You ſhall finde it no other then a declaration of the kings pleaſure ſo to have it, and a courſe preſcribed for levying of it. But admitting, that the very laying of an impoſition did implie a reſtraint, yet I denie the conſequence, becauſe the king may reſtrain totally, that therefore he may reſtraine for a time, or from certaine places, or certaine commodities, or certaine merchants; this indeed is a good argument, à majori ad minus. But becauſe he may reſtraine totally, therefore, that he may give paſſage for money, is no good conſequence; for in our caſe, there is no reſtraint at all, but it is rather a paſſage for money. If there be juſt occaſion of reſtraint, the law giveth the king power to reſtraine. But when merchants may without hurt to the ſtate have paſſage, as in our caſe, to enforce them to pay for that paſſage is in my opinion as unlawfull, as to enforce any man whatſoever to pay for doing that which he may lawfully doe. Merchants have, as I may ſo ſay, as good inheritance in their trade, as any man in his lands; and when it may ſtand with the good of the ſtate, that they may paſſe, they ought to paſſe as freely without charge impoſed on them, as any man ought to hold his inheritance, or any artificer or other tradeſman ought to exerciſe their lawfull trades and means of living, free from burdens to be laid on by the kings abſolute power. If all others ſhould be free, and onely merchants, who adventure their perſons and eſtates in ſo many dangers, to bring us from farre places ſuch things, as without which we cannot ſubſiſt, and to return us profit for our ſuperfluities, ſhould be ſubject to involuntarie burthens, their eſtate were of all other mens moſt unhappy and ſlaviſh, which, of all other trades, is indeed the nobleſt, and moſt worthy to be cheriſhed.

And here by the way I note, that, in all other nations of the world, where the merchant is ſubject to impoſitions at the kings pleaſure, the landlord, the farmer, the artificer, the very plowman, and all others, are in like ſort ſubject to taxes and burdens, when the king pleaſeth. The merchant is not the man alone that is ſubject to taxes, and all other men free. If, in the frame of our common-wealth, it were thought fit to free all other trades and profeſſions from taxes, much more ought it to be thought reaſonable, that our merchants ſhould be free, and by all means poſſible incouraged in their trade; for our caſe is not as it is with other nations of the Continent. We are iſlanders, and divided by the ſea from all the world, and in that reſpect have ſuch uſe of merchants, as we cannot live without them. If therefore any ſhould be free amongſt us, it ſhould be the merchant; and not the quite contrary, onely the merchant charged, and all others free. Plato in his 8. book de Rep. is of opinion, that the merchant, for his incouragement to trade, ſhould be free from all cuſtome whatſoever. We ſeek only to be free of involuntary impoſitions. But to return to the argument of reſtraint, from whence I am a little digreſſed. If it be a good argument, that becauſe the king may reſtraine in toto, he may reſtrain in tanto; it will not be denied unto me, for it followeth neceſſarily, that in caſes where he cannot reſtraine in toto, he cannot reſtraine in tanto. But there is no man that will ſay, that he may reſtraine the entrance and paſſage of all merchants, to and from all the parts of the world whatſoever, without any limitation of time, but the reſtraint to endure for ever, and for all kinds of merchandizes whatſoever, of moſt neceſſary and common uſe, to be brought into, or carried out of the realme. There is no man I ſuppoſe will ſay, that the law hath given the king power to make ſo unreaſonable a reſtraint as this; for it were to give him a power to deſtroy merchandize, and conſequently to ruine the common-wealth. Beſide, it were againſt the law of nations, and of reaſon itſelf. It cannot be imagined, that any wiſe law in the world ſhould allow it. But if our impoſitions, as it is ſaid, doe implie a reſtraint, and that a reſtraint be always the fore-runner of all impoſitions, then ſuch an unreaſonable reſtraint, as I have ſpoken of, muſt needs be preſuppoſed to have been the ground or fore-runner of our preſent impoſition. For in our impoſitions, are not all the merchandizes of neceſſary and common uſe charged? Are not all the merchants denizens and ſtrangers, importing from any part, or exporting to any part of the world, ſubject to the charge? Is there any limitation of time, but to endure for ever? If I ſay ſuch a reſtraint had been unlawfull, which I ſuppoſe no man will denie, then whatſoever implieth ſuch a reſtraint, which our impoſitions doe, is likewiſe unlawfull. But the ill conſequence of this their argument drawne from the kings power of reſtraint, will beſt appeare by comparing it to other caſes.

I little doubt, but the king upon ſome occaſion may lawfully reſtraine the paſſage of all men through the gates of London; as for the purpoſe, when the citie ſhall be beſieged, or in the time of an extreme plague. Nay is it not by authoritie derived onely from him, that the gates are ſhut every night? Doth it follow therefore, that becauſe he may doe it upon ſome extraordinary occaſion, or at ſome time, that he may ſhut up the paſſage for ever; or that preſuppoſing ſuch a reſtraint by his abſolute power, he may lay an impoſition upon every burthen of any thing brought in, or carried out, as the duke of Florence and many other ſtates in Italy and Germany doe, or upon every man by the poll, that ſhall paſſe thro' the gates?

You ſee the weakneſſe and danger of the conſequence of this argument, and how it tends to juſtifie impoſitions within the land. And ſo I leave it, and proceed to the next.

The third argument, that the ports are the kings, and that he may open them and ſhut them upon what conditions he pleaſeth, anſwered.

The ports and haven townes of England are, ſay they, the kings; and, in regard thereof, he may open and ſhut them upon what conditions he pleaſeth. I anſwere,

1. That the poſition, that all the ports are the kings, is not generally true; for ſubjects may alſo be owners of ports, as may appeare by the patent roll of 3. E. 1. M. 1. parl. where you ſhall finde, that king Ed. 1. granted to the lords of port townes the forfeitures granted to him by parliament, for not duly paying the new cuſtome of the demy-marke within every ſeverall port of theirs, where the merchandizes ſhould happen to be imported or exported. But admitting the truth of the poſition, yet is the conſequence as weake and dangerous, as of any of the reſt of their arguments. For are not all the gates of cities and townes, and all the ſtreets and highways in England the kings, and as much ſubject to be open or ſhut at his pleaſure, as the ports are? Nay, whenſoever we ſpeak of the highway in any law buſineſſe, we call it via regia, the kings highway; and the king in his commiſſions, ſpeaking of London, or any other citie, calls it civitas noſtra London, or civitas noſtra Exon. Doth it follow therefore, that the king may lay impoſitions upon every man, or upon all commodities that ſhall paſſe through any of theſe places? Nay the gates of the kings owne houſe, for the purpoſe his pallace of Weſtminſter, are his in a farre neerer degree then any of theſe. May he therefore by his proclamation impoſe upon every man that ſhall paſſe in or out at Weſtminſter-hall doore a ſumme of money? Doubtleſſe he may not; becauſe the king is a perſon publike, and his ſubjects ought to have acceſſe to him, as to the fountaine of juſtice, and to the courts of juſtice ſitting by his authoritie. I make little doubt, but his majeſtie may upon juſt occaſion cauſe any of theſe paſſages to be ſhut, as he may alſo the paſſage at the havens. But when the paſſage may without danger to the ſtate be open, and that the ſubjects may paſſe, his majeſtie may not then exact money for their paſſage; for the law hath given the king power over theſe things, for the good of the common-wealth, and not thereby to charge and burden the ſubject. If the king may not exact money for paſſage in and out of his court gates, becauſe of the publikeneſſe of his perſon; nor for paſſage through the gates of cities; much leſſe may he for paſſage out at the ports, which are the great gates of the kingdom, and which the ſubject ought as freely to enjoy, as the ayre or the water.

The fourth argument, that the king is bound at his owne charge, to protect merchants; and therefore it is neceſſary it ſhould be in his power to lay moderate impoſitions upon merchandizes for raiſing of money to defray his charge, anſwered.

Another of their arguments is this. The king is bound to protect merchants from ſpoile by the enemie; he ought to fortifie the havens, that their ſhips may there abide in ſafety; he ought, if occaſion be, to ſend ambaſſadors to forrein princes, to negotiate for them; and many the like charges is the king by the law to undergoe for the protection of his merchants. It is reaſon, therefore, that his expence be defraied out of the profit made by merchants; and conſequently, that he may impoſe upon merchandize a moderate charge, thereby to repay himſelf.

The conſequence of this argument is thus farre true. The law expects, that the king ſhould protect merchants. Therefore it alloweth him out of merchandize a revenue for the maintenance of his charge, which is the old cuſtome due, as at firſt I ſaid, by the common-law. But it is no good conſequence, that therefore he may take what he liſt, no more then he may at his pleaſure increaſe that old revenue, which the law giveth him for protecting of ſubjects in their ſuits, or for protecting wards, &c.

The fifth argument, that all forraine princes have power to impoſe, and if our king had not the like it might be very inconvenient to this ſtate, anſwered.

Another argument of theirs is this. All other princes of the world may impoſe upon merchandize at their pleaſure; and ſo may make our merchandizes leſſe vendible with them, by laying an impoſition upon them, to be paid by us, when they are brought into their territories, whereby their owne commodities of the ſame nature may be ſold more to the gaine of their merchants, and our merchant impoveriſhed, or driven from his trade. They may alſo lay impoſitions upon our merchants fetching commodities from thence, and leave their owne merchants free from any impoſition in the ſame caſe; by which their merchants ſhall reape all the profit by that commoditie, in affording it better cheape to us here, then we can fetch it, and conſequently our merchants ſhall be undone. Many the like caſes have been put to prove, that if the king of England may not impoſe, as other princes may, they ſhall be able at their pleaſure to deſtroy our trading. This I conceive was the ſame as now it is, during all that time from Ed. 3. till queen Mary; and doubtleſſe it could not but ſometimes, during that long ſpace, ſo fall out, that forreine princes did put their power in practiſe to our prejudice, and yet we heare not of any impoſition laid by any of our kings by their abſolute power; which may give any man aſſurance, that they tooke ſome other courſe to meet with the inconvenience; and indeed the meanes are divers, which theſe our kings uſed to prevent it.

Firſt, they were carefull in all their leagues and treaties with forrain princes, eſpecially to provide for it; as may appeare by the records of the ancient leagues. Neither is there any league of late time, that hath not had an article for proviſion in this point; which leagues for the moſt part are upon oath on both parts. And yet, for further ſecuritie, our kings have always had ambaſſadors reſident in the courts of ſuch forrain princes, to put them in minde of their leagues, if upon any occaſion our merchants have in that caſe happened to be never ſo little wronged by them; and if upon complaint of the ambaſſador, our merchants have not found redreſſe, our kings have held the league as broken, and denounced warre, or ſeiſed all the goods of the ſame princes ſubjects within England; and I dare ſay there have been more warres undertaken by our princes againſt forrain nations onely for this cauſe, then for any one other cauſe whatſoever.

Beſides, our kings have in this caſe ſometimes made uſe of that their prerogative of reſtraint, either by prohibiting our merchants from carrying our commodities into thoſe parts, where they are charged with impoſitions, that ſo by the want of our commodities, forraine princes might be enforced to abate their impoſitions laid upon them; or by reſtraining the merchants of forrain princes to import or export commodities from hence; by which meanes forraine princes have been compelled to deale favourably with our merchants for the good of their owne ſubjects. All theſe are lawfull and ordinary means to prevent or redreſſe the inconvenience which may grow by the impoſitions of other princes. If all theſe ordinary means ſhould happen to faile, which can hardly ſo fall out, and that the laying of impoſitions be indeed the only means that is left to redreſſe the inconvenience, why ſhould not that be done by act of parliament as well in theſe times, as it was in 7 Hen. 7. c. 7. to take downe the impoſition of foure ducates upon a but of malmſey, impoſed by the Venetians, and as it was done by queen Eliz. the 19 yeere of her reigne, to prevent the laying of impoſitions by forraine princes upon ſalt-fiſh, as may appeare by the printed ſtatutes of 19 Eliz. cap. 10? But, as I have ſaid, the providence of the prince and ordinary power of reſtraint may very well meet with the inconvenience.

Theſe are the chiefe reaſons made in maintenance of impoſitions. The weakneſſe of them, and their dangerous conſequence, you cannot but perceive; for, by the ſame reaſons, taxes within the land may be as well proved to be lawfull. On the contrary part, you have heard the reaſons againſt impoſitions fortified by many records and ſtatutes in the point. So as I conclude, that impoſitions, neither in the time of warre, or other the greateſt neceſſitie or occaſion that may be, much leſſe in the time of peace, neither upon forraine nor inland commodities of whatſoever nature, be they never ſo ſuperfluous or unneceſſary, neither upon merchants ſtrangers nor denizens, may be laid by the kings abſolute power, without aſſent of parliament, be it for never ſo ſhort a time, much leſſe to endure for ever, as ours. Though this be now my opinion, yet am not I ſo obſtinate therein, but if yet I heare better reaſon, I will once againe change my minde. In the meane while, you ſee I had reaſon to alter my firſt opinion, as being grounded upon very weak reaſons, as now they appeare unto me. And ſo I ſuppoſe they doe alſo unto you.

Mr. Yelverton*'s argument againſt impoſitions by the crown.* (a)

The queſtion is, Whether the king, without aſſent of parliament, may ſet impoſitions upon the wares and goods of merchants exported, and imported, out of, and into this realme.

THREE things have been debated in this parliament, that have much concerned the right of our whole nation, of which every one of them hath exceeded the other by a gradation in weight and moment.

The name of Britaine not admitted in legall proceedings.

The firſt was the change of our name, which was a point of honour, wherein we ſhewed our ſelves not willing to leave that name, by which our anceſtors made our nation famous; yet have we loſt it, ſaving onely in thoſe caſes, where our ancient and faithfull protector; the common-law doth retaine it.

Coke l. 7. Calvins caſe.

The ſecond was the union, a queſtion of greater moment; for that concerned the freehold of our whole nation; not in ſo high a point as having, or not having, but in point of diviſion and participation, that is, whether we ſhould enjoy the benefits and liberties of the kingdome our ſelves onely, as we and our anceſtors have done, or admit our neighbour nation to have equall right in them, and ſo make our own part the leſs, by how much the greater number ſhould be among whom the diviſion was to be made. This was adjudged againſt us both legally and ſolemnly, and therefore in that we reſt, hoping of that effect of this judgement which we read of in the poet,

Virgil. Æn. l. 1. Dido's ſpeech to Æneas.

Tros Tyriuſque mihi nullo diſcrimine habetur.

The third is the queſtion now in hand, which exceedeth the other two in importance and conſequence, concerning the whole kingdome; for it is a queſtion of our very eſſence; not what we ſhall be called, nor how we ſhall divide that we have, but whether we ſhall have any thing or nothing: for if there be a right in the king to alter the property of that which is ours without our conſent, we are but tenants at his will of that which we have. If it be in the king and parliament, then have we propertie, and are tenants at our own will: for that which is done in parliament, is done by all our wills and conſents. And this is the very ſtate of the queſtion which is propoſed, that is, whether the king may impoſe without conſent of parliament.

Impoſitions are of two natures, forreine and inteſtine.

Inteſtine be thoſe which are raiſed within our land in the commerce and dealing that is at home within our ſelves, and may aſwell for that reaſon be ſo called, as for that veſcuntur inteſtinis reipublicæ, they are fed and nouriſhed with the conſuming and waſting of the entrails of the common-wealth. Againſt theſe I need not to ſpeake; for the kings learned councell have with great honour and conſcience in full councell acknowledged them to be againſt the law.

Therefore I will apply my ſelf to ſpeak of impoſitions forreine, being the ſingle queſtion now in hand, and maintained on the kings behalfe with great art and eloquence.

The inconvenience of theſe impoſitions to the common-wealth, that is, how hurtfull they are to the merchants, in impoveriſhing them in their eſtates; to the king in the increaſing of his revenues by decay of traffique; and to the whole people in making all commodities exceſſive deare, is confeſſed by all, and therefore need no debate. The point of right is now only in queſtion, and of that I will ſpeak with conſcience and integrity, rather deſirous that the truth may be knowne, and right be done, than that the opinion of my ſelf or any other may prevaile.

The occaſion of this queſtion was given by the book of rates lately ſet out, affronted with the copy of letters patents, dated July 28. 6 Jac. In which book, beſides the rates, is ſet down every kind of merchandiſe, exported and imported, for the true anſwering of ſubſidy to the king, according to the ſtatute of tonnage and poundage.

In the firſt yeare of his reigne there is an addition of impoſitions upon all thoſe kind of wares, which within the book are expreſſed, and the rate of the impoſition as high and in ſome caſes higher than the rate of the ſubſidy: and this declared to be by authority of thoſe letters patents. Hereupon conſidering with my ſelfe, that heretofore the ſetting on of one only impoſition without aſſent of parliament, upon ſome one kinde of merchandiſe, and that for a ſmall time, and upon urgent neceſſity of actuall war, did ſo affect our whole nation, and eſpecially the great councell of the parliament, being the repreſentative body of the whole common-wealth, that neither the ſun did ſhine, nor the rivers run their courſes until it was taken off by the publick judgment of the whole ſtate: I thought it concerned me, and other members of that councell, that were no leſs truſted for our countrey than thoſe in former times, and have their actions to guide and direct us, to have the ſame care they had in preſerving the rights and liberties of the people, having now more cauſe then they had, for that the impoſitions now ſet on without aſſent of parliament, are not upon one or two ſpeciall kinds of goods, but almoſt indefinite upon all, and do extend to the number of many hundreds, as appeareth by that printed book of rates, and are ſet in charge upon the whole kingdome as an inheritance to continue to the king, his heires and ſucceſſors for ever; which limitation of eſtate in matter of impoſitions was never heard of, nor read of before, as I conceive.

Tit. Liv. l. 3.

The inducements expreſſed in theſe letters patents are much upon point of ſtate, and with reference to the rights and practice of forraine princes. For this I will not take upon me to enter into the conſideration of ſuch great myſteries of policie and government, but will only put you in minde of that I obſerve out of Tit. Livius the Romane hiſtoriographer. Omnem divini humanique moris memoriam abolemus, cum nova peregrinaque patriis & priſcis præferimus.

To that which hath been ſpoken for the kings prerogative, I will give anſwer to ſo much of it as I may conveniently in my paſſage through this debate: wherein I will principally endeavour to give ſatiſfaction to ſuch new objections as were made by the worthie and learned counſellor of the king, that ſpake laſt in maintenance of his majeſties prerogative.

P*a*t. July 22. Jac. 6.

The caſe in termes is this. The king by his letters patents before recited, hath ordained, willed, and commanded, that theſe new impoſitions, contained in that book of rates, ſhall be for ever hereafter payd unto him his heirs and ſucceſſors, upon paine of his diſpleaſure. Hereupon the queſtion ariſeth, whether by this edict and ordinance ſo made by the king himſelfe, by his letters patents of his own will and power abſolute, without aſſent of parliament, he be ſo lawfully intituled to that he doth impoſe, as that thereby he doth alter the property of his ſubjects goods, and is enabled to recover theſe impoſitions by courſe of law.

I think he cannot; and I ground my opinion upon theſe foure reaſons.

1. It is againſt the naturall frame and conſtitution of the policie of this

(a) By an order of the commons licencing the publication, this argument appears to have been firſt printed in 1641. But it is here extracted from an edition of 1658.—The title runs thus: ‘ The Rights of the People concerning Impoſitions, ſtated in a learned Argument; with a Remonſtrance preſented to the Kings moſt excellent Majeſty, by the honourable Houſe of Commons, in the Parliament, An. Dom. 1610. Annoq. Regis Jac. 7. By a late eminent Judge of this Nation.’—The following addreſs to the reader was prefixed. ‘ To the courteous reader. This excellent treatiſe of the no leſs worthy author, happily falling into my hands, I inſtantly thought it my duty to make that publick, which had given ſo much uſeful ſatiſfaction to many learned, and judicious, in private; remembring that antient adage, bonum quò communius, eò præſtantius.

‘ I hope it is needleſs to commend either the reverend author deceaſed, the treatiſe, its uſe, or ſtile; ſince the authority by which it is publiſhed, is a ſufficient argument of their known worth.

‘ If thou kindly accept of his good meaning, whoſe onely aim in the publiſhing hereof was the common good, it will be an encouragement to him (and others) to preſent to thy view, what may hereafter fall into his hands worthy thy further peruſal. ‘ Thine; J. B.’

The addreſs to the reader was preceded with the following remonſtrance, which was made to king James by the houſe of commons 24. May 1610.

‘ A remonſtrance delivered to his majeſty in writing, after the inhibition given by him to the commons houſe of parliament, aſwell by word of mouth, as by letters, not to proceed in the examining his right to impoſe without aſſent of parliament.

‘ To the kings moſt excellent majeſty.

‘ Moſt gracious ſovereign,

‘ Whereas we your majeſties moſt humble ſubjects, the commons aſſembled in parliament, have received firſt by meſſage, and ſince by ſpeech from your majeſty, a command of reſtraint from debating in parliament your majeſties right of impoſing upon your ſubjects goods exported, or imported out of, or into this realm; yet allowing us to examine the grievance of theſe impoſitions in regard of quantity, time, and other circumſtances of diſproportion thereto incident: we your ſaid humble ſubjects nothing doubting but that your majeſty had no intent by that command to infringe the antient and fundamental right of the liberty of parliament in point of exact diſcuſſing of all matters concerning them, and their poſſeſſions, goods, and rights whatſoever, which yet we cannot but conceive to be done in effect by this command, do with all humble duty make this remonſtrance unto your majeſty.

‘ Firſt, we hold it an antient, general and undoubted right of parliament, to debate freely all matters which do properly concern the ſubject, and his right or eſtate; which freedom of debate being once fore-cloſed, the eſſence of the liberty of parliament is withal diſſolved.

‘ And whereas in this caſe the ſubjects right on the one ſide, and your majeſties prerogatives on the other, cannot poſſibly be ſevered in debate of either: we alledge, that your majeſties prerogatives of that kinde concerning directly the ſubjects right and intereſt, are daily handled and diſcuſſed in all courts at Weſtminſter, and have been ever freely debated upon all fit occaſions, both in this and all other former parliaments, without reſtraint; which being forbidden, it is impoſſible for the ſubject, either to know, or to maintain his right and propriety to his own lands and goods, though never ſo juſt and manifeſt.

‘ It may further pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty to underſtand, that we have no minde to impugn, but a deſire to inform our ſelves of your highneſs prerogative in that point, which (if ever) is now moſt neceſſary to be known; and though it were to no other purpoſe, yet to ſatisfie the generality of your majeſties ſubjects, who, finding themſelves much grieved by theſe new impoſitions, do languiſh in much ſorrow and diſcomfort.

‘ Theſe reaſons, dread ſovereign, being the proper reaſons of parliament, do plead for the upholding of this our antient right and liberty. Howbeit ſeeing it hath pleaſed your majeſty to inſiſt upon that judgment in the Exchequer, as being direction ſufficient for us without further examination: upon great deſire of leaving your majeſty unſatisfied in no one point of one of our intents and proceedings, we profeſs touching that judgement, that we neither do nor will take upon us to reverſe it; but our deſire is to know the reaſons whereupon the ſame was grounded; and the rather, for that a general conceit is had, that the reaſons of that judgement may be extended much further, even to the utter ruine of the antient liberty of this kingdom, and of your ſubjects right of propriety to their goods and lands.

‘ Then for the judgement it ſelf, being the firſt and laſt that ever was given in that kind (for ought appearing unto us,) and being onely in one caſe, and againſt one man, it can binde in law no other but that perſon; and is alſo reverſible by writ of error granted heretofore by act of parliament; and neither he nor any other ſubject is debarred by it from trying his right in the ſame or like caſe, in any of your majeſties courts of record at Weſtminſter.

‘ Laſtly, we nothing doubt, but our intended proceeding in a full examination of the right, nature, and meaſure of theſe new impoſitions (if this reſtraint had not come between) ſhould not have been ſo orderly and ſo moderately carried and imployed to the manifold neceſſities of theſe times, and given your majeſty ſo true a view of the ſtate and right of your ſubjects, that it would have been much to your majeſties content and ſatisfaction, (which we moſt deſire,) and removed all cauſes of fears and jealouſies from the loyal hearts of your ſubjects, which is (as it ought to be) our careful endeavour: whereas contrariwiſe in that other way directed by your majeſty, we cannot ſafely proceed without concluding for ever the right of the ſubject, which without due examination thereof we may not do.

‘ We therefore your loyal and dutiful commons, not ſwerving from the approved ſteps of our anceſtors, moſt humbly and inſtantly beſeech your gracious majeſty, that, without offence to the ſame, we may, according to the undoubted right and liberty of parliament, proceed in our intended courſe of a full examination of theſe impoſitions; that ſo we may chearfully paſs on to your majeſties buſineſs, from which this ſtop hath by diverſion ſo long with held us. And we your majeſties moſt humble, faithful, and loyal ſubjects ſhall ever (according to our bounden duty) pray for your majeſties long and happy reign over us.’

kingdome, which is jus publicum regni, and ſo ſubverteth the fundamentall law of the realme, and induceth a new forme of ſtate and government.

2. It is againſt the municipall law of the land, which is jus privatum, the law of property and of private right.

3. It is againſt divers ſtatutes made to reſtraine our king in this point.

4. It is againſt the practice and action of our common-wealth, contra morem majorum; and this is the modeſteſt rule to limit both kings prerogatives, and ſubjects liberties.

Upon the firſt and fourth of theſe foure principal grounds I will more inſiſt then upon the ſecond and third, both for that in their own nature they are a more proper matter for a councel of ſtate, to the judgement of which I apply my diſcourſe, and they have not been enforced by others; as alſo for that the other two, as more fit for a barre, and the courts of ordinary juſtice, have by ſome profeſſors of the law been already moſt learnedly and exquiſitely diſcuſſed.

1 Reaſon againſt the conſtitution of the ſoveraignty.

For the firſt, it will be admitted for a rule, and ground of ſtate, that in every common-wealth and government there be ſome rights of ſovereignty, jura majeſtatis, which regularly and of common right doe belong to the ſoveraign power of that ſtate; unleſs cuſtome, or the proviſional ordinance of that ſtate doe otherwiſe diſpoſe of them: which ſoveraigne power is poteſtas ſuprema, a power that can controule all other powers, and cannot be controuled but by it ſelf.

It will not be denied, that the power of impoſing hath ſo great a truſt in it, by reaſon of the miſchiefes may grow to the common-wealth by the abuſes of it, that it hath ever been ranked among thoſe rights of ſoveraign power.

Then is there no further queſtion to be made, but to examine where the ſoveraigne power is in this kingdome; for there is the right of impoſition.

The ſoveraigne power is agreed to be in the king: but in the king is a two-fold power; the one in parliament, as he is aſſiſted with the conſent of the whole ſtate; the other out of parliament, as he is ſole, and ſingular, guided merely by his own will. And if of theſe two powers in the king, one is greater than the other, and can direct and controule the other; that is ſuprema poteſtas, the ſoveraigne power, and the other is ſubordinata.

It will then be eaſily proved, that the power of the king in parliament is greater than his power out of parliament; and doth rule and controule it; for if the king make a grant by his letters patents out of parliament, it bindeth him and his ſucceſſors; he cannot revoke it, nor any of his ſucceſſors; but by his power in parliament he may defeate and avoyd it; and therefore that is the greater power.

H. 7. 19. 6. Lib. Intrac. fol. 302. c. 1.

If a judgement be given in the Kings Bench, by the king himſelfe, as may be, and by the law is intended, a writ of error, to reverſe this judgement, may be ſued before the king in parliament; which writ muſt be granted by the chancellor, upon bill indorſed by the king himſelf, as the book is 1 H. 7. 19. 6. And the forme of the writ of error is, that it being directed to the chiefe juſtice of the Kings Bench; quia in recordo & proceſſu, ac etiam in redditione judicii loquelæ, quæ fuit in curiâ noſtrâ coram nobis, error intervenit manifeſtus ad grave damnum, &c. nos errorem (ſi quis fuerit) modo debito corrigi, & partibus prædictis plenam & celerem juſtitiam fieri volentes, in hâc parte vobis mandamus, quod recordum & proceſſum loquelæ illius cum omnibus ea tangentibus, in præſens parliamentum noſtrum ſub ſigillo tuo diſtinctè & apertè mittas & hoc breve, ut inſpectis, &c. nos de conſilio & adviſamento dominorum ſpiritualium & temporalium, ac communitatis in parliamento noſtro prædicto exiſtentis, ulterius pro errore illo corrigendo fieri faciamus, quod de jure & ſecundum legem & conſuetudinem regni noſtri Angliæ fuerit faciendum. So you ſee the appeal is from the king out of the parliament, to the king in parliament; the writ is in his name; the rectifying and correcting the errours is by him, but with the aſſent of the lords and commons, than which there can be no ſtronger evidence to prove, that his power out of parliament is ſubordinate to his power in parliament; for in acts of parliament, be they lawes, grounds, or whatſoever elſe, the act and power is the kings, but with the aſſent of the lords and commons, which maketh it the moſt ſoveraigne and ſupreme power above all, and controulable by none. Beſides this right of impoſing, there be others in the kingdome of the ſame nature. As the power to make lawes; the power of naturalization; the power of erection of arbitrary government; the power to judge without appeale; the power to legitimate; all which do belong to the king only in parliament. Others there be of the ſame nature, that the king may exerciſe out of parliament, which right is grown unto him in them, more in thoſe others by the uſe and practice of the common-wealth, as denization, coynage, making warre; which power the king hath time out of minde practiſed, without the gainſaying and murmuring of his ſubjects. But theſe other powers beforementioned have ever been executed by him in parliament, and not otherwiſe, but with the reluctation of the whole kingdome.

The booke is not ſo, that the commons ſhould meddle.

Can any man give me a reaſon, why the king can only in parliament make lawes? No man ever read any law whereby it was ſo ordained; and yet no man ever read that any king practiſed the contrary. Therefore it is the originall right of the kingdome, and the very natural conſtitution of our ſtate and policy, being one of the higheſt rights of ſoveraigne power. So it is in naturalization, legitimation, and the reſt of that ſort before recited.

It hath been alleadged, that thoſe, which in this cauſe have enforced their reaſons from this maxime of ours, that the king cannot alter the law, have diverted from the queſtion.

I ſay under favor they have not; for that in effect is the very queſtion now in hand; for if he alone out of parliament may impoſe, he altereth the law of England in one of theſe two maine fundamental points. He muſt either take his ſubjects goods from them, without aſſent of the party, which is againſt the law; or elſe he muſt give his own letters pattents the force of a law, to alter the property of his ſubjects goods, which is alſo againſt the law.

That the king of England cannot take his ſubjects goods, without their conſent, it need not be proved more than a principle. It is jus indigenæ, an old homeborne right, declared to be law by divers ſtatutes of the realme. As in 34. E. 3. cap. 2. that no officer of the kings, or of his heires, ſhall take any goods of any manner of perſon without the aſſent and good will of the party to whom the goods belonged. The ſame is declared in many other ſtatutes made againſt priſages and purveyances. Neither have ever any kings attempted to go plainly and directly againſt that right, but have deviſed certaine legal colours and ſhadowes for their wrongfull doing in that kind, which I doe find were of three ſorts: by way of commiſſion; by way of loan; by way of benevolence. Commiſſions of all other were the moſt inſolent; for they went out (as it were by authority) to levy ayd of the people upon great neceſſity of the common-wealth. Theſe were condemned in parliament, 21 E. 3. numb. 16. upon a grievous complaint made of the uſe of them by the commons, unto the king in parliament: wherein the people doe pray the king, that he would be pleaſed to remember, how at the parliament held the 17 year of his raign, and at the laſt parliament, it was then accorded, and granted by their ſaid lord the king and his councell, that there ſhould goe out no commiſſions out of Chauncery for hobbeleries, archers, and other charges to be levied upon the people, if they were not granted in parliament; which ordinances were not obſerved, by reaſon whereof the people were impoveriſhed and decayed, for which they prayed the king, that he would be pleaſed to take pity of his people, and the ordinances and grants made to his people in parliament to affirme and hold; and that if ſuch commiſſions goe out without aſſent of parliament, that the commons, which are grieved thereby, may have writs of ſuperſedeas, according to the ſaid ordinance, and that the people be not bound to obey them.

Commiſſions loans or privie ſeales. Benevolence.

That is the Parliament.

To this the kings anſwer is,

Si ul tiel impoſition fuit fait per grand neceſſitie, & ceo del aſſent des prelates, countes, barons, & autres grandes & auctres homes des commons adonq; preſents, neant moins noſtre ſeignior le roy ne v et, que tiel impoſition non duement fait ſoit treit in conſequence, eins voet qu^{e} les ordinances dont ceſt petition fait mention ſoit bienment gardes.

Stowes Annals, 17. H. 8.

The laſt time that ever king attempted that courſe of exaction was 17 H. 8. upon the taking of the French king at Pavia, by the forces of Charles the fifth. Cardinal Wolſey, having a purpoſe to put the king into a warre about that quarrel, and finding his coffers empty, adviſed this way, to ſend out commiſſions, and by them to levie ayd of the people, according to the value of their eſtate. But this gave ſuch diſcontent to the whole realme, that it cauſed in many places an actuall rebellion; and the cardinal, being called to give an account of this bad advice, did juſtifie this fact by the example of Joſeph, who adviſed Pharaoh to take the fifth part of his ſubjects goods. But when he ſaw that would not ſerve the turne, he falſely laid it upon the judges, informing the king, he did it by their advice, being reſolved by them of the lawfulneſs of the fact. So you ſee, that great churchmen found more ſafety in matter of government of our common-wealth, in making a falſe report of a point of the common-law, then in a true text of the ſcripture. And if any churchmen will endeavor by application of the text of ſcripture, to overthrow the antient laws and liberties of the kingdom, I would adviſe them to be admoniſhed by the ill ſucceſs of the cardinal in this particular action, and by the miſerable cataſtrophe of his whole life and fortunes.

Loans and privy ſeals.

Loans and appreſts were thoſe which we call privy ſeals, which though they were more moderate in ſhew, yet being made againſt the good-will of the parties, were as injurious indeed as the other. The commons in parliament, 25 E. 3. num. 16. made a grievous complaint to the king againſt the uſe of them, and prayed, that none from henceforth ſhould be compelled to make loans againſt their will; and they gave this reaſon, in their petition, for that it is againſt reaſon, and the franchiſe of the land, and prayed that reſtitution might be made to thoſe that have made ſuch loans.

Rot Par. 25 E. 3. num. 16.

To this the kings reſcript was; it pleaſeth our lord the king it be ſo.

Benevolence.

Laſtly, came in thoſe kinde of exactions, which were termed by the fair name of benevolences; but they became ſo odious, as they gave the occaſion of a good law to be made againſt themſelves, and againſt all other ſhifts and devices, by what new terms ſoever impoſed upon the ſubjects. The law is, 1 R. 3. cap. 2. and is thus. The king, remembring how the commons of this his realm, by new and unlawful inventions and inordinate covetiſe, againſt the law of this realm, have been put to great ſervitude and important charges and exactions, and eſpecially by a new impoſition called a benevolence, enacted by the adviſe, &c. that the ſubjects and commons of this land from henceforth ſhall in no wiſe be charged by any ſuch charges or impoſitions called the benevolence, nor by ſuch like thing.

1 R. 3. c. 2.

But if you will deny, that the king doth in this caſe take the goods of his ſubject without his aſſent, then you muſt fall upon mine alternative propoſition, that the kings patent hath in this caſe the power of a law, to alter property; for how can he recover the impoſed by a legal courſe of proceeding, and by judgment in his court, but upon a title precedent him, before the action brought, which title muſt be a property in the ſame impoſed; and how cometh he by that property, but by his own letters patents, by which he declareth he will have that ſame as an impoſition? For the judgment giveth not the right, but onely doth manifeſt and declare it, and giveth execution of it. So in this point the queſtion is, whether the kings patent hath the force and power of the law, or not; for if it be not maintained that it hath, it can never be concluded, that he can transfer the property of his ſubjects goods to himſelf, without the aſſent of them; for quod meum eſt, ſine facto meo alterius fieri non poteſt.

Bracton, l. 1. c. 8.

And if you give this power to the kings patent, you ſubject the law, and take away all rules and bounds of ſettled government, and leave in the ſubject no property of his own, neither do you by this advance the kings power and prerogative, but you make him no king; for, as Bracton ſaith, rex eſt, ubi dominatur lex, non voluntas.

Forteſc. de laudibus leg. Aug. c. 9.

Fortefc. de laud. leg. Ang cap. 36.

So we ſee, that the power of impoſing and power of making laws are convertibilia & coincidentia; and whoſoever can do the one, can do the other. And this was the opinion of ſir John Forteſcue, that reverend and honorable judge, a very learned profeſſor of the common-law, and chief juſtice of the Kings Bench, in the time of Henry 6. His words are theſe, in his book de laudibus legum Angliæ, cap. 9. Non poteſt rex Angliæ ad libitum leges mutare regni ſui; principatu namque nedum regali, ſed & politico, ipſe dominatur. Si regali tantum præeſſet iis, leges mutare poſſet; tallagia quoque, & cætera onera imponere, ipſis inconſultis, quale dominium leges civiles indicant, cum dicunt quod principi placuerit legis habet vigorem. Sed longè aliter poteſt rex politicis imperans; quia nec leges ipſe ſine ſubditorum aſſenſu mutare poterit, nec ſubjectum populum renitentem onerare peregrinis impoſitionibus. In which place I muſt interpret unto you, that peregrinæ impoſitiones be not ſtrange and unheard of impoſitions, as was urged by the worthy gentleman that ſpake laſt; but impoſitions upon traffick into and out of forrain countries, which is the very thing in queſtion. Further, in the thirty-ſixth chapter, he ſaith of the king of England, neque rex ibidem per ſe aut miniſtros ſuos tallagia, ſubſidia, aut alia quævis onera imponit ligeis ſuis, aut leges eorum mutat, vel novas condit, ſine conceſſione vel aſſenſu totius regni ſui in parliamento. So he maketh theſe two powers of making law and impoſing to be concomitant in the ſame hand, and that the one of them is not without the other. He giveth the ſame reaſon for this, as we do now, but in other words; becauſe (as he ſaith) in England it is principatus mixtus & politicus, the king hath his ſoveraign power in parliament, aſſiſted and ſtrengthened with the conſent of the whole kingdom, and therefore theſe powers are to be exerciſed by him only in parliament. In other countries they admit the ground of the civil law, quod principi placuerit legis habet vigorem. Becauſe they have an abſolute power to make law, they have alſo a power to impoſe, which hath the force of a law in transferring property. Philip Comines, that lived at that time, in his fourth book, the firſt chapter, the fifth book, the eighth chapter, taketh notice of this policy of England, and commends it above all other ſtates, as ſettled in moſt ſecurity; and further to our purpoſe laieth this ground, that a king cannot take one penny from his ſubjects without their conſent, but it is violence. And you may there note the miſchiefs that grew to the kingdom of France, by the voluntary impoſitions firſt brought in by Charles the ſeventh, and ever ſince continued, and encreaſed, to the utter impoveriſhment of the common people, and the loſs of their free councel of three eſtates. And if this power of impoſing were quietly ſettled in our kings, conſidering what is the greateſt uſe they make of aſſembling of parliaments, which is the ſupply of money, I do not ſee any likelihood to hope for often meetings in that kind, becauſe they would provide themſelves by that other means. And thus much for my firſt reaſon, grounded upon the natural conſtitution of the policy of our kingdom, and the publike right of our nation.

2 Reaſon, againſt common-law as to property and private right.

Dier. 1. E. 165.

2. For the point of common-law, which is my ſecond reaſon, it hath been well debated, and nothing left unſpoken that can be ſaid in it; and therefore I will decline to ſpeak of that, which other men have well diſcuſſed; and the rather, for that there is nothing in our law-book directly, and in point of this matter; neither is the word (impoſition) found in them, until the caſe in my lord Dier, 1 Eliz. 165. for we ſhall finde this buſineſs of an higher ſtrain, and alwaies handled elſewhere, as afterwards ſhall appear. Yet I will offer ſome anſwers to ſuch objections as have been made on the contrary in point of common-law, and have not been much ſtood upon by others to be anſwered.

42. Aſſ. p. 9.

1, and 2. E. Dier. 175.

The objections that have been made are theſe; that from the firſt book of the law to the laſt, no man ever read any thing againſt the kings power of impoſing. No judgement was ever given againſt it, in any of the kings courts at Weſtminſter. Other points of prerogative as high as this, diſputed and debated, his exceſs in them limited; as in the book of 42. Aſſ. pl. 5. where the judges took away a commiſſion from one, that had power given by it to him under the great ſeal to take ones perſon, and to ſeiſe his goods before he was indicted. So maſter Scrogs caſe 1, and 2. El. Dier. 175. the power of the king in making a commiſſion to determine a queſtion of right depending between two parties, notably debated, and ruled againſt the king, that he could not grant it.

9. E. 3. c. 1. Every alien and denizen may carry his merchandiſe where it pleaſeth him, notwithſtanding any charter granted, or judgment thereupon. 16, and 17. R. 2.

To this I anſwer, that caſes of this nature, of which the queſtion now handled is, have ever been taken to be of that extraordinary conſequence, in point of the common right of the whole kingdom, that the ſtates would never truſt any of the courts of ordinary juſtice with the deciding of them; but aſſumed the cogniſance of them unto the high court of parliament, as the fitteſt place to decide matters ſo much concerning the whole body of the kingdom. As 2. Ed. 3. 7. it appears that Ed. 1. had granted a charter to the men of Great Yarmouth, that all the ſhips of merchants, coming to the port of Yarmouth, ſhould land their goods at their haven, and not at any other haven at that port, as at Garneſton, and Little Yarmouth, which were members of that port. This was very inconvenient for the merchants, and a great hurt to traffick, and therefore the charter was queſtioned in the time of Ed. 2. and adjudged good by the council. But the parties not contented with this judgment, in the ſecond year of king E. 3. by an order in parliament made upon a petition there exhibited againſt this grant, brought a ſcire facias out of the Chancery returnable in the Kings Bench, to queſtion again the lawfulneſs of the patent. And in that ſuit the cauſe was notably debated, and thoſe reaſons much inſiſted upon that have been enforced in this caſe; as that of the kings power in the cuſtody of the ports. But the matter ſo depending in the ordinary court of juſtice, a writ came out of the parliament, and did adjourn it thither again, where it gave occaſion of a good law to be made to prevent the like grants, and to make them void notwithſtanding any judgment given upon them, and to make ſuch judgments alſo void. The ſtatute is, 9. E. 3. c. 1. And in the parliament rolls, 2. H. 4. num. 109. we finde a notable record, which gives warrant for the proceeding in parliament in this manner as hath been in this caſe, notwithſtanding the judgment in the Exchequer, and declares to the kingdom, that, notwithſtanding the great wonder made by ſome men, nothing hath been done in this buſineſs by thoſe that ſerve in the parliament, but in imitation of their worthy predeceſſors in the like caſe. In the ſecond year of H. 4. the commons ſhew that in the time of R. 2. by the means of John Waltham, biſhop of Saliſbury, treaſurer of England, wrongfully, without authority of parliament, and by reaſon of a judgment given in the Exchequer, 16, and 17. R. 2. by the barons there, againſt certain merchants of Briſtol, and other places, paſſage had been taken for wines otherwiſe then in ancient times had been, and therefore they prayed, they might pay their priſe wines in the manner they had uſed to pay, notwithſtanding any judgment given in the Exchequer, or other ordinance made by the ſaid treaſurer, contrary to the antient uſage; which petition the king granted, and the judgment thereupon became void, and the priſage wine hath been paid contrary to the judgment ever ſince.

1. El. Dier. 165.

In 1. El. Dier. 165. upon the complaint, made by the merchants, of the impoſitions ſet upon cloth by queen Mary, by her abſolute power, without aſſent of parliament; the cauſe was thought too weighty to be decided in any one court; but, as it appeareth in the book, it was referred to all the judges of England, who divers times had conference about it. So it may well be, there is nothing againſt it in our year books, for there is nothing of it.

39 E. 3. 13.

18 El. Dier. 352.

Dier. 43.

Another objection was this, which was made in the laſt argument, viz. that cuſtom is originally due by the common-law of England; it can then have no other ground or cauſe, but meerly by the kings royal prerogative, as a right and duty originally belonging to his crown: which if it be, it muſt neceſſarily follow he may impoſe, for that is but the exerciſing of that right. To prove this was alleadged the caſe 39. E. 3. 13. by which caſe it appeareth, that king John had a cuſtom of eight-pence on a tun of wine in the port of Southampton, but the book doth not tell you that the king had it by prerogative, and he might have it as well otherwiſe; as by preſcription, or convention, which ſhall rather be intended, by reaſon of the certainty of the ſum paied; for if it were by prerogative, he might take ſometimes more, ſometimes leſs at his will, the right being indefinite, and the quantity limited onely by his own diſcretion. A common perſon may have ſuch a cuſtom certain, as 18. El. Dier. 352. The mayor of London hath the twentieth part of ſalt brought into the city by aliens, which is a great impoſition, but is good by preſcription originally, and hath received greater ſtrength ſince, by acts of parliament made for the confirmation of the liberties and cuſtoms of the city of London. So it appeareth that John of Britain had cuſtom of the ſhips that arrived at his port of Little Yarmouth, worth twenty pounds per annum. And theſe inſtances do infer, that a cuſtom may be otherwiſe then by prerogative, and therefore it is no good argument to conclude, ‘the king had ſuch a cuſtom, therefore ‘he had it by prerogative.’

30 Hen. 8. Dier. 43.

14 Ed. 3. c. 21. ſtat. 1.

The book in 30 H. 8. Dier. 43. was much preſſed on this point, which ſaith that cuſtom belonged to the king at common-law, and doth inſtance in wooll woollfels and leather, begun at the common-law, but abridged by the ſtatute of 14 E. 3. cap. 21. ſtat. 1. But this appeareth to be a great error, and miſtaking in the book; for we do finde, that that cuſtom of woolls woollfels and leather was begun by a grant in parliament, as appeareth in ſtatute 15 E. 1. cap. 7. The words be, ‘granted ‘to us by the commonalty aforeſaid;’ and the laſt mention before was that the king had granted to the biſhops, earls, barons, and all the commonalty of the land, &c. Novemb. 3. Ed. 1. The king recited in his letters patents, that prelati, magnates, ac tota communitas mercatorum regni, granted this new cuſtom. And ſo the ground and motive of that opinion being falſe, all grounded upon that muſt needs be erroneous.

Rot. Char. 31. E. 1. num. 42. in Turri.

It was objected, that the king holdeth at this day the encreaſe of fourpence in the pound, over due cuſtom, paid by merchants aliens according to the purport of the charta mercatoria 31 E. 1. by meer right of prerogative at the common-law; for by that grant of the merchants he cannot hold it, they being no body politick at the time of the grant; and therefore the grant is meerly void to binde in ſucceſſion; and yet the merchants aliens do pay it at this day.

It is agreed, that by the common-law a contract with a number not incorporate bindeth not ſucceſſion. But we muſt take notice, that they, by whom that grant was made, of the augmentation of cuſtom, by three-pence in the pound, and other encreaſes, 31. E. 1. were merchants aliens, who by the law of merchants and nations may contract to bind their ſucceſſors in matters of traffick. For their contracts are not ruled by the common-law of the land, but by the law of nations, & per legem mercatoriam, as the book caſe is, 3 Ed. 4. 10. and there was a good conſideration given them by the king for this encreaſe of cuſtome, as diſcharge of priſe wines for two ſhillings the tun, and other immunities, which all merchants aliens hold and enjoy at this day, by force of that contract made, 31 E. 1. for a ſtranger paieth now but two ſhillings the tun for priſage, whereas it ſtandeth an Engliſhman in much more. The rule of commutative juſtice maketh the contract available to the king againſt the merchants, becauſe he parteth with part of his priſage to the merchant; and maketh it available to the merchant againſt the king, becauſe he giveth him encreaſe of cuſtom above that is due by law.

27. E. 3. cap. 26.

law. But the ſtatute of 27 E. 3. cap. 26. heretofore cited, doth make this point clear without ſcruple, which confirmeth the charter of 31. E. 1. entirely; and by that the encreaſe of cuſtom by three pence in the pound, which is by name mentioned in the ſtatute, is now due by act of parliament.

If you will have the king hold this encreaſe of cuſtom by prerogative, you go directly againſt his meaning; for it appeareth by that which preſently followed this grant, that the king took this encreaſe of cuſtom by way of contract onely, and not by way of prerogative; for the ſame year following he directeth his writs to the officers of his ports, reciting the contract made with the aliens by charta mercatoria; adding further, that ſome denizens were willing to pay the like cuſtom, upon the ſame immunities to them to be granted, and doth aſſign his officers to gather it, but with this clauſe, ſi gratanter & abſque coertione ſolvere voluerint, ita quod aliquem mercatorem de regno & poteſtate noſtrâ ad præſtationes & cuſtumas hujuſmodi invite ſolvendas nullatenùs diſtringatis. Nothing can more plainly expreſs, that the kings intention was not to demand this by way of prerogative, but by force of the contract. If there were ſuch a prerogative in the crown, as of right to have cuſtom, how cometh it to paſs this prerogative never yet had fruit or effect? For this I can maintain, that the king of England hath not one penny cuſtom or impoſition upon merchandizes, elder then the fourth year of queen Mary, that he holdeth not by act of parliament, and by the peoples grant. The eldeſt, that he hath, is that of woolls wooll-fells and leather, and that is by act of parliament, as appeareth in the ſtatute 25 E. 1. cap. 7. the tonnage and poundage by parliament in the firſt year of every kings reign, and the aliens encreaſe of cuſtom by parliament 27 E. 3. cap. 26. Then this prerogative hath been much neglected, that it was never called on to be put in execution, untill now of late years.

27 E. 3. cap. 26.

3. Reaſon, againſt ſtatutes.

Concerning the ſtatutes made for reſtraining our kings from the exerciſe of this pretended prerogative, which is the third matter I ſtand upon; thoſe that have maintained the kings prerogative in this point, have endeavored to interpret thoſe ſtatutes to extend onely to reſtrain him from impoſing upon wooll wooll-fells and leather, which are ſtaple commodities. And the reaſon they give for this reſtraint, more then for other goods, is, becauſe the king by ſtatute is reſtrained to a cuſtom certain for thoſe commodities, as the half mark a ſack of wooll, and half a mark three hundred wooll-fells, and thirteen ſhillings four pence a laſt of leather; and therefore great reaſon he ſhould not exceed this cuſtom in theſe commodities.

This objection receiveth many anſwers. Firſt, it appeareth both by the expreſs letter of divers of the laws made in this point, by the occaſion that induced the making of the laws, and by the execution of them, that all other wares and merchandiſes, as well as thoſe of the ſtaple, were within the purpoſe and intent of thoſe laws. Secondly, the reaſon alleadged, why there ſhould be reſtraint for the ſtaple commodities, rather then for the other, is miſtaken; for the lords and commons did grant to E. 1. by act of parliament the cuſtom of the half mark for wooll wooll-fells and leather, which was matter of meer grace and liberality, and includeth no reſtraint in it, but rather a favourable extention, quite contrary to the ſence of the objection, according to that rule of interpretation, gratioſa ampliari decet, odioſa reſtringi. And admit ſome laws be made expreſly to reſtrain impoſitions upon wooll wooll-fells and leather, by reaſon that the occaſion of making ſuch laws was the actual impoſing upon thoſe goods at that time, ſhall we not by good conſtruction, ſecundum mentem extenſivam legis, extend this law to other wares and merchandizes that are within the ſame miſchief? If we look to the reaſon of the law, we ſhall make no doubt of it: for that is, becauſe the impoſitions were without aſſent of parliament, not becauſe they were upon ſuch and ſuch commodities. Beſides, thoſe laws ſo made are declarativæ juris antiqui, non introductivæ novi.

In the enumeration of thoſe ſtatutes which I conceive make directly to this purpoſe, I will endeavour rather to anſwer the objections made againſt them, then to enforce the ſenſe and meaning of them, which is very plain and open, and needs no interpretation. The firſt ſtatute enforced is mag. charta, cap. 30. made in the ninth year of H. 3. by which it is enacted, that all merchants ſhall have free egreſs and regreſs out of and into this realm, with their goods and merchandizes, to buy and ſell, ſine omnibus malis tolnetis per antiquas & rectas conſuetudines. In which words we may infer, that both the uſe and right of impoſing are abſolutely excluded, and debarred; for conſuetudo, which in this caſe is to be taken for uſage, which is mos, (not improperly for portorium, a duty paid in money, as our Engliſh word cuſtom in one ſence doth ſignifie) implieth a beginning and continuance by conſent and will of the parties, not by power and enforcement, which cannot be a cuſtom; and therefore it cannot be an impoſition; for that ariſeth meerly out of the will and power of the impoſer, and is againſt the will of him upon whoſe goods it is ſet. But take conſuetudo either for mos or portorium, the epithites with which it is qualified, antiquum and rectum, do deſcribe it to be of that nature that it cannot be an impoſition. For antiquum, in legal conſtruction, is that which is time out of mind, that is not an impoſition; for then by continuance of time it ſhould grow a right by preſcription, and were juſtifiable. Rectum implieth a limited right, which inferreth there may be a wrong, and exceeding of that right, which is not in impoſitions; for if there be a right in the king to impoſe, the quantity, time, and other circumſtances are in his diſcretion; the right is illimited. And if he ſet on never ſo great an impoſition, there is as much right in it, as if it be never ſo ſmall. The exceſs maketh it a burthen, but not a wrong.

We may further obſerve, that, in the ſtatute, malum tolnetum, which is evill toll, is ſet down by way of antitheſis to antiqua, and recta conſuetudo; by which is inferred, that exactions upon wares and merchandizes not qualified with theſe two properties of antiquum and rectum, are evill and unjuſt. This is made more evident by a record in the Tower of the ſixteenth yeer of H. 3. which was a mandat ſent by the king to the cuſtomers of his ports for the execution of this law made in 9. H. 3. whereby it is commanded, quod omnibus mercatoribus in portum ſuum venientibus cum vinis, & aliis merchandizis, ſcire faciant, quod ſalvò & ſecurè in terram Angliæ veniant cum vinis & merchandizis ſuis, faciendo inde rectas & dubitas conſuetudines, nec ſibi timeant de malis tolnetis, quæ iis faciat rex, vel in terrâ ſuâ fieri permittat. By this record the word conſuetudo is interpreted to be mos, not portorium; otherwiſe it ſhould have been ſolvendo conſuetudines, not faciendo. Alſo theſe words antiquum & rectum in the ſtatute in this writ are rectum & debitum, which doth more enforce a certainty of right and duty, which by no means can be intended in impoſitions.

Rot. Clauſ. 16. H. 3.

Objections againſt this law were made in the laſt argument. Firſt, that it was made for aliens. This is true; the words of the law do plainly ſhew it was made for aliens. But if the ſtate was ſo careful to provide for them, ſhall we not judge, that with denizens it was ſo already? And that this ſtatute was made to extend that liberty by act of parliament to aliens, which denizens had by the common law, ſucceeding times did ſo conceive of it, as appeareth by the ſtatute of 2. E. 3. cap. 9. The words are, that all merchants ſtrangers and princes may go and come with their merchandizes in England after the tenor of the great charter, and that writs be thereupon ſent to all the ſheriffs in England, and to mayors and bayliffs of good towns, where need ſhall require.

2. E. 3. cap. 9.

A ſecond objection was made in the laſt argument, out of theſe words of the ſtatute of magna charta, that merchants might freely traffique, niſi publicè antea prohibiti fuerint: by which was enforced, that the king had power to reſtrain and prohibit traffique; therefore to impoſe.--It is agreed there may be a publick reſtraint of traffique, upon reſpects of the common good of the kingdom; but whether that which is called publica prohibitio in the ſtatute, be intended by the king alone, or by act of parliament, is a queſtion: for ſuch reſtraints have ſtill been by parliament. But admit the king may make a reſtraint of traffique in part for ſome publick reſpect of the commonwealth, he doth this in point of protection, as truſted by the commonwealth to do that which is for the publick good of the kingdom; but if he uſe this truſt to make a gain and benefit by impoſing, that is a breach of the truſt, and a ſale of government and protection. But more of this ſhall be hereafter ſpoken in the anſwering of the main objections.

25. E. 1. cap. 7.

The next law is that notable ſtatute of E. 1. in the 25 year of his reign, made upon the very point in queſtion. The words are theſe. 'And foraſmuch as the moſt part of the commonalty of 'this realm find themſelves ſore grieved with the male toll of woolls, that 'is, to wit, a toll of forty ſhillings for every ſack of wooll, and have pe'titioned to us for to releaſe the ſame; we at their requeſt have clearly 'releaſed it, and have granted for us and our heirs, that we ſhall not take 'ſuch things without their common conſent and good will, ſaving to us 'and our heirs the cuſtoms of woolls ſkins and leather, granted before by 'the commonalty aforeſaid.'

Againſt the application of this law to the queſtion now in hand, many objections were made; ſome out of matter precedent to the law, ſome out of the law it ſelf, ſome out of matter ſubſequent and following after the law.

Tho. Walſingham in E. 1. fo. 71, 72, 73. edit. per W. Camb. impreſ. Francoſ. 1603.

For matter precedent, it was objected out of Thomas Walſingham, an hiſtoriographer of good credit, that writ of that time when the ſtatute was made, that in the petition of grievances given to king E. 1. by the people in the 25 year of his reign, upon which petition the ſtatute was made, that they found themſelves not grieved in point of right, but in point of exceſs. The words are, communitas ſentit ſe gravatam de vectigali lanarum, quod nimis eſt oneroſum, viz. de quolibet ſacco 40s. & de lanâ fractâ ſeptem marcas. So they expreſs the cauſe of their grief, that it was too heavy; which is to be applied to the point of exceſs, not of right.

To this I anſwer, that if the words had been, quia eſt nimis oneroſum, this conſtruction might have been made out of them; becauſe the word quia had induced a declaration of the cauſe of that which was formerly affirmed: but the words are, quod nimis oneroſum, which doth only poſitively affirm, that the impoſition de facto was intolerable for the greatneſs of it, which doth not therefore admit, that it is tolerable in reſpect of the right the king had to impoſe. But this is made clear by the general word precedent in the preamble of the petition, which doth evidently infer, they grounded their complaint upon point of right, not upon point of exceſs. The words are theſe, tota terræ communitas ſentit ſe valdè gravatam, quia non tractantur ſecundum leges & conſuetudines terræ, ſecundum quas tractari anteceſſores ſui ſolebant habere, ſed voluntariè excluduntur. After which preamble, among the particulars, this of forty ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll is ranked, but with a dependency of that expreſſed in the preamble for the point of right. But ſeeing we light upon hiſtory, which, though it be of ſmall authority in a law argument, yet being the hiſtory of our own realm, hath fit and proper uſe in the common counſel of the realm, I will purſue it a little further, out of Matth. Weſtm. a writer that lived much nearer the time of the law made, then Thomas Walſingham. He ſaith, that the commons by their petitions required, ne rex de cætero tallagia uſurparet, & voluntarias ſuper his inductas exactiones de cætero quaſi in irritum revocaret; by which it appeareth, that the point of the complaint was that the exactions laid on them were voluntary, that is, at the kings will without aſſent of parliament.

Matth. Weſtm. fo. 430. edit. per H. Savilemil. Francofurti 1601.

Out of the law it ſelf it hath much been preſſed, as firſt the commons made petition to the king; whereupon they infer out of the nature of the word petition, that their proceeding was by way of grievance, for the exceſs and inconvenience, as a matter of grace, not in courſe of juſtice for the wrong.

To this I anſwer, that conſidering the quality of the parties to this action, it being between the king and the ſubject, duty and good manners doth induce gentleneſs and humility of terms, without blemiſh or diminution of the force of right. It is according to the demeanor of Job, chap. 9. v. 15. though I were juſt, yet would I not anſwer, but I would make ſupplication to my judge. But in our forms of law, be the right of the ſubject never ſo clear, manifeſt, and acknowledged by all; yet if his own be detained from him by the king, he hath no other writ or action to recover, but a meer petition ſupplicat celſitudini, &c. So as if the word petition to the king infer defect of right in the petitioner, there can be no caſe where the king can do the ſubject wrong.

A ſecond objection out of the body of the law is, that the king doth releaſe that impoſition of forty ſhillings, which implieth a right ſetled in him.

But to this I anſwer, that it is no neceſſary inference, whereſoever a releaſe of right is; for it is uſed for claim onely, or where poſſeſſion was, though wrongful, and that in majorem ſecuritatem, quia abundans cautela non nocet. But in this caſe, a releaſe was very expedient, and for ſome reſpect neceſſary, to extinguiſh a right the king had in this impoſition againſt the merchants themſelves. For this impoſition, though it were not ſet on by aſſent of parliament, yet was it not ſet on by the kings abſolute power; but was granted to him by the merchants themſelves, who were to be charged with it. So the grievance was the violation of the right of the people, in ſetting it on without their aſſent in parliament, not the damage that grew by it; for that did onely touch the merchants, who could not juſtly complain thereof, becauſe it was their own act and grant. This appeareth by two notable records, the one 22. E. 1. a writ to the treaſurer and barons of the Exchequer in Ireland, to diſcharge the merchants there of impoſitions on woolls; in which the king reciteth, licet in ſubſidium guerræ regis pro recuperandâ terrâ Vaſconiâ mercatores gratanter conceſſerunt per biennium vel triennium, ſi tantum duravit guerra, de ſacco lanæ, &c. The other record is the writ of publication, that in 26. E. 1. went out after the ſtatute of 25. in which writ the king reciteth thus, cum nos ad inſtantiam communitatis regni noſtri remiſerimus cuſtumam 40s. nobis nuper in ſubſidium guerræ noſtræ contra regem Franciæ conceſſum, &c.

22. E. 1. Origin. in Scac. Rem. Theſ.

In 26. E. 1. Mem. Scac. Rem. Theſ.

A third objection made out of the body of the ſtatute, by thoſe which have argued on the contrary part, was upon theſe words, that the king would take no ſuch things without common conſent; by which words they conceived the intention of the law was limited preciſely to impoſitions ſet upon wooll, and not on other commodities, which are not ſuch things, but other; and for this they alledge this reaſon, that it was not probable, when the complaint was only for an impoſition on wooll, that the king would give a remedy for other things not ſpoken of, for which there was no cauſe of complaint.

To this a full anſwer is given many ways. Firſt, out of the ſaving in the act, which extends to other things then to wooll, as to wooll-fells and leather; therefore the purview of the act by theſe words, ſuch things, extendeth to more then the wooll; for there needs no ſaving, but for that which is contained in the purview. Secondly, the reaſon alledged, that no more by likelihood ſhould be remedied but for wooll, becauſe onely that was complained of, is falſe; for the complaint of the commons was not onely for this impoſition on wooll, but divers other burthens and grievances of the like nature. And this will appear if we compare all the parts of the law, the one with the other; for this law is in the form of a charter written in French, and beginneth, Edward by the grace of God, &c. and is an entire grant, and inſtrument without fractions, ſections, and chapters, as it is now printed, and containeth in it, next before this laſt clauſe concerning the impoſitions on woolls, which in the printed book is cap. 6. that the king, for no buſineſs from thenceforth, will take no manner of aids, miſes, nor priſes, but by common aſſent. This word miſes, in French ſignifieth properly impoſitions, derived of the word mitto in Latine to put. So the word ſuch things, is a concluſion to all the premiſes, and hath relation not onely to that which is made cap. 7. by the printer, and concerneth the male toll of woolls, but to that precedent, which is all other aids impoſitions and takings. The writ of publication of this ſtatute ſent out to all parts in 26. E. 1. maketh plain this conſtruction. The words of it are, concedentes quod cuſtumam illam vel aliam, ſine voluntate vel communi aſſenſu non capiamus. Theſe words, vel aliam, are indefinite, and extend to any other whatſoever, beſides that of woolls. The writ doth further diſcharge merchants for the commodities of wooll-fells and leather, which are not complained of by name in the ſtatute; and therefore the law was intended to other impoſitions as well as to thoſe upon woolls.

Mem. Scac. in 26. E. 1. Rem. Theſ.

The objection made out of matter ſubſequent to the ſtatute was this, that notwithſtanding this law of 25 E. 1. impoſitions, that before the ſtatute had been ſet on other merchandize then woolls, were ſtill anſwered after the ſtatute; and for inſtance of this, was alledged, that whereas 16. E. 1. an impoſition of 40*s.* the tun was ſet upon wines brought into the kingdom, an accompt was made of this in the Exchequer in 26. E. 1. as by the records there appeareth; by which it ſeemeth that the law of 25. E. 1. was not taken to extend to wines, and ſuch other commodities, other then woolls named in the ſtatute. It is true, ſuch an impoſition was ſet on by E. 1. in the ſixteenth year of his reign, and an accompt made for it 25. and 26. But it appeareth by the record of the accompt, that it was made for the time ended before the ſtatute made: as from the eighteenth of May, 16. E. 1. to 23. Jul. 22. E. 1. But there is no record, that ever any accompt was made for any money received for that impoſition for the time after the ſtatute made; neither was it very willingly anſwered before; for it appeareth by the record, that it was ten years after the ſetting of it.

16. E. 1. Orig. R. Theſ.

25, & 26. E. 1. de compt. T. Mich. R. Theſ.

The third ſtatute alledged on the behalf of the ſubject is that 34. E. 1. c. 1. the words are theſe. 'No tallage or aid 'ſhall be taken or levied by us, or our heirs in our realm, 'without the good will and aſſent of our arch-biſhops, biſhops, earls, ba'rons, knights, burgeſſes, and other freemen of the land.' Againſt this was objected, that this ſtatute was intended onely upon the taxes and impoſitions of things. The word auxilium makes it clear, that it is to be intended further then of things within the realm; for tallagium is commonly intended of domeſtical taxes, but auxilium is the moſt uſual term for impoſitions upon goods imported and exported; as by the acts of parliament by which ſuch impoſitions are given to the king, in which they are called moſt commonly by the name of aids, as proceeding of good will and benevolence.

34. E. 1. cap. 1.

The fourth ſtatute alledged on this part is that of 5. E. 2. c. 14. juſt in point of the matter in queſtion; and therefore I will ſet it down as I finde it verbatim in the record in the Tower. Enſement novelles cuſtomes ſont levies, & antients enhaunces, come ſur levies drapes, vine aver du pois, & autre choſes, purquoy les merchantes veynont pluis volement, & meynes de bien, menynent en la terre, & les merchants eſtrangers demurront pluis longment que ils ſoleyent faier, pur le quel demoure le choſes ſont le pluis enhaunces que ils ne ſoloyent eſtre, al dammage de roy, & de ſon people. Nous ordenons que tout manners de male tolls, levies puies de coronement de roy Ed. fils de roy Henry, ſoyent entirement ouſtes, & de tout eſtreints pur tout jours, nient contriſteant le chartre que le dict roy Ed. fiſt a merchants aliens, pur ceo que il fuit fait contre le grand chartre & encountre le franchiſe de la city de Londres, & ſans aſſent de baronage, &c. Savant neque dent al roy le cuſtome de leynes, peulx, & de quirs, &c. ſi aver les doet.

5. E. 2. cap. 14. Rot. Ordin.

By this law is recited, that by the levying of new cuſtomes, and by the raiſing of old, traffique was deſtroyed, and all things made dear; and therefore all new impoſitions and cuſtoms were diſcharged charta mercatoria, by which, cuſtom, that was encreaſed on aliens, was taken away; and the reaſon alledged; becauſe it was ſans aſſent de baronage, and againſt the great charter. And this is further with this clauſe, ſaving to the king his cuſtom of wooll wooll fells and leather, ſi aver les doet.

Great wars have been raiſed againſt the credit of this law in the parliament houſe, and three things have been eſpecially objected againſt it.

Firſt, that it is no law; for it was enforced upon the king by ſome of the nobility that were too ſtrong for him, the realm being then in tumult and mutiny about the quarrel of Peirce of Gaveſton, ſo never had the kings free conſent; but he gave way unto it for fear of greater miſchief.

Secondly, that in itſelf it is unjuſt, as in taking away the cuſtom granted to the king by charta mercatoria, 31. E. 1. and in making doubt, whether the king ſhould have the cuſtom of woolls, &c. by thoſe words, ſaving it to him, ſi aver les doet.

The third objection is, that if it were a law, it is repealed.

To theſe I give particular anſwers.

To the firſt, that this ſtatute was made both at the inſtance of the king and people, with a purpoſe and intention on all parts to ſettle things in a ſtay and order, both in the kings houſe and commonwealth; the king and his nobles ſtanding in good terms, when this buſineſs was taken in hand. And it was begun and ended with great ſolemnity and ceremony. For the king in the third year of his reign gave commiſſion under his great ſeal to 32 lords ſpiritual and temporal; of which there were eleven biſhops, eight earls, and thirteen barons; they being as committees of the higher houſe to deviſe ordinances for the good government of his houſe and his realm. In which commiſſion he doth for the honor of God, the good of him and of his realm, of his freewill, grant to the prelates earls and barons, and others elected by the whole kingdom, full power to ordain the ſtate of his houſe and realm by ſuch ordinances as by them ſhould be made, to the honor of God, the honor and profit of holy church, the honor of himſelf, the profit of him and his people, according to right and reaſon, and the oath he made at his coronation. Theſe joyning with others of diſcreet commons in parliament, and taking every of them a ſolemn oath for their ſincere demeanor in the buſineſs, did make this and other ordinances, which were ſo well liked of by the king, that, after they were made, he took an oath to obſerve them, and cauſed them to be publiſhed in Pauls church-yard by the biſhop of Saliſbury, by denouncing excommunication againſt all that ſhould wilfully infringe them; and by his letters pattents dated 5. Oct. 5. regni ſui, did ſend them through the realm to be publiſhed, and from thenceforth to be obſerved, thereby ſignifying his great liking and approbation of them; after which they had the force and power of laws given unto them in the parliament, in the fifth year of his reign.

Pallic. 3. Kal. Oct. 5. E. 2. Rot. Ord. Pat. 5. Oct. 5. E. 2. Rot. Ord.

The ſecond objection, which is the unjuſtneſs of the law, inſtanced in two points; the taking away of charta mercatoria, and the doubting of the kings right to the cuſtom of wooll-fells and leather, &c.—To the firſt of theſe, I deny it to be unjuſt, but to be according to the law of England, and liberty of the kingdom: for that charter did contain in it divers grants of things which were not in the power of the king to grant without aſſent of parliament; the trial per medictatem linguæ, and other things tending to the alteration of the law, and burdening of the people; and therefore that charter never had his undoubted and ſettled force, until it was confirmed by act of parliament, but lay aſleep almoſt twenty years together, without being put in execution, between 5. E. 2. and 27. E. 3. when it was confirmed. For the doubt that is ſuppoſed to be made in the ſtatute of the kings right to the cuſtom of wooll wooll-fells and leather, I take it, there is no ſuch doubt made: for the words, ſaving the kings right to the cuſtom of woolls, ſi aver les doet, have this conſtruction, that is, at ſuch times as he ought to have it: ſo the word ſi hath the ſignification of quando; for it had been a folly to have made a ſaving of that, of the right whereof they had doubted; neither is it likely but that they would have taken it away, if it had not been lawful. But there was no colour to doubt of the right of it; for it was given by act of parliament, and ever continued in force without challenge or exceptions to the lawfulneſs of it.

The third objection is, that this ſtatute is repealed. To this I plead, nullum valet recordum. If it be repealed, it muſt be by act of parliament; for unum quodque diſſolvitur iiſdem modis quibus eſt colligatum. I and others have ſearched the records of the realm, and endeavoured by all means to inform our ſelves of the truth herein, and we can find no act of parliament of repeal. The truth is, ſome kings, finding theſe laws not to ſort to their wills and humors, have endeavoured to ſuppreſs them; but they did never yet obtain a repeal of them by act of parliament.

Rot. finium 11. E. 2.

But it is further urged, that although there were no formal repeal of the law, yet it was never put in execution as a law, but even preſently upon the making was rejected, and uſe and practice went quite againſt it: and for inſtance hereof, a record was vouched, that E. 2. held himſelf ſo little bound by it, as that in the 11. year of his reign he ſet an impoſition without aſſent of parliament upon wooll, wooll-fells, leather, wines cloth, aver de pois, and divers other kind of merchandizes. To this I anſwer, that if it were true, that a weak and impotent king, as he was, did contrary to the law, doth this make the law void, and no law? But if we look into the whole record, and ſcan this action of E. 2. from the beginning of it unto the end, we ſhall finde it a very good inſtance to prove the practice and execution both of this law of 5. E. 2. and of that in 25. E. 1. For it is true, that E. 2. in the eleventh year of his reign did borrow of the merchants a certain ſum of money, above the due cuſtom of woolls, wooll-fells, wine, aver de pois, leather, and ſuch other goods imported and exported. But it appeareth by the record, he took it but for one year; he took it by the advice and counſel of the merchants; and he took it per viam mutui, as a loan. The direction of the writ is, collectoribus mutui nobis per mercatores alienigenas & indigenas de certis rebus & merchandiſis uſque ad certum tempus faciendi. This was done in good terms, he did not claim it as his right, but did borrow it, which I do think is a good evidence againſt his right. But what became of this? The ſtate would not abide it, for all theſe fair ſhews. And therefore afterwards the king ſendeth out other writs, by which he diſchargeth all merchandizes of this loan, ſaving only wooll wooll-fells and leather; and for the loan taken upon thoſe commodities, it was limited to continue but until Michaelmas after, and good ſecurity was given to the merchants by the cuſtomers to pay themſelves, by way of defalcation, out of the cuſtoms which ſhould be due after Michaelmas, thoſe ſums which were ſo borrowed of them. The words of the record are worth the obſerving, cum pro expeditione guerræ Scotiæ, & aliis arduis & urgentibus neceſſitatibus nobis multipliciter incumbentibus, pro quarum exoneratione quaſi infinitam pecuniam refundere oportebit, pecunia plurimum indigeamus in præſenti, & nuper pro eo quod exitus regni & terrarum noſtrarum, ſimul cum pecunia nobis in ſubventione præmiſſorum tam per clerum quam communitatem regni noſtri conceſſa, ad ſumptus prædictos cum feſtinatione qua expediret faciendos, non ſufficiunt; exquirentes vias & modos, quibus poſſemus pecuniam habere commodius & decentius pro præmiſſis, de conſilio & adviſamento quorundam mercatorum tam alienigenarum quam indigenarum viam invenimus infra ſcript. viz. and ſo ſetteth down the manner of the loan; and the ſecurity for the payment of it. This, I take it, was neither an impoſition, nor a wrong in any reſpect. Alſo by the firſt record it appeareth, that the loan ſet on wines, aver de pois, and ſuch other commodities, beſides wooll wooll-fells and leather, were preſently diſcharged by E. 2. which ſheweth they were taken to be within the intent of the ſtatute of 25. E. 1.

14. E. 3. ſtat 1. cap. 21.

The fifth ſtatute alledged on the behalf of the ſubject is that of 14. E. 3. ſtat. 1. cap. 21. by which the commons pray the king to take no more then the old cuſtom of the half mark. The king prayeth aid of the commons for a time above the cuſtom upon his neceſſity of wars. And the concluſion is, that by that act the king doth grant, that after the feaſt of Penticoſt, twelve moneths following, he will take no more of woolls wooll-fells and leather but the old cuſtom, and doth promiſe to charge, ſet, or aſſeſs upon the cuſtom but in manner as aforeſaid.

14. E. 3. ſtat. 2. c. 1.

The ſixth ſtatute is 14. E. 3. ſtat. 2. cap. 1. The king doth grant by way of charter to the prelates earls barons commons citizens burgeſſes and merchants, that they be not from henceforth charged nor grieved to make any aid or ſuſtain charge, if it be not by the common conſent of the prelates, earls, barons, and other great men, and commons of the realm, and that in parliament.

Theſe two ſtatutes grew upon an occaſion of an impoſition ſet on wooll by the king without aſſent of parliament. Little hath been objected againſt them, but only to the firſt, that it was obtained of grace, and not upon inſtance of right, which they gather out of the words of the law, which are, "the commons pray the king that he would ſtabliſh, "that from henceforth no more then the old cuſtom be taken". The like reaſon may be made againſt the king out of the ſame words in the ſame law; for the king in the ſame act prayeth the commons to give him an impoſition upon woolls for a time above the old cuſtom. But the record of the petitions exhibited in parliament, on which theſe two laws are made, cleareth the objection.

Rot. Par. 13. E. 3. num. 5.

Rot. Par. 13. E. 3. num. 13.

The firſt was delivered by the lords in this form, les grands volunt, that the male toll, ſet on woolls newly, be altogether abated, and that the old cuſtom be held, and that they may have this in point of charter, and by inrolment in parliament. This word, volunt, had been too high for a ſuit of grace, and therefore muſt be intended of right. The commons petition in form is ſomewhat humble, but in effect and purpoſe is rough and ſtern. The words are theſe: the commons pray that the male toll of woolls be taken as it was uſed in antient time, which is now enhanced without the aſſent of the commons, and grandes, as we conceive; and that if it be otherwiſe demanded, that every one of the commons may arreſt them without being challenged. According to theſe petitions, the firſt of theſe two laws is by inrolment in parliament; the ſecond is in form of a charter: the firſt doth expreſs ſome ſpecial commodities; the ſecond doth reach generally at all.

14. E. 3. ſtat. 2. c. 2.

The ſeventh law directly touching this point is that 14. E. 3. ſtat. 2. cap. 2. the king doth grant according to the great charter, that all merchants denizens and foreigners may without let ſafely come into the realm of England with their goods and merchandizes, and ſafely tarry, and ſafely return, paying the ſubſidies, cuſtoms and other profits reaſonably due. Upon the words of this law, was great advantage taken in this, that beſides cuſtom and ſubſidy, which comprehend all the certain and ordinary duties the king hath upon the wares and goods of merchants, there are other profits ſpoken of to be due. Theſe they affirm cannot be underſtood but of impoſitions by the king without aſſent of parliament.

Rot. Par. 50. E. 3. nu. 163.

To this I anſwer; if they were not duties due to the king beſides cuſtom and ſubſidy, which might ſatisfie the intention of theſe words, this objection might have had ſome colour in it; but it is plain, that beſides theſe two, there are other profits due to the king upon merchants goods, as ſcavage, tonnage, and the like. And you ſhall finde a petition in parliament, 50. E. 3. againſt the raiſing of theſe above the old rate.

15. E. 3. ſtat. 2. c. 5.

The eighth law is 15. E. 3. ſtat. 2. cap. 5. whereby it is enacted, that every merchant may freely buy and ſell, and paſs the ſea with their merchandizes of wooll and all other things, paying the cuſtom of old time uſed, according to the ſtatute made in the laſt parliament in Mid-Lent, which was the ſtat. 14. E. 3. ſtat. 2. cap. 2. This law doth expreſsly exclude the novelty of impoſitions.

18 E. 3. ſtat. 1. c. 3.

The ninth law is that 18. E. 3. ſtat. 1. cap. 3. whereby it is enacted, that the ſea be open to all manner of merchants to paſs with their merchandizes where it ſhall pleaſe them.

27. E. 3. ſtat. 2. c. 2.

The tenth is, 27. E. 3. ſtat. 2. cap. 2. for the aſſurance of merchants-ſtrangers and other, the king doth will and grant for him and his heirs, that nothing ſhall be taken over the due cuſtoms, not taken of them to his uſe by colour of ſuit, or in other manner againſt their wills.

38 E. 3. cap. 2.

The eleventh is 38 E. 3. cap. 2. that all manner of merchants aliens and denizens may buy and ſell all manner of merchandizes, and freely carry them out of the realm, paying the cuſtoms and ſubſidies thereof due.

22 H. 8. cap. 8.

The laſt is 22 H. 8. cap. 8. by which it was enacted, that tables ſhould be ſet up in ports, by which the certainty and very duty of every cuſtom, toll, and duty, or ſum of money, to be demanded and required of wares and merchandizes, ſhall and may plainly appear and be declared, to the intent that nothing be exacted otherwiſe then in old time hath been uſed and accuſtomed.

By this late law it appeareth, that the judgment of the whole parliament was at that time, that nothing was due upon wares and merchandizes but that which was certain, and had been antiently due; by which impoſitions are excluded, whoſe qualities are novelty and incertainty, as being ſet on as preſent occaſion moveth, and proportioned for quantity and other circumſtances as the will of the king directeth.

Theſe are the laws, which I conceive moſt directly tend to the reſtraining the kings of England from the exerciſe of that irregular power of impoſing, at the firſt offered by them to be put in execution, yet not preſſed as their right, and never practiſed but upon oppoſition of the whole ſtate, and at laſt deſerted and given over until of late; as by that which followeth in the fourth place will appear.

4 Reaſon. It is againſt the practice of former times.

My fourth and laſt aſſertion is, that this practice of impoſing without aſſent of parliament is contra morem majorum. In this I will make an hiſtorical perluſtration of the times paſt, whereby I will diſcover and make known, what paſſages have been in this buſineſs in this kingdom, and eſpecially in the high court of parliament for the ſpace of 300 years and more laſt paſt, ſince the beginning of the reign of E. 1. ſithence which time, and not before, this kingdom hath grown into the glory and reputation of foraigne traffique. And as a worthy gentleman of the kings learned councel made certain conſiderations upon this queſtion, framed and ſtrengthened out of the greatneſs of his wit and reaſon; ſo I grounding my ſelf upon the practice of former times, which is the ſafeſt rule whereby to ſquare the right both of king and people in this commonwealth, where their right is jus conſuetudinarium, a right that groweth by uſe and practice, I will propoſe unto you certaine obſervations out of the action and experience of former times untill the raignes of the two late queens; by which you may the better ground and frame your judgements in the determination of the right in this queſtion.

1. My firſt obſervation is in point of circumſtance, that there never was any impoſition ſet, but in time of actuall war, and duplicatis vexillis; they were ſet on very rarely and ſparingly, but for a ſhort time, and that certaine and definite, and upon ſome few commodities, and that by the aſſent of the merchants that were to beare the burthen. In our time the occaſion not ſo ſenſible, the continuance to be perpetual, the number many hundreds, almoſt no kinde of commodity ſpared. I will give you ſome few inſtances of theſe circumſtances out of the records themſelves.

22 E. 1. Orig. Scacc. Rem. Theſ. 22 E. 1. Mem. Scac. R Theſ. T. Mich. Rot. Parl. 17. E. 3. nu. 28.

The maletole of wooll, ſet on by king E. 1. which gave the occaſion of the ſtat. 25 yeare of his raigne, was given by merchants. The record ſaith, mercatores gratanter conceſſerunt in ſubſidium guerræ regis. It further ſheweth, it was for his neceſſity of warre, which then was great alſo.

For the time of E. 3. there need not many inſtances; for his whole raigne was almoſt an actuall warfare. As in the ſixth year of his raigne for his war in Scotland and Ireland, in the thirteenth year of his raigne for his war in France, ſeverall impoſitions were ſet on.

In the ſeventeenth year of E. 3. the record in the Tower mentioneth, that forty ſhillings impoſition was upon a ſacke of wooll by the grant of merchants, and it was in the time of war.

Rot. Parl. 20. E. 3. nu. 18.

In the twentieth yeare of king E. 3. it appeareth in the record, that the impoſition then put upon woolls was by the aſſent of merchants for two years, for the neceſſity the king had in his paſſage over the ſea, to recover his right, and to defend the realme.

2. My ſecond obſervation is, never any impoſition was ſet on by the king out of parliament, but complaint was made of it in parliament; and not one that ever ſtood after ſuch complaint made, but remedy was afforded for it; et quod rex inconſulto fecit, conſulto revocavit, his ſoveraigne power controlled his ſubordinate. In which it is a thing very notable, that the king in no one caſe ever claimed, or ſo much as ever named his right or prerogative, which no doubt would have been done, if it had been thought due, but gave ſatisfaction to the complaint by one of theſe three waies;

Either by diſcharging them quite, and making ſome good law againſt them.

Secondly, by intreating the people to hold them ſome ſhort time by their favor.

Thirdly, by waving his preſent poſſeſſion, and taking that of their gift by act of parliament, as an aide which he had ſet on by his abſolute power as an impoſition.

Inſtance of the third. 25 E. 3. nu. 22. the commons made petition againſt an impoſition of fourty ſhillings upon a ſack of wool granted to the king by the merchants, ſhewing that they ought not to be bound by their act. The king did not claime right or juſtice; but becauſe his warres were great, upon his requeſt had it granted unto him for two yeeres by act of parliament, and pretended no title of prerogative, neither was it ever ſpoken of.

3. My third obſervation is, that our kings have acknowledged that it is not their right. E. 1. in his writs he ſent to the officers of his ports to levie three-pence on the pound over the old cuſtome of the denizens as well as of the aliens, and to ſuffer the denizens to enjoy thoſe privileges the aliens did enjoy by the payment of the encreaſe of cuſtome, doth give this direction expreſly; that they ſhould not take it of denizens againſt their will. The words of the record expreſs it very fully: cum mercatores extranei & alienigenæ, pro quibuſdam libertatibus eis per nos conceſſis & priſcis noſtris quibuſcunque remiſſis, nobis de bonis & merchandiſis ſuis quibuſcunque infra regnum & poteſtatem noſtram adducend. ultra antiquas cuſtumas dare conceſſerint præſtationes & cuſtumas ſubſcriptas, viz. and ſo ſetteth down the increaſes, and amongſt the reſt this three-pence upon the pound, and ſo proceedeth, ac quidam mercatores de regno noſtro & poteſtate noſtra, ut ipſis dictis libertatibus & immunitatibus uti & gaudere, & quod de priſis noſtris quieti eſſe poſſint, præſtationes & cuſtumas hujuſmodi de bonis & merchandiſis ſuis nobis ſolvere velint, ut accepimus, aſſignavimus vos, &c. ad cuſtumas & præſtationes prædictas de mercatoribus de regno & poteſtate noſtra colligend. qui eas gratanter & ſine coercione ſolvere voluerint.; ita tamen quod aliquem mercatorem de dicto regno & poteſtate noſtra ad præſtationes & cuſtumas hujuſmodi nobis invito ſolvend. nullatenus diſtringatis. Surely if E. 1. had claimed the prerogative of impoſing, he would never have given theſe cautions in the requiring of that which he had taken to be his due, as that they ſhould not exact it of any of his ſubjects that were not willing to pay it, nor trouble nor diſtraine them for it.

Rot. Alem. 12. E. 3. dorm. 21. in Turr.

In the twelfth yeere of E. 3. we finde the record of certaine letters written from the king, being then at Barwick in the Scottiſh warres, unto the archbiſhop of Canterburie, in which letters the king ſeemeth to have a great confidence in the devotion of the archbiſhop, and therefore earneſtly intreateth him to further his enterpriſes with his prayers to God, and then addeth further:

Ad hoc pater, cum populus regni noſtri variis oneribus, tallagiis, & impoſitionibus, hactenus prægravetur (quod dolentes referimus) ſed inevitabili neceſſitate compulſi de eiſdem oneribus ipſum adhuc relevare non valemus dictum populum, ut tantam neceſſitatem noſtram humiliter & benigne patiatur & caritativè ſuſtineat, & priorem, quam penes nos concepit de cetero inſtanter in orationibus & eleemoſynis ſuis, (oneribus prædictis, quæ non ex maliiia vel preſumptione voluntaria ipſum gravant, non obſtantibus) exhibeant caritatem, indulgentiam muneribus & aliis modis, quibus ſecundum Deum videbitis piis exhortationibus inducatis, & nos penes eundem excuſetis; ſperamus namque per Dei gratiam, cujus manus cunctis indigentibus ſola ſufficiens, & largiflua comprobatur, beneficiis compenſativis dictum populum viſitare & conſolari pro loco & tempore opportunis.

The principall thing I note out of this record, upon the very point of this my third obſervation, is, that the king intending to excuſe himſelf of the burthens by him laid on the people, and to avoid the blemiſh of wrong and injuſtice in laying thereon, ſaith they were not onera ex preſumptione voluntaria, that is, burthens that he preſumed to lay on at his owne will, whereby he condemneth impoſitions without aſſent of parliament, which are (onera ex voluntate regis) to proceed of preſumption, which doth clearly exclude claime of right, and diſproveth the lawfulneſs of the act. But there are divers other notable paſſages in the record worthy our marking. As out of the word (prægravantur) uſed by the king, wee may gather he did accompt theſe impoſitions a grievous burden to his people, which ſheweth his owne pity of them. He ſaith further, dolentes referimus, ſhewing his griefe and remorſe at it; & inevitabili neceſſitate compulſi, he did it conſtrained by unavoidable neceſſity, ſhewing he was forced to it againſt his will, by that which violateth and breaketh all law; which inferreth, he would not maintaine his action by law. Adhuc relevare non valemus; this inſinuates, he would eaſe them in good time. Curitatem exhiberent, they ſhould afford him charity in the bearing of them, as if ſo be in point of juſtice or right they need not. Penes eundem excuſetis, the biſhop ſhould excuſe him to the people. By this he did clearly leave the point of juſtification, and ſo of right. Laſtly, he promiſeth he would viſit and comfort them beneficiis compenſativis, would give them recompence for thoſe ſummes he had ſo raiſed of them; which ſheweth that he claimed them not as due, for then he needed not give recompence for them.

Rot. Parl. 21. E. 3. n. 16.

In the one and twentieth yeere of E. 3. a petition was exhibited in parliament, that levies be not made by commiſſion (ſo they be in this caſe) nor other things laid upon the people unleſs they be granted in parliament. The kings anſwer is, if any ſuch impoſitions were made, it was by great neceſſity, and with aſſent of the prelates barons and ſome of the commons preſent; yet he will not that ſuch impoſitions not duly made be drawne in conſequence. Here the king acknowledgeth an impoſition not to be duly made, though with the conſent of the higher houſe and ſome of the commons, becauſe it was not in full parliament: much rather he would have thought ſo, if it had been by the king alone.

King E. 4. (that was a rough and warlike prince, and was more beholding to his ſword in the recovery of his right to the crowne then to the affection of the people) at a parliament held the ſeventh yeere of his raigne made a ſpeech to the commons, ſir John Say being then ſpeaker, in which ſpeech is contained very notable matter, and very pertinent to our purpoſe; and becauſe the record is not in print, I will ſet downe the kings ſpeech verbatim as it is entred upon the parliament roll, and then I will make a paraphraſe upon it. 'John Say, and ye 'ſirs come to this my court of parliament for the commons 'of this my realme. The cauſe why I have cald and ſummoned this my preſent parliament, is, that I purpoſe to 'live upon mine own, and not to charge my ſubjects but 'in great and urgent cauſes, concerning more the weale of 'themſelves, and alſo the defence of them and of this my 'realme, rather than mine owne pleaſure, as heretofore by commons of 'this land hath beene done, and borne unto my progenitors in time of 'need; wherein I truſt, that yee ſirs, and all the commons of this my land, 'will be as tender and kinde unto me in ſuch caſes as heretofore any 'commons have been to any of my progenitours. And for the good-'will, kindneſs, and true hearts that yee have borne, continued, and 'ſhewed to me at all times heretofore, I thanke you as heartily as I 'can. Alſo I truſt yee will continue in time coming; for which by 'the grace of God I ſhall be to you as good and gracious a king, and 'reigne as righteouſly upon you, as ever did any of my progenitors upon 'commons of this my realme in dayes paſt, and ſhall alſo in time of 'need apply my perſon for the weale and defence of you, and of this my 'realme, not ſparing my body nor life for any jeopardy that might happen to the ſame.'

Out of this, we may obſerve firſt the kings proteſtation to live of his owne, and not to charge his ſubjects; by which I gather he did acknowledge a certain and diſtinct property of that which was his ſubjects from that which was his own, which excludeth the right to impoſe at his will; for if that be admitted, the ſubjects property is proprietas precaria, not certaine how much of his is his owne: for that is his which the king will leave him; for there is no limit or reſtraint of the quantity, the right being admitted, but onely the kings will.--The ſecond thing I obſerve is this, that in charging of his ſubjects he would confine himſelfe between theſe two bounds. The one, it ſhould bee in great and urgent cauſes concerning more the weale of them, and the defence of them and his realme, than his owne pleaſure; wherein he condemneth thoſe occaſions that grew upon exceſſe of private expence by over great bounty, or otherwiſe, and admitteth onely ſuch as grow by reaſon of warres, or other ſuch like publique cauſes concerning the whole ſtate. The other bound or limit is, that thoſe burdens ſhould be ſecundum morem majorum, as heretofore had been done and borne by the commons to his anceſtours in time of need.--The third thing I obſerve is, that he acknowledged theſe burdens did proceed out of their good-will and kindneſs, and not out of his right and prerogative; out of theſe words, that he truſted they would bee as tender and kinde to him in ſuch caſes, as heretofore any commons had been to his progenitors.--And laſtly, wee may note the recompence promiſed by the king to his ſubjects, for their good wills and kindneſs, his goodneſs and grace, his juſt and righteous government, the jeopardy of his body and life for their weale and defence. Did this king aſſume to himſelfe a right to lay burdens on his ſubjects at his own will without their aſſents, that offered to buy them at his need with the price of his blood, the moſt ſacred relique in the kingdome?

4. My fourth obſervation is, that in all petitions exhibited by the commons in parliament againſt impoſitions, the very knot of their griefe, and the principal cauſe of their complaint, hath been expreſſed in thoſe petitions, that the impoſitions have been without aſſent of parliament; by which is neceſſarily inferred, that their griefe was in point of right, not of burden.

Rot. Parl. 11. E. 3. nu. 11.

In 21 E. 3. nu. 11. the complaint of the impoſition of two ſhillings upon a ſacke of wooll, two ſhillings upon a tonne of wine, ſix-pence upon aver de pois, the cauſe of grievance expreſſed, becauſe it was done ſans aſſent de commons.

Rot. Parl. 25 E. 3. nu. 22.

25 E. 3. nu. 22. In a petition the commons complaine, that an impoſition upon wools was ſet by the conſent of the merchants; they pray that commiſſions bee not made upon ſuch ſingular grants, if they be not in full parliament; and if any ſuch grants be made, they may be held as void.

Rot. Parl. 17 E. 3. nu. 28.

17 E. 3. nu. 28. The commons in their petition informe the king, it is againſt reaſon they ſhould be charged with impoſitions ſet on by aſſent of merchants, and not in parliament.

5. My fifth obſervation is, that, whenſoever any petition was exhibited againſt impoſitions, there was never any reſpect had of the quantity, but they were ever intirely abated, as well where they were ſmall, as where they were great; no requeſt ever made to make them leſs when they were great, nor excuſe made of their eaſe when they were exceeding ſmall; which ſheweth, that it was not the point of burden or exceſſe was reſpected in their complaint, but the point of meere right.

R. Parl. 25. E. 3. nu. 22.

25 E. 3. nu. 22. Fourty ſhillings ſet an impoſition upon a ſacke of wooll, upon complaint, all taken off, and no ſuit to be eaſed of part becauſe it was too great.

Ibid. 36. E. 3. nu. 26. 21 E. 3. nu. 11.

36 E. 3. nu. 26. Three ſhillings and four-pence upon a ſacke of wool all taken off, and no excuſe made for the ſmalneſs; for 21 E. 3. nu. 11 two ſhillings a ſacke, two ſhillings tonnage, and ſix-pence poundage.

R. Parl 50. E. 3. nu. 163.

50 E. 3. nu. 163. A great complaint was made in parliament by the commons, that an impoſition of a penny was ſet upon wools for tonnage over and above the ancient due, which was but a penny, and ſo the ſubject was charged with two-pence; alſo that a penny was exacted for meſonage, which was but an halfe-penny; which impoſitions the record doth expreſs did amount to an hundred pounds a yeere.

This petty impoſition was as much ſtood upon in point of right, as the other great one of fourty ſhillings, and was taken off upon complaint in parliament, without either juſtification or excuſe for the ſmalneſs of it.

6. My ſixth obſervation is, that thoſe which have adviſed the ſetting on of impoſitions without aſſent of parliament, have been accuſed in parliament for giving that advice, as of a great offence in the ſtate, and have ſuffered ſharpe cenſure and great diſgrace by it.

Neither doe I finde that the quality of the perſon hath extenuated the blame; as 50 E. 3. William lord Latimer chamberlaine to the king, and one of his private councell, was accuſed by the commons in parliament of divers deceits and extortions and miſdeeds, and among other things, that he had procured to be ſet upon wooll woollfells and other merchandizes, new impoſitions, to wit, upon a ſack of wooll eleven ſhillings, which the lord Latimer ſought to excuſe, becauſe he had the conſent and good liking of the merchants firſt. But judgment was given againſt him, that he ſhould be committed to priſon, be fined and ranſomed at the kings will, and be put from being of the council; and this procuring of impoſitions to be ſet on without aſſent of parliament is expreſly ſet down in the entry of the judgment for one of the cauſes of his cenſure.

Rot. Parl. 50. E. 3. n. 17, 18, 19, 20.

Richard Lyons, a farmer of the cuſtoms in London, the ſame year was accuſed in parliament for the ſame offence. He pleaded, he did it by the kings command, and had anſwered the money to the kings chamber: yet was condemned and adjudged in parliament to be committed to priſon, and all his lands and goods were ſeiſed into the kings hand. And at the laſt the hate againſt theſe authors of impoſitions grew ſo, that 50 E. 3. in the ſame parliament, a petition was exhibited in parliament to make this a capital offence. The record is very ſhort, and therefore I will ſet it down verbatim. Item prie le dit common, que ſoit ordaine per ſtatute en ceſt preſent parliament de touts ceux, queux cy en avant mittont ou font pur lour ſinguler profit novels impoſitions per lour authoritie demeſn, accrocheants al eux eny ul power de riens que ſoit eſtabli en parliament, ſans aſſent de parliament, que ils eyent judgement de vie & member, & de foriſfacture. To this rough petition the king gave a milde and temperate anſwer, courre la common ley come eſtoit al avant uſe.

7. My ſeventh obſervation is, the ceſſation between 50 E. 3. after this cenſure in parliament and 4 Mariæ, almoſt two hundred years, during which time no king did attempt to impoſe without aſſent of parliament. And yet we finde in the parliament rolls, that there was not one of thoſe kings that reigned in that time, but had impoſitions granted him upon fit occaſion by act of parliament upon all goods and merchandizes, and at divers times during their reigns, ſometimes more, ſometimes leſs upon the ton and pound, but ever for a time certain, and indefinite. So the uſe of them was not given over, but the power of impoſing was ſo clearly and undoubtedly held to be in the parliament, as no king went about to practiſe the contrary.

But to this ceſſation, that was of great weight and credit in our evidence, a colour was given by the other ſide, to avert the inference made upon it againſt the kings right, that is, that during that time there was ſo great a revenue grew to the crown by double cuſtom paid for all merchandizes both in England and at Callais, by reaſon of an act of parliament made 8 H. 4. which was, that no goods ſhould be carried out of the realm but to Callais, and by reaſon that the merchants paid cuſtom both there and here for the ſame goods, that in the ſeven and twentieth year of Henry the ſixth, the cuſtom of Callais was 68000 l. the year; a great ſum, if you conſider the weight of money then, what price it bare; and by reaſon hereof princes not delighting to charge their murmuring ſubjects but when need is, being ſo amply ſupplied otherwiſe, did not put that prerogative in practice.

To this I anſwer, that if that were true that was urged, it might be ſome probable colour of the forbearance of impoſing. But I finde it quite contrary, and that by record: for there was no ſuch reſtraint of all commodities not to be tranſported to any place but Callais, but onely woolls woollfells leather tinn and lead, that were ſtaple wares, which by the ſtatute 37 E. 3. were to be tranſported thither, and not to any other place, and the ſtaple continued at that place for the moſt part from that time untill long after, 27 H. 6. but there was no double cuſtom paid both here and there by the ſame owner: but the yearly profits of the cuſtoms of Callais at thoſe times were ſo far ſhort of that which hath been alledged in 27 H. 6. that it appeareth in an act of parliament, 27 H. 6. cap. 2. printed in the book at large, that the commons do complain, that, whereas in the time of E. 3. the cuſtom of Callais was 68000 l. per annum, at that time, which was 27 H. 6. by reaſon of the ill uſage of merchants, it was fallen to be but 12000 pounds the year. So then there was great cauſe in that reſpect to have ſet on impoſitions by reaſon of that great abatement of cuſtoms, and yet it was not then offered to be done without aſſent of parliament. But if you look a little further into the extreme neceſſities of thoſe times, you ſhall finde there never was greater cauſe to have ſtrained prerogatives; for it appeareth in an act of parliament, 28 H. 6. that it was then declared in parliament by the chancellor and treaſurer, who demanded relief of the people for the king, both for payment of his debts and for his yearly livelihood, that the king was then indebted 372000 l. which now by the weight of money amounteth to above 1100000*l.* and that his ordinary expences were more then his yearly revenue by 19000 l. yearly. So if ever there was cauſe to put a king to his ſhifts, it was then; yet we ſee they did not venture to put in practice this ſuppoſed prerogative. It further appeareth in that ſtatute, that the people, among thoſe reaſons they alleadged, why they were not able to retain the king, gave this for one, that they had ſo often granted him tonnage and poundage upon merchandizes, by which it appeareth he took nothing of merchants by impoſition without grant; for if he had, no doubt they would not have ſtuck to have put him in mind of it. But I pray conſider, what became of this motion of the chancellor and treaſurer. The propoſition had depended in parliament many years. The effect was, the people entreated the king to reſume all grants he had made from the beginning of his reign untill that time, being the twenty-eighth year of his reign, excepting ſuch as were made upon conſideration valuable, that he might ſo enable himſelf by that mean by which he had impoveriſhed himſelf and the whole kingdom. This took effect, and the ſtatute of reſumptions was thereupon made the ſame year; which record, becauſe it is not in print, and declareth theſe things with great gravity and authority, I will ſet down the very text of it, ſo much as is material to our purpoſe.

28 H. 6. Stat. de Reſump. in Turri Lond. not printed.

'Prayen your commons in this your preſent parliament 'aſſembled to conſider, that where your chancellor of your 'realm of England, your treaſurer of England, and many 'other lords of your council, by your high commandment to 'your ſaid commons, at your parliament holden laſt at Weſtminſter, ſhewed and declared the ſtate of this your realm, which was 'that ye were indebted 372000*l.* which is grievous, and that your 'livelihood in yearly value was but 5000*l.* And foraſmuch as this '5000 l. to your high and notable ſtate to be kept, and to pay your ſaid 'debts, will not ſuffice: therefore that your high eſtate may be releived. And furthermore it was declared, that your expences neceſſary 'to your houſhold without all other ordinary charge came to 24000*l.* 'yearly, which exceedeth every year in expence neceſſary over your 'livelihood 19000 l. Alſo pleaſeth it your highneſs to conſider, that 'the commons of your ſaid realm be as well willing to their power, for 'the releiving of your highneſs, as ever was people to any king of your 'progenitors that raigned in your ſaid realm of England: but your ſaid 'commons been ſo impoveriſhed, what by taking victual to your houſehold, and other things in your ſaid realm, and nought paid for it, and 'the quinzime by your ſaid commons ſo often granted, and by the grant 'of tunnage and poundage, and by the grant of ſubſidy upon woolls, 'and other grants to your highneſs, and for lack of execution of juſtice, 'that your ſaid poor commons be full nigh deſtroyed; and if it ſhould 'continue longer in ſuch great charge, it would not in any wiſe he had, 'ne born. Wherefore pleaſeth it your highneſs, the premiſſes graciouſly 'to conſider, and that ye by the advice and aſſent of your lords ſpiritual 'and temporal, and by the authority of this your preſent parliament, 'for the conſideration of your high eſtate, and in comfort and eaſe of 'your poor commons, would take, reſume, ſeiſe and retain in your 'hands and poſſeſſion all honors, &c.'

This was very plain dealing by the people with their king, and this is the ſucceſs of the demand of ſupply and ſupport had in thoſe days, being required in point of gratification, without any recompence or retribution for it. Thus then we have cleared this point, that between 50 E. 3. and 4 Mariæ, there was not one impoſition ſet without aſſent of parliament.

Queen Mary in the fourth year of her reign, upon the wars with France, ſet an impoſition upon clothes for this conſideration, that the cuſtom of woolls was decayed, by reaſon for the moſt part they were made into clothes, which afforded little cuſtom; for that which in wooll paid for cuſtom and ſubſidy 40*s.* made into cloth paid but 4*s.* 4*d.* To recompence this by an indifferent equality, there was ſet upon a cloth 5*s.* 6*d.* which impoſition did not make up the loſs ſuſtained in the cuſtom of wooll, by 13*s.* 4*d.* in 40*s.* This was juſtum, but not juſtè. This religious prince, invironed with infinite troubles in the church and commonwealth, and much impoveriſhed by her devotion, in renouncing the profits of the church-lands that were in the crown by the ſuppreſſion, was the firſt that made digreſſion from the ſteps of her worthy progenitors, in putting on that impoſition without aſſent of parliament; for that very conſideration of the loſs of cuſtom, by turning of wooll to clothing, came into treaty in the 24 year of E. 3. when the art of clothing began firſt to be much practiſed in this kingdom; and then in the recompence of the loſs ſo ſuſtained in the decay of cuſtom of woolls, there was ſet upon a cloth by act of parliament above the olde cuſtom, 14*d.* for a denizen, and for an alien 21 d. This is recited in a record in the Exchequer, 48 E. 3. Rot. 2. R. Theſ. in origin. But I pray you examine, how this impoſition of queen Mary was digeſted by the people. We ſee in the caſe of my lord Dier, 1 El. fol. 165. that the merchant found great grief at it, and made exclamation and ſuit to queen Elizabeth to be unburdened of it. The very reaſon of their grief expreſſed in that caſe is, becauſe it was not ſet on by parliament, but by the queens abſolute power; ſo that was the ground of that complaint, the very point of right.

Orig in Scac. 48 E. 3. Rot. 2. R. Theſ. 1 Eliz. Dier, fo. 165.

This cauſe was referred to all the judges, to report whether the queen might ſet on this impoſition without aſſent of parliament. They divers times had conference about it, but have not yet made report for the king; which is an infallible preſumption, that their opinions were not for him. For it is a certain rule among us, that if a queſtion, concerning the kings prerogative or his profit, be referred to the judges, if their opinions be for the king, it will be ſpeedily publiſhed, and it were indiſcretion to conceal it; but if there be no publication, then we make no doubt, but that their opinions are either againſt the king, or at leaſt they ſtick, and give none for him.

The ſame queen Mary, upon reſtraint of bringing in of French commodities occaſioned by the then wars with France, ſet an impoſition upon Gaſcoyn wines, which continueth yet. So the kingdom of England by the injuſtice of that prince was clogged with theſe two heavy impoſitions, contrary to the right of the kingdom and the acts of her progenitors.

Queen Elizabeth ſet on that upon ſweet wines, which grew alſo upon the occaſion of the troubles with Spain. That upon allome was none. It was rather a monopoly to maſter Smith the cuſtomer of London, for the ingroſſing of all allomes into his own hands, for which priviledge he gave a voluntary impoſition upon that commodity. It was like the priviledge granted to John Pechey of the ſweet wines by E. 3. for which the patentee was called into the parliament houſe, 50. E. 3. and was there puniſhed, and his patent taken away and cancelled.

What impoſitions have been ſet on in the kings time, I need not expreſs. They are ſet down particularly in the book of rates that is in print. They are not eaſily numbered. The time for which they are raiſed is not ſhort. The patent prefixed to that book, bearing date 28 Julii, 6 Jacobi, will inſtruct you ſufficiently in that point. They be limited to the king, his heirs and ſucceſſors; which I ſuppoſe is the firſt eſtate of fee ſimple of impoſitions that ever man read of.

8. My eighth and laſt obſervation is upon tunnage and poundage given to the king of this realm, upon wares and merchandizes exported and imported, which is an impoſition by act of parliament, and, as it will appear, was given out of the peoples good-will, as a very gratification to the king, to enjoyn him thereby from the deſire of voluntary impoſitions, and to conclude him by that gift in parliament from attempting to take any other without aſſent of parliament. For after the ceaſing of voluntary impoſitions, theſe parliamentary ones were frequent in the times of the king that ſucceeded. But they were never given but for years, with expreſs caution how the money ſhould be beſtowed; as towards the defence of the ſeas, protection of traffick, or ſome ſuch other publick cauſes. Sometimes ſpecial ſequeſtrators made by act of parliament, by whoſe hands the money ſhould be delivered, as 5 R. 2. cap. 3. in a printed ſtatute. The rates that were given were very variable, ſometimes 2 s. tunnage, and 6 d. poundage, as 7 R. 2. 3 s. tunnage, and 12 d. poundage, 10 R. 2. which grants were not to endure, the longeſt of them, above a year; 18 d. tunnage, 6 d. poundage, in 17 R. 2. 3 s. tunnage and 12 d. poundage granted to H. 4. in the thirteenth year of his reign for a certain time, in which ſtatute there is this clauſe, that this aide in time to come ſhould not be taken for an example to charge the lords and commons in manner of ſubſidy, uneſs it be by the wills of the lords and commons, and that by a new grant to be made in full parliament in time to come. This clauſe in good and proper conſtruction may be taken to be a very convention between the king and his people in parliament, that he ſhould not from thenceforth, nor any of his ſucceſſors, ſet on impoſitions without aſſent of parliament. The like impoſition was granted to H. 5. in the firſt year of his reign for a ſhort time towards the defence of the realm, and ſafeguard of the ſea, upon condition expreſſed in the act, that the merchants denizens and ſtrangers coming into the realm with their merchandizes, ſhould be well and honeſtly uſed and handled, paying the ſaid ſubſidy as in the time of his father, and his noble progenitors kings of England, without oppreſſion or extortion. In the end of which act the commons proteſted being bound by any grant in time to come, for the purpoſes aforeſaid.

H. 6. in the one and thirtieth year of his reign, had tunnage and poundage given him for his life. E. 4. had it given him the third year of his reign, as it appeareth in a ſtatute 12 E. 4. cap. 3. H. 8. in the ſixth year of his reign, and all ſince in the firſt year of their reigns have had it given them for term of their life; and being now ſo certainly ſettled, do reach further at that, from which they are in conſcience and honor excluded by this voluntary gratification. For can any man give me a reaſon, why the people ſhould give this impoſition of tunnage and poundage above the due cuſtom upon all commodities, if the king by his prerogative might ſet on impoſitions without aſſent of parliament? And were not that a weak action in a king, to take that of his people as a benevolence from them, with limitation of the ſame, and in what it ſhould be imploied, and how they will be uſed for it, and for what time he ſhall have it, which he might juſtly take without their conſents, unclogged of theſe unpleaſing incumbrances?

Rot. Parl. 31. H. 6. 12. E. 4. c. 3. 6. H. 8. c. 12. 1. E. 6. c. 13. 1 Mar. c. 18. 1 Eliz. c. 19. 1. Jac. c. 33.

The ſtatutes of tunnage and poundage made in our times, that are altogether inclined to flattery, do yet retain in them certain ſhews and rumors of thoſe antient liberties, although indeed the ſubſtance be loſt. As in the ſtatute 1 Jac. cap. 33. we declare, that we truſt, and have ſure confidence of his majeſties good-will towards us, in and for the keeping and ſure defending of the ſeas; and that it will pleaſe his highneſs, that all merchants, as well denizens as ſtrangers, coming into this realm, be well and honeſtly entreated and demeaned for ſuch things whereof ſubſidy is granted, as they were in the time of the kings progenitors and predeceſſors, without oppreſſion to them to be done. By this clauſe, as it now continueth, the true intent of this ſtatute appeareth to be, that there ought no other impoſition to be laid upon merchants beſides theſe given by this ſtatute; and this intention hath been well interpreted by uſe and practice from the time of E. 3. to the time of queen Mary, as before is declared.

1 Jac. c. 33.

Thus much of this laſt reaſon, made from obſervation, and the action of our nation.

Objections anſwered.

I will anſwer now ſuch main objections as have been made againſt the peoples right, and have not been touched by me obiter in my paſſage through this diſcourſe.

That which hath been moſt inſiſted upon is this, that the king by his prerogative royal hath the cuſtody of the havens and ports of this iſland, being the very gates of this kingdom; that he in his royal function and office is onely truſted with the keys of theſe gates; that he alone hath power to ſhut them, and to open them when, and to whom he in his princely wiſdom ſhall ſee good; that by the law of England he may reſtrain the perſons of any from going out of the land, or from coming into it; that he may of his own power and diſcretion prohibit exportation and importation of goods and merchandizes; and out of his prerogative and preheminence, the power of impoſing, as being derivative, doth ariſe and reſult; for cui quod majus eſt licet, & ei quod eſt minus licitum eſt. So their reaſon briefly is this; the king may reſtrain the paſſage of the perſon, and of the goods; therefore he may ſuffer them not to paſs, but ſub modo, paying ſuch an impoſition for his ſufferance, as he ſhall ſet upon them.

For the grounds and propoſitions laid in this objection, I ſhall not be much againſt any one of them. Others of them muſt be qualified, ere they be confeſſed. But the inference and argument made upon them, I utterly deny; for in it there is mutatio hypotheſis, and a tranſition from a thing of one nature to a thing of another. As the premiſes are of a power in the king onely fiduciary, and in point of truſt and government, the concluſion infers a right of intereſt and gain.—Admit the king had cuſtodiam portuum; yet he hath but the cuſtody, which is truſt, and not dominium utile. He hath power to open and ſhut upon conſideration of publike good to the people and ſtate, but not to make gain and benefit by it. The one is protection, the other is expilation. The ports in their own nature are publike, free for all to go in and out; yet for the common good this liberty is reſtrainable by the wiſdom and policy of the prince, who is put in truſt to diſcern the times when this natural liberty ſhall be reſtrained. In 1 H. 7. fol. 10. in the caſe of the Florentines for their allome, the lord chief juſtice Huſſey doth write a caſe, that in the time of E. 4. a legate from the pope being at Callais to come into England, it was reſolved in full council, as the book ſaith, before the lords and judges, that he ſhould not have licence to come into England unleſs he would take an oath at Callais, that he would bring nothing with him that ſhould be prejudicial to the king and his crown.—The king by the common-law may ſend his writ, ne exeas regnum, to any ſubject of the realm; but the ſurmiſe of the writ is, quia datum eſt nobis intelligi, quod tu verſus partes exteras abſque licentia noſtra clam deſtinas te divertere, et quamplurima nobis et coronæ noſtræ prejudicia proſequi. Fitzh. N. B. 85. b. So in point of government, and common good of the realm, he may reſtrain the perſon. But to conclude therefore he may take money not to reſtrain, is to ſell government, truſt and common juſtice, and moſt unworthy the divine office of a king.

1 H. 7. fol. 10.

Fitzherbert, N. B. 85. b.

But let us compare this power of the king in foraign affairs, with the like power he hath in domeſtick government. There is no queſtion but that the king hath the cuſtody of the gates of all the towns and cities in England, as well as all the ports and havens, and upon conſideration of the weal publike may open and ſhut them at his pleaſure. As if the infection of the ſickneſs be dangerous in places vicine to the city of London, the king may command that none from thoſe places ſhall come into the city. May he therefore ſet an impoſition upon thoſe that he ſuffereth to come into the city? So, if by reaſon of infection he forbid the bringing of wares and merchandizes from ſome cities or towns in this kingdom to any great fair or mart, ſhall he therefore reſtrain the bringing of goods thither, unleſs money be given him by way of impoſition? The king in his diſcretion, in point of equity, and for qualifying the rigor of the law, may enjoyn any of his ſubjects by his chancellor from ſuing in his court of common-law. May he therefore make a benefit by reſtraining all from ſuit in his courts, unleſs they pay him an impoſition upon their ſuits? In 2 E. 3. in the caſe of the earl of Richmond before-cited, the king had granted unto the men of Great Yarmouth, that all the ſhips that arrived at the port of Yarmouth, which conſiſted of three ſeveral ports, Great Yarmouth, Little Yarmouth, and Gerneſton, ſhould arrive all at Great Yarmouth, and at no other place within that port. The lawfulneſs of this patent being in queſtion in the kings court, it was reaſoned in the kings behalf for the upholding of the grant, as it is now, that the king had the cuſtody of the port; he might reſtrain merchants from landing at all in his kingdom; therefore out of the ſame power might appoint where, and in what haven they ſhould land, and no other. This patent was demurred on in the Kings Bench, as being granted againſt the law; but the caſe depending was adjourned into parliament for the weight and conſequence of it, and there the patent was condemned, and a law made againſt ſuch and the like grants.

2 E. 3. 7.

The preſidents, that were vouched for maintenance of this power of reſtraint in the king, were four produced almoſt in ſo many hundred years, whereof two were in the ſecond year of E. 1. one in the tenth year of E. 3. another in the ſeventeenth year of H. 6. ſince which time we hear of none but by act of parliament, as they had been uſually and regularly before. To theſe I will give anſwer out of themſelves, out of the common-law, out of divers ſtatutes, and out of the practice of the common-wealth. The reſtraints in the time of E. 1. one of them was to forbid the carrying of wooll out of the realm, the other was to forbid all traffick with the Flemings. That of 10 E. 3. was to reſtrain the exportation of ſhip-timber out of the realm. That of 17 H. 6. to prohibite traffique with the ſubjects of the duke of Burgundy. Theſe preſidents are rare, yet they have in them inducements out of publique reſpects to the common-wealth. For the rule of common-law in this caſe, I take it to be as the reverend judge ſir Anthony Fitzherbert holds in his writ of ne exeas regnum in Nat. Br. that by the common-law any man may go out of the kingdom, but the king may upon cauſes touching the good of the commonwealth reſtrain any man from going by his writ or proclamation, and if he then go, it is a contempt. This opinion of his is confirmed by the book, 1. Eliz. fol. 165. Dier, 12. and 13. Eliz. Dier, 296. In like manner if a ſubject of England be beyond ſea, and the king ſend to him to repair home, if he do it not, his lands and goods ſhall be ſeiſed for the contempt; and this was the caſe of William de Britain earl of Richmond, 19. E. 2. He was ſent by the king into Gaſcoyne on a meſſage, and refuſed to return, for which contempt his goods chattels lands and tenements were ſeiſed into the kings hands. The record is cited 2 and 3 Phil. and Mar. in my lord Dier. fol. 128. b. 2 & 3 P. & M. Dier. 128. and the law there held to be ſo at that time upon a queſtion moved in the queens behalf againſt divers, that being beyond the ſeas refuſed to return upon commandment ſent unto them to that purpoſe. The ſame is again for law confirmed in the dutcheſs Dier. 2 Eliz. 176. 5 R. 2. cap. 2. of Suffolke's caſe, 2 Eliz. Dier. 176. But the common-law was altered in this point by the ſtatute of 5 R. 2. cap. 2. by which the paſſage of all people is defended, that they may not go without licence, except the lords and other great men of the realm, merchants, and ſouldiers. So for the merchants, which are the people dealt withal, in the buſineſs in hand, the common-law remaineth as it was before the ſtatute; and ſo it was held, 12 El. Dier. 196. Dier. 12 El. 196. where the caſe was, an Engliſh merchant, being a papiſt, went over-ſea, and, being there, did ſettle himſelf to remain there for the enjoying the freedom of his conſcience. It was moved here in England, that his going without licence ſhould be a contempt; becauſe he went not to traffique as a merchant, but for the cauſe of religion. It was reſolved, no ſuch averment would be taken in this caſe; for that the very calling and vocation of being a merchant did give him liberty to go out of the kingdom when he would, and therefore the ſecret intent of his going was not to be enquired after. Sed lex inſpicit quod veriſimilius. Therefore it was in this caſe held no contempt. But at this day the law is as it was before, 5 R. 2. cap. 2. for that ſtatute is repealed, 4 Jac. c. 1. 4 Jac. cap. 1. And all men whatſoever are now at liberty by the common-law to paſs out of the realm. There is only againſt this inconvenient liberty a proclamation dated at Weſtminſter, Proclam. 9. Jul. 5 Jac. 9. Jul. 5 Jac. to the very ſame effect in point of reſtraint of paſſage with the ſtatute of R. 2. So the ſubject is in this much the more at eaſe and liberty then he was before, that his going over-ſea without licence doth not induce any forfeiture, but onely incurreth the cenſure of a contempt; and therefore it were to be wiſhed that ſome firm law might be made in the caſe, both for the execution of ſo good a point of policy, and for the more quiet of the ſtate, in knowing the certainty of the puniſhment for the offence.

This liberty and freedom of merchants hath been ſtrengthened and confirmed by many notable laws before recited, as 14 E. 3. 14 E. 3. ſt. 2. c. 2. 15 E. 3. ſt. 2. c. 5. 18 E. 3. ſt. 1 c. 3. ſtat. 2. cap. 2. 15 E. 3. ſtat. 2. cap. 5. 18 E. 3. ſtat. 1. cap. 3. and divers other. And therefore though it be admitted that the king may reſtrain perſons and goods, yet it may well be denied, that he hath power of himſelf alone without aſſent of parliament ſimply and indefinitely to reſtrain all traffique in general, or to ſhut up all the havens and ports, and to bar the vent and iſſuing of wares and merchandizes of the whole kingdom; as it appeareth plainly, that this hath been done this three hundred years, or near thereabouts, by act of parliament onely, and that the kingdom of England made this matter of traffique ſo tender a caſe to deal in, as that it hath ever held it a matter fit for the conſultation of the great council of the kingdom, and for no other.

In 11 E. 3. the exportation of woolls was prohibited by act 11 E. 3. cap. 1. of parliament, in which ſtatute there was this clauſe, untill that by the king and his council it be thereof otherwiſe provided: which power ſo given to the king, to be uſed for the good of the commonwealth, gave occaſion to him to abuſe it to his profit and commodity, by giving licences of tranſportation to all, that would give forty ſhillings upon a ſack of wooll above the due cuſtom. This appeareth in the records in the Exchequer, 13 E. 3. Rot. 2. Rem. 13 E. 3. R. Theſ. rot. 2. Theſ. I will deſcribe the record, that you may perceive the ground of it the better. Rex collectoribus cuſtumæ in portu magnæ Jermouth *ſalutem. It followed in all kings times ſithence the death of E. 3. that this opening and ſhutting of the havens, reſtraining and enlarging of traffick, was done by act of parliament.

I will give one inſtance in the reign of every king. 5 R. 2. 5 R. 2. c. 2. ſt. 2. cap. 2. ſtat. 2. for the paſſage of wooll wooll-fells and leather. 6 H. 4. c. 4. 6 H. 4. cap. 4. for the traffique and commerce with merchants aliens. 2 H. 5. c. 6. ſt. 2. 2 H. 5. cap. 6. ſtat. 2. for the reſtraint of ſtaple commodities to places certain, and for the traffique of the merchants of the weſt. 27 H. 6. c. 1. 27 H. 6. cap. 1. that is enacted in parliament, which is contained in the proclamation 17 H. 6. cited for a preſident, that is, becauſe the duke of Burgundy made an ordinance whereby the traffick of the Engliſh nation was reſtrained, that therefore the Engliſhmen ſhould not traffick with the ſubjects of the duke of Burgundy. The ſame thing enacted upon the like occaſion, 4 E. 4 E. 4. c. 1. 4. c. 1. 19 H. 7. c. 21. 19 H. 7. cap. 21. the importation of divers commodities forbidden, as being prejudicial to the manufactures within the realm. 6 H. 8. cap. 12. 6 H. 8. cap. 12. the exportation of Norfolk woolls out of the realm forbidden. 26 H. 8. cap. 10. 26 H. 8. cap. 10. power is given to the king to order and diſpoſe of the traffick of merchants at his pleaſure; and the reaſon is given, becauſe otherwiſe the leagues and amities with foreign princes might be impeached by reaſon of reſtraint made by divers ſtatutes then ſtanding on foot; whereby it appeareth that it was not then taken to be law, that the king had an abſolute power in himſelf to order and diſpoſe of the courſe of traffick without help of a ſtatute. 2 E. 6. c. 9. 2 E. 6. cap. 9. exportation of leather reſtrained. 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 5. 1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. the exportation of herring, butter, cheeſe, and other victuals forbidden. 18 El. c. 8. 18 Eliz. cap. 8. the exportation of tallow, raw hides, leather. So in all times no uſe of proclamations in matters of this nature, but acts of parliament ſtill procured. Wherefore in mine opinion it behoveth them that do ſo earneſtly urge this argument, the king may reſtrain traffick, therefore may impoſe, to prove better then they have done, that the king may reſtrain traffick of his own abſolute power: for as the natural policy and conſtitution of our commonwealth is, we may better ſay, that is law which is de more gentis, then that which floweth from the reaſon of any man guided by his general notion and apprehenſion of power regal, in genere, not in individuo.

The laſt aſſault made againſt the right of the kingdom, was an objection grounded upon policy, and matter of ſtate; as, that it may ſo fall out that an impoſition may be ſet by a foreign prince that may wring our people, in which caſe the counterpoiſe is, to ſet on the like here upon the ſubjects of that prince; which policy, if it be not ſpeedily executed, but ſtayed until a parliament, may in the mean time prove vain and idle, and much damage may be ſuſtained that cannot afterwards be remedied.

This ſtrain of policy maketh nothing to the point of right. Our rule is in this plain commonwealth of ours, oportet neminem eſſe ſapientiorem legibus. If there be an inconvenience, it is fitter to have it removed by a lawful means, then by an unlawful. But this is rather a miſchief then an inconvenience; that is, a prejudice in preſent of ſome few, but not hurtful to the commonwealth. And it is more tolerable to ſuffer an hurt to ſome few for a ſhort time, then to give way to the breach and violation of the right of the whole nation; for that is the true inconvenience. Neither need it be ſo difficult or tedious to have the conſent of the parliament, if they were held as they ought, or might be. But our ſureſt guide in this will be the example of our anceſtors in this very caſe, and that in the time of one of the moſt politick princes that ever reigned in this kingdom. 7 H. 7. cap. 7. you ſhall finde an act of parliament, in 7 H. 7. cap. 7. which it was recited that the Venetians had ſet upon the Engliſh merchants that laded malmſeys at Candy four duckets of gold upon a butt, which in ſterling is eighteen ſhillings the butt. It was therefore enacted, that every merchant ſtranger, that brought malmſey into this kingdom, ſhould pay eighteen ſhillings the butt over and above the due cuſtom uſed; this impoſition to endure, until they of Venice had ſet aſide that of four duckets the butt upon the Engliſhmen.

Much hath been learnedly uttered upon this argument in the maintenance of the peoples right, and in anſwering that which hath been preſſed on the contrary. But my meaning is not to expreſs in this diſcourſe all that hath or may be ſaid on either ſide, but onely to make a remembrance ſomewhat larger of that which I myſelf offered as my ſymbolum towards the making up of this great reckoning of the commonwealth, which if it be not well audited, may in time coſt the ſubjects of England very dear. My hope is of others, that labored very worthily in this buſineſs, that they will not ſuffer their pains to die, and therefore I have forborn to enter into their province. I will end with that ſaying of that true and honeſt counſellor Philip Comines in his fifth book, Ph. Com. l. 5. c. 18. the 18 chapter, that it is more honorable for a king to ſay, 'I have ſo faithful and obedient ſubjects, that they deny me nothing I demand,' then to ſay, 'I levy what me liſt, and I have priviledges ſo to do.'

[At the end of the foregoing argument by Yelverton, an extract from a petition of grievances addreſſed by the commons to king James in 1610 is added, one ſubject of which is impoſitions by prerogative. But the whole petition is in Mr. Petyt's Jus Parliamentarium; and as we are not aware, that it is to be found either in the Parliamentary Hiſtory, the Journals of the Commons, or any other printed book, except the two before mentioned, it is here inſerted as a fragment of ſome curioſity. To this petition, we ſhall add lord Bacon's ſpeech on preſenting it to the king. The king's anſwer to ſo much of the petition as regarded impoſitions, is in the Parliamentary Hiſtory, vol. 5. p 239. Mr. Petyt, in his book before cited, gives ſome remarks of his own on the ſubject, with an extract from the Journal of the Lords for 23*d* May and 6*th* June 1612, when it was unſucceſsfully attempted to obtain the opinion of the judges on the queſtion of impoſitions.]

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

Grievances complained of.

YOUR majeſty's moſt humble commons aſſembled in parliament, being moved as well out of their duty and zeal to your majeſty, as out of the ſenſe of juſt grief, wherewith your loving ſubjects are generally through the whole realm at this time poſſeſſed, becauſe they perceive their common and ancient right and liberty to be much declined and infringed in theſe late years, do with all duty and humility preſent theſe our juſt complaints thereof to your gracious view, moſt inſtantly craving juſtice therein, and due redreſs.

And although it be true, that many of the particulars, whereof we now complain, were of ſome uſe in the late queen's time, and then not much impugned, becauſe the uſage of them being then more moderate, gave not ſo great occaſion of offence, and conſequently not ſo much cauſe to enquire into the right and validity of them; yet the right being now more thoroughly ſcanned, by reaſon of the great miſchiefs and inconveniencies which the ſubjects have thereby ſuſtained: we are very confident that your majeſty will be ſo far from thinking it a point of honour or greatneſs to continue any grievance upon your people, becauſe you found them begun in your predeceſſor's times, as you will rather hold it a work of great glory to reform them; ſince your majeſty knoweth well, that neither continuance of time, nor errors of men, can or ought to prejudice truth or juſtice; and that nothing can be more worthy of ſo worthy a king, nor more anſwerable to the great wiſdom and goodneſs which abound in you, than to underſtand the griefs, and redreſs the wrongs of ſo loyal and well deſerving people.

In this confidence, dread ſovereign, we offer theſe grievances (the particulars whereof are hereunder ſet down) to your gracious conſideration.

And we offer them out of the greateſt loyalty and duty, that ſubjects can bear to their prince; moſt humbly and inſtantly beſeeching your majeſty, as well for juſtice ſake (more than which, as we conceive, in theſe petitions we do not ſeek) as alſo for the better aſſurance of the ſtate, and general repoſe of your faithful and loving ſubjects, and for teſtimony of your gracious acceptation of their full affections; declared as well by their joyful receiving of your majeſty at your happy entrance into theſe kingdoms, which you have been often pleaſed with favour to remember, as alſo by their extraordinary contributions granted ſince unto you, ſuch as have been never yielded to any former prince, upon the like terms and occaſions, that we may receive to theſe our complaints your moſt gracious anſwer.

Which we cannot doubt but will be ſuch as may be worthy of your princely ſelf, and will give ſatisfaction and great comfort to all your loyal and moſt dutiful loving ſubjects, who do and will pray for the happy preſervation of your moſt royal majeſty.

New impoſitions.

The policy and conſtitution of this your kingdom appropriates unto the kings of this realm, with the aſſent of the parliament, as well the ſovereign power of making laws, as that of taxing, or impoſing upon the ſubjects goods or merchandizes, wherein they have juſtly ſuch a propriety, as may not without their conſent be altered or changed.

This is the cauſe that the people of this kingdom, as they ever ſhewed themſelves faithful and loving to their kings, and ready to aid them in all their juſt occaſions with voluntary contributions; ſo have they been ever careful to preſerve their own liberties and rights, when any thing hath been done to prejudice or impeach the ſame.

And therefore, when their princes, occaſioned either by their wars, or their over great bounty, or by any other neceſſity, have without conſent of parliament ſet impoſitions either within the land, or upon commodities either exported or imported by the merchants; they have in open parliament complained of it, in that it was done without their conſents; and thereupon never failed to obtain a ſpeedy and full redreſs, without any claim made by the kings of any power or prerogative in that point.

And though the law of propriety be originally and carefully preſerved by the common laws of this realm, which are as ancient as the kingdom itſelf; yet theſe famous kings, for the better contentment and aſſurance of their loving ſubjects, agreed, that this old fundamental right ſhould be farther declared and eſtabliſhed by act of parliament: wherein it is provided, that no ſuch charges ſhould ever be laid upon the people, without their common conſent; as may appear by ſundry records of former times.

We therefore, your majeſty's moſt humble commons aſſembled in parliament, following the example of this worthy care of our anceſtors, and out of a duty to thoſe for whom we ſerve, finding that your majeſty, without advice or conſent of parliament, hath lately in time of peace ſet both greater impoſitions, and far more in number, than any your noble anceſtors did ever in time of war, have with all humility preſumed to preſent this moſt juſt and neceſſary petition unto your majeſty, that all impoſitions ſet without the aſſent of parliament may be quite aboliſhed and taken away: and that your majeſty, in imitation likewiſe of your noble progenitors, will be pleaſed, that a law may be made during this ſeſſion of parliament, to declare, that all impoſitions ſet or to be ſet upon your people, their goods or merchandiſes, ſave only by common aſſent in parliament, are and ſhall be void: wherein your majeſty ſhall not only give your ſubjects good ſatisfaction in point of their right, but alſo bring exceeding joy and comfort to them which now ſuffer; partly through the abating the price of native commodities, and partly through the raiſing of all foreign; to the overthrow of merchants and ſhipping; the cauſing of a general dearth and decay of wealth among your people, who will be hereby no leſs diſcouraged than diſabled to ſupply your majeſty, when occaſion ſhall require it.

Commiſſions eccleſiaſtical.

Whereas by the ſtatute 1 Eliz. cap. 1. intituled, an act reſtoring to the crown the ancient juriſdiction over the ſtate eccleſiaſtical, &c. power was given to the queen and her ſucceſſors, to conſtitute and make a commiſſion in cauſes eccleſiaſtical;

The ſaid act is found to be inconvenient and of dangerous extent in divers reſpects:

Firſt, For that it enableth the making of ſuch a commiſſion, as well to any one ſubject born as to more.

Secondly, For that, whereas by the intention and words of the ſtatute, eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction is reſtored to the crown, and your highneſs by that ſtatute enabled to give only ſuch power eccleſiaſtical to the ſaid commiſſioners; yet under colour of ſome words in that ſtatute, where the commiſſioners are authoriſed to execute their commiſſion, according to the tenor and effect of your highneſs's letters patents, and by letters patents grounded thereupon; the ſaid commiſſioners do fine and impriſon, and exerciſe other authority not belonging to the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction reſtored by that ſtatute; which we conceive to be a great wrong to the ſubject; and that thoſe commiſſioners might as well, by colour of thoſe words, if they were ſo authoriſed by your highneſs's letters patents, fine without ſtint, and impriſon without limitation of time; as alſo, according to will and diſcretion, without any rules of law, ſpiritual or temporal, adjudge and impoſe utter confiſcation of goods, forfeiture of lands; yea and the taking away of a limb, and of life itſelf; and this for any matter whatſoever pertaining to ſpiritual juriſdiction. Which never was nor could be meant by the makers of that law.

Thirdly, For that by the ſtatute, the king and his ſucceſſors (however your majeſty hath been pleaſed out of your gracious diſpoſition otherwiſe to order) may make and direct ſuch commiſſion into all the counties and dioceſes, yea into every pariſh of England; and thereby all cauſes may be taken from juriſdiction of biſhops, chancellors and archdeacons, and laymen ſolely to be enabled to excommunicate and exerciſe all other cenſures ſpiritual.

Fourthly, That every petty offence, pertaining to ſpiritual juriſdiction, is by colour of the ſaid words and letters patents, grounded thereupon, made ſubject to excommunication and puniſhment by that ſtrange and exorbitant power and commiſſion; whereby the leaſt offenders, not committing any thing of any enormous or high nature, may be drawn from the moſt remote places of the kingdom to London or York; which is very grievous and inconvenient.

Fifthly, For that limit touching cauſes ſubject to this commiſſion, being only with theſe words; viz. ſuch as pertain to ſpiritual or eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction; it is very hard to know what matters or offences are included in that number: and the rather becauſe it is unknown, what ancient canons or laws ſpiritual are in force, and what not. From hence ariſeth great inconveniency, and occaſion of contention.

And whereas upon the ſame ſtatute a commiſſion eccleſiaſtical is made, therein is grievance apprehended thus:

Firſt, For that thereby the ſame men have both ſpiritual and temporal juriſdiction, and may both force the party by oath to accuſe himſelf of any offence, and alſo enquire thereof by a jury: and laſtly, may inflict for the ſame offence at the ſame time, and by one and the ſame ſentence, both a ſpiritual and a temporal juriſdiction.

Secondly, Whereas upon ſentences of deprivation or other ſpiritual cenſures given by force of ordinary juriſdiction, an appeal lyeth for the party aggrieved, that is here excluded by expreſs words of the commiſſion. Alſo here is to be a trial by jury, yet no remedy by traverſe nor attaint; neither can a man have any writ of error, though a judgment or ſentence be given againſt him, amounting to the taking away of all his goods, and impriſoning of him during life, yea, to the adjudging him in caſe of præmunire, whereby his lands are forfeited, and he out of the protection of the law.

Thirdly, That whereas penal laws and offences againſt the ſame cannot be determined in other courts, or by other perſons than by thoſe truſted by parliament with the execution thereof; yet the execution of many ſuch ſtatutes (divers whereof were made ſince the firſt of Eliz.) are commended and committed to theſe commiſſioners eccleſiaſtical, who are either to inflict the puniſhment contained in the ſtatute being præmunire, and of other high nature, and ſo enforce a man upon his own oath to accuſe and expoſe himſelf to thoſe puniſhments, or elſe to inflict other temporal puniſhments at their pleaſure. And yet beſides and after that done, the party ſhall be ſubject, in the courts mentioned in the acts, to puniſhment by the ſame acts appointed and inflicted. Which we think very unreaſonable.

Fourthly, That the commiſſion giveth authority to enforce men called into queſtion, to enter into recognizance, not only for appearance from time to time, but alſo for performance of whatſoever ſhall be by the commiſſioners ordered.

And alſo that it giveth power to enjoin parties defendant or accuſed to pay ſuch fees to the miniſters of the court, as by the commiſſioners ſhall be thought fit.

And touching the execution of the commiſſion, it is found grievous theſe ways among other:

Firſt, For that laymen are by the commiſſioners puniſhed for ſpeaking (otherwiſe than in judicial places and courſes) of the ſimony and other miſdemeanors of the ſpiritual men, though the thing ſpoken be true, and the ſpeech tending to the inducing of ſome condign puniſhment.

Secondly, in that theſe commiſſioners uſually appoint and allot to women diſcontented at and unwilling to live with their huſbands, ſuch portion and allowance for preſent maintenance, as to them ſhall ſeem meet; to the great encouragement to wives to be diſobedient and contemptuous againſt their huſbands.

Thirdly, in that their purſuivants and other miniſters employed in the apprehenſion of ſuſpected offenders in any thing ſpiritual, and in the ſearching for any ſuppoſed ſcandalous books, uſe to break open mens houſes, cloſets, and deſks, rifling all corners and ſecret cuſtodies, as in caſes of high treaſon or ſuſpicion thereof.

All which premiſes, amongſt other things conſidered, your majeſty's moſt loyal and dutiful commons in all humbleneſs beſeech you, that, for the eaſing of them, as well from the preſent grievance, as from the fear and poſſibility of greater in times future, your highneſs would vouchſafe your royal aſſent and allowance to and for the ratifying of the ſaid ſtatute, and the reducing thereof, and conſequently of the ſaid commiſſion, to reaſonable and convenient limits, by ſome act to be paſſed in the preſent ſeſſion of parliament.

Proclamations. Amongſt many other points of happineſs and freedom, which your majeſty's ſubjects of this kingdom have enjoyed under your royal progenitors, kings and queens of this realm, there is none which they have accounted more dear and precious than this, to be guided and governed by certain rule of law, which giveth both to the head and members that which of right belongeth to them; and not by any uncertain or arbitrary form of government.

Which, as it hath proceeded from the original and conſtitution and temperature of this eſtate, ſo hath it been the principal means of upholding the ſame in ſuch ſort, as that their kings have been juſt, beloved, happy and glorious; and the kingdom itſelf peaceable, flouriſhing and durable, ſo many ages.

And the effect, as well of the contentment that the ſubjects of this kingdom have taken in this form of government, as alſo of the love, reſpect and duty, which they have, by reaſon of the ſame, rendered unto their princes, may appear in this, that they have, as occaſion hath required, yielded more extraordinary and voluntary contributions to aſſiſt their kings, than the ſubjects of any other known kingdom whatſoever.

Out of this root hath grown the indubitable right of the people of this kingdom, not to be made ſubject to any puniſhment that ſhall extend to their lives, lands, bodies or goods, other than ſuch as are ordained by the common laws of this land, or the ſtatutes made by their common conſent in parliament.

Nevertheleſs, it is apparent, both that proclamations have been of late years much more frequent than heretofore, and that they are extended, not only to the liberty, but alſo to the goods, inheritances, and livelihood of men; ſome of them tending to alter ſome points of the law, and make them new:

Other ſome made ſhortly after a ſeſſion of parliament, for matter directly rejected in the ſame ſeſſion:

Others appointing puniſhments to be inflicted before lawful trial and conviction;

Some containing penalties in form of penal ſtatutes;

Some referring the puniſhment of offenders to the courts of arbitrary diſcretion, which have laid heavy and grievous cenſures upon the delinquents:

Some, as the proclamation for ſtarch, accompanied with letters commanding enquiry to be made againſt the tranſgreſſors at the quarter ſeſſions:

And ſome vouching former proclamations, to countenance and warrant the latter; as by a catalogue hereunder written more particularly appeareth.

By reaſon whereof there is a general fear conceived and ſpread amongſt your majeſty's people, that proclamations will by degrees grow up and increaſe to the ſtrength and nature of laws.

Whereby not only that ancient happineſs [freedom] will be as much blemiſhed (if not quite taken away) which their anceſtors have ſo long enjoyed;

But the ſame may alſo (in proceſs of time) bring a new form of arbitrary government upon the realm.

And this our fear is the more increaſed, by occaſion as well of certain books lately publiſhed, which aſcribe a greater power to proclamations than heretofore hath been conceived to belong unto them; as alſo of the care taken to reduce all the proclamations made ſince your majeſty's reign into one volume, and to print them in ſuch form as acts of parliament formerly have been, and ſtill are uſed to be; which ſeemeth to imply a purpoſe to give them more reputation and more eſtabliſhment than heretofore they have had.

We therefore, your majeſty's humble ſubjects, the commons in this parliament aſſembled, taking theſe matters into our conſideration, and weighing how much it doth concern your majeſty, both in honour and ſafety, that ſuch impreſſions ſhould not be enforced to ſettle in your ſubjects minds, have thought it to appertain to our duties, as well towards your majeſty, as to thoſe that have truſted and ſent us to their ſervice, to preſent unto your majeſty's view theſe fears and griefs of your people; and to become humble ſuitors unto your majeſty, that thenceforth no fine or forfeiture of goods, or other pecuniary or corporal puniſhment, may be inflicted upon your ſubjects (other than reſtraint of liberty, which we alſo humbly beſeech may be but upon urgent neceſſity, and to continue but 'till other order may be taken by courſe of law) unleſs they ſhall offend againſt ſome law or ſtatute of this realm in force at the time of their offence committed; and for the greater aſſurance and comfort of your people, that it will pleaſe your majeſty, to declare your royal pleaſure to that purpoſe, either by ſome law to be made in this ſeſſion of parliament, or by ſome ſuch other courſe (whereof your people may take knowledge) as to your princely wiſdom ſhall ſeem moſt convenient.

A catalogue of ſome of the proclamations complained of.

I. Proclamations importing alterations of ſome points of the law, and making new:

11 January, 1 Jac. fol. 57. forbiddeth chuſing of knights and burgeſſes bankrupt or outlawed; and commandeth choice of ſuch as are not only taxed to ſubſidies, but alſo have ordinarily paid and ſatisfied the ſame, f. l. 57.

If returns be made contrary to proclamation, they are to be rejected as unlawful and inſufficient, fol. 60.

25 Auguſt, 5 Jac. fol. 151. That the proclamation ſhould be a warrant to any officer or ſubject to ſeize ſtarch, and to diſpoſe or deſtroy any ſtuff, &c. And reſtraineth all men not licenſed to make ſtarch, fol. 154.

II. A proclamation made ſhortly after parliament, for matter directly rejected the precedent ſeſſion:

1 March, 2 Jac. fol. 112. A proclamation for building with brick, after a bill to that end rejected.

III. Proclamations touching the freehold livelihood of men:

16 September, 1 Jac. fol. 41. Raiſing and pulling down houſes authoriſed, and prohibition to build them again at any time.

12 October, 5 Jac. fol. 160. Forbidding building and taking away the materials; and appointing the owners land to be lett by other men at what price they pleaſe, fol. 101.

IV. Proclamations, referring puniſhments to be done by juſtices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, conſtables, and other officers; or ſeizure by perſons who have no authority to enquire, hear and determine of thoſe offences; ſo it is to be inflicted before lawful trial and conviction.

23 Auguſt, 5 Jac. fol. 151. A ſeizure of ſtarch, &c.

V. Proclamations penned with penalties, in form of penal ſtatutes:

4 November, 1 Jac. fol. . . . Pain of confiſcation of goods.

18 January, 2 Jac. fol. 72. Ten days impriſonment, and ſtanding in the pillory.

Juſtices of peace to forfeit twenty pounds if they ſee not the proclamation of folding wools executed.

23 Auguſt, 5 Jac. fol. 151. Forfeiture of one moiety of ſtarch, &c. ſeized, &c.

VI. Puniſhment of offenders in courts of arbitrary diſcretion, as Star-Chamber:

1 March, 2 Jac. fol. 102. Proclamation for building.

12 October, 5 Jac. fol. 159. A proclamation for building.

July, 6 Jac. fol. 177. Proclamation for ſtarch.

25 July, 6 Jac. fol. 180. Proclamation for building.

VII. Former proclamations become precedents, and vouched in latter proclamations:

18 June, 2 Jac. fol. 75. avoucheth 5 Ed. VI. and 4 Eliz. fol. 73.

25 July, 6 Jac. fol. 180. mentioneth former proclamations againſt buildings, and explaineth and qualifieth them.

Your majeſty's commons, in this ſeſſion of parliament aſſembled, do chearfully acknowledge the ſpring and fountain of public juſtice of this ſtate to be originally in your majeſty, Writs of prohibition, &c.

For the benefit thereof is conveyed and derived into every member of this politick body by your highneſs's writs.

Amongſt which none are more honourable for the ſupport of the common juſtice of the realm, than the writs of prohibition, habeas corpus, & de homine replegiando: which writs have been ever held and found to be a chief means of relief unto the poor, diſtreſſed and oppreſſed ſubjects of this kingdom, and can be no inconvenience at all: ſeeing they are no way concluſive againſt any man, and do draw no benefit to the procurers, but rather a fruitleſs charge, if they be obtained upon any unjuſt ground or pretence.

In the free granting of, and proceeding upon, ſome of which writs, eſpecially that of prohibition, there hath of late been obſerved to be ſome obſtruction, by reaſon that upon the complaints and the importunity of ſome, who deſire the ſupport of inferior courts againſt the principal courts of the common law, (wherein your majeſty hath been greatly troubled) you have taken into your royal conſideration the ſeveral extents of the juriſdiction of the ſaid ſeveral courts.

Since which time the ſaid writs have been more ſparingly granted, and with ſtricter cautions than anciently hath been accuſtomed.

It is therefore moſt humbly deſired that it may pleaſe your majeſty, (whoſe glory is never more conſpicuous than when the pooreſt of the commonality are bleſſed with the influence of the ancient beams of juſtice) to require your judges in the courts of Weſtminſter to grant the ſaid writs, in caſes wherein ſuch writs do lye, and by law are grantable; and in ſuch ſort as that ſuch perſons whoſe bodies being either committed to priſon, or their cauſes like to recover great prejudice by proceedings againſt them in times of vacation, may not be debarred nor deferred from having the ſpeedy relief and benefit of thoſe writs, more than in former times.

Four ſhires near Wales.

Foraſmuch as the exerciſe of authority over the counties of Glouceſter, Hereford, Wigórn, and Salop, by the preſident and council of Wales, by way of inſtructions upon a pretext of a ſtatute made in the 34th year of the reign of king Henry VIII. is conceived not to be warranted by that, or any other law of this realm of England.

And for that in the ſecond ſeſſion of this preſent parliament, there did a bill paſs the houſe of commons, whereby it was declared that the true intent and meaning of that before mentioned ſtatute was not thereby to ſubject theſe counties to that kind of government by inſtructions; and yet notwithſtanding the inhabitants of thoſe counties are ſince utterly diſcouraged, and in effect debarred from the tryal of the right of that kind of juriſdiction over thoſe counties, by the ordinary courſe of the common laws of this land, by reaſon of prohibitions which were heretofore frequently granted (upon ſuggeſtion that thoſe counties are not part of Wales, or of the marſhes of the ſame, which is the very point in queſtion) are now very hard to be obtained, except in caſes where thoſe of that council do exceed the inſtructions ſet down to them by your majeſty:

As alſo for that, in caſes where actions have been brought at the common law, whereby that queſtion might have come to deciſion, the plaintiffs have been ſtopped, ſometimes by injunctions out of your majeſty's court of Chancery from their proceedings, ſometimes before, ſometimes after judgments, and alſo by impriſonment:

The precedents of which proceedings do concern all your majeſty's loyal and dutiful ſubjects of this kingdom, as well in reſpect of the ſtopping of the free courſe of juſtice, as alſo by reaſon that if that kind of juriſdiction were at firſt extended over theſe four counties, and be now ſtill continued without warrant of law; the conſequence of this example may in future times give countenance to the erecting of like juriſdictions in other places of this realm:

And foraſmuch as your majeſty was pleaſed to command all the judges to conſider of this queſtion, and that they thereupon beſtowed very many days in hearing the cauſe argued by learned counſel on both ſides, and in viewing and conſidering great numbers of records, produced before them concerning that cauſe; whereby they have (no doubt) truly informed themſelves of the right:

It is therefore the moſt humble petition of the commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, that your moſt excellent majeſty will alſo be pleaſed to command, that the judges may deliver their opinion upon that ſo exact and deliberate hearing, which was had before them, concerning the right of the aforeſaid juriſdiction over thoſe four counties, by force of that ſtatute; and that the opinion which they ſhall deliver therein, may be in ſuch ſort publiſhed, as that all your majeſty's ſubjects whom it may concern, may have means to take knowledge thereof; and that your majeſty will vouchſafe to declare it, by your moſt princely pleaſure, that any of your majeſty's ſubjects, who may have occaſion thereof, may try his or their right in that point, by the due and ordinary courſe of the common law, either by ſuing out of prohibitions, or any other your majeſty's writs, without reſtraint; and that if the ſaid juriſdiction over theſe four counties ſhall appear to your majeſty by the opinion of the judges, or otherwiſe, not to be warranted by law, that then your majeſty will be pleaſed, out of your moſt princely and gracious favour towards all your loyal dutiful ſubjects, to order the ceaſing of the ſaid juriſdiction over thoſe counties, to the great comfort of the inhabitants of thoſe counties, and of the reſt of your ſubjects of all the kingdom.

New drapery.

Complaint was made in all humble manner, the ſecond ſeſſion of this preſent parliament, of many diſorders, outrages, and oppreſſions, committed upon occaſion of letters patents granted to the duke of Lenox, for ſearching and ſealing of ſtuffs and manufactures, called by the name of new draperies.

Which patent we held in all, or the moſt part of it, to be queſtionable, and in many apparently unlawful, and the execution thereof we found ſtretched by the farmers and deputies beyond the extent of the ſaid letters patents, as appears in the particulars ſet down in the ſaid grievance.

To which it pleaſed your majeſty to give this gracious anſwer; 'that the validity of the ſaid patent ſhould be left to be judged by the 'law, and whenſoever any abuſe ariſing in the execution thereof ſhould 'appear, it ſhould ſeverely be puniſhed.'

Which was for that time to our good ſatisfaction.

Yet finding by divers complaints made now in parliament, that not only the ſaid letters patents are ſtill in force, and the validity of them undecided by judgment, but diſorders in the execution of them are ſo far from being reformed, that they multiply every day, to the grievance of your majeſty's ſubjects; and thoſe of the poorer ſort, who exerciſing theſe manufactures, are ſubject to much oppreſſion, to the great hindrance of ſome, and utter undoing of many, as hath appeared in the particularities of the complaints preſented to us:

Our humble deſire is, that your majeſty will be pleaſed, according to your former reſolution, to give order that this cauſe, which hath thus long hung in ſuſpence, be ſpeedily brought to judgment; and that before all the judges, becauſe it concerneth all the ſubjects of the land; and in the mean time that the execution of the ſaid letters patents, ſo far forth as they concern the ſaid new drapery, may be ſuſpended till judgment be given: whereby your ſubjects, who do in all humility preſent this grievance unto your majeſty, may be relieved, and have no occaſion to reiterate their complaints.

Licence of wines.

Whereas by ancient and late ſtatutes it hath been enacted, that wines ſhould be retailed at ſuch low rates and prices, as for this fifty years paſt they could not be afforded,

And for redreſs thereof, it was ordained by a ſtatute in the 5th year of the late queen Elizabeth, that (thoſe former laws notwithſtanding) wines might be ſold at ſuch prices, as by proclamation from time to time to be made by conſent of many great offences, ſhould be publiſhed and ſet down:

Which proclamation, nevertheleſs, the late queen and your moſt excellent majeſty have been drawn to forbear, upon the earneſt ſuit of certain perſons, who therein only intended their private game:

By reaſon whereof, both great ſums of money in fines, rents, and annual payments, have been gotten and raiſed unto the ſaid perſons, and their aſſignees, and great damage and prejudice hath likewiſe fallen and light upon your people; not only by enhancing the prices of wines, licencing over many taverns, and appointing of unmeet perſons, in unfit places, to keep the ſame; but alſo by reaſon that corrupt, mingled, evil, and unwholeſome wines have been uttered and ſold, to the great hurt of the health of your highneſs's people; one man ſometimes engroſſing all the licences deſigned for that place.

Whereupon complaint being made to your majeſty, amongſt other grievances of your people, in the ſecond ſeſſion of this preſent parliament, your highneſs was pleaſed to anſwer, that your grants in that behalf were no other than ſuch as were warrantable by the law.

Whereas the grievance was the greater, for that all laws concerning the ſale of wines being intended and conceived to ſtand and be repealed, there were nevertheleſs, by the overſight of them which were truſted in that buſineſs, caſually omitted, and left unrepealed, certain obſolete laws impoſſible to be obſerved:

As namely, one, in the time of king Edward I. commanding wines to be ſold at one ſhilling the ſextern:

And one other made in the 28th year of king Henry VIII. prohibiting all perſons, under penalty, to ſell any French wines above eight-pence the gallon; and other wines, as ſacks and ſweet wines, above one ſhilling the gallon:

And one branch of a ſtatute made in the 7th year of king Edward VI. prohibiting men to ſell any wines by retail in their houſes.

Whereupon your majeſty hath been induced and drawn to ground new patents of diſpenſation, and to grant the benefit thereof unto the lord admiral:

Whereby the like diſcommodities and inconveniencies have ſince enſued unto the common-wealth, as formerly did ariſe and grow upon the other repealed laws, whereof in the former petitions of your ſubjects, exhibited unto your majeſty in the ſaid ſecond ſeſſion, your highneſs never had any direct and clear information:

May it therefore pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty, at the humble requeſt of your commons, (who have taken into conſideration the greateſt charges and expences which the ſaid lord admiral hath been at in your majeſty's ſervice, and have conſidered likewiſe the preſent licences and grants, for valuable conſiderations unto many hundreds of your highneſs's ſubjects, which, without great loſs to the ſaid grantees, cannot be ſo ſuddenly made void) out of your princely wiſdom and goodneſs, wherein you have profeſſed not to extend and ſtrain your prerogative royal, againſt the publick good of your people, for the particular gain of any private perſons, to vouchſafe: that from thenceforth there may no more grants of that nature be made unto any of your ſubjects whomſoever; but that the ſaid ſtatute of the 5th of Elizabeth for the apprizing of wines, to be publiſhed by proclamation, as time and occaſion ſhall require, may be put in execution: and that your majeſty will likewiſe vouchſafe to grant your royal aſſent to a bill of repeal of the ſaid obſolete ſtatutes, and all other whereupon any ſuch non obſtantes and diſpenſations might be grounded.

In which ſtatute of repeal, proviſion ſhall be made for the indemnity of all ſuch, as under your majeſty's great ſeal have already procured licence for ſuch ſale of wines.

Ale-houſes.

Whereas by the laws of this your majeſty's realm of England, no taxes, aids, or impoſitions of any kind whatſoever, ought or can be laid or impoſed upon your people, or upon any of their goods or commodities, but only by authority and conſent of parliament:

Which being undoubtedly the ancient and fundamental law of the land, is yet for more abundant clearneſs expreſly declared in ſundry acts of parliament, made and enacted in the time of ſundry your majeſty's progenitors, the nobleſt and moſt prudent kings of this realm:

Your commons with juſt grief do complain unto your majeſty of the late tax and impoſition laid and impoſed yearly upon ſuch as are allowed to keep victualling houſes, or ſell ale and beer by retail:

Which impoſition not being taxed by aſſent of parliament, but commanded and directed only by letters and inſtructions, your commons are perſuaded that the ſame proceeded rather from miſinformation, than by the direction and judgment of your moſt noble and royal heart.

Wherefore your ſaid commons, knowing the grief of your people in this behalf, do (according to their duties) in all humility inform and ſignify unto your majeſty,

Firſt, that the ſaid taxation being ſingular and without example, and it is in itſelf a precedent of dangerous conſequence, and (as your people fear) may eaſily (in time) be extended farther, as to badgers of corn, makers of malt, drovers of cattle, and ſuch like, who in ſuch ſort are to be licenced by juſtices of the peace, as thoſe perſons are, upon whom, at this time, this preſent tax is charged and laid.

Secondly, ſuch houſes being often times (at the beſt) harbours of idleneſs, drunkenneſs, whoredom, and all manner of villanies, the licences are now (the honeſter ſort in moſt places refuſing to undergo the new charge) rented and taken by the looſer and baſer ſort of people, who have no conſcience how they gain. By reaſon whereof all manner of vice and evil behaviour is likely every day to increaſe. Neither can the juſtices of the peace conveniently prevent the ſame: for that the perſons licenced under the late contribution, affirm with clamour, that they have a toleration for a year, and that ſuch perſons are not friends unto the crown that ſeek to ſuppreſs them, and thereby to diminiſh your majeſty's revenues.

Thirdly, many juſtices of the peace, (being ſworn to execute their office) which for this particular conceive to be, that ale-houſe keepers formerly licenced, are not to be ſuppreſſed without juſt and reaſonable cauſe, cannot be ſatisfied touching their ſaid oath, but are much diſtracted and perplexed what to do (the late inſtructions notwithſtanding) againſt ſuch perſons, as otherwiſe being not known to be of evil behaviour, only to refuſe to pay this late taxed and impoſed ſum of money.

In conſideration whereof, your humble commons moſt inſtantly beſeech your moſt excellent majeſty, that the former letters and inſtructions may be countermanded or ſtayed, and all further directions and proceedings in that kind forborn.

Sea coal. Among many reſemblances which are obſerved to be between natural and politick bodies, there is none more apt and natural than this, that the diſeaſes of both do not at one inſtance commonly ſeize upon all parts; but beginning in ſome one part, do by tract of time, and by degrees, get poſſeſſion of the whole, unleſs by applying of wholeſome and proper remedies in due time they may be prevented, which, as it is in many things very viſible, ſo it is in nothing more apparent than in this matter of impoſitions: which beginning at the firſt, either with foreign commodities brought in, or ſuch of your own as were tranſported, is now extended to thoſe commodities, which growing in this kingdom are not tranſported, but uttered to the ſubjects of the ſame:

For proof whereof, we do in all humility preſent unto your majeſty's view the late impoſition of one ſhilling the chaldron of ſea-coals, riſing in Blith and Sunderland, not by virtue of any contract or grant (as in the coals of Newcaſtle) but under a mere pretext of your majeſty's moſt royal prerogative:

Which impoſition is not only grievous for the preſent (eſpecially to thoſe of the poorer ſort, the price of whoſe only and moſt neceſſary fuel is thereby to their great grief enhanced) but dangerous alſo for the future, conſidering that the reaſon of this precedent may be extended to all the commodities of this kingdom.

May it therefore pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty, which is the great and ſovereign phyſician of the eſtate, to apply ſuch a remedy as this diſeaſe may be preſently cured, and all diſeaſes for time to come of like nature prevented.

Speech of ſir Francis Bacon to the king, the 7th of July 1610, on preſenting the petition to his majeſty, who was attended on the occaſion by ſir Francis and eleven other members; taken from Bacon's works, laſt 4to ed. vol. 2. page 212.

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

THE knights, citizens, and burgeſſes aſſembled in parliament, in the houſe of your commons, in all humbleneſs do exhibit and preſent unto your moſt ſacred majeſty, in their own words though by my hand, their petitions and grievances. They are here conceived and ſet down in writing, according to ancient cuſtom of parliament: they are alſo prefaced according to the manner and taſte of theſe later times. Therefore for me to make any additional preface, were neither warranted nor convenient; eſpecially ſpeaking before a king, the exactneſs of whoſe judgment ought to ſcatter and chaſe away all unneceſſary ſpeech as the ſun doth a vapour. This only I muſt ſay. Since this ſeſſion of parliament we have ſeen your glory in the ſolemnity of the creation of this moſt noble prince; we have heard your wiſdom in ſundry excellent ſpeeches which you have delivered amongſt us. Now we hope to find and feel the effects of your goodneſs, in your gracious anſwer to theſe our petitions. For this we are perſuaded, that the attribute, which was given by one of the wiſeſt writers to two of the beſt emperors, divus Nerva et divus Trajanus, ſo ſaith Tacitus, res olim inſociabiles miſcuerunt, imperium et libertatem, may be truly applied to your majeſty. For never was there ſuch a conſervator of regality in a crown, nor ever ſuch a protector of lawful freedom in a ſubject.

Only this, excellent ſovereign, let not the ſound of grievances, though it be ſad, ſeem harſh to your princely ears. It is but gemitus columbae, the mourning of a dove, with that patience and humility of heart which appertaineth to loving and loyal ſubjects. And far be it from us, but that in the midſt of the ſenſe of our grievances we ſhould remember and acknowledge the infinite benefits, which by your majeſty, next under God, we do enjoy; which bind us to wiſh unto your life fulneſs of days, and unto your line royal a ſucceſſion and continuance even unto the world's end.

It reſteth that unto theſe petitions here included I do add one more that goeth to them all: which is, that if in the words and frame of them there be any thing offenſive; or that we have expreſſed ourſelves otherwiſe than we ſhould or would; that your majeſty would cover it and caſt the veil of your grace upon it; and accept of our good intentions, and help them by your benign interpretation.

Laſtly, I am moſt humbly to crave a particular pardon for myſelf that have uſed theſe few words; and ſcarcely ſhould have been able to have uſed any at all, in reſpect of the reverence which I bear to your perſon and judgment, had I not been ſomewhat relieved and comforted by the experience, which in my ſervice and acceſs I have had of your continual grace and favour.

XIV. The Caſe of Mixed Money in Ireland, Trin. 2. Jam. 1605.

[As the following caſe relates to the king's prerogative of regulating the coinage and value of money, in which the whole ſtate is ſo immediately and eſſentially intereſted, it properly falls within the ſcope of this collection. It is taken from the Engliſh edition of ſir John Davies's Reports. None of the marginal notes and references are in the French original. They were all added by the editor of the tranſlated edition. This caſe, being earlier than Bates's, would have been placed before it, if the former had not occurred to the editor too late.]

QUEEN Elizabeth in order to pay the royal army which was maintained in this kingdom for ſeveral years, to ſuppreſs the rebellion of Tyrone, cauſed a great quantity of mixed money, with the uſual ſtamp of the arms of the crown, and inſcription of her royal ſtile, to be coin'd in the Tower of London, and tranſmitted this money into this kingdom, with a proclamation, bearing date 24 May, in the 43d. year of her reign, by which her majeſty declared and eſtabliſhed this mixed money, immediately after the ſaid proclamation, to be the lawful and current money of this kingdom of Ireland, and expreſly commanded that this money ſhould be ſo uſed, accepted and reputed by all her ſubjects and others, uſing any traffick or commerce within this kingdom; and that if any perſon or perſons ſhould refuſe to receive this mixed money according to the denomination or valuation thereof, viz. ſhillings for ſhillings, ſixpenny pieces for ſixpenny pieces, &c. being tendered for payment of any wages, fees, ſtipends, debts, &c. they ſhould be puniſhed as contemners of her royal prerogative and commandment. And to the intent that this mixed money ſhould have the better courſe and circulation, it was further declared by the ſame proclamation, that after the 10th. day of June immediately following, all other money which had been current within this kingdom, before the ſaid proclamation, ſhould be cried down and annulled and eſteemed as bullion, and not as lawful and current money of this kingdom.

In April, before this proclamation was publiſhed, when the pure coin of England was current within this kingdom, one Brett of Drogheda, merchant, having bought certain wares of one Gilbert in London, became bound to the ſaid Gilbert in an obligation of 200*l.* on condition that he ſhould pay to the ſaid Gilbert, his executors or aſſigns, 100*l. ſterling, current and lawful money of* England, at the tomb of earl Strongbow in Chriſt-Church, Dublin, at a certain day to come; at which day and place, Brett made a tender of the 100*l.* in the mixed money of the new ſtandard, in performance of the condition of the obligation; and whether this tender was ſufficient to ſave the forfeiture of the obligation, or whether the ſaid Brett ſhould now, upon the change or alteration of money within this kingdom, be compelled to pay the ſaid one hundred pound in other or better coin than in the mixed money, according to the rate and valuation of it, at the time of the tender, was the queſtion at the council table, where the ſaid Gilbert, who was a merchant of London, exhibited his petition againſt the ſaid Brett, for the ſpeedy recovery of his debt aforeſaid.

And, inaſmuch as this caſe related to the kingdom in general, and was alſo of great importance in conſideration and reaſon of ſtate, ſir George Carew, then lord deputy and alſo treaſurer, required the chief judges, (being of the privy council) to confer on and conſider this caſe, and to return to him their reſolution touching it; who upon conference and conſideration on all the points of the ſaid proclamation, reſolved that the tender of the one hundred pounds in the mixed money, at the day and place aforeſaid, was good and ſufficient in the law, to ſave the forfeiture of the ſaid obligation, and that Brett ſhould not be obliged at any time after, to pay other money in diſcharge of the debt, than this mixed money, according to the rate and valuation that it had, at the time of the tender; and this reſolution was certified by them to the lord-deputy, and the certificate entered in the council book. And in this caſe divers points were conſidered and reſolved.

Neceſſity of money, Lock of coin. Cotton 4.

Firſt, it was conſidered, that in every commonwealth, it is neceſſary to have a certain ſtandard of money. For no commonwealth can ſubſiſt without contracts, and no contracts without equality, and no equality in contracts without money. For although in the firſt ſocieties of the world, permutation of one thing for another was uſed, yet that was ſoon found cumberſome, and the tranſportation and diviſion of things was found difficult and impoſſible; and therefore money was invented, as well for the facility of commerce, as to reduce contracts to an equality. Cum non facile concurrebat, ut cum tu haberes quod ego deſiderarem, ego invicem haberem quod tu accipere velles, electa materia eſt, cujus publica & perpetua eſtimatio difficultatibus permutationem ſubveniret. Paul. lib. 1. ff. de contrahendis empt. and therefore money is ſaid by Bodin to be menſura publica; and Budelius lib. 1. de re nummariâ, ca. 3. ſaith, moneta eſt juſtum medium & menſura rerum commutabilium, nam per medium monetæ fit omnium rerum, quæ in mundo ſunt, conveniens & juſta æſtimatio. And to this purpoſe Keble ſaith, 12 H. 7. 23. b. that every thing ought to be valued per argent; by which word argent, he meaneth money coined. And the great utility of a certain ſtandard of money and of meaſures is well expreſſed by Budelius in this verſe,

Una fides, pondus, menſura, moneta ſit una,
Et ſtatus illæſus totius orbis erit.

King's prerogative in making or coining money. 2 Ro. ab. 166. 1 Co. 146. 5 Co. 114. 1 H. H. P. C. 188.

Secondly, it was reſolved, that it appertaineth only to the king of England, to make or coin money within his dominions; ſo that no other perſon can do it without ſpecial licenſe or commandment of the king; and if any perſon preſume to do it of his own head, it is treaſon againſt the perſon of the king by the common law; and this appears by the ſtat. of 25 Ed. 3. c. 2. (which is only a declaration of the common law,) and by Glanvil, Britton and Bracton, before that ſtatute, Stamford fol. 2. and 3. And in the caſe of Mines, Plowd. 316. a. this point is expreſſed more clearly, where it is ſaid, that the king ſhall have mines of gold and ſilver; for if a ſubject had them, he by law could not coin ſuch metals, nor ſtamp a print or value upon them, for it appertaineth to the king only to put a value upon coin, and make the price of the quantity, and to put a print to it; which being done the coin is current; and if a ſubject doth this it is high treaſon at common law, as appears, 23 Aſſ. p. 2. and it is high treaſon to the king, becauſe he hath the ſole power of making money, &c.

Things eſſential to the legitimation of money.

And in this book three things are expreſſed, which are requiſite to the making of lawful money, viz. the authority of the prince, the ſtamp, and the value. But upon the conſideration of the caſe in queſtion, it was obſerved, that ſix things or circumſtances ought to concur, to make lawful and current money, viz. 1. Weight. 2. Fineneſs. 3. Impreſſion. 4. Denomination. 5. Authority of the prince. 6. * Proclamation. For every piece of money ought to have a certain proportion of weight or poiſe, and a certain proportion of purity or fineneſs, which is called alloy. Alſo every piece ought to have a certain form of impreſſion, which may be knowable and diſtinguiſhable; for as wax is not a ſeal without a ſtamp, ſo metal is not money without an impreſſion: & moneta dicitur a monendo, quia impreſſione nos moneat, cujus ſit moneta. Cujus imago eſt hæc? Cæſaris: date Cæſari quæ ſunt Cæſaris. Alſo every piece of money ought to have a denomination or valuation for how much it ſhall be accepted or paid, as for a penny, a groat or a ſhilling. And all this ought to be by authority and commandment of the prince, for otherwiſe the money is not lawful; and it ought to be publiſhed by the proclamation of the prince, for before that, the money is not current.

* But ſee 1 H. H. P. C. 196. that proclamation is not always neceſſary.

Theſe circumſtances appear in the antient ordinances made by the king for the coinage of money, as well in this kingdom as in England, which are to be found in the Tower of London there, and in the Caſtle of Dublin here. Alſo the indentures between the king and the maſters of the mint preſcribe the proportion of weight, fineneſs, and alloy, the impreſſion or inſcription, the name and the value. See the ſtat. 2 Hen. 6. c. 12. where mention is made of theſe indentures; ſee alſo Wade's caſe, 5 Co. 114. b. that the king by his proclamation may make any coin lawful money of England; a fortiori, he may, by his proclamation only, eſtabliſh the ſtandard of money coined by his authority within his own dominions.

King's prerogative in putting a value on money.

And that the king by his prerogative may alſo put a price or valuation on all coins, appears by a remarkable caſe, 21 Ed. 3. 60. b. In the time of Will. the Conqueror, the abbot of St. Edmundſbury complained to the king in parliament, that whereas he was exempted from the juriſdiction of the ordinary by divers antient charters, the biſhop of Norwich had viſited his houſe, contrary to thoſe charters of exemption; upon which it was granted and ordained in parliament, that if from thenceforward the biſhop of Norwich or any of his ſucceſſors ſhould go againſt the aforeſaid exemption, they ſhould pay to the king or his heirs thirty talents or beſaunts. Afterwards in the time of Ed. 3. the biſhop of Norwich viſited the houſe again, againſt the ordinance aforeſaid; and this contempt being found in the King's Bench, a ſcire facias iſſued againſt the biſhop to ſhew why he ſhould not pay to the king the thirty talents or beſaunts; and upon an inſufficient plea pleaded by the biſhop, the court awarded that they ſhould recover the talents or beſaunts, and that it ſhould be interpreted by the king himſelf of what value they ſhould be, more or leſs; by which it is manifeſt that where talents or beſaunts, or ſuch other pieces or quantities of gold or ſilver are of uncertain value (for Budelius ſaith that talentâ ſunt varia, & pondera ſunt, potius quam numiſmata) the king hath a power to put a certain value upon them, according to the rule well known to the civilians, monetæ æſtimationem dat, qui cudendi poteſtatem habet. And in this point the common law of England agrees well with the rules of the civil law, jus cudendæ monetæ ad ſolum principem, hoc eſt, imperatorem, de jure pertinet. Monetandi jus principum oſſibus inhæret. Jus monetæ comprehenditur in regalibus, quæ nunquam a regio ſceptro abdicantur.

Yet by antient charters, this privilege or prerogative hath been communicated to ſome ſubjects in England; as, to the archbiſhop of Canterbury by charter of king Athelſtan, Lamb. peramb. Kant. fol. 291. The archbiſhop of York and biſhop of Durham had mines and power of coining money, as appears by the ſtatute of 14 Hen. 8. c. 12. and the dean of St. Martin's-le-grand had the ſame privilege, as is manifeſt from the ſtat. of 19 Ed. 4. c. 1. And this right of coining money hath been granted to ſeveral great perſonages in France heretofore, as Choppinus relates, lib. de Domanio Franc. fol. 217. a. And this prerogative at this day is imparted too generally to all the inferior princes and ſtates of Germany by grant or permiſſion of the emperor; for it is a law of the empire, jus cudendæ monetæ, niſi cui ab imperatore conceſſum fuerit, nemo uſurpato.

King's prerogative in changing the ſtandard of coin. 1 H. H. P. C. 192.

Thirdly, it was reſolved that as the king by his prerogative may make money of what matter and form he pleaſeth, and eſtabliſh the ſtandard of it, ſo may he change his money in ſubſtance and impreſſion, and enhance or debaſe the value of it, or entirely decry and annul it, ſo that it ſhall be but bullion at his pleaſure. And note, that bullion, which in Latin is called billio, eſt moneta defenſa & prohibita, quæ videlicet uſu caret.

And that the king hath uſed this prerogative in England, appears by ſeveral notorious changes of money, made in the time of ſeveral kings ſince the Norman Conqueſt. Anno 26 Hen. 2. Monetâ veteri reprobatâ, nova ſucceſſit. Matt. Paris hiſt. mag. fol. 35. a. Anno 7. Joh. a new money was coined, at which time the firſt ſterling money was coined, according to the opinion of Cambden, where he ſpeaketh of Sterling-Caſtle in Scotland, fol. 700. b. Anno 32 Hen. 3. the king was obliged to make new money, cum moneta Angliæ circumcidebatur à circumciſis Judæis, as Matt. Paris ſaith, fol. 703. a. Anno 7 Ed. 1. the ſtandard of money was renewed, when the ſterling penny was eſtabliſhed to contain viceſimam partem unciæ, as appears by the old magna charta, in the ordinance called compoſitio menſurarum, where it is ordained, quod viginti denarii faciant unciam. Anno 29 Ed. 1. when the money called pollards was cried down, a new ſterling money was alſo coined; ſee 6 Ed. 6. Dyer 82. b. & lib. rubr. Scacc. Dubl. part 2. fol. 1. b. After this new monies were made, 9 Ed. 3. and 13 Hen. 4. and 5 Ed. 4. and 19 Hen. 7. and 36 Hen. 8. and laſtly 2 Eliz. when all mixed and baſe money was cried down, and the ſtandard of pure ſilver eſtabliſhed, which continues to this day, of which Bodin maketh honourable mention, libro 6 de republicâ, cap. 3.

Without act of parliament.

And it ſeems theſe changes of money in England were made by the authority of the king without parliament; although ſeveral acts of parliament have been made for the ordering of exchange, and to prohibit the exportation of money made and ordained by the king, and the importation and utterance of foreign and falſe money, under certain pains and penalties, of which ſome were capital and ſome pecuniary. And ſeveral ordinances of the king made without the parliament are called ſtatutes; as ſtatutum de monetâ magnum, & ſtatutum de monetâ parvum; which are called ſtatutes, becauſe the ordinance of the king with proclamation in ſuch caſe hath the force of an act of parliament.

King's prerogative in inhancing or debaſing the value of coin in England. 1 H. H. P. C. 192.

And as the king hath uſed to change the ſtandard of his money, to wit, the form and the ſubſtance, ſo hath he uſed by his prerogative to enhance or debaſe the value of it, notwithſtanding that the form and ſubſtance continueth as it was before. And this was done, 5 Ed. 4. as appears by the book of 9 Ed. 4. 49. where Danby ſaith, that a noble was better then, than it was anno 20 of that king, by 20 d. in each noble. And king Hen. 8. by ſpecial commiſſion dated 24 July, anno 18. of his reign, authoriſed cardinal Wolſey, with the advice of other of the privy council, to put a value on all the moneys of England, from time to time, according to the rates and values of the monies of foreign nations, which were then too much enhanced, eſpecially by the emperor and the king of France, as is expreſſed in the ſaid commiſſion. See alſo 6 and 7 Ed. 6. Dyer 82 and 83. ſeveral caſes on the debaſement of money.

And it is to be obſerved, that between the 36 of Hen. 8. when ſeveral ſorts of debaſed money were coined in England, and 2 Eliz. when the pure ſtandard of ſilver money was eſtabliſhed, there were three notorious falls or cry-downs of baſe monies publiſhed by proclamation; the firſt, 9 July, 5 Ed. 6. the ſecond, 17 Auguſt, the ſame year, as is mentioned, Dyer 83. a. the third, 28 Sep. 2 Eliz.

And in Ireland.

And as the king hath always uſed to make and change the money of England, he hath alſo uſed the ſame prerogative in Ireland ever ſince the 12th year of king John, when the firſt ſtandard of Engliſh money was eſtabliſhed in this kingdom, as is recorded by Matt. Paris, magn. hiſt. 220. b. where it is ſaid, that this king being in Ireland, conſtituit ibidem leges & conſuetudines Anglicanas, ponens ibidem vicecomites, aliſque miniſtros, qui populum regni illius juxta leges Anglicanas judicarent. Præfecit autem ibidem Johannem de Gray epiſcopum Norwicenſem, juſtitiarium, qui denarium terræ illius ad pondus numiſmatis Angliæ fecerat publicari, & tam obolum quam quadrantem rotundum fieri præcepit: juſſit quoque rex, ut illius monetæ uſus tam in Anglia quam in Hibernia communis ab omnibus haberetur, & utriuſque regni denarius in theſauris ſuis indifferenter poneretur.

By which it appeareth that the ſtandard of money in England and in Ireland was equal at firſt, and that the Engliſh money was not a fourth part better in value than the Iriſh, as it hath been ſince the time of Ed. 4. for before that, as there was one and the ſame ſtandard of money in both kingdoms, ſo always when the money was changed in England, it was alſo changed in Ireland. As in the year 1279, viz. 7 Ed. 1. when that king eſtabliſhed new money in England, as is ſhewn before, there was likewiſe a change of money in Ireland, as is obſerved in the annals of this kingdom, publiſhed by Cambden in his Britannia, where it is ſaid, that in the year 1279, dominus Robertus de Ufford juſticiarius Hiberniæ intravit Angliam, & conſtituit loco fratrem Robertum de Fulbourne epiſcopum Waterford, cujus tempore mutata eſt moneta. So 29 Ed. 1. when by ſpecial ordinance of the king the pollards and crockards were decried and annulled, the ſame ordinance was tranſmitted into this kingdom, and enrolled in the Exchequer here, as is found in lib. rubr. ſcacc. part 2. fol. 2. b. Alſo in the annals aforeſaid it is obſerved in the ſame year, numiſma pollardarum prohibetur in Angliâ & Hiberniâ.

And as the ſtandard of the monies was equal, ſo the mints and coinage in this kingdom were ordered and governed in the ſame manner as in England, as appears by the account of Donat and Andrew de Sperdſholſt aſſay maſters in Dublin, 9 and 10 Ed. 1. in archivis Caſtri Dublin, and in libr. rubr. ſcacc. hic part 2. fol. 1. and in rot. parl. in Caſtro Dublin, 12 Ed. 4. c. 60. See alſo ſeveral ordinances there touching the mint and monies, 7 Ed. 4. c. 9. 10 Ed. 4. c. 4. 16 Ed. 4. c. 2. 19 Ed. 4. c. 1. 1 R. 3. c. 7.

Different ſtandards in England and Ireland.

But the firſt difference and inequality between the ſtandard of Engliſh and Iriſh monies, is found in 5 Ed. 4. for then it was declared in parliament here, that the noble made in the time of Ed. 3. Rich. 2. Hen. 4. Hen. 5. and Hen. 6. ſhould be from that time forth current in this kingdom for 10 s. and ſo of the demy-noble, and all other coins according to the ſame rate. See rot. parl. 5 Ed. 4. c. 40. and 11 Ed. 4. c. 6. and 15 Ed. 4. c. 5. in the Roll's-office in the Caſtle of Dublin. After which time the money made in Ireland or for Ireland was always leſs in value than the money of England, and the uſual proportion of the difference was the fourth part only, viz. the Iriſh ſhilling was only 9 d. Engliſh. See the proclamation aforeſaid, dated the 24 of May, 43 Eliz. enrolled in the Chancery here, where the queen makes mention of this difference made by her progenitors between the ſtandard of money made for this kingdom, and the money of England. And note, that That which is called the ſtandard of money in this caſe, is the ſame which is called by the French pied de money, by Bodin pes monetarum; as if the prince there pedem figat, having eſtabliſhed the weight and purity of money in a certain proportion, which ſhould not be tranſgreſſed by the moneyers.

And ſo it is manifeſt, that the kings of England have always had and exerciſed this prerogative of coining and changing the form, and when they found it expedient of enhancing and abaſing the value of money within their dominions: and this prerogative is allowed and approved not only by the common law, but alſo by the rules of the imperial law. Budelius de re nummariâ, libr. 1. c. 5. Princeps ad arbitrium ſuum, irrequiſito aſſenſu ſubditorum, valorem monetæ conſtituere poteſt; quia populus, quantum ad hoc, omnem poteſtatem & juriſdictionem in principem ſeu imperatorem tranſtuliſſe dicitur. And a little after in the ſame chapter, although ſome doctors are of opinion, principem ſine aſſenſu populi monetam mutare non poſſe, yet he concludes, ſi princeps conſueviſſet mutare monetam auctoritate propriâ, ſine conſenſu populi, a tempore cujus initii memoria non exiſtit, tunc libere impoſterum eum hoc facere poſſe. L. hoc jure Paragr. ductus aquæ. ff. de aqua quotid. &c. And Covarruvias, libro de collatione veterum numiſmatum, cap. de mutatione monetæ, ſaith, princeps poteſt mutare monetam ratione publicæ utilitatis, viz. tempore belli, vel ſi alias utile populo ſit futurum, ita etiam, ut ex corio fieri poſſit. And it is obſerved by Molineus, libro de mutatione monetæ, cap. 100. that the ſtate of Rome in the firſt Punick war, when Hannibal had poſſeſſion of a great part of Italy, and all their treaſure was exhauſted, enhanced baſe money to a great value, for the payment of their armies; and yet the juſtice of that ſtate was then famous throughout the world. But nihil eſt magis juſtum, quam quod neceſſarium; by which it appears, that the mixed money was made by queen Eliz. on a juſt and honourable cauſe.

Sterling money what, and from whence ſo called.

Fourthly, it was reſolved, that the ſaid mixed money having the impreſſion and inſcription of the queen of England, and being proclaimed for lawful and current money within this kingdom of Ireland, ought to be taken and accepted for ſterling money; and on conſideration of this point, the name and the nature of ſterling money were enquired and diſcovered. As to the name of ſterling, ſome doctors of the civil law, being deceived by the erroneous report of Polydore Virgil, have conceived, that this Engliſh money was called ſterling, becauſe the form of a ſtare, the diminutive of which is ſterling, was imprinted or ſtamped upon it, and therefore Covarruvias, lib. de collatione veterum numiſmatum, c. 2. ſterling (ſaith he) eſt argenteus nummus Anglicus ex viceſima ſexta parte unciæ, nam viginti ſex nummi argentei ſterlingi pendebant unciam, autore Polydore Virgilio, in hiſt. Anglicâ, lib. 16. Dictus autem eſt hic nummus, ut idem author tradit, ſterling, quod ſturnus avis, Anglice a ſterling, in altera parte nummi eſſet impreſſa. To the ſame purpoſe Choppinus de Domanio Franc. lib. 2. tit. 7. hath this note, cæterum Errico 3. Britanniæ rege, primum percuſſa eſt nunc uſitatiſſima ſterlingorum moneta, ab effigie ſturni ſic dicta, anno 1249. Theſe doctors being ſtrangers, were, it ſeems, miſinformed by Polydore Virgil, who was alſo an alien and a ſtranger. But our Linwood alſo (who made his gloſs on the provincial conſtitutions of England, in the time of Hen. 6.) tit. de teſtam. C. Item, quia, verbo, Centum ſolidos, ſaith, ſterling nomen erat argenteæ monetæ, & habebat ſimilitudinem denarii uſualis, hoc ſalvo, quod in unâ quartâ habebat effigiem avis, quæ vocatur ſturnus, Anglice, ſterling.

Others have been of opinion, that this Engliſh money had the name of ſterling, becauſe the firſt money of this ſtandard was coined in the Caſtle of Sterling in Scotland by king Ed. 1. But this is alſo an erroneous opinion, as is noted by Cambden in Scotia, pag. 700. where ſpeaking of Sterling-Caſtle, he ſaith, that quidam monetam probam Angliæ quæ ſterling money dicitur, hinc denominatam volunt, fruſtra ſunt; a Germanis enim, quos Angli Eſterlingos ab orientali ſitu vocarunt, facta eſt appellatio; quos Johannes rex, ad argentum in ſuam puritatem redigendum, primus evocavit; & ejuſmodi nummi, Eſterlingi, in antiquis ſcripturis ſemper reperiuntur.

And this latter opinion, without doubt, is the better and more probable, by the judgment of all the moſt learned antiquarians of England. For in all the antient ſtatutes which make mention of this money, it is called Eſterling. As 9 Ed. 3. c. 2. &c. no falſe money counterfeit eſterling ſhall be imported into our realm; and the ſame year c. 3. no eſterling halfpenny or farthing ſhall be molten to make veſſel, &c. and 25 Ed. 3. c. 13. the money of gold and ſilver, which is now current, ſhall not be impaired in weight or allay, but ſhall be put in the antient ſtate as in the eſterling. And Matt. Paris, magn. hiſt. fol. 403. where he expreſſes the form of the obligation made by the clergy of England to the pope's bankers reſident in London, makes mention of this money by the name of eſterling; Noveritis nos recipiſſe ab A. and B. &c. centum uncias bonorum & legalium eſterlingorum, treſdecim ſolidis & quatuor ſterlingis pro qualibet unciâ computatis. And the ſame author fol. 710. ſaith, eodem tempore moneta Eſterlingorum, propter ſui materiam deſiderabilem, deteſtabili circumciſione cæpit deteriorari & corrumpi. And fol. 575. Comitiſſa de Biarde venit ad regem cum 60 militibus, ducta cupidine Eſterlingorum, quibus noverat regem Angliæ abundare, & accepit a rege qualibet die pro ſtipendio treſdecim libras Eſterlingorum, &c. And Hoveden in Rich. 1. fol. 377. b. makes mention of this money in theſe words, videns igitur Galfridus Eboracenſis electus, quod niſi mediante pecuniâ amorem regis fratris nullatenus habere poſſit, promiſit ei tria millia librarum Sterlingorum pro amore ejus habendo; and this was before the time of king John; from whence it ſeems, that the time when this money was firſt coined is uncertain; for ſome ſay that it was made by Oſbright a king of the Saxon race 160 years before the Norman Conqueſt. And ſo as nummus is called from Numa, who was the firſt king who made money in Rome, ſo ſterling is called from the Eſterlings who firſt made the money of this ſtandard in England, by a metonymia, ſubſtituting the name of the inventor for the thing invented, as Ceres pro frumento, Bacchus pro vino, &c.

And it is to be obſerved, that the Eſterlings were the firſt founders of the four principal cities of Ireland, viz. Dublin, Waterford, Cork and Limerick, and of the other maritime towns in this kingdom, and were the ſole maintainers of traffick and commerce, which was utterly neglected by the Iriſh. Theſe cities and towns were under the protection of king Edgar and Edward the Confeſſor before the Norman Conqueſt: and theſe Eſterlings in the antient records of this kingdom are called Oſtmanni. And therefore, when Hen. 2. upon the firſt conqueſt, thought it better to people theſe cities and towns with Engliſh colonies taken from Briſtol, Cheſter, &c. he aſſigned to theſe Oſtmen certain proportion of land next adjoining to each of theſe cities, which portion is called in the records of antient times, Cantreda Oſtmannorum. And all this was obſerved on the name of Sterling.

For the nature or ſubſtance of this money, firſt it was obſerved, that the coin which was properly called the ſterling was the denier or ſilver penny, as appears in the ordinance called compoſitio menſurarum made in the time of Ed. 1. where it is ſaid, denarius Angliæ, qui nominatur ſterlingus, rotundus, ſine tonſura, ponderabit triginta & duo grana in medio ſpicæ, &c. and every other coin or piece of ſilver was meaſured by the ſterling penny, as the groat contained the value of four ſterlings, and the half groat the value of two ſterlings, 25 Ed. 3. c. 6. and the ſhilling conſiſted of twelve ſterlings, Linwood de teſtamentis, C. item quia, verb. Centum ſolidos; and the mark conſiſted of 13*s*. and four ſterlings, as before is ſhewn from Matt. Paris; and the maile (half-penny) was the half of a ſterling; and the farthing the fourth part of a ſterling. See an ordinance without date in the magna charta printed by Tottel, anno 1556. fol. 167. and in Raſtall's old abridgment, money 52. quia multorum regum temporibus proviſum fuit, quod propter pauperes denarius argenti, viz. ſterlingus, divideretur in obolum & quadrantem, ex parte domini regis precipitur, quod quicunque recuſaverit obolum vel quadrantem debitam habentem formam, capiatur. See 6 and 7 Ed. 6. Dyer 82. in the caſe of pollards, where it appears that a ſterling and a denier were the ſame; for there it is ſaid that two pollards paſſed for one ſterling, and accordingly two ſterlings* were paid for one denier. And indeed in antient time, every ſort of money, made of the ſeveral metals of which money was uſually coined, was properly called a denarius; and therefore the French and Italians ſpeak properly, when they call all money deniers and denarii, for coins (nummi) were either copper, ſilver or gold; each ſilver one was worth ten of copper, and ſo was called a denier; and each gold one was worth ten of ſilver, and in this reſpect theſe were likewiſe deniers. And the antient proportion of gold to ſilver was as ten to one; and this proportion, as it ſeems, David obſerved in the treaſure of gold and ſilver which he prepared for the building of the temple; for the text ſays, Chron. chap. 22. ver. 14. that he provided for that purpoſe 100,000 talents of gold, and 1,000,000 talents of ſilver. So the firſt and proper ſterling coin was a denier.

Weight and purity of it.

And for the ſubſtance of this denier or ſterling penny in weight and purity: as to the weight, it was at firſt the twentieth part of an ounce, viz. an ounce was cut into twenty ſterling deniers and no more. See the compoſitio menſurarum made in the time of Ed. 1. in veteri libro de magnâ chartâ, fol. 113. b. and in Raſtall's old abridgment, tit. weights and meaſures, 4. where it is ſaid, that viginti denarii faciunt unciam, & duodecim unciæ faciunt libram; and ſo it was until 9 Ed. 3. at which time the ounce of ſilver was cut into 26 pence. Annal. de Rob. de Aveſbury M. S. See ſeveral ordinances touching the new ſterling money, made 9 Ed. 3. Raſtall, money 345. And ſuch proportion was continued until 2 Hen. 6. when the ounce of ſilver made 32 pence; and this appears by the ſtat. of 2 Hen. 6. c. 13. and alſo by Linwood de teſtamentis, cap. item quia, verb. cent. ſolid. Hic ſolidus (ſaith he) ſumitur pro duodecim denariis Anglicanis; horum 26 ponderabant unciam, cum tamen jam 32 denarii vix faciant unciam. And this gloſs was wrote in the beginning of the reign of Hen. 6. as it is mentioned in the preface to his book. This ſtandard was continued until the 5 Ed. 4. and then the ounce of ſilver made 40 pence; 9 Ed. 4. 49. a. and 12 Ed. 4. c. 60. in Rot. parl. Dublin. And this continued until 36 Hen. 8. when the king prepared for his journey to Bullogne; and then an ounce of ſilver was cut into 60 pence, and that ſtandard remains to this day. And ſo the ſterling penny, which was at firſt the twentieth part of an ounce, is now the ſixtieth part of an ounce; and by conſequence, the antient ſterling penny contained as much ſilver as is contained in the three-penny piece that is now current.

1 H. H. P. C. 190.

And as to the purity of this ſterling money, 18 s. 5½ d. of the pureſt ſilver was contained in each pound, and each pound of ſterling money had 1 s. 6½ d. allay of copper, and no more; and of this allay of ſterling money, the ordinances or ſtatutes of 25 Ed. 3. c. 13. and 2 Hen. 6. c. 13. make mention. But this is well known to all moneyers, and is contained in all the indentures made between the king and the maſters of the mint.

Whether the mixed money ſhould be deemed ſterling.

Then the ſterling money being of ſuch weight and fineneſs, the doubt, primâ facie, was, how this mixed money ſhould be ſaid to be ſterling. And for the clearing of this doubt, it was ſaid, that in each common piece of money, there is bonitas intrinſeca, & bonitas extrinſeca: intrinſeca conſiſtit in prætioſitate materiæ & pondere, viz. fineneſs and weight; extrinſeca bonitas conſiſtit in valuatione ſeu denominatione, & in formâ ſeu charactere. Budel. de re nummariâ, lib. 11. cap. 7. And this bonitas extrinſeca, which is called eſtimatio ſive valor impoſititius, eſt formalis & eſſentialis monetæ, and this form giveth name and being to money; for without ſuch form, the moſt precious and pure metal that can be is not money; and therefore, Molinæus, lib. de mutat. Monetæ, ſaith, non materia naturalis corporis monetæ, ſed valor impoſititius eſt forma & ſubſtantia monetæ, quæ non eſt corpus phyſicum ſed artificiale, as Ariſtotle ſaith, Ethic. lib. 5. And ſo Polit. lib. 1. he ſaith to this effect, that money was firſt ſigned and imprinted with a certain character, to the intent, that the people might accept it on the credit of the prince or ſtate who publiſhes it, without examination or trial of the weight or purity. And to this purpoſe Molineus hath this rule, Q. 99. de jure non refert ſive plus ſive minus argenti inſit, modo publica, proba, & legitima moneta ſit. Et Baldus l. ſingulari, ſaith, in pecunia potius attenditur uſus & curſus quam materia. And Seneca, lib. 5. de beneficiis, Æs alienum habere dicitur, & qui aureos debet, & qui corium formâ publicâ percuſſum. And it was ſaid that the king hath the ſame prerogative to give value to baſe metal by his impreſſion or character, as he hath to give eſtimation to a mean perſon by imparting the character of honour to him; ſic fiet viro quem rex honorare deſiderat.

And ſo it was concluded, that after the Eſterlings, by command of the king of England, had made this pure Engliſh money, which from the name of the makers was called eſterling or ſterling money, the ſtandard of which hath been always the moſt fixed and unchanged in all the world, (which hath been a great honour to our nation, for in all other kingdoms and ſtates, the ſtandards of their money are more unſteady and variable,) all money coined by the authority of the king of England, and having his character and impreſſion, not only in England, but alſo in Scotland and Ireland, hath been ſterling money, and ſo called, reputed and taken by all people, whether the matter of it were mixed or pure. And this appears by the ordinance which is called ſtatutum de moneta magnum, by which all money is prohibited, only the money of England, of Ireland and of Scotland, which was properly the ſterling money. And therefore Freherus, lib. de re nummariâ, where he enumerates the different money of different nations; ſterlingi, ſaith he, habentur in Anglia, Scotia & Hibernia. And Bodin, lib. 6. de republ. c. 3. ſpeaking of the money of Scotland; in Scotland, ſaith he, are two pounds, (livers) very different; one of eſterlings, the other cuſtomary. And certainly the uſual Scottiſh pound (liver) is like the French livre, and the pound (livre) eſterling current there is that of England. And that baſe or mixed money may be current for ſterling, appears by the ſaid caſe of pollards, Dyer 82. b. where it is ſaid, quod currebat quædam moneta in Anglia loco ſterlingi quæ vocabatur pollards, viz. duo pollardi pro uno ſterlingo.

Fifthly, it was reſolved, that although this mixed money was made to be current within this kingdom of Ireland only, yet it may well be ſaid, current and lawful money of England, for two cauſes.—1. Becauſe this kingdom is only a member of the imperial crown of England; and this appears 3 Hen. 7. 10. a. where a queſtion was propounded to the juſtices by Hobart, attorney-general, ſi quis ſciens monetam ad ſimilitudinem monetæ regis Angliæ contrafactam, talem monetam in Angliam extra Hiberniam deferat, ſi ſit proditio necne: & dixerunt quod Hibernia eſt quaſi membrum Angliæ, & ibidem legibus Angliæ utuntur, & authoritate regia faciunt monetam. And to this purpoſe it is recited in the ſtatute of Faculties, enacted in this kingdom, 28 Hen. 8. c. 19. that this the king's land of Ireland is a member appendant, and rightfully belongeth to the imperial crown of the realm of England, and united unto the ſame. And in the act of 33 Hen. 8. c. 1. by which the ſtile and title of king of Ireland was given to Hen. 8. his heirs and ſucceſſors, it is moreover enacted, that the king ſhall enjoy that ſtile and title, and all other royal pre-eminences, prerogatives and dignities, as united and annexed to the imperial crown of the realm of England.—2. It is called lawful money of England, in reſpect to the place of coinage, which was in England, viz. in the Tower of London. For although in antient times the king had ſeveral mints in this kingdom, as he had in England, yet ſince the commencement of the reign of queen Elizabeth, all the mints have been reduced to one place, viz. the Tower of London; and this was done upon good reaſon of ſtate, to prevent the falſification of money. And therefore, before the Norman Conqueſt, all money was coined in monaſteries; for it was preſumed, that in ſuch places no falſity or corruption would be found. And this agrees with the prudence of the Roman ſtate, which had but one mint for all Italy, and that was in the temple of Juno at Rome, who for this cauſe was called Juno moneta. And for this purpoſe, the emperor Charlemain made a law in theſe words, viz. de falſis monetis, quia in diverſis locis contra juſtitiam fiunt, volumus, ut in nullo alio loco moneta, niſi in palatio noſtro, fiat. Choppinus de Domanio Franciæ, 217. a. Yet in 28 Ed. 1. this prudent king, for the facility of exchange, cauſed ſeveral mints to be eſtabliſhed in ſeveral towns in England; one in the Tower of London with thirty furnaces, another at Canterbury with eight furnaces, another at Kingſton upon Hull with four furnaces, another at Newcaſtle upon Tyne with two furnaces, another at Briſtol with four furnaces, and another at Exeter with four furnaces. Tractat. de monetâ Angliæ, made in the time of Ed. 1. which I found in the library of ſir Robert Cotton, which was the book of lord Burleigh, late lord high treaſurer of England. See alſo the cloſe rolls of 29 Ed. 1. in the Tower of London. And this appears alſo by the inſcription of divers antient coins, on which are expreſſed the names of the cities where they were coined, according to a verſe made in the time of Ed. 1. and taken by Stow out of Robert le Brun, an antient manuſcript:

Edward did ſmite round penny, half-penny, farthing.

And then followed,

On the king's ſide, was his head and his name written,
On the croſs ſide, the city where it was ſmitten.

And this ſame king having eſtabliſhed a mint at Dublin with four furnaces, and having conſtituted Alexander Norman of Luſk maſter of the mint there, as appears in ſeveral records in the archives of the Caſtle of Dublin; afterwards, viz. 32 Ed. 1. when he had altered the form of the coin, he cauſed divers ſtamps conſiſting of two parts, of which the one contained the pile, and the other the croſs, to be tranſmitted to the treaſurer of this kingdom, as is recorded in the red book of the Exchequer here, in this manner. Magiſter Gulielmus de Wimundham, cuſtos cambiorum domini regis in Anglia, de præcepto venerabilis patris Bathon. & Wellenſis epiſcopi, theſaurarij ejuſdem domini regis, miſit domino Gulielmo de Eſenden, theſaurario in Hibernia, viginti quatuor pecias cuneorum, pro moneta ibidem facienda, viz. tres pilas cum ſex crucellis pro denarijs, tres pilas cum ſex crucellis pro obolis, & duas pilas cum quatuor crucellis pro ſerlingis, per Johannem le Minor, Thomas Dowle, & Johannem de Shorditch, clericos, de ſocietate operariorum & monetariorum London, per eoſdem ad monetam prædictam operandam & monetandam. And there it is likewiſe mentioned, before what witneſſes the ſaid ſtamps were delivered; for cuneus monetæ tanquam ſigillum regni cuſtodiri debet, as it is ſaid in the treatiſe de moneta Angliæ before mentioned; and the reaſon is, becauſe to counterfeit the one or the other is high treaſon.

And at this time there was but one mint in Ireland, to wit, at Dublin. But long afterwards, viz. 3 Ed. 4. a mint was eſtabliſhed at Waterford, another at Trim, and another at Galway; Rot. Parl. 3 Ed. 4. in Caſtro Dublin. And 12 Ed. 4. Rot. Parl. ibid. it is ordained, that the maſters of the mint in Ireland ſhould make, in the caſtles of Dublin and Trim, and in the town of Drogheda, five ſorts of coin, the groat, the half-groat, the penny, half-penny and farthing; by which it is manifeſt that in former times, there were five ſeveral mints in Ireland, in the ſeveral towns aforeſaid. But all theſe were diſcontinued in the time of Ed. 6. ſo that ſince the reign of that king, all the money made in Ireland, hath been coined in England; and therefore this mixed money, coined in the Tower of London, may be properly called current and lawful money of England.

If an obligee refuſeth a tender at the time and place in mixed money (viz. under the pure ſtandard) the obligor ſhall not be bound to pay better money afterwards.

Sixthly and laſtly, it was reſolved, that although at the time of the contract and obligation made in the preſent caſe, pure money of gold and ſilver was current within this kingdom, where the place of payment was aſſigned; yet the mixed money, being eſtabliſhed in this kingdom before the day of payment, may well be tendered in diſcharge of the ſaid obligation, and the obligee is bound to accept it; and if he refuſes it, and waits until the money be changed again, the obligor is not bound to pay other money of better ſubſtance, but it is ſufficient if he be always ready to pay the mixed money according to the rate for which they were current at the time of the tender. And this point was reſolved on conſideration of two circumſtances, viz. the time and the place of the payment; for the time is future, viz. that if the ſaid Brett ſhall pay or cauſe to be paid 100 l. ſterling, current money, &c. and therefore ſuch money ſhall be paid as ſhall be current at ſuch future time; ſo that the time of payment, and not the time of the contract, ſhall be regarded.

Alſo, the future time is intended by the words current money; for a thing which is paſſed is not in curſu; and therefore all the doctors, who write de re nummaria, agree in this rule, verba currentis monetæ tempus ſolutionis deſignant. And to this purpoſe are ſeveral caſes ruled in our books. 6 and 7 Ed. 6. Dyer 81. b. After the fall and embaſement of money, 5 Ed. 6. debt was brought againſt the executors of leſſee for years, for rent in arrear for two years, ending Mich. 2 Ed. 6. at which time the ſhilling (which at the time of the action brought, was cried down to 6 d.) was current for 12 d. the defendants pleaded a tender of the rent on the days when it became due, in peciis monetæ Angliæ vocat. ſhillings, qualibet pecia vocat. ſhilling, adtunc ſolubili pro 12 d. and that neither the plaintiff nor any other for him was ready to receive it, &c. and concluded that they are ſtill ready to pay the arrears in dictis peciis vocat. ſhillings, ſecundum ratam, &c. On this plea, although the plaintiff demurred, yet he was content to take the money at the rate aforeſaid, without coſts or damages. To the ſame purpoſe is the caſe of pollards adjudged, 29 Ed. 1. and reported by Dyer 82. b. where in debt on an obligation for payment of 24 l. at two ſeveral days, the defendant pleads, that, at the days limited for payment of the debt in demand, currebat quædam moneta quæ vocabatur pollards, loco ſterlingi, &c. and that the defendant at the firſt day of payment tendered the moiety of the debt in the money called pollards, which the plaintiff refuſed, and that he is ſtill ready, &c. and offered it in court, which is not denied by the plaintiff; ideo conceſſum eſt, that he recovered one moiety in pollards, and the other in pure ſterling money. See 9 Ed. 4. 49. a. a remarkable caſe on the change of money, where it is ſaid, that if a man in an action of debt demands 40 l. it ſhall be intended money, which is current at the time of the writ purchaſed. And there a caſe in the time of Ed. 1. is put, which is directly to this purpoſe. In debt brought upon a deed for thirty quarters of barley, price 20 l. it was found for the plaintiff, and the jury was charged to enquire of the price at the time of the payment; and it was ſaid that at the time of the payment, a quarter was at 12 s. but at the time of the making of the deed, it was only at 3 s. and the plaintiff recovered 18 l. for the corn according to the price of it at the time of the payment. To this purpoſe alſo, Linwood hath a notable gloſs on the conſtitution of Simon Mepham, lib. 3. de teſtamentis cap. item quia. For where the conſtitution is ſuch, pro publicatione teſtamenti pauperis, cujus inventarium bonorum non excedit centum ſolidos ſterlingorum, nihil penitus exigatur, he maketh this gloſs, hic ſolidus ſumitur pro duodecim denarijs Anglicanis, &c. Sed quæro, ſaith he, numquid circa hos centum ſolidos debeat conſiderari valor in moneta jam currente, vel valor ſterlingorum qui currebant tempore ſtatuti; and there he reſolveth, quod ubi diſpoſitio ſurgit ex ſtatuto, ut hic, licet moneta ſit diminuta in valore, tamen debet conſiderari reſpectu monetæ novæ currentis, & non reſpectu antiquæ. Nam mutata moneta, mutari videtur ſtatutum, ut ſcilicet intelligatur de nova, & non de veteri. See Regiſt. 50. a. and 54. b. where the king iſſues his writ, to be certified of the value of a church. The words of the writ are ſecundum taxationem decimæ jam currentis. And 31 Ed. 3. Fitz. H. Annuity 28. an annuity was granted to I. S. until he was promoted by the grantor to a ſufficient benefice; I. S. brings a writ of annuity againſt the grantor, who pleads that he had tendered to the plaintiff a ſufficient benefice; and there iſſue was taken on the value of the benefice at the time of the tender.

But it was ſaid that, although in contracts theſe words currentis monetæ ſhall relate to the time of the payment; yet in wills, they ſhall relate to the time of making the will; for the bequeſt is in the preſent tenſe, I give and bequeath, &c. and therefore legacies ſhall be paid in ſuch money as is current at the time of the making the teſtament, or according to the rate thereof. It was alſo ſaid, that if a man hath 1000 l. of pure ſilver in marriage with his wife, and afterwards they are divorced cauſa præcontractus, by which the wife is to receive her portion: or if a man recovers by an erroneous judgment 100 l. in debt, and hath execution in pure ſilver money, and afterwards the judgment is reverſed, ſo that he is to be reſtored to all that he hath loſt, although baſe money be eſtabliſhed in the mean time, reſtitution ſhall be in ſuch money as was current at the time of the marriage, and at the time of the recovery. But theſe latter caſes were not reſolved.

And as to the circumſtance of place, it was reſolved, that although the contract was made in London, yet, the place of payment being appointed in Dublin, of neceſſity the obligor muſt make his tender in the mixed money at the time of the payment; for all other money was cried down and made bullion by the proclamation aforeſaid, and this money only eſtabliſhed; ſo that if the obligee had refuſed this mixed money, he had committed a contempt, for which he might be puniſhed. Alſo the judges are not bound to take notice of any money, that is not current by proclamation. And therefore Priſot ſaith, 34 Hen. 6. 12. a. we are not apprized of 61. Flemiſh, as we are of 100 nobles; and therefore in all contracts of merchants, conſuetudo & ſtatuta loci, in quem eſt deſtinata ſolutio, reſpicienda ſunt. Budelius de re nummariâ, lib. 2. c. 21. And it was ſaid, that if at this day the law ſhould be taken, as it was taken in the time of Ed. 1. that upon judgment in debt given in England, on a teſtatum that the defendant hath nothing in England, but that he hath goods and lands in Ireland; a writ of execution ſhall be awarded to the chief-juſtice or deputy of Ireland, to levy the debt there, (which writ is found in Regiſtro brev. jud. 43. b.) the ſum in ſuch caſe ſhall be levied according to the rate of Iriſh money, and not of Engliſh money, and in ſuch coin as ſhall be current in this kingdom, at the time of the execution.

And according to this reſolution, ſeveral other caſes on the ſame point were afterwards ruled and adjudged in the ſeveral courts of record in Dublin.

XV. The Caſe of Præmunire in Ireland, or the Conviction and Attainder of Robert Lalor Prieſt, being indicted on the Statute of the 16 R. II. cap. 5. Hill. 4 Jam. 1607.

[This caſe is extracted from Sir John Davies's Reports. It was originally publiſhed in Engliſh, with marginal notes containing the heads of the caſe, in the ſame manner as it is here printed.]

Of what quality and credit Robert Lalor was.

THIS Robert Lalor, being a native of this kingdom, received his orders of prieſthood above 30 years ſince at the hands of one Richard Brady, to whom the pope had given the title of biſhop of Kilmore in Ulſter; and for the ſpace of 20 years together his authority and credit was not mean within the province of Leinſter. He had alſo made his name known in the court of Rome, and held intelligence with the cardinal who was protector of this nation; by means whereof he obtained the title and juriſdiction of vicar-general of the ſee apoſtolick, within the archbiſhoprick of Dublin and the biſhopricks of Kildare and Fernes. This pretended juriſdiction, extending well-nigh over all the province of Leinſter, he exerciſed boldly and ſecurely many years together, until the proclamation was publiſhed, whereby all Jeſuits and prieſts ordained by foreign authority were commanded to depart out of this kingdom by a certain time prefixed. After which time he began to lurk and to change his name. Howbeit at laſt he was apprehended in Dublin, and committed to priſon in the Caſtle there. Upon his firſt examination taken by the lord-deputy himſelf, he acknowledged that he was a prieſt, and ordained by a popiſh titulary biſhop; that he had accepted the title and office of the pope's vicar-general in the three dioceſes before-named, and had exerciſed ſpiritual juriſdiction in foro conſcientiæ; and in ſundry other points he maintained and juſtified the pope's authority. Only he ſaid, he was of opinion that the pope had no power to excommunicate or depoſe his majeſty, becauſe the king is not of the pope's religion.

His apprehenſion and firſt examination.

His firſt indictment and conviction.

The next term after he was indicted upon the ſtatute of 2 Eliz. enacted in this realm againſt ſuch as ſhould wilfully and adviſedly maintain and uphold the juriſdiction of any foreign prince or prelate in any cauſes eccleſiaſtical or civil within this realm. By which ſtatute the firſt offence of that kind is puniſhed with loſs of goods, and one year's impriſonment; the ſecond offence incurreth the penalty of the præmunire; and the third offence is made high treaſon. Upon this indictment he was arraigned, convicted and condemned, and ſo reſted in priſon during the next two terms without any farther queſtion. He then made petition unto the lord-deputy to be ſet at liberty: whereupon his lordſhip cauſed him to be examined by ſir Oliver St. John, ſir James Fullerton, ſir Jeffery Fenton, the attorney and ſolicitor general. At firſt he made ſome evaſive and indirect anſwers; but at laſt voluntarily and freely he made this enſuing acknowledgment or confeſſion, which being ſet down in writing word for word as he made it, was adviſedly read by him, and ſubſcribed with his own hand, and with the hands of thoſe who took his examination; and afterwards he confirmed it by his oath before the lord-deputy and council.

His ſecond examination.

The confeſſion or acknowledgment of Robert Lalor prieſt, made the 22*d of* December, 1606.

His confeſſion or acknowledgment.

FIRST, he doth acknowledge, that he is not a lawful vicar-general in the dioceſes of Dublin, Kildare and Fernes, and thinketh in his conſcience that he cannot lawfully take upon him the ſaid office.

Item, he doth acknowledge our ſovereign lord king James, that now is, to be his lawful chief and ſupreme governor in all cauſes, as well eccleſiaſtical as civil, and that he is bound in conſcience to obey him in all the ſaid cauſes; and that neither the pope, nor any other foreign prelate, prince or potentate, hath any power to controul the king in any cauſe eccleſiaſtical or civil within this kingdom, or any of his majeſty's dominions.

Item, he doth in his conſcience believe, that all biſhops ordained and made by the king's authority within any of his dominions are lawful biſhops; and that no biſhop made by the pope, or by any authority derived from the pope, within the king's dominions, hath any power or authority to impugn, diſannul or controul any act done by any biſhop made by his majeſty's authority as aforeſaid.

Item, he profeſſeth himſelf willing and ready to obey the king, as a good and obedient ſubject ought to do, in all his lawful commandments, either concerning his function of prieſthood, or any other duty belonging to a good ſubject.

After this confeſſion made, the ſtate here had no purpoſe to proceed againſt him ſeverely, either for his contempt of the proclamation, or offence againſt the law: ſo as he had more liberty than before, and many of his friends had acceſs unto him; who telling him what they heard of his confeſſion, he proteſted unto them, that he had only acknowledged the king's civil and temporal power, without any confeſſion or admittance of his authority in ſpiritual cauſes. This being reported unto the lord-deputy by ſundry gentlemen, who gave faith unto what he ſaid, his lordſhip thought fit, that ſince he had incurred the pain of præmunire, by exerciſing epiſcopal juriſdiction, as vicar-general to the pope, that he ſhould be attainted of that offence; as well to make him an example to others of his profeſſion, (for almoſt in every dioceſe of this kingdom there is a titulary biſhop ordained by the pope), as alſo that at the time of his trial a juſt occaſion might be taken, to publiſh the confeſſion and acknowledgment which he had voluntarily made, ſigned, and confirmed by oath before the lord-deputy and council, who have likewiſe ſubſcribed their names as witneſſes thereof.

Hereupon, in Hill. term, 4 Jacobi, an indictment was framed againſt him in the King's Bench upon the ſtatute of 16 Rich. 2. cap. 5. containing theſe ſeveral points.

1. That he had received a bull or brief purchaſed or procured in the court of Rome, which bull or brief did touch or concern the king's crown and dignity royal, containing a commiſſion of authority from the pope of Rome unto Richard Brady and David Magragh to conſtitute a vicar-general for the ſee of Rome, by the name of the See Apoſtolick, in the ſeveral dioceſes of Dublin, Kildare and Fernes, within this kingdom of Ireland.

The indictment of Lalor upon the ſtat. of 16 Ric. 2.

2. That by pretext or colour of that bull or brief he was conſtituted vicar-general of the ſee of Rome, and took upon him the ſtile and title of vicar-general in the ſaid ſeveral dioceſes.

3. That he did exerciſe eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction as vicar-general of the ſee of Rome, by inſtituting divers perſons to benefices with cure of ſouls, by granting diſpenſations in cauſes matrimonial, by pronouncing ſentences of divorce between divers married perſons, and by doing all other acts and things pertaining to epiſcopal juriſdiction, within the ſaid ſeveral dioceſes, againſt our ſovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity royal, and in contempt of his majeſty, and diſheriſon of his crown, and contrary to the form and effect of the ſtatute, &c.

To this indictment Lalor pleaded not guilty; and when the iſſue was to be tried, the name and reputation of the man, and the nature of the cauſe, drew all the principal gentlemen both of the pale and provinces that were in town to the hearing of the matter. At which time a ſubſtantial jury of the city of Dublin being ſworn for the trial, and the points of the indictment being opened and ſet forth by the king's ſerjeant; the attorney-general thought it not impertinent, but very neceſſary, before he deſcended to the particular evidence againſt the priſoner, to inform and ſatisfy the hearers in two points.

1. What reaſon moved us to ground this indictment upon the old ſtatute of 16 Rich. 2. rather than upon ſome other later law made ſince the time of king Henry 8.

2. What were the true cauſes of the making of this law of 16 Rich. and other formal laws againſt proviſors, and ſuch as did appeal to the court of Rome in thoſe times, when both the prince and people of England did for the moſt part acknowledge the pope to be the thirteenth apoſtle, and only oracle in matters of religion, and did follow his doctrine in moſt of thoſe points wherein we now diſſent from him.

1. For the firſt point, we did purpoſely forbear to proceed againſt him upon any latter law, to the end that ſuch as were ignorant might be informed, that long before king Henry 8. was born divers laws were made againſt the uſurpation of the biſhop of Rome upon the rights of the crown of England, well-nigh as ſharp and ſevere as any ſtatutes which have been made in later times; and that therefore we made choice to proceed upon a law made more than 200 years paſt, when the king, the lords and commons, which made the laws, and the judges, which did interpret the laws, did for the moſt part follow the ſame opinions in religion which were taught and held in the court of Rome.

The true cauſe of making the ſtat. of 16 R. 2. and other ſtatutes againſt proviſors.

2. For the ſecond point, the cauſes that moved and almoſt enforced the Engliſh nation to make this, and other ſtatutes of the ſame nature, were of the greateſt importance that could poſſibly ariſe in any ſtate. For theſe laws were made to uphold and maintain the ſovereignty of the king, the liberty of the people, the common law, and the commonweal, which otherwiſe had been undermined and utterly ruined by the uſurpation of the biſhop of Rome.

For albeit the kings of England were abſolute emperors within their dominions, and had under them as learned a prelacy and clergy, as valiant and prudent a nobility, as free and wealthy a commonalty, as any was then in Chriſtendom; yet if we look into the ſtories and records of theſe two imperial kingdoms, we ſhall find, that if theſe laws of proviſion and præmunire had not been made, they had loſt the name of imperial, and of kingdoms too, and had been long ſince made tributary provinces to the biſhop of Rome, or rather part of St. Peter's patrimony in demeſne. Our kings had had their ſcepters wreſted out of their hands, their crowns ſpurned off from their heads, their necks trod upon; they had been made laquies or footmen to the biſhop of Rome, as ſome of the emperors and French kings were; our prelates had been made his chaplains and clerks, our nobility his vaſſals and ſervants, our commons his ſlaves and villains, if theſe acts of manumiſſion had not freed them. In a word, before the making of theſe laws, the flouriſhing crown and commonwealth of England was in extreme danger to have been brought into moſt miſerable ſervitude and ſlavery, under colour of religion and devotion to the ſee of Rome. And this was not only ſeen and felt by the king, and much repined at and proteſted againſt by the nobility, but the commons, the general multitude of the ſubjects, did exclaim and cry out upon it. For the commons of England may be an example unto all other ſubjects in the world in this, that they have ever been tender and ſenſible of the wrongs and diſhonours offered unto their kings, and have ever contended to uphold and maintain their honour and ſovereignty. And their faith and loyalty have been generally ſuch, (though every age hath brought forth ſome particular monſters of diſloyalty) as no pretence of zeal or religion could ever withdraw the greater part of the ſubjects to ſubmit themſelves to a foreign yoke, no not when popery was in her height and exaltation; whereof this act and divers others of the ſame kind are clear and manifeſt teſtimonies. For this act of 16 Rich. 2. was made at the prayer of the commons: which prayer they make not for themſelves, neither ſhew they their own ſelf-love therein, (as in other bills which contain their grievances) but their love and zeal to the king and his crown. When after the Norman Conqueſt they importuned their kings for the great charter, they ſought their own liberties; and in other bills preferred commonly by the commons againſt ſhriefs, eſcheators, purveyors, or the like, they ſeek their own profit and eaſe. But here their petition is to the king, to make a law for the defence and maintenance of his own honour. They complain, that by bulls and proceſſes from Rome, the king is deprived of that juriſdiction which belongs of right to his imperial crown; that the king doth loſe the ſervice and council of his prelates and learned men by tranſlations made by the biſhop of Rome; that the king's laws are defeated at his will, the treaſure of the realm is exhauſted and exported to enrich his court; and that by thoſe means the crown of England, which hath ever been free, and ſubject unto none, but immediately unto God, ſhould be ſubmitted unto the biſhop of Rome, to the utter deſtruction of the king and the whole realm; which God defend, ſay they: and thereupon, out of their exceeding zeal and fervency, they offer to live and die with the king in defence of the liberties of the crown. And laſtly, they pray and require the king by way of juſtice, to examine all the lords in parliament, what they thought of theſe manifeſt wrongs and uſurpations, and whether they would ſtand with the king in defence of his royal liberties, or no. Which the king did according to their petition: and the lords ſpiritual and temporal did all anſwer, that theſe uſurpations of the biſhop of Rome were againſt the liberties of the crown, and that they were all bound by their allegiance to ſtand with the king, and to maintain his honour and prerogative. And thereupon it was enacted with a full conſent of the three eſtates, that ſuch as ſhould purchaſe in the court of Rome, or elſewhere, any bulls or proceſſes, or other things which might touch the king in his crown and dignity royal, and ſuch as ſhould bring them into the realm, and ſuch as ſhould receive them, publiſh them, or execute them, they, their notaries, proctors, maintainers and counſellors, ſhould be all out of the king's protection, their lands and goods forfeited to the king, their bodies attached if they might be found, or elſe proceſs of præmunire facias to be awarded againſt them. Upon theſe motives, and with this affection and zeal of the people, was the ſtatute of 16 Rich. 2. made, whereupon we have framed our indictment.

The ſtatute of præmunire made at the prayer of the commons.

The effect of the ſtatute of 16 R. 2. cap. 5.

Now let us look higher and ſee, whether the former laws made by king Edw. 1. and king Edw. 3. againſt the uſurpation of the biſhop of Rome were not grounded upon the like cauſe and reaſon.

The effect of the ſtatute of 38 Edw. 3. cap. 1.

The ſtatute of 38 Edw. 3. cap. 1. expreſſing the miſchiefs that did ariſe by breves of citation, which drew the bodies of the people, and by bulls of proviſion and reſervation of eccleſiaſtical benefices, which drew the wealth of the realm, to the court of Rome, doth declare, that by theſe means the ancient laws, cuſtoms and franchiſes of the realm were confounded, the crown of our ſovereign lord the king diminiſhed, and his perſon falſely defamed, the treaſure and riches of the land carried away, the ſubjects of the realm moleſted and impoveriſhed, the benefices of holy church waſted and deſtroyed, divine ſervice, hoſpitality, alms-deeds and other works of charity neglected.

The ſtatute of 27 Edw. 3. cap. 1.

Again, 27 Edw. 3. cap. 1. upon the grievous and clamorous complaint (for that phraſe is there uſed) of the great men and commons touching citations and proviſions, it is enacted, that the offenders ſhall forfeit their lands, goods and chattels, and their bodies be impriſoned and ranſomed at the king's will.

The ſtatute of 25 Edw. 3. reciting the ſtatute of 25 Edw. 1.

But in the ſtat. of 25 Edw. 3. wherein the firſt law againſt proviſors made 25 Edw. 1. is recited, there is a larger declaration of theſe inconveniences than in the two laſt acts before mentioned. For there all the commons of the realm do grievouſly complain, that whereas the holy church of England was firſt founded in eſtate of prelacy by the kings and nobility of that realm, and by them endowed with great poſſeſſions and revenues in lands, rents and advowſons, to the end the people might be informed in religion, hoſpitality might be kept, and other works of charity might be exerciſed within the realm; and whereas the king and other founders of the ſaid prelacies were the rightful patrons and advowees thereof, and upon avoidance of ſuch eccleſiaſtical promotions had power to advance thereunto their kinſmen, friends, and other learned men of the birth of that realm, which being ſo advanced became able and worthy perſons to ſerve the king in counſel, and other places in the commonweal; the biſhop of Rome, uſurping the ſeignory of ſuch poſſeſſions and benefices, did give and grant the ſame to aliens, which did never dwell in England, and to cardinals, which might not dwell there, as if he were rightful patron of thoſe benefices; whereas by the law of England he never had right to the patronage thereof; whereby in ſhort time all the ſpiritual promotions in the realm would be engroſſed into the hands of ſtrangers, canonical elections of prelates would be aboliſhed, works of charity would ceaſe, the founders and true patrons of churches would be diſinherited, the king's council would be weakened, the whole kingdom impoveriſhed, and the laws and rights of the realm deſtroyed. Upon this complaint it was reſolved in parliament, that theſe oppreſſions and grievances ſhould not be ſuffered in any manner: and therefore it was enacted, that the king and his ſubjects ſhould thenceforth enjoy the rights of patronage; that free elections of archbiſhops, biſhops, and other prelates elective, ſhould be made according to the ancient grants of the king's progenitors and their founders; that no bulls of proviſion ſhould be put in execution, but that the proviſors ſhould be attached, fined, and ranſomed at the king's will, and withal impriſoned, till they had renounced the benefits of their bulls, ſatisfied the party grieved, and given ſureties not to commit the like offence again.

Now, Mr. Lalor, what think you of theſe things? Did you believe that ſuch laws as theſe had been made againſt the pope 200, 250, 300 years ſince? Was king Hen. 8. the firſt prince that oppoſed the pope's uſurped authority? Were our proteſtants the firſt ſubjects that ever complained of the court of Rome? Of what religion, think you, were the propounders and enacters of theſe laws? Were they good catholicks, or good ſubjects, or what were they? You will not ſay they were proteſtants, for you will not admit the reformed religion to be ſo ancient as thoſe times: neither can you ſay they were undutiful, for they ſtrove to uphold their liege lord's ſovereignty. Doubtleſs the people in thoſe days did generally embrace the vulgar errors and ſuperſtitions of the Romiſh church, and in that reſpect were papiſts as well as you. But they had not learned the new doctrine of the pope's ſupremacy, and tranſcendant authority over kings; they did not believe he had power to depoſe princes, and diſcharge ſubjects of their allegiance, to abrogate the fundamental laws of kingdoms, and to impoſe his canons as binding laws upon all nations, without their conſents; they thought it a good point of religion to be good ſubjects, to honour their king, to love their country, and to maintain the laws and liberties thereof, howſoever in other points they did err and were miſs-led with the church of Rome.

Theſe laws made by ſuch as did profeſs the Romiſh religion.

So as now (Mr. Lalor) you have no excuſe, no evaſion, but your conſcience muſt condemn you as well as the law; ſince the law-makers in all ages, and all religious papiſts and proteſtants, do condemn you: unleſs you think yourſelf wiſer than all the biſhops that were then in England, or all the judges, who in thoſe days were learned in the civil and canon laws as well as in the common laws of England.

Laws againſt proviſors made in Ireland.

But you, being an Iriſhman, will ſay, perhaps, theſe laws were made in England, and that the Iriſh nation gave no particular conſent thereunto, only there was an implicit conſent wrapt and folded up in general terms given in the ſtatute of 10 Hen. 7. cap. 22. whereby all ſtatutes made in England are eſtabliſhed and made of force in Ireland. Aſſuredly, though the firſt parliament held in Ireland was after the firſt law againſt proviſors made in England, yet have there been as many particular laws made in Ireland againſt proviſions, citations, bulls and breves of the court of Rome, as are to be found in all the parliament-rolls in England. What will you ſay if in the ſelf-ſame parliament of 10 Hen. 7. cap. 5. a ſpecial law were made, enacting, authorizing and confirming in this realm all the ſtatutes of England made againſt proviſors; if before this the like law were made 32 Hen. 6. cap. 4. and again 28 Hen. 6. cap. 30. the like; and before that, the like law were made 40 Edw. 3. cap. 13. in the famous parliament of Kilkenny; if a ſtatute of the ſame nature were made 7 Edw. 4. cap. 2. and a ſeverer law than all theſe, 16 Edw. 4. cap. 4. that ſuch as purchaſe any bulls of proviſion in the court of Rome, as ſoon as they have publiſhed or executed the ſame to the hurt of any incumbent, ſhould be adjudged traitors; which act, if it be not repealed by the ſtatute of queen Mary, may terrify Mr. Lalor more than all the acts which are before remembred?

When the pope began firſt to uſurp upon the liberties of the crown of England.

But let us aſcend yet higher, to ſee when the pope's uſurpation, which cauſed all theſe complaints, began in England, with what ſucceſs it was continued, and by what degrees it roſe to that height, that it well-nigh over-topped the crown; whereby it will appear whether he had gained a circle by preſcription, by a long and quiet poſſeſſion, before the making of theſe laws.

The firſt encroachment of the biſhop of Rome upon the liberties of the crown of England, was made in the time of king William the Conqueror. For before that time the pope's writ did not run in England, his bulls of excommunication and proviſion came not thither; no citation, no appeals were made from thence to the court of Rome; our archbiſhops did not purchaſe their palls there, neither had the pope the inveſtiture of any of our biſhopricks. For it is to be obſerved, that as under the temporal monarchy of Rome, Britany was one of the laſt provinces that was won, and one of the firſt that was loſt again: ſo under the ſpiritual monarchy of the pope of Rome, England was one of the laſt countries of Chriſtendom that received his yoke, and was again one of the firſt that did reject and caſt it off. And truly, as in this, ſo in divers other points, the courſe of this ſpiritual monarchy of the pope may be aptly compared with the courſe of the temporal monarchies of the world. For as the temporal monarchies were firſt raiſed by intruſion upon other princes and commonweals; ſo did this ſpiritual prince (as they now ſtile him) grow to his greatneſs by uſurping upon other ſtates and churches. As the temporal monarchies, following the courſe of the ſun, did riſe in the eaſt, and ſettle in the weſt; ſo did the hierarchy or government of the church. Of the four temporal monarchies, the firſt two were in Aſia, the latter two in Europe; but the Roman monarchy did ſurpaſs and ſuppreſs them all. So were there four great patriarchs, or eccleſiaſtical hierarchies, two in the eaſt, and two in the weſt; but the Roman patriarch exalted himſelf, and uſurped a ſupremacy above them all. And as the riſing of the Roman empire was moſt oppoſed of Carthage in Africa, (æmula Romæ Carthago;) ſo the council of Carthage and the African biſhops did firſt forbid appeals to Rome, and oppoſed the ſupremacy of the pope. And doth not Daniel's image, whoſe head was of gold, and legs and feet of iron and clay, repreſent this ſpiritual monarchy as well as the temporal; whereas the firſt biſhops of Rome were golden prieſts, though they had but wooden chalices, and that the popes of later times have been for the moſt part worldly and earthly-minded? And as the northern nations firſt revolted from the Roman monarchy, and at laſt brake it in pieces; have not the north and north-weſt nations firſt fallen away from the papacy; and are they not like in the end to bring it to ruin?

A compariſon of the ſpiritual monarchy of the church with the temporal monarchies of the world.

The pope had no juriſdiction in England in the time of the Britains.

But to return to our purpoſe. The biſhop of Rome before the firſt Norman Conqueſt had no juriſdiction in the realm of England, neither in the time of the Britains, nor in the time of the Saxons. Eleutherius, the pope, within leſs than 200 years after Chriſt writes to Lucius, the Britiſh king, and calls him God's vicar within his kingdom: which title he would not have given to that king, if himſelf, under pretence of being God's vicar-general on earth, had claimed juriſdiction over all Chriſtian kingdoms.

Pelagius the monk of Bangor, about the year 400, being cited to Rome, refuſed to appear upon the pope's citation, affirming that Britain was neither within his dioceſe nor his province.

After that, about the year 600, Auguſtine the monk was ſent by Gregory the Great into England, to convert the Saxons to the Chriſtian religion. The Britiſh biſhops then remaining in Wales regarded not his commiſſion nor his doctrine, as not owing any duty, nor having any dependency on the court of Rome; but ſtill retained their ceremonies and traditions which they received from the eaſt church, upon the firſt plantation of the faith in that iſland, being divers and contrary to thoſe of the church of Rome, which Auguſtine did endeavour to impoſe upon them.

The like doth Beda write of the Iriſh prieſts and biſhops. For in the year 660, he reporteth, that a convocation of the clergy being called by king Oſwif, there roſe a diſputation between Colman, one of our Iriſh ſaints, then preſent in that ſynod, and Wilfrid a Saxon prieſt, touching the obſervation of Eaſter, wherein the Britiſh and Iriſh churches did then differ from the church of Rome. Colman, for the celebration of Eaſter uſed in Ireland, affirmed it was the ſame, quod beatus evangeliſta Johannes, diſcipulus ſpecialiter à Domino dilectus, in omnibus quibus præerat eccleſiis celebrâſſe legitur. On the other part Wilfrid alledged, that all the churches of Chriſtendom did then celebrate Eaſter after the Roman manner, except the churches of the Britains and Picts, qui contra totum orbem (ſaith he) ſtulto labore pugnant. Whereunto Colman replied, miror quare ſtultum laborem appellas, in quo tanti apoſtoli, qui ſuper pectus Domini recumbere dignus fuit, exempla ſectamur. Numquid reverendiſſimum patrem noſtrum Columbam & ejus ſucceſſores, viros à Deo dilectos, divinis paginis contraria ſapuiſſe aut egiſſe credendum eſt? In this diſputation or dialogue two things may be obſerved: firſt, that at this time the authority of the biſhop of Rome was of no eſtimation in theſe iſlands: next, that the primitive churches of Britany and Ireland were inſtituted according to the form and diſcipline of the eaſt churches, and not of the weſt, and planted by the diſciples of John, and not of Peter. Thus much for the time of the Britains. For the Saxons, though king Ina gave the Peter-pence to the pope, partly as alms, and partly in recompence of a houſe erected in Rome for entertainment of Engliſh pilgrims; yet it is certain, that Alfred and Athelſtane, Edgar and Edmund, Canutus and Edward the Confeſſor, and divers other kings of the Saxon race, did give all the biſhopricks in England per annulum & baculum, without any other ceremony, as the emperor and French king and other Chriſtian princes were wont to do. They made alſo ſeveral laws for the government of the church. Among others, St. Edward begins his laws with this proteſtation, that it is his princely charge, ut populum domini, & ſuper omnia ſanctam eccleſiam, regat & gubernet. And king Edgar, in his oration to his Engliſh clergy, ego (ſaith he) Conſtantini, vos Petri gladium habetis: jungamus dextras, & gladium gladio copulemus, ut ejiciantur extra caſtra leproſi, & purgetur ſanctuarium Domini. So as the kings of England with their own clergy did govern the church, and therein ſought no aid of the court of Rome. And the truth is, that though the pope had then long hands, yet he did not extend them ſo far as England; becauſe they were full of buſineſs nearer home in drawing the emperor and the French king under his yoke. But upon the conqueſt made by the Norman, he apprehended the firſt occaſion to uſurp upon the liberties of the crown of England. For the Conqueror came in with the pope's banner, and under it won the battle which got him the garland; and therefore the pope preſumed he might boldly pluck ſome flowers from it, being partly gained by his countenance and bleſſing. Hereupon he ſent two legates into England, which were admitted and received by the Conqueror. With them he called a ſynod of the clergy, and depoſed old Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, becauſe he had not purchaſed his pall in the court of Rome. He diſplaced many biſhops and abbots, to place his Normans in their rooms. And amongſt the reſt it is to be noted, that the king having earneſtly moved Wolſtan biſhop of Worceſter, being then very aged, to give up his ſtaff; his anſwer was, that he would give up his ſtaff only to him of whom he firſt received the ſame. And ſo the old man went to St. Edward's tomb, and there offered up his ſtaff and ring, with theſe words: Of thee, O holy Edward, I received my ſtaff and my ring, and to thee I do now ſurrender the ſame again. Which proves, that before the Norman Conqueſt the king did inveſt his biſhops per annulum & baculum, as I ſaid before.

The firſt uſurpation of the pope upon the crown began in the time of king William the Conqueror.

By ſending legates into England.

Thus we ſee, by the admiſſion of the pope's legates, the firſt ſtep or entry made into his uſurped juriſdiction in England. Albeit, the king ſtill retained the abſolute power of inveſting biſhops, and ſeemed only to uſe the advice and aſſiſtance of the legates in eccleſiaſtical matters; for that no decree paſſed or was put in execution without his royal aſſent thereunto. Beſides, how far forth he ſubmitted himſelf to the pope, it appeareth by a ſhort epiſtle he wrote to Gregory 7. in this form. Excellentiſſimo ſanctæ eccleſiæ paſtori, Gregorio, gratiâ Dei Anglorum rex & dux Normanorum Willielmus ſalutem cum amicitia. Hubertus legatus tuus, religioſe pater, ad me veniens ex tua parte, me admonuit, ut tibi & ſucceſſoribus tuis fidelitatem facerem, & de pecunia, quam anteceſſores mei ad Romanam eccleſiam mittere ſolebant, melius cogitarem. Unum admiſi, alterum non admiſi. Fidelitatem facere nolui, nec volo; quia nec ego promiſi, nec anteceſſores meos anteceſſoribus tuis id feciſſe comperio. Pecunia, tribus ferè annis, in Galliis me agente, negligenter collecta eſt. Nunc vero divinâ miſericordiâ me in regnum meum reverſo, quod collectum eſt per præfatum legatum mittetur; & quod reliquum eſt, per legatos Lanfranci archiepiſcopi fidelis noſtri, cum opportunum fuerit, tranſmittetur, &c.

In the time of Wil. Rufus the pope attempted to draw appeals to Rome, but prevailed not.

But in the time of his next ſucceſſor, king William Rufus, they attempted to paſs one degree farther, that is, to draw appeals to the court of Rome. For Anſelme being made archbiſhop of Canterbury, and being at ſome difference with the king, beſought his leave to go to Rome, under pretence of fetching his pall. The king, knowing he would appeal to the pope, denied him leave to go, and withal told him that none of his biſhops ought to be ſubject to the pope, but the pope himſelf ought to be ſubject to the emperor; and that the king of England had the ſame abſolute liberties in his dominions as the emperor had in the empire; and that it was an ancient cuſtom and law in England, uſed time out of mind before the Conqueſt, that none might appeal to the pope without the king's leave; and that he that breaketh this law or cuſtom doth violate the crown and dignity royal, and he that violates my crown (ſaith he) is mine enemy, and a traitor. How anſwer you this, quoth the king? Chriſt himſelf anſwers you, ſaith the archbiſhop, tu es Petrus, & ſuper hanc petram, &c. wherewith the king was nothing ſatisfied. And thereupon Anſelme departing out of the realm without licence, the king ſeized his temporalities, and became ſo exaſperate and implacable towards the biſhop, as he kept him in perpetual exile during his reign; albeit great interceſſion were made for his return, as well by the pope as the king of France.

In the time of king Hen. the firſt the pope uſurpeth the donation of biſhopricks, &c.

In the time of the next king, Hen. 1. though he were a learned and a prudent prince, yet they ſought to gain a farther point upon him, and to pluck a flower from his crown of greater value, namely, the patronage and donation of biſhopricks and all other benefices eccleſiaſtical. For Anſelme being revoked and re-eſtabliſhed in the ſee of Canterbury, the biſhopricks of Saliſbury and Hereford fell void, which the king beſtowed on two of his chaplains. But Anſelme their metropolitan did refuſe to conſecrate them, ſo as the archbiſhop of York was fain to perform that office, who with the chief of the Engliſh clergy ſtood with the king, and withſtood Anſelme. Hereupon the king requires him to do his homage; the biſhop denies it. The king demands of him whether the patronage and inveſtiture of all biſhopricks were not his rightful inheritance. The biſhop ſaid it was not his right; becauſe pope Urban had lately made a decree, that no lay perſon ſhould give any eccleſiaſtical benefice. This was the firſt queſtion, that ever was made, touching the king of England's right of patronage and donation of biſhopricks within his dominions. This new queſtion cauſed many meſſages and embaſſages to Rome. At laſt the king writes plainly to the pope, notum habeat ſanctitas veſtra, quod me vivente (Deo auxiliante) dignitates & uſus regni noſtri non minuentur; & ſi ego (quod abſit) in tanta me directione ponerem, magnates mei, imo totius Angliæ populus, id nullo modo pateretur. Beſides, William de Warrenaſt, the king's procurator in the court of Rome, told the pope, that the king would rather loſe his kingdom than he would loſe the donation of biſhopricks. The pope anſwered, Know you preciſely, ſir, I ſpeak it before God, that for the redemption of my head I would not ſuffer him to enjoy it.

After this Anſelme being received into the king's favour, in a ſynod of the Engliſh clergy holden at London in the year 1107, a decree was made, cui annuit rex Henricus, ſaith Matth. Paris, that from thenceforth, nunquam per donationem baculi paſtoralis vel annuli quiſquam de epiſcopatu vel abbathia per regem, vel quamlibet laicam manum, inveſtiretur in Angliæ. In recompence whereof the pope yielded this favour to the king, that thenceforth no legate ſhould be ſent from the pope's ſide into England, unleſs the king required it; and that the archbiſhop of Canterbury for the time being ſhould be for ever legatus natus; and Anſelme, for the honour of his ſee, obtained, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould in all general councils ſit at the pope's foot, tanquam alterius orbis papa. Notwithſtanding, as the ſucceeding popes kept not their promiſe touching the ſending of legates, ſo this ſelf-ſame king, after the death of Anſelme, broke the decree touching the inveſtiture of the biſhops. For he gave the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury to Rodolph biſhop of London, ſaith Matth. Paris, et illum per annulum & paſtoralem baculum inveſtivit; as before he had inveſted Willielmum Gifford in the biſhoprick of Wincheſter, contra novi concilii ſtatuta, as the ſame author reporteth.

In the time of king Stephen the pope gained appeals to the court of Rome.

The times of the next ſucceeding king Stephen were full of civil diſſentions, which made the land well-nigh waſte, ſo as St. Peter's ſucceſſor could not take any fiſh in ſuch troubled waters. Yet during this king's reign they won that point of juriſdiction, which they attempted to get, but failed thereof, in the time of king William Rufus; namely, that appeals might be made to the court of Rome. For in a ſynod at London ſummoned by Henry biſhop of Wincheſter, the pope's legate, it was decreed, that appeals ſhould be made from provincial councils to the pope. Before that time appellationes in uſu non erant, ſaith a monk of that time, donec Henricus Winton. Epiſcopus malo ſuo, dum legatus eſſet, crudeliter intruſit. Thus did the pope uſurp three main points of juriſdiction upon three ſeveral kings after the Conqueſt, (for of William Rufus he could win nothing) namely, upon the Conqueror, the ſending of legates or commiſſioners to hear and determine eccleſiaſtical cauſes; upon Hen. 1. the donation and inveſtitures of biſhopricks and other benefices; upon king Stephen, the appeals to the court of Rome.

In the time of king Hen. 2. the pope claimed exemption of clerks from the ſecular power.

A brief of Tho. Becket's troubles, or rather treaſons.

Now are we come to king Henry 2. in whoſe time they made a farther encroachment upon the crown, whereby they endeavoured to make him but half a king, and to take away half his ſubjects, by exempting all clerks from ſecular power. Hereupon roſe that long and great contention between Henry 2. and Thomas Becket, which on Becket's behalf may be rightly termed rebellion and treaſon; the juſt cauſe and ground whereof was the ſame that made the late difference between the pope and the Venetians. For a prieſt had committed a foul murder; and being thereof indicted and convicted, prayed the benefit of his clergy; which being allowed unto him, he was delivered to the biſhop of Saliſbury, being his ordinary, to make his purgation; which the murderer failing to do ſhould by the law have been degraded, and delivered back to the ſecular power. But the biſhop, contemning the law of the land, to enlarge the liberties of the church, ſent his priſoner to Thomas Becket then archbiſhop of Canterbury, who ſhifted him into an abbey, and ſo reſcued him from the capital puniſhment he had juſtly deſerved.

This gap of impunity being once opened, the clergy grew ſo outrageous, as the king was informed of a hundred murders committed by clerks, and yet not one of them executed for the ſame; for that the archbiſhop had protected them all after the ſame manner. For this the king was juſtly incenſed againſt the archbiſhop, who juſtified his doing herein. Whereupon a common council as well of the biſhops as of the nobility was called, wherein they did revive and re-eſtabliſh the ancient laws and cuſtoms of the kingdom for the government of the clergy, and ordering of cauſes eccleſiaſtical, whereof theſe were the principal heads or articles.

1. That no biſhop nor clerk ſhould depart the realm without the king's licence; and that ſuch as obtained licence ſhould give ſecurities, that they ſhould procure no hurt or damage to the king or realm during their abſence in foreign parts.

2. That all biſhopricks and abbeys being void ſhould remain in the king's hands as his own demeſnes, until he had choſen and appointed a prelate thereunto; and that every ſuch prelate ſhould do his homage to the king before he were admitted into the place.

3. That appeals ſhould be made in cauſes eccleſiaſtical in this manner; from the archdeacon to the ordinary, from the ordinary to the metropolitan, from the metropolitan to the king, and no farther.

4. That Peter-pence ſhould be paid no more to the pope, but to the king.

5. That if any clerk ſhould commit felony, he ſhould be hanged; if treaſon, he ſhould be drawn and quartered.

6. That it ſhould be adjudged high-treaſon to bring in bulls of excommunication, whereby the realm ſhould be curſed.

7. That no decree ſhould be brought from the pope to be executed in England, upon pain of impriſonment and confiſcation of goods.

To theſe and other conſtitutions of the like nature made at Claringdon, all the reſt of the biſhops and great men did ſubſcribe, and bound themſelves by oath to obſerve the ſame abſolutely. Only the archbiſhop would not ſubſcribe, and ſwear, but with a ſaving, ſalvo ſuo ordine & honore ſanctæ eccleſiæ. Yet at laſt he was content to make the like abſolute ſubſcription and oath as the reſt had done; but preſently he repented, and to ſhew his repentance ſuſpended himſelf from celebrating maſs, till he had received abſolution from the pope. Then he began to maintain and juſtify the exemption of clerks again; whereat the king's diſpleaſure was kindled anew; and then the archbiſhop once again promiſed abſolute obedience to the king's laws. (See the fickleneſs and mutability of your conſtant martyr.) The king, to bind faſt this ſlippery Proteus, called a parliament of the biſhops and barons; and ſending for the roll of thoſe laws, required all the biſhops to ſet their ſeals thereunto. They all aſſented but the archbiſhop, who proteſted he would not ſet his ſeal, nor give allowance to thoſe laws. The king, being highly offended with his rebellious demeanour, required the barons in parliament to give judgment of him, who being his ſubject would not be ruled by his laws; cito facite mihi juſtitiam de illo, qui homo meus ligeus eſt, & ſtare juri in curia mea recuſat. Whereupon the barons proceeding againſt him, and being ready to condemn him; I prohibit you (quoth the archbiſhop) in the name of Almighty God to proceed againſt me; for I have appealed to the pope: and ſo departed in contempt of that high court, omnibus clamantibus, ſaith Hoveden, quo progrederis proditor? exſpecta & audi judicium tuum. After this he lurked ſecretly near the ſea-ſhore; and changing his apparel and name (like a Jeſuit of theſe times,) he took ſhipping with a purpoſe to fly to Rome. But his paſſage being hindered by contrary winds, he was ſummoned to a parliament at Northampton, where he made default wilfully; for which contempt, his temporalities were ſeized, and his body being attached, he was charged with ſo great an account to the king, as that he was found in arrear thirty thouſand marks, and committed to priſon; whence he found means to eſcape ſhortly after, and to paſs out of the realm to Rome. He was no ſooner gone, but the king ſends writs to all the ſheriffs in England to attach the bodies of all ſuch as made any appeals to the court of Rome. Hereupon many meſſages and letters paſſing to and fro, all the ſuffragans of Canterbury join in a letter to the pope, wherein they condemn the fugitive archbiſhop, and juſtify the king's proceedings. Upon this the pope ſends two legates to the king, being then in Normandy, to mediate for the archbiſhop. They, with the mediation of the French king, prevailed ſo far with king Henry, as that he was pleaſed to accept his ſubmiſſion once again, and promiſed the king of France, that if he would be obedient to his laws, he ſhould enjoy as ample liberties as any archbiſhop of Canterbury ever had; and ſo ſent him into England with recommendation unto the young king his ſon, then lately crowned; who, hearing of his coming, commanded him to forbear to come to his preſence, until he had abſolved the archbiſhop of York and others, whom he had excommunicated for performing their duties at his coronation. The archbiſhop returned anſwer, that they had done him wrong in uſurping his office; yet if they would take a ſolemn oath to become obedient to the pope's commandment in all things concerning the church, he would abſolve them. The biſhops, underſtanding this, proteſted they would never take that oath, unleſs the king willed them ſo to do. King Henry the father, being hereof advertiſed into France, did riſe into great paſſion and choler, and in the hearing of his ſervants uttered words to this effect; Will no man revenge me of mine enemies? Whereupon the four gentlemen named in the ſtories of that time paſſed into England, and firſt moving the archbiſhop to abſolve the biſhops whom he had excommunicated for performing their duties at the young king's coronation, and receiving a peremptory anſwer of denial from the archbiſhop, they laid violent hands upon him, and ſlew him; for which the king was fain not only to ſuffer corporal penance, but in token of his humiliation to kiſs the knee of the pope's legate. And this is the abridgment of Becket's troubles, or rather treaſons, for which he was celebrated for ſo famous a martyr.—And thus you ſee by what degrees the court of Rome did within the ſpace of 100 and odd years uſurp upon the crown of England four points of juriſdiction, viz. Firſt, ſending out of legates into England. Secondly, drawing of appeals to the court of Rome. Thirdly, donation of biſhopricks and other eccleſiaſtical benefices. And fourthly, exemption of clerks from the ſecular power. And you ſee withal how our kings and parliaments have from time to time oppoſed and withſtood this unjuſt uſurpation.

Four points of juriſdiction uſurped upon the crown of England by the pope before the reign of king John.

Now then the biſhop of Rome having claimed and well nigh recovered full and ſole juriſdiction in all cauſes eccleſiaſtical, and over all perſons eccleſiaſtical, with power to diſpoſe of all eccleſiaſtical benefices in England, whereby he had upon the matter made an abſolute conqueſt of more than half the kingdom, (for every one that could read the pſalm of Miſerere was a clerk, and the clergy poſſeſſed the moiety of all temporal poſſeſſions) there remained now nothing to make him owner and proprietor of all, but to get a ſurrender of the crown, and to make the king his farmer, and the people his villains, which he fully accompliſhed and brought to paſs in the times of king John and of Henry 3.

The cauſe of the quarrel between king John and the pope.

The quarrel between the pope and king John, which wreſted the ſcepter out of his hand, and in the end brake his heart, began about the election of the archbiſhop of Canterbury. I call it election, and not donation or inveſtiture; for the manner of inveſting of biſhops by the ſtaff and ring after the time of king Hen. 1. was not any more uſed, but by the king's licenſe they were canonically elected, and being elected, the king gave his royal aſſent to their election, and by reſtitution of their temporalities did fully inveſt them. And though this courſe of election began to be in uſe in the time of Rich. 1. and Hen. 2. yet I find it not confirmed by any conſtitution or charter before the time of king John, who by his charter dated the 15th of January, in the ſixteenth year of his reign, granted this privilege to the church of England in theſe words, viz. Quod qualiſcunque conſuetudo temporibus prædeceſſorum noſtrorum hactenus in eccleſia Anglicana fuerit obſervata, & quicquid juris nobis hactenus vindicaverimus, de cætero in univerſis & ſingulis eccleſiis & monaſteriis, cathedralibus & conventualibus, totius regni Angliæ, liberæ ſint in perpetuum electiones quorumcumque prælatorum, majorum & minorum: ſalvâ nobis & hæredibus noſtris cuſtodiâ eccleſiarum & monaſteriorum vacantium quæ ad nos pertinent. Promittimus etiam, quod nec impediemus nec impediri permittemus per miniſtros noſtros, nec procurabimus, quin in univerſis & ſingulis monaſteriis & eccleſiis, poſtquam vacuerint prælaturæ, quemcumque voluerint libere ſibi præficiant electores paſ- torum, petitâ tamen à nobis priùs & hæredibus noſtris licentiâ eligendi, quam non denegabimus nec differemus. Et ſimiliter, poſt celebratam electionem, noſter requiratur aſſenſus, quem non denegabimus, niſi adverſus eandem rationale propoſuerimus, & legitimè probaverimus propter quod non debemus conſentire, &c.

But to return to the cauſe of his great quarrel with the pope. The ſee of Canterbury being void, the monks of Canterbury ſuddenly and ſecretly without the king's licenſe elected one Reignold their ſub-prior to be archbiſhop, who immediately poſted away to be confirmed by the pope. But when he came there, the pope rejected him, becauſe he came not recommended from the king. Hereupon the monks made ſuit to the king to nominate ſome fit perſon to whoſe election they might proceed. The king commends John Gray biſhop of Norwich, his principal counſellor, who was afterwards lord juſtice of this kingdom, who with a full conſent was elected by them, and afterwards admitted and fully inveſted by the king. Theſe two elections bred ſuch a controverſie as none might determine but the pope, who gave a ſhort rule in the caſe; for he pronounced both elections void, and cauſed ſome of the monks of Canterbury, who were then preſent in the court of Rome, to proceed to the election of Stephen Langton, lately made cardinal at the motion and ſuit of the French king: who being ſo elected was forthwith confirmed and conſecrated by the pope, and recommended to the king of England with a flattering letter, and a preſent of four rings ſet with precious ſtones, which were of great value and eſtimation in thoſe days. Howbeit, the king more eſteeming this jewel of the crown, namely, the patronage of biſhopricks, returned a round and kingly anſwer to the pope, that inconſiderately and raſhly he had caſſed and made void the election of the biſhop of Norwich, and had cauſed one Langton, a man to him unknown, and bred up and nouriſhed amongſt his mortal enemies, to be conſecrated archbiſhop, without any due form of election, and without his royal aſſent, which was moſt of all requiſite by the antient laws and cuſtoms of his realm. That he marvelled much, that the pope himſelf and the whole court of Rome did not conſider what a precious account they ought to make of the king of England's friendſhip, in regard that his one kingdom did yield them more profit and revenue than all the other countries on this ſide the Alps. To conclude, he would maintain the liberties of his crown to the death, he would reſtrain all his ſubjects from going to Rome. And ſince the archbiſhops, biſhops and other prelates within his dominions, were as learned and religious as any other in Chriſtendom, his ſubjects ſhould be judged by them in eccleſiaſtical matters, and ſhould not need to run out of their own country to beg juſtice at the hands of ſtrangers.

King John's round and kingly letter to the pope.

But what followed upon this? The pope, after a ſharp reply, ſendeth forth a bull of malediction againſt the king, and of interdiction againſt the realm, whereby all the churches in England were ſhut up, the prieſts and religious perſons were forbidden to uſe any liturgies or divine ſervice, to marry, to bury, or to perform any Chriſtian duty among the people. This put the king into ſuch a rage, that he on the other part ſeiſed the temporalities of all biſhops and abbots, and confiſcated the goods of all the clergy. Then doth the pope by a ſolemn ſentence at Rome depoſe the king, and by a bull ſent into England diſchargeth his ſubjects of their allegeance, and by a legate ſent to the king of France gave the kingdom of England to him and his ſucceſſours for ever.

The pope curſeth the king, and interdicteth the realm.

Theſe things brought ſuch confuſion and miſery to all eſtates and degrees of people in England, as the king became odious to all his ſubjects, as well to the laiety as to the clergy. For as the biſhops and religious people curſed him abroad; ſo the barons took arms againſt him at home, till with much bloodſhed they forced him, by granting the great charter, to reſtore king Edward's laws, containing the ancient liberties of the ſubjects of England. The pope being a ſpectator of this tragedy, and ſeeing the king in ſo weak and deſperate eſtate, ſent a legate to comfort him, and to make a reaſonable motion unto him; to wit, that he ſhould ſurrender and give up his crown and kingdom to the pope, which ſhould be regranted unto him again to hold in fee-farm and vaſſalage of the church of Rome: and that thereupon the pope would bleſs him and his realm again, and curſe his rebells and enemies in ſuch ſort, as he ſhould be better eſtabliſhed in his kingdom then he was before. In a word, this motion was preſently embraced by that miſerable king, ſo as with his own hands he gave up the crown to the pope's legate, and by an inſtrument or charter ſealed with a bull or ſeal of gold he granted to God and the church of Rome, the apoſtles Peter and Paul, and to pope Innocent the third and his ſucceſſors, the whole kingdom of England, and the whole kingdom of Ireland; and took back an eſtate thereof by an inſtrument ſealed with lead, yielding yearly to the church of Rome over and above the Peter-pence a thouſand marks ſterling, viz. ſeven hundred marks for England, and three hundred marks for Ireland, with a flattering ſaving of all his liberties and royalties. The pope had no ſooner gotten this conveyance, though it were void in law, but he excommunicateth the barons, and repeals the great charter, affirming that it contained liberties too great for his ſubjects; calls the king his vaſſal, and theſe kingdoms St. Peter's patrimony; grants a general bull of proviſion for the beſtowing of all eccleſiaſtical benefices, and takes upon him to be abſolute and immediate lord of all. And thus, under colour of exerciſing juriſdiction within theſe kingdoms, the pope, by degrees, got the very kingdoms themſelves. And ſo would he do at this day, if the king would give way to his juriſdiction.

But what uſe did the pope make of this grant and ſurrender of the crown unto him? What did he gain by it, if our kings retained the profits of their kingdoms to their own uſe? Indeed we do not find, that the fee-farm of a thouſand marks was ever paid, but that it is all run in arrear till this preſent day. For the truth is, the court of Rome did ſcorn to accept ſo poor a revenue as a thouſand marks per annum out of two kingdoms. But after the death of king John, during all the reign of Hen. 3. his ſon, the pope did not claim a ſeigniory or a rent out of England and Ireland, but did endeavour to convert all the profits of both lands to his own uſe, as if he had been ſeized of all in demeſne. For whoſoever will read Matt. Paris his ſtory of the time of king Hen. 3. will ſay theſe things ſpoken of before were but the beginnings of evils. For the exactions and oppreſſions of the court of Rome were ſo continual and intolerable, as that poor monk, who lived in thoſe times, though otherwiſe he adored the pope, doth call England Balaam's aſs loaden, beaten, and enforced to ſpeak; doth call the court of Rome Charybdis and Barathrum avaritiæ, the pope's collectors harpys, and the pope himſelf a ſtepfather, and the church of Rome a ſtepmother. He ſheweth, that two third parts of the land being then in the hands of church-men, the entire profits thereof were exported to enrich the pope and the court of Rome: which was done for the moſt part by theſe two ways and means. Firſt, by conferring the beſt eccleſiaſtical benefices upon Italians, and other ſtrangers reſident in that court, whoſe farmers and factors in England took the profits, turned them into money, and returned the money to Rome. Secondly, by impoſing continual taxes and tallages, (worſe then Iriſh cuttings) being ſometimes the tenth, ſometimes the fifteenth, ſometimes the third, ſometimes the moiety of all the goods both of the clergy and laiety, under colour of maintaining the pope's holy wars againſt the emperor and the Greek church, who were then ſaid to be in rebellion againſt their lady and miſtreſs the church of Rome. Beſides, for the ſpeedy levying and ſafe return of theſe moneys, the pope had his Lombards and other Italian bankers and uſurers reſident in London and other parts of the realm, who offered to lend and diſburſe the moneys taxed, and return the ſame by exchange to Rome, taking ſuch penal bonds, the form whereof is ſet down by Matt. Paris, and ſuch exceſſive uſury, as the poor religious houſes were fain to ſell their chalices and copes, and the reſt of the clergy and laiety had their backs bowed and their eſtates broken under the burthen. Beſides, the pope took for perquiſites and caſualties the goods of all clerks that died inteſtate, the goods of all uſurers, and all goods given to charitable uſes. Moreover he had a ſwarm of friars, (the firſt corrupters of religion in England) who perſwaded the nobility and gentry to put on the ſign of the croſs, and to vow themſelves to the holy wars; which they had no ſooner done, but they were again perſwaded to receive diſpenſations of their vows, and to give money for the ſame to the church of Rome. I omit divers other policies then uſed by the pope's collectors to exhauſt the wealth of the realm, which they affirmed they might take with as good a conſcience as the Hebrews took the jewels of the Egyptians. Briefly, whereas the king had ſcarce means to maintain his royal family, they received out of England ſeventy thouſand pounds ſterling at leaſt yearly, which amounteth to two hundred and ten thouſand pounds ſterling of the monies current at this day. Beſides, they exported ſix thouſand marks out of Ireland at one time, which the emperor Frederick intercepted. Laſtly, the king himſelf was ſo much dejected, as at a royal feaſt he placed the pope's legate in his own chair of eſtate, himſelf ſitting on his right hand, and the biſhop of York on his left, non ſine multorum obliquantibus oculis, ſaith Matt. Paris.

Thus we ſee the effect of the pope's pretended juriſdiction within the dominions of the king of England. We ſee to what calamity and ſervitude it then reduced both the prince and people. Was it not therefore high time to meet and oppoſe thoſe inconveniences? Aſſuredly if king Edward 1. who was the ſon and heir of Hen. 3. had inherited the weakneſs of his father, and had not reſiſted this uſurpation and inſolency of the court of Rome, the pope had been proprietor of both theſe iſlands, and there had been no king of England at this day.

But king Edward 1. may well be ſtiled vindex Anglicæ libertatis, the Moſes that delivered his people from ſlavery and oppreſſion: and as he was a brave and victorious prince, ſo was he the beſt pater patriæ that ever reigned in England ſince the Norman Conqueſt, till the coronation of our gracious ſovereign. At the time of the death of his father he was abſent in the war of the holy land, being a principal commander of the Chriſtian army there, ſo as he returned not before the ſecond year of his reign. But he was no ſooner returned and crowned, but the firſt work he did was to ſhake off the yoke of the biſhop of Rome. For the pope having then ſummoned a general council, before he would licenſe his biſhops to repair to it, he took of them a ſolemn oath, that they ſhould not receive the pope's bleſſing. Again, the pope forbids the king to war againſt Scotland; the king regards not his prohibition: he demands the firſt-fruits of eccleſiaſtical livings; the king forbids the payment thereof unto him. The pope ſendeth forth a general bull prohibiting the clergy to pay ſubſidies or tributes to temporal princes: a tenth was granted to the king in parliament, the clergy refuſed to pay it: the king ſeizeth their temporalties for their contempt, and got payment notwithſtanding the pope's bull. After this he made the ſtatute of Mortmain, whereby he brake the pope's chief net, which within an age or two more would have drawn to the church all the temporal poſſeſſions of the kingdom, &c. Again, one of the king's ſubjects brought a bull of excommunication againſt another: the king commandeth he ſhould be executed as a traitor, according to the ancient law. But becauſe that law had not of long time been put in execution, the chancellor and treaſurer kneeled before the king, and obtained grace for him, ſo as he was onely baniſhed out of the realm. And as he judged it treaſon to bring in bulls of excommunication; ſo he held it a high contempt againſt the crown to bring in bulls of proviſion or briefs of citation; and accordingly the law was ſo declared in parliament 25 Ed. 1. which was the firſt ſtatute made againſt proviſors: the execution of which law, during the life of king Ed. 1. did wellnigh aboliſh the uſurped juriſdiction of the court of Rome, and did revive and reſtore again the ancient and abſolute ſovereignty of the king and crown of England.

King Ed. 1. oppoſeth the pope's uſurpation.

His ſucceſſor, king Edward 2. being but a weak prince, the pope attempted to uſurp upon him again: but the peers and people withſtood his uſurpation. And when that unhappy king was to be depoſed, amongſt many articles framed againſt him him by his enemies, this was one of the moſt hainous, that he had given allowance to the pope's bulls.

E. 2. ſuffereth the pope to uſurp again.

E. 3. reſiſteth the uſurpation of the pope.

King Rich. 2.

Again, during the minority of king Ed. 3. and after that in the heat of the wars in France, the pope ſent many briefs and bulls into England; and at laſt preſumed ſo far, as that he gave an Italian the title of a cardinal in England, and withal by his bull gave him power to beſtow all eccleſiaſtical promotions as they ſhould fall void from time to time. This moved the king and the nobility to write to the pope to this effect. 'We and our anceſtors 'have richly endowed the church of England, and have founded abbeys 'and other religious houſes for the juriſdiction of our people, for maintenance of hoſpitality, and for the advancement of our countrymen and 'kinſmen. Now you provide and place ſtrangers in our benefices, that 'come not to keep reſidence thereupon; and if they come, underſtand 'not our language; and ſome of them are ſubjects to our mortal enemies; 'by reaſon whereof our people are not inſtructed, hoſpitality is not kept, 'our ſcholars are unpreferred, and the treaſure of the realm is exported.' The pope returneth anſwer, that the emperor had lately ſubmitted himſelf to the church of Rome in all points, and was become the pope's great friend; and in menacing manner adviſed the king of England to do the like. The king replies, that if the emperor and French king both ſhould take his part, he was ready to give battle to both in defence of the liberties of his crown. Hereupon the ſeveral ſtatutes againſt proviſors before recited were put in execution ſo ſeverely, as the king and his ſubjects enjoyed their right of patronage clearly: and their exemption of clerks took no place at all; for that the abbot of Waltham and biſhop of Wincheſter were both attainted of high contempts, and the biſhop of Ely of a capital offence, as appeareth in the records of this king's reign. Yet during the nonage of Rich. 2. they began once again to encroach upon the crown, by ſending legates and bulls and briefs into England, whereof the people were ſo ſenſible and impatient, as that at their ſpecial prayer, this law of 16 Rich. 2. (whereupon our indictment is framed) was enacted, being more ſharp and penal than all the former ſtatutes againſt proviſors. And yet againſt this king, as againſt Ed. 2. it was objected at the time of his deprivation, that he had allowed the pope's bulls, to the enthralling of the crown.

After this in the weak time of king Hen. 6. they made one attempt more to revive their uſurped juriſdiction by this policy. The commons had denied the king a ſubſidy when he ſtood in great want of moneys. The archbiſhop of Canterbury and the reſt of the biſhops offered the king a large ſupply of his wants, if he would conſent that all the laws againſt proviſors, and eſpecially this law of 16 Rich. 2. might be repealed. But Humphry duke of Glouceſter, who had lately before caſt the pope's bull into the fire, did likewiſe cauſe this motion to be rejected. So as by ſpecial providence theſe laws have ſtood in force even till this day in both theſe kingdoms.

The evidence againſt Lalor.

Then the attorney-general deſcended to the evidence, whereby he proved fully all the parts of the indictment. Firſt, it was proved by Lalor's own confeſſion, upon ſeveral examinations taken before the lord-deputy and lord-chancellor, and others, that he had accepted the office and title of vicar-general in the dioceſes of Dublin, Kildare and Fernes, by virtue of the pope's bull. Secondly, it appeared by the copies of ſundry letters found among his papers at his apprehenſion, that he ſtiled himſelf the pope's vicar, in this form, Robertus Dublinien. & Kiſdaren. & Fernen. diœces. vicarius apoſtolicus. Thirdly, there were produced the copies of divers acts and inſtruments, written for the moſt part with Lalor's own hand, ſome of inſtitutions of popiſh prieſts to benefices, others of diſpenſations with marriage within the degrees, others of divorces, others of diſpenſations for non-payment of tithes. Whereby it was manifeſtly proved that he did execute the pope's bull, in uſurping and exerciſing epiſcopal juriſdiction, as vicar-general of the ſee apoſtolick, within the dioceſes before named.

To this evidence he made a three-fold anſwer. Firſt, that he was no ſuiter for the office of vicar-general, but it was impoſed on him, and he accepted virtute obedientiæ, only to obey his ſuperiors. Next, that he did exerciſe the office of vicar-general in foro conſcientiæ tantùm, and not in foro judicii. And laſtly, that thoſe copies of inſtitutions, diſpenſations and divorces, were many of them written with his man's hand, as precedents of ſuch acts and inſtruments, without his privity or direction. Hereupon ſir James Ley, chief juſtice, told him, that he could not well ſay, that he accepted that unlawful office virtute obedientiæ, for there was no virtue in that obedience; that he owed an obedience to the law and to the king, who is the true ſuperior and ſovereign over all his ſubjects, and hath no peer within his dominions; and that the ſuperiors whom he meant and intended were but uſurpers upon the king's juriſdiction, and therefore this excuſe did aggravate his contempt, in that it appeared he had vowed obedience to thoſe who were apparent enemies to the king and his crown. And though it were manifeſt that he exerciſed juriſdiction in foro judicii, (for every inſtitution is a judgment, and ſo is every ſentence of divorce) yet were his offence nothing diminiſhed if he had executed his office of vicar-general in foro conſcientiæ tantùm; for the court of man's conſcience is the higheſt tribunal, and wherein the power of the keys is exerciſed in the higheſt degree.

Lalor's confeſſion publickly read.

Hereunto the attorney-general took occaſion to add thus much, that Lalor had committed theſe high offences, not only againſt the law, but againſt his own conſcience, and that he was already condemned in foro conſcientiæ. For that he upon his ſecond examination had voluntarily acknowledged himſelf not to be a lawful vicar-general, and that he thought in his conſcience he could not lawfully take upon him the ſaid office. He hath alſo acknowledged our ſovereign lord king James to be his lawful, chief and ſupreme governor, in all cauſes, as well eccleſiaſtical as civil; and that he is in conſcience bound to obey him in all the ſaid cauſes, &c. as it is contained in his acknowledgment or confeſſion before ſet down; which being ſhewed forth by the attorney-general, the court cauſed it to be publickly read; and thereupon demanded of Lalor, if that were not his free and voluntary confeſſion ſigned with his own hand, and confirmed by his oath before the lord-deputy and council. He was not a little abaſhed at the publiſhing of this acknowledgment and confeſſion in the hearing of ſo many principal gentlemen, to whom he had preached a contrary doctrine; therefore, ſaid he, the ſhewing forth of this confeſſion is altogether impertinent and beſides the matter. Howſoever, he could not deny but that he made it, and ſigned it, and ſwore it, as it was teſtified by the lord-deputy and the reſt.

Then was it demanded of him, whether ſince the making of this confeſſion he had not proteſted to divers of his friends, that he had not acknowledged the king's ſupremacy in eccleſiaſtical cauſes. His anſwer was, that indeed he had ſaid to ſome of his friends who viſited him in the Caſtle of Dublin, that he had not confeſſed or acknowledged that the king was his ſupreme governor in ſpiritual cauſes, for that the truth is, in the confeſſion there is no mention made of ſpiritual cauſes, but of eccleſiaſtical.

This is a ſubtile evaſion indeed, ſaid the attorney-general; I pray you what difference do you make between eccleſiaſtical cauſes and ſpiritual cauſes? This queſtion, ſaid Lalor, is ſudden and unexpected at this time, and therefore you ſhall do well to take another day to diſpute this point. Nay, ſaid the attorney-general, we can never ſpeak of it in a better time or fitter place; and therefore, though you, that bear ſo reverend a title, and hold the reputation of ſo great a clerk, require a farther time, yet ſhall you hear that we laymen that ſerve his majeſty, and by the duty of our places are to maintain the juriſdiction of the crown, are never ſo unprovided, but that we can ſay ſomewhat touching the nature and difference of theſe cauſes.

When the diſtinction of eccleſiaſtical and ſpiritual cauſes from civil and temporal cauſes began in the world.

Firſt then, let us ſee when this diſtinction of eccleſiaſtical or ſpiritual cauſes from civil and temporal cauſes did firſt begin in point of juriſdiction. Aſſuredly, for the ſpace of three hundred years after Chriſt, this diſtinction was not known or heard of in the Chriſtian world. For the cauſes of teſtaments, of matrimony, of baſtardy and adultery, and the reſt which are called eccleſiaſtical or ſpiritual cauſes, were merely civil, and determined by the rules of the civil law, and ſubject only to the juriſdiction of the civil magiſtrate, as all civilians will teſtifie with me.

But after that the emperors had received the Chriſtian faith, out of a zeal and deſire they had to grace and honour the learned and godly biſhops of that time, they were pleaſed to ſingle out certain ſpecial cauſes wherein they granted juriſdiction unto the biſhops; namely, in cauſes of tithes, becauſe they were paid to men of the church; in cauſes of matrimony, becauſe marriages were for the moſt part ſolemnized in the church; in cauſes teſtamentary, becauſe teſtaments were many times made in extremis, when church-men were preſent, giving ſpiritual comfort to the teſtator, and therefore they were thought the fitteſt perſons to take the probates of ſuch teſtaments. Howbeit theſe biſhops did not proceed in theſe cauſes according to the canons and decrees of the church, (for the canon law was not then hatched or dreamed of) but according to the rules of the imperial law, as the civil magiſtrate did proceed in other cauſes; neither did the emperors, in giving this juriſdiction unto them, give away their own ſupreme and abſolute power, to correct and puniſh theſe judges as well as others, if they performed not their ſeveral duties. This then is moſt certain, that the primitive juriſdiction in all theſe cauſes was in the civil magiſtrate, and ſo in right it remains at this day; and though it be derived from him, it remaineth in him as in the fountain. For every Chriſtian monarch (as well as the godly kings of Juda) is cuſtos utriuſque tabulæ; and conſequently hath power to puniſh not only treaſon, murder, theft, and all manner of force and fraud, but inceſt, adultery, uſury, perjury, ſimony, ſorcery, idolatry, blaſphemy. Neither are theſe cauſes in reſpect of their own quality and nature to be diſtinguiſhed one from another by the names of ſpiritual or temporal: for why is adultery a ſpiritual cauſe, rather than murder, when they are both offences alike againſt the ſecond table; or idolatry rather than perjury, being both offences likewiſe againſt the firſt table? And indeed if we conſider the natures of theſe cauſes, it will ſeem ſomewhat abſurd, that they are diſtinguiſhed by the name of ſpiritual and temporal; for, to ſpeak properly, that which is oppoſed to ſpiritual ſhould be termed carnal; and that which is oppoſed to temporal ſhould be called eternal. And therefore if things were called by their proper names, adultery ſhould not be called a ſpiritual offence, but a carnal. But ſhall I expreſs plainly and briefly why theſe cauſes were firſt denominated, ſome ſpiritual or eccleſiaſtical, and others temporal and civil?

Truly, they were ſo called, not from the nature of the cauſes, as I ſaid before, but from the quality of the perſons whom the prince had made judges in thoſe cauſes. The clergy did ſtudy ſpiritual things, and did profeſs to live ſecundùm ſpiritum, and were called ſpiritual men; and therefore they called the cauſes wherein princes had given them juriſdiction ſpiritual cauſes, after their own name and quality. But becauſe the lay-magiſtrates were ſaid to intend the things of this world, which are temporal and tranſitory, the clergy called them ſecular or temporal men, and the cauſes wherein they were judges temporal cauſes. This diſtinction began firſt in the court of Rome, where the clergy having by this juriſdiction gotten great wealth, their wealth begot pride, their pride begot ingratitude towards princes, who firſt gave them their juriſdiction; and then, according to the nature of all ungrateful perſons, they went about to extinguiſh the memory of the benefit. For whereas their juriſdiction was firſt derived from Cæſar, in the execution whereof they were Cæſar's judges, ſo as both their courts and cauſes ought ſtill to have born Cæſar's image and ſuperſcription, as belonging unto Cæſar; they blotted Cæſar's name out of the ſtile of their courts, and called them courts Chriſtian, as if the courts holden by other magiſtrates had been in compariſon but courts of Ethnicks; and the cauſes which in their nature were merely civil, they called ſpiritual and eccleſiaſtical. So as if the emperor ſhould challenge his courts and cauſes again, and ſay, reddite Cæſari quæ ſunt Cæſaris, they would all cry out on the contrary part and ſay, date Deo quæ ſunt Dei; our courts bear the name and title of Chriſt, the ſuperſcription of Cæſar is quite worn out, and not to be found upon them. And this point of their policy is worth the obſerving, that when they found their juriſdiction in matrimonial cauſes to be the moſt ſweet and gainful of all other, (for of matrimony they made matter of money indeed) to the end that Cæſar might never reſume ſo rich a perquiſite of their ſpiritual juriſdiction, they reduced matrimony into the number of the ſeven ſacraments: after which time it had been ſacrilege, if the civil magiſtrate had intermeddled with the leaſt matter that had relation to matrimony, or any dependency thereupon. So then it appeareth, that all cauſes, whereof eccleſiaſtical or ſpiritual perſons have cognizance or juriſdiction by the grants or permiſſion of princes, are called eccleſiaſtical or ſpiritual cauſes. And as all their courts are called ſpiritual courts, ſo all cauſes determinable in thoſe courts are called ſpiritual cauſes. And therefore where M. Lalor hath acknowledged the king's majeſty to be ſupreme governor in all eccleſiaſtical cauſes, he hath therein acknowledged the king's ſupremacy in all ſpiritual cauſes; wherein he hath but rendered to Cæſar that which is Cæſar's, and hath given unto his majeſty no more than all the biſhops of England have yielded to his predeceſſors, not only in this latter age, but alſo in former times both before and ſince the Conqueſt, as hath been before at large expreſſed.

Here the day being far ſpent, the court demanded of the priſoner if he had any more to ſay for himſelf. His anſwer was, that he did willingly renounce his office of vicar-general, and did humbly crave his majeſty's grace and pardon. And to that end, he deſired the court to move the lord-deputy to be favourable unto him. Then the jury departed from the bar, and returning within half an hour, found the priſoner guilty of the contempts whereof he was indicted. Whereupon the ſolicitor-general moved the court to proceed to judgement. And ſir Dominick Sarsfield, knight, one of the juſtices of his majeſty's chief place, gave judgment according to the form of the ſtatute whereupon the indictment was framed.

[The encroachments of the church of Rome, on the king's eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, are the ſubject of other caſes beſides the preceding one of præmunire. In particular they are hiſtorically diſcuſſed in lord Coke*'s* Caſe of the King's Eccleſiaſtical Law, in the 5th Report. The publication of this latter caſe, with the active zeal of lord Coke as attorney-general, in the proſecution of the conſpirators in the gunpowder-plot, gave occaſion to a volume of animadverſions by the famous Jeſuit father Parſons, which was publiſhed in 1606, by the title of An Anſwer to Lord Coke's 5th Report, by a Catholick divine. But the aſperity with which lord Coke was treated, did not provoke a reply. All that it drew from him was a ſhort notice of the work in the preface to his 6th Report, in which he repreſents the author as a calumniator, and as ſuch diſdained to anſwer him. But the controverſy was afterwards continued by Mr. Prynne, who aſſerted the cauſe of the crown againſt the ſee of Rome, in a work of prodigious extent in the plan; for though the part publiſhed conſiſts of three large volumes, of more than 1000 pages each, yet it reaches only to the end of the reign of Edward the firſt. The work we allude to, is Mr. Prynne*'s* Chronological Vindication of the King's ſupreme Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, the publication of which commenced four or five years after the Reſtoration. The firſt volume extends to the Conqueſt. The ſecond, which was publiſhed firſt, concludes with the reign of Henry the third. The third, being in part a ſupplement to the ſecond, is occupied with the reigns of Henry the third, John, and our firſt Edward. When the author had advanced thus far, death interpoſed, and prevented the completion of the undertaking. What he lived to publiſh is become ſo extremely ſcarce, that twenty guineas are the common price of a compleat copy. The cauſe is the ſmall remnant of copies of the firſt volume, moſt of them having been burnt in the great fire of London.—Such as are curious to ſee an account of the Jeſuit Parſons, may conſult Camden's Annals of Elizabeth. See the tranſlated edition in 2. XVI. The Caſe of the Poſtnati, or of the Union of the Realm of Scotland with England; Trin. 6 James I.

[From the meeting of the crowns of England and Scotland in the perſon of the firſt James, grew one of the moſt important queſtions of State, which ever engaged the attention of either country. It was, whether the poſtnati, or thoſe born in Scotland after the acceſſion of James to the crown of England, were in the latter country to be deemed aliens or natives. As to the ante-nati, all ſeem to have agreed, that they remained aliens. But there was a great difference of opinion about the condition of the poſtnati. The king, anxious for every thing which tended to conſolidate the iſland into one kingdom, was eager to have it declared as law, that the union of the crowns effected a mutual naturalization of the poſtnati in the two countries. His wiſhes were ſoon made known by the proclamation, in which he aſſumed the ſtile of king of Great Britain, with an exception however in favor of legal proceſs inſtruments and aſſurances; and words were introduced, importing, that his ſucceſſion to the crown of England had made a great change in the law of naturalization. Rym. Fœd. v. 16. p. 603. 2. Bac. laſt 4to. ed. 144. The commiſſioners, appointed by the reſpective parliaments of the two countries to treat for an union of government and laws, followed the king in this language; for they reſolved to propound to both parliaments a declaration of the law to that effect. But when the propoſition was made, the Engliſh houſe of commons were found averſe to it, notwithſtanding the countenance given by the lords, and an opinion delivered to them by ten out of eleven judges. It was therefore determined to ſettle the point out of parliament in the regular way, by reſorting to the Engliſh courts of juſtice. For this purpoſe, two ſuits were inſtituted in the name of Robert Calvin, a poſtnatus of Scotland and an infant; one in the King's Bench for the freehold of ſome land; and the other in Chancery for detainer of writings concerning the title to the freehold of the ſame eſtate: and in both it was pleaded by the defendants in abatement, that the plaintiff was an alien born in Scotland at a time which by the pleading appeared to be ſince the king's acceſſion to the crown of England. A demurrer to this plea neceſſarily brought forward the intended queſtion about the poſtnati; for if Calvin was an alien, he could not maintain either ſuit, aliens being incapable to ſue for the freehold of land. Theſe cauſes were adjourned into the Exchequer-Chamber, in order to have the ſolemn opinion of all the judges; and there the buſineſs ended with a reſolution in favour of the poſtnati, in which the lord-chancellor and twelve judges out of fourteen concurred. However, very eminent lawyers appear to have entertained a different opinion of the point. In parliament, Dodridge, Hyde, Brock, Crew, Moore, and Hedley, all ſpoke againſt the poſtnati. What the names of the two diſſenting judges were, is not mentioned; except that lord Elleſmere alludes to both having the chriſtian name of Thomas, the only judges of which name at the time were lord chief juſtice Fleming, Mr. juſtice Walmeſley, and Mr. juſtice Foſter. It is ſuſpected too, that the known inclinations and wiſhes of the king had no little influence in the deciſion. But be this as it may, we are not apprized that the main point of the caſe has been ever diſturbed by any ſubſequent judicial opinion.

The only regular report we have of this caſe is by lord Coke. But there is a great deal of matter relative to it in other books. Lord-chancellor Elleſmere publiſhed his argument ſeparately. Mr. ſerjeant Moore *gives the hiſtory of the previous paſſages in parliament on the great point of law, for deciding which the caſe was afterwards made. Caſe of the Union of the realm of Scotland with England, from Moore's Reports, page 790.

1603. BY act of parliament in the firſt ſeſſion anno primo Jacobi regis, certain commiſſioners of England were appointed to meet with commiſſioners of Scotland, and to treat for the weale of both kingdoms, and to put their doings in ſchedules tripartite, to be delivered, one to the king, the other to the parliament of England, and the third to the parliament of Scotland. The commiſſioners of both nations met in the painted chamber at Weſtminſter, anno 2 Jac. regis, and treated long, and in the end made ſchedules, and delivered them according to the act. The ſchedule for the parliament of England was preſented by the lord Elleſmere lord chancellor of England, to whom the commiſſioners had delivered the ſame for that purpoſe, himſelf being one of the commiſſioners, the firſt day of the ſeſſion of parliament holden anno 3 Jac. R. the king himſelf, the lords ſpiritual and temporal and the commons being all aſſembled in the upper houſe of parliament. But the conſideration of that ſchedule was by another act made in that ſeſſions of an' 3 Jac. R. deferred untill the then next ſeſſion.

The next ſeſſion being this inſtant of an' 4 Jacobi regis, the ſchedule was conſidered of devidedly by the lords and commons: the material parts conſiſting upon 3 heads. The firſt the commiſſioners did propoſe, that all hoſtile lawes of either nation one againſt the other might be abrogated, and did enumerate the ſame lawes. The ſecond, they propoſed a courſe for commerce and merchandizing by merchants of both nations between themſelves and with forreiners. Thirdly, they propoſed that the common law of both nations ſhould be declared to be, that all born in either nation ſithence his majeſty was king of both, were mutually naturalized in both. And further, that an act might be made to naturalize all born before, with certain cautions and reſtrictions for bearing principall offices of the crown, offices of judicature, or having voice in parliament, and with a ſaving of the kings prerogative.

Upon the two firſt articles, the lords and commons had ſundry conferences in the painted chamber, and in effect agreed to give way to the ſubſtance of them. But upon the third, the commons could not aſſent to declare the law as was propoſed, and thereupon after long debate amongſt themſelves, they appointed committees to confer with the lords committees, who mett the 25 of February 1606, in the painted chamber. At which conference ſir Francis Bacon appointed by the houſe to introduce the reſt begun in this manner.

Bacon. That this conference and the ſubject thereof was non in deliberativo, but in judiciali, not de bono but de vero, not to conſult of a law to be made, but to declare the law already planted, whereto the commons were drawn, by inſatisfaction of their judgments, not indiſpoſition of their minds to the happy union intended, to oppoſe the propoſition of the commiſſioners. And whereas his majeſty had by a proclamation expreſſed the law to be as the commiſſioners had propoſed, the commons did not take themſelves prejudicated by the proclamation; firſt, for that that matter came but obiter in the proclamation, and was not the principal part or purpoſe thereof; then, for that the proclamation mentioneth the king to be ſo informed by divers ſages of the law, which is not to be underſtood judges of the law, but ſome learned in the lawes, whoſe opinion may the better be oppoſed: yet the proclamation hath ſo tempered the tongues of the ſpeakers, as it hath kept down all flaſhes of heat, which otherwiſe might have happened in the argument. Howbeit the danger of a declaratory ſtatute, being like Janus Bifrons ſtriking both wayes, raiſeth in the commons too much fear to aſſent to the propoſition, leaving the proclamation neverthe leſſe to its own effect. Pur inducement pur les auters ſpeakers apres ceſt induccion, he ſhewed that it was a ſingular commendation to the lawes of England, that it was not inſociable, but contented to hear and be adviſed by other ſciences in matters of dependencie upon them; as in caſes of expoſition of words, by grammarians; in matters of matrimony, deprivation, baſtardy, by civilians; in minerals, by natural philoſophers; in uſes, by moral philoſophers. Upon which conſideration the commons had ſelected out of themſelves divers gentlemen, ſome for inducement, ſome for argument in the point of law. Thoſe for inducement were to ſhew the law of nations, and of reaſon, and the ſtories of other countries and the civil law elſewhere put in uſe upon unions; thoſe for argument were gentlemen of the profeſſion of the common laws of this realm: all which being here ready, he left them to diſcharge their own proper duties.

Sir Edwyn Sandes. Sir Edwyn Sandes ſhewed that this caſe was proper to be conſulted with the law of nations, which is called jus gentium; for there being no preſident for it in the law, lex deficit, and deficiente lege recurritur ad conſuetudinem, and deficiente conſuetudine recurritur ad rationem naturalem, which ratio naturalis is the law of nations called jus gentium. The queſtion of difference is thus, whether ſubjection to one king make all the people born within the places of that ſubjection to be naturalized over all places of that kings ſubjection, which as he thought if it were to be meaſured by the law of reaſon and nations did not. And therefore ſhewed 7 reaſons for his opinion.

1 That although ab antiquo, when people were together in one heap irregularly, having one head, their ſubjection gave to every one equal priviledge in all places of their ſubjection, yet ſithence the world is grown to diſtribution of people into places, and to diſcipline in their government, though their ſubjection ſtill remain in the general to one head; yet the manner of it is locally circumſcribed to the places where they are brought forth, and thoſe of one place do not, nor ſhould partake of the diſcipline, priviledges, and birthright of the other places, but every one left to his own, as acquired for patrimony by their anteceſſors of that place, upon reaſons peradventure now not extant nor to be exactly underſtood.

2. This is in uſe in other nations, who obtain their naturalization by charters, and for ſuch time, and with ſuch cautions, as may be granted unto them, and take it not by the general law of that nation whereto they were united.

3. In the time of the old civil Romans, who united unto them divers provinces, they had degrees in naturalizing; for firſt, the party had jus domicilii, then jus civitatis, next jus tribus, and laſtly jus honoris; whereas if the law of England ſhould be, that ſubjection brought all this together, it were a law overliberal, and more bountiful, then the laws of this civil ſtate grounded upon reaſon and policy.

4. That Scotland being governed by the civil law, alloweth not Engliſh by bare ſubjection to their king to be naturalized within them; and therefore the law of England ſhould be very unequal, if it ſhould allow it to Scots here.

5. This caſe may give a dangerous example for mutual naturalizing of all nations that hereafter may fall into the ſubjection of the king, although they be very remote, in that their mutual communalty of priviledges may diſorder the ſettled government of every of the particulars; and how many of them may happen, is uncertaine; for we ſee, that where there were 100 kings, they came after to 11, and are now brought to 6 only within Chriſtendome.

6. The Scots ſhall be in better caſe by this law of naturalizing then the Engliſh, in the Engliſh nation; for the Engliſh pay all impoſitions and taxes for ſervices of the crown, which the Scots do not within England.

7. All the reaſons given for naturalizing extend aſwell to them before born, as ſithence the king came to the crown of England; for the ſubjection is now all one. Therefore, the law that ſhould make a difference is not reaſonable; and becauſe the law is confeſſed to be, that thoſe before born be not naturalized, therefore the law muſt alſo be, if it retain the ſame reaſon, that thoſe born after are not naturalized.

Neverthe leſs he concluded, that he held it in reaſon, that in reſpect of one ſubjection, the Scots ſhould not be accounted nor dealt withall by our lawes, as aliens, although not enabled to the full rights of Engliſhmen born amongſt us.

Sir Roger Owen. Sir Roger Owen for ſtories, 1. ſhewed, that in all the preſidents of the Romans, and in all their varieties of ariſtocracy or monarchy, there was no naturalizing ipſo jure, but by charters of grace or conſtitutions ſpecial, and that by Naninus begun and introduced. 2. The preſident of Spain and Caſtile is not to this point; for Alaricus the emperour firſt lord of all Spain gave out Caſtile, and the coming of Caſtile again is rather a reuniting or a remitter, then a new union, and therefore reaſonable they be one naturalized in the other as they were at the firſt. 3. The preſident freſh of France and Scotland by marriage of the kings mother with Francis the ſecond king of France, becauſe the ſubjection made no naturalization ipſo jure, therefore the Scots in France and the French in Scotland were naturalized by acts of parliament and with cautions.

Sir John Bennet and Dr. James. Sir John Bennet doctor of the civil law, he ſhewed that the civil law had no reſolution of this point in terminis terminantibus; but of other unions leſſer then kingdoms, there were rules, which he devided into theſe heads; one a maxime, the other a diſtribution; the maxime, cum duo jura concurrunt in una perſona æquum eſt ac ſi eſſent in diverſis, as one parſon of two churches, one dean of two deaneries: the cuſtomes of every place remain ſtill diſtinct and devided. And he cited an example, that the earldome of Flanders and Artois were holden of the king of France as ſoveraign by the duke of Brabant and Holland, who within Brabant and Holland was a free ſtate: the queſtion was whether this duke having both the dukedome and the earldome, and owing ſubjection to France only for the earldome, might make a league with the Engliſh for his dukedome, without breaking allegiance with France: and this being debated in the parliament of Paris, it was adjudged he might, becauſe he held the dukedome and the earldome as diſtinct in his perſon, and owed no ſubjection to France for his dukedome. The diſtribution he made was this, upon the difference of unum and unitum: there was a union ſubordinate, that is, when an inferiour is united to the ſuperiour, as Ireland to England, in this caſe privilegia communicantur. There is an union by incorporation, that is, when two be made unum, and not unitum, and then privilegia communicantur, as Wales and England. The third is when disjunct kingdomes are united, and that unicum is ſecundum quid, and non ſimpliciter; in which caſe privilegia non communicantur; and ſo he concluded that Scottiſh men were not naturalized in England; and yet he affirmed that it was in the power of the king by the civil law to naturalize them, and give them the priviledges.

The earl of Saliſbury here interpoſed, and ſaid, that he was deſirous to underſtand whether the arguments made were upon the point in queſtion; for as he conceived the queſtion now in debate was a legal queſtion of the law of England, and therefore time was to be ſpent upon argument and diſcuſſion of the law of England, and ſo ſapiens contentio aut prodeſt aut non obeſt.

The lord chancellor then ſpake and ſaid, that the firſt man that ſpake by introduction and inducement of the reſt brought the queſtion to the quick, that is, that it was not a queſtion de bono but de vero, not what was fit to be done, but what the law already is, which is what the law of England is; in which queſtion, if it ſhall be doubtful, it is more then indifferent to declare it as the commiſſioners have propoſed for three cauſes. 1. The kings proclamation having divulged it ſo, it is for his honor to declare it ſo, if it be not clear otherwiſe. 2. The opinion of the commiſſioners whom both houſes truſted. 3. The act of recognition, whereby we have acknowledged the king of both, and that we both live under one imperial crown.

The earl of Northampton ſaid, that it appeared by the civilians, that in the civil law there was no preſident in terminis terminantibus; and therefore from them we could take no rule for this caſe; nor no ſtories or examples of forraign ſtates, which are appliable and framed to their own particular policies. Nor as this caſe is, can we be meaſured or guided by inconveniences that may be forecaſt; becauſe we are confined to a point of law already received and planted, and are to reaſon and diſcuſs what that law is. Nevertheleſs he deſired leave to uſe a compariſon to them, to be commended to their conſideration, between the union in a body politick and in a body natural. The head in a body natural hath his influence into all the members by ſpirits of life and ſenſe. So hath the head of the body politick, to whom all the members be children in obedience, and brothers one to the other. The ſinews in a body natural are ligaments that binde together the joynts and fleſh. So are lawes in the body politick that tye people in a band of ſubjection and civil life. The blood, that paſſeth in the veins of the body natural by continual motion, doth maintain and refreſh the ſpirits of life. So traffick, commerce, and contracts in a body politick, do ſupport, maintaine and refreſh the common-wealth. But of all theſe there is a ſuperior ſpirit ſent by God, which is the ſoul to the body of man, by which all our bleſſedneſs is infuſed. So may we well ſay, that the kings majeſtie is like the ſoul, a bleſſedneſs ſent from God to dwell in both theſe nations as a continual ſpirit of union amongſt them, to pacifie and temper all bitterneſs, even as the ſoul by inſtinct of reaſon quieteth the natural paſſions of the natural bodies. Wherefore let us conſider how unfit it is to have two ſpirits or ſouls in one body; what their oppoſition may work for diſtemper and diſſolution; what the ſweet harmony of one good vertuous and religious ſoul in every part of the body may do, for conſolidating, ſtrengthning, and continuing in the whole body that proſperous eſtate of life and health that is to be wiſhed: and therefore in the caſe whatſoever may tend to the happy and firm uniting of theſe two kingdomes in reſemblance of lives and fortunes is to be inclined to, and recommended to your grave conſideration.

Dodridge the king's ſollicitor, Laurence Hyde, Brock, Crewe, & Hedley, profeſſors of the common law, now begin. And for the common law they urged 9 reaſons or arguments, that thoſe born ſithence his majeſty came to the crown of England within Scotland ſhould not be naturalized in England. Which queſtion ſprang out of two poſitions granted, as a third doubtful between, and this third is oculus quæſtionis. The firſt of theſe two poſitions is, that in the kings perſon there is an union of ſoveraignty over both nations. The ſecond is, that notwithſtanding this union, yet the fundamental lawes of either nation do remaine diſtinct. The third, which is the doubt between both theſe, whether naturalization proceed from the king or the lawes. Out of this one head all the reaſons were derived as followeth.

1 That lex & ligeancia came out of one root, and as it is called lex a ligando, ſo it is called legeance, a ligatione; which proveth allegeance to be tied to laws; and conſequently the laws of theſe two nations being ſeveral, notwithſtanding the union of ſoveraignty in the kings perſon, the allegeance of the ſubjects remaineth ſtill ſeveral; and therefore naturalization being meaſured by allegeance muſt ſtill remain ſeveral and diſtinct in either nations, as allegeance and laws do, and cannot be united and made one in both nations. To inforce this they cited the ſtatute of 25 Ed. 3. ſtatute 2. de natis ultra mare. In many places where it mentioneth legeance, is added 'out of the legeance of England, or 'within the ſame legeance of England;' which doth infer, that legeance is tyed to the kingdome, and not to the perſon of the king.

2 Reaſon, that poſtnati in Scotland are not ſubject to the laws of England, and therefore ſhould not have benefit of the laws of England.

3 Reaſon, that every nation hath a precinct wherein the laws have operation; and naturalization is an act or operation of law; therefore it cannot extend to places out of the precinct for the laws. Which being granted, it followeth, that as Engliſh laws extend not into Scotland, ſo to be naturalized by the laws of England, extends not into Scotland nor to thoſe born in Scotland.

The 4 and 5 Reaſon, that the great ſeal of England, which is the organ by which the law is conveyed, is not powerful nor binding in Scotland; therefore thoſe born in Scotland not inheritable to the laws of England, nor to be born ſubjects of England, when they cannot be commanded by the great ſeal of England.

6 Reaſon, that in ſubordinate kingdomes, dukedomes, or ſeignories, as Ireland, Gaſcoigne, Aquitane, Angois, the great ſeal of England is paſſable, and the parliament of England hath power; as is proved by that a writ of error may be brought in the Kings Bench of a judgment in Ireland, and the parliament of England may make a ſtatute to bind in Ireland, if Ireland be ſpecially named, but without ſpecial nameing it doth not bind. So 27 E. 3. cap. 7. a ſtatute was made to authoriſe the ſteward of Gaſcoigne to arreſt the bodies of ſuch as bargaine for wines elſewhere, then in the portes of Burdeaux and Bayon, and to ſend them to the Tower of London. An habeas corpus hath been directed under the great ſeal of England into Gaſcoigne, as appeareth by records of the Kings Bench. And the iſlanders do ſend petitions and make proctors to the parliament of England, as is ſtill put in uſe to this day. By which it appeareth, that the caſe is not like between England and theſe kingdomes and dukedomes ſubordinate to England, as it is between England and Scotland; Scotland being a diſtinct kingdom not ſubordinate, and as ancient as England it ſelf. And therefore whereas ſome have conceived, that when Gaſcoigne was by marriage united to England, thoſe of Gaſcoigne were not aliens to England, and inforce this expoſition out of the prior Shels caſe, 27 E. 3. pla. 48. in the book of Aſſizes, in that the prior having his lands ſeiſed in time of war, for that he was born in Gaſcoigne under the kings allegeance, and thereupon the matter being found true, he had reſtitution; to that, it may be confeſſed; and yet it matcheth not our caſe for Scotland, a diſtinct kingdome, and the reaſon of that reſtitution may be the ceaſing of the wars aſwell as being born in Gaſcoigne; for thoſe of Gaſcoigne were in thoſe times accompted aliens in England, as may appear by the ſtatute of 38 E. 3. cap. 11. where it is enacted, that the Gaſcoignes and other aliens ſhould come into England with their wines; which proveth, that thoſe of Gaſcoigne could not bring their wines into England, and they were then aliens to England, by the words of Gaſcoignes and other aliens.

7 Reaſon, that regnum and rex were relatives, and therefore diſtinct kingdoms, diſtinct kings as to the kingdoms; and the perſon of the king poſſeſſing both kingdoms poſſeſſeth the people and the laws of them diſtinct, as the kingdoms are themſelves. Therefore the ſubjection of every people is diſtinguiſhed to the ſeveral kingdoms, and one not ſubject to the other, nor naturalized within the other. And this is proved by the ſtatute of 14 E. 3. whereby it is declared, that notwithſtanding the king of England were king of France, yet the people of England were not ſubject unto him as king of France, but only as king of England.

8 Reaſon, that no man can be born a ſubject of two allegeances, nor by birth natural of two diſtinct kingdoms, therefore Scots born in Scotland cannot be naturalized in England.

9 Inconvenience would enſue in honors privileges and things of value, which would be confounded without order, if this commixtion ſhould be planted in both nations without diſcipline or rules.

The time being thus ſpent the 25 day of February, the next day was appointed to proceed with the conference, at which time the lords committees deſired the judges there attending to deliver their advice and opinions concerning the point of law: for which the lord chief juſtice Popham had the night before prayed reſpite until this time. Whereupon the ſaid lord chief juſtice, and ſir Edward Cook chief juſtice of the Common Pleas, and ſir Thomas Flemming chief baron, did openly deliver their opinions and their reaſons, the ſaid lord chief juſtice Popham making theſe three inducements in commendation of the laws of England. 1 That they had continued as a rock without alteration in all the varieties of people that had poſſeſſed this land, namely the Romans, Brittons, Danes, Saxons, Normans, and Engliſh, which he imputed to the integrity and juſtice of theſe laws, every people taking a liking to them, and deſirous to continue them and live by them, for which he cited Forteſcues book of the laws of England.

2 Commendation, the price that thoſe laws did coſt, which was no leſſe then blood; not laws of blood or bloody laws, but laws bought and purchaſed by the blood of our anteceſſors, as appeareth by magna charta, planted in king H. 3. time, after long and bloody wars between the kings and barons of this realm, the ſtories whereof do yet live freſh in every chronicle.

3 Commendation is the proceedings of the law, which he devided into 3 parts. 1 Judgments. 2 Trials. 3 Teſtimonies. The judgments ſo even and ſo impartial, as they give way to no mans affection, nor impute blame to any man; but to ſay the law requireth ſuch judgment, is an excuſe ſatisfactory to all men, for the king, and the judges. And therefore the ſaid lord chief juſtice cited a reſolution in parliament when himſelf ſerved as ſpeaker: That whereas it was propoſed to have a law made, that the judges might uſe their diſcretion in appointing trials in forraine counties, in reſpect the meaner ſort of people were overweighed with the power of great men in ſome ſhires that were parties to the ſuites; it was upon grave advice and conſultation denied, with this anſwer, that it were better to live under a certain known law, though hard ſometimes in a few caſes, then to be ſubject to the alterable diſcretion of any judges. The trials of the law for the moſt part ſo equal by the oaths of 12, as he proteſted that he never knew of the multitude that had paſſed before himſelf, ſcarce two of a hundred paſſe otherwiſe then himſelf ſhould have paſſed, if he had been in their caſe. For the teſtimonies being viva voce before the judges in open face of the world, he ſaid was much to be preferred before written depoſitions by private examiners or commiſſioners. Firſt, for that the judge and jurors diſcerne often by the countenance of a witneſſe whether he come prepared, and by his readineſs and ſlackneſs, whether he be ill affected or well affected, and by ſhort queſtions may draw out circumſtances to approve or diſcredit his teſtimony, and one witneſs may conteſt with another where they are viva voce. All which are taken away by written depoſitions in a corner.

For argument the ſaid judges anſwered with one aſſent, to the firſt reaſon of the commons, that allegeance and laws were not of equiparation for 6 cauſes. 1. Allegiance was before laws. 2. Allegiance is after laws. 3. Allegiance is where the laws are not. 4. Between ſoveraignty and allegiance laws are begotten. 5. Allegiance extends as far as defence, which is beyond the circuit of laws. 6. Allegiance followeth the natural perſon, not the politick. To prove this, it was ſaid, if a heap of people meet together ſo near, that they appoint a king, there allegiance is before they have laws proclaimed or preſcribed: wherefore allegiance is before laws. If the king be expelled by force and another uſurps, yet the allegiance is not taken away, though the law be taken away. If the king go out of England with a company of his ſervants, allegiance remaineth amongſt his ſubjects and ſervants, although he be out of his own realm, whereto his laws are confined, as is proved by a caſe in Fleta, who wrote in Ed. 2 time, which is thus. King Ed. 1. went in perſon into France, to a marriage; one of his ſervants in France ſtole 2 ſilver diſhes, for which he was apprehended by the French: the king required to have him redelivered, being his ſubject and of his traine; and upon diſpute in the parliament of Paris, he was ſent to the king of England to do his own juſtice upon him, whereupon he was tried before the ſteward and marſhal of the kings houſe, and executed in France in a meadow called St. Jermins meadow. Which proveth that the kings law followeth his allegiance out of the local limit of the laws of England. And even ſo it is, where the king of England ſendeth a lieutenant or general with an army royal out of the realm, the army is to be guided by the martial law of England, as the lord Cook affirmed, who alſo cited the caſe of Fleta. If there were not a ſoveraign to preſcribe laws, and people of allegiance to obey them, there could be no laws made nor executed. By which it appeareth, that between ſoveraignty and allegiance laws are begotten; and therefore in nations conquered there are no laws, yet is there preſent allegiance; and after allegiance gotten, it is ſecondary for the king to deliver laws to the people of his allegiance. And to prove the allegiance to be tyed to the body natural of the king, not to the body politick, the lord Cook cited the phraſes of divers ſtatutes mentioning the king our natural liege ſoveraign, and theſe words natural ſubjects in acts of recognition uſual and familiar. And to prove that allegiance extended further then the laws national, they ſhewed, that every king of divers kingdoms or dukedomes is to command every people to defend any of his kingdomes without reſpect of that nation where he is born; as if the king of Spain be invaded in Portugal, he may levy for deſence of Portugal armies out of Spain, Naples, Caſtile, Millan, Flanders, and the like, as a thing incident to the allegiance of all his ſubjects to joyn together in defence of any one of his territories without reſpect of extent of the laws of that nation where he was born: whereby it manifeſtly appeareth, that allegiance followeth the natural perſon of the king, and is not tyed to the body politick reſpectively in every kingdom. And therefore, whereas the rule for aliens is this, that thoſe born within the kings allegiance are ſubjects, and thoſe born out of his allegiance are aliens, it is manifeſt, that Scots born in Scotland, ſince the king of England was king of England and Scotland both, are not born out of the kings allegiance, and ſo not aliens, but ſubjects, and ſo to be accounted in England. For further proof of this, the lord Cook ſhewed ſtatutes, bookcaſes and pleadings.

For ſtatutes prerogativa regis cap. 12. which was made in the 17 year of king Edward the ſecond, and is a declaration of the prerogative before, wherein it is declared, that the king was to have the eſcheats of the lands of the Normands, and all others born in parts beyond ſeas, whoſe anteceſſors were of the faith or loyalty of the king of France, and not of the king of England; as it happened of the barony of Monumeta, after the death of John D. Monumeta, whoſe heirs were of Brittain and elſewhere. By which declaration the judges did infer, that out of the allegiance, and within the allegiance of the king (fides being to be underſtood allegiance) maketh the oddes between an alien and a denizen, and not the place of birth in England, or without England; for it is declared, that the king ſhould have the eſcheats of ſuch as were born in parts beyond ſeas, and whoſe parents were of the allegiance of the king of France, and not of the allegiance of the king of England. So that although his birth were out of the bounds of the kingdome of England and out of the reach and extent of the laws of England, yet if it were within the allegiance of the kings of England, the king was not to have his eſcheat as an alien, as at this time divers places that were within the limits of France were in ſubjection to the kings of England. And for the inſtance of the barony of Monumeta, they ſhewed that king H. 2. had four ſons, Henry, Richard, Jeffrey, and John, that Jeffrey was married to the heire of Brittain, and was murthered by John, in which time the caſe of Monumeta happened, Brittain being not within the allegiance of the king of England, by that marriage of the kings third ſon. They ſhewed that it was not material, whether a kingdome or dukedome came to the allegiance of the king of England, nor whether by marriage or conqueſt; for many dukedoms were ſometimes kingdoms, and kingdoms were but dukedoms, as Caſtile at the firſt but an earldom, now a kingdom; little Brittain once a kingdom, then after and now a dukedom; Ireland a dukedom, now a kingdom. But the matter of difference is, whether they be free and divided ſtates in their laws and government, and ſo were both theſe dukedoms of Aquitane, Gaſcoigne, Guyen, &c. which have been ſo much inſiſted upon, and ſo is Scotland, and yet all under one allegiance and faith to one king: which unity and allegiance to one king, taketh away the rule of alien born from them all, howſoever they were united, be it by marriage or conqueſt. And yet for Gaſcoigne and Aquitane, it came by marriage and deſcent, as Scotland. The next ſtatute is the ſtatute of 42 E. 3. cap. 10. that the commons deſired in parliament that children born beyond ſeas, within the ſeigniories of Calice and elſewhere within the lands and ſeignories that pertaine to the king beyond ſeas, might inherite in England. Whereto the anſwer is, it is accorded, that the common law and the ſtatute upon the ſame point another time may be holden. The judges, examining what ſtatute that was, found it was the ſtatute of 25 E. 3. ſtat. 2. de natis ultra mare. Which ſtatute contains a preamble, and 3 ordinances. The preamble is a recital of a doubt, whether children ſhould inherite in England, that were born beyond ſeas out of the legiance of England. The 1 ordinance is a declaration of the law, that the kings children whereſoever born are inheritable in England. The 2 is a conſtitution particular for ſome named, and which the king ſhall name, which were born beyond ſeas, out of the legiance of England, to inherit in England. The 3 is a new law, that children from henceforth born out of the legiance of the king, whoſe fathers and mothers at the time of their birth be and ſhall be at the faith and of the allegiance of the king of England, ſhall inherite in England, &c. Out of this they did infer, that the third ordinance only did touch the point now in queſtion; which ordinance neverthleſs came not to the queſtion propoſed; for the ordinance is for perſons born beyond ſeas, and out of the kings legiance, whoſe parents are Engliſh; whereas our queſtion is for perſons born in Scotland, which is within the faith and allegiance of the king, and ſo much the odds is, as the words import, viz. out of the allegiance and within the allegiance. So as that ſtatute directs not this controverſy; and therefore it muſt be the common law that doth it, whereto the ſtatute of 42 E. 3. doth referr concerning thoſe born at Callis, and other ſegniories beyond ſeas, that pertain to the king: which perſons having been ever expounded to inherit in England, it muſt needs be taken, that they inherit by the common law, and not by ſtatute. 28 H. 6. cap. 5. againſt extortions uſed by ſearchers amongſt merchants, the merchants of Gaſcoigne, Guyen, Ireland and the Iſles, are called the kings liege people.

The books and judgments cited by the judges, were firſt 27 E. 3. in the book of Aſſizes the 48 plea, the caſe of the prior of Shels, who being a prior alien, and his temporalties being ſeiſed in time of war, ſhewed that he was not an alien, for that he was born in Gaſcoigne, within the legiance of the king; which plea was found true by verdict, and thereupon his temporalties were reſtored. And then the ſame caſe came again in queſtion in the common place in a quare impedit, becauſe in his reſtitution he had no ſpecial words of advowſons, whether the king might not preſent to the advowſons of the priory notwithſtanding the reſtitution, for that alſo the reſtitution was, that the king of his grace did reſtore, &c. So it was of grace, not of right. But the book is, that the king ſhould not preſent; and the reaſon alleadged, becauſe the ſeaſure was by wrong, the prior being no alien, and ſo a reſtitution in that caſe, by which the king doth not give but do right, needs not contain ſpecial mention of advowſons; neither the recital of the kings grace could eſcape the juſtice of the court examining the cauſe, to ſay it was not of right. For concurrence with this book, they cited the caſe of 11 H. 4. fo. 26. that two huſbands and their wives parceners brought an aſſize, and then were ſummoned and ſevered: the tenant pleaded to her that was ſevered, that her huſband was an alien, and born out of the realm, and all the legiance, and not made denizen: but in the end in reſpect of the ſeverance, and that the plea was in diſablement of him that was ſevered, the writt was awarded good. Yet the note ſpecial of the caſe is the manner of the plea, viz. alien born out of the realm, and all the allegiance; whereof it is inferred that allegiance is further then the realm, and not confined to the circuit of the laws of the realm. 14 H. 4. fo. 19. b. one challenged a juror for that he was an alien, and the manner of his challenge is, that he was not a liege to the king, becauſe he was born out of his legiance, and ſhewed that he was a Flemming; and the triers found that he was born in Flanders, but had lived of a child in England, and was ſworn to the king in a leet: neverthleſſe the court would not allow him to be ſworn. But the note of the caſe is, the manner of the challenge, viz. not a liege to the king, becauſe he was born out of his legiance. So Littleton in his chapter of villenage ſheweth him to be an alien that is born out of the kings allegiance. And this diſtinction of allegiance quatenus king of England, and quatenus king of Scotland, or quatenus duke of Ireland, Aquitane, Gaſcoigne, &c. is never heard of in the books of our law.

For pleadings they ſhewed the preſident in the book of Entries, to be, that he that diſableth an alien muſt alledge affirmatively, that he is an alien; and yet that ſufficeth not, but he muſt alledge further that he was born extra obedientiam domini regis; and not that alone, but alſo he muſt aſſigne a place where he was born, infra obedientiam of ſome other king. As in 9 E. 4. fo. 7. in the aſſize by Bagot of the office of clerk of the crown in the Chancery, the tenant pleaded, that Bagot was an alien in this manner, dicit quod idem Johannes Bagot eſt alienigena genitus extra ligeanciam domini regis Angliæ, viz. apud Pontoys infra regnum Franciæ ſub obedientia Caroli nuncupantis ſe regem Franciæ, adverſarii & magni inimici domini regis Angliæ. Which courſe of pleading cannot be held with thoſe of Scotland; for that Scotland is not out of the kings allegiance, neither is the king of Scots enemy to the king of England, but he is alſo king of England, whereof both nations do and muſt take notice.

And whereas it hath been urged that the trial of an alien muſt be within England, ſo that he which will deſtroy the plea of an alien againſt himſelf muſt aſſigne a place in England of his birth, and cannot aſſigne a place in Scotland; this is eaſily anſwered, and proveth nothing on the other part; for ſo if a deed be made in Ireland or in Gaſcoigne, or in the Iſles, you muſt aſſigne the making of it in ſome county of England, to the end a trial may be had by jury, which is not but in England; neverthleſſe you may give in evidence the making of it in Ireland or the Iſles. So is the caſe of 13 H. 4. pla. 10. for an obligation made in Gaſcoigne. And ſo is 32 H. 6. fo. 26. in debt upon a bond made in the biſhoprick of Durham being a county palatine; and there the reaſon of this caſe debated, and Brown citeth it to be adjudged, that if the defendant alledge that the plaintif is a Scot born at St. Johns town in Scotland, out of the legiance, this is a trial where the writ is brought; but if the plaintif will reply, that he was born at London within the allegiance, the defendant muſt rejoyn, that the plaintif was born at St. Johns town in Scotland, without that, that he was born in London, and the iſſue ſhall be tried in London. So are affirmative iſſues allowed for neceſſity of trial; but evidence of his birth in any place within the kings dominions is ſufficient to maintain the iſſue, although for form of pleading it be laid to be at London. In which caſe of 13 H. 4. it was put by Ireby, that a liegman of England was killed by another liegman of England in Scotland, and his wife brought her appeal in England in the court of the lord conſtable of England.

pla. 92.

Then the judges examined what ſhould be given to the Scots, if they ſhould be naturalized. Firſt, they being not enemies, if they be aliens, are to be protected in their bodies and goods, and may bring perſonal actions. But if they buy land, the king if he will, may ſeize it. But for dignities of honor, or voices in parliament as barons, Scotchmen cannot have in England, ſo long as the laws ſtand diſtinct. And therefore they cited the caſe of 11 E. 3. titulo briefe 473. where the writ was brought againſt the earl of Richmond, who alleadged, that he was duke of Brittaine, and not ſo named in the writ, and prayed that the writ might abate; but the judges allowed not his plea, becauſe the dukedom of Brittaine is a forraigne dignity, of which we take no notice in England. Yet Edmond Baliol aſſigning the ſame cauſe in abatement of a writ, for that he was not named king of Scots, the exception was held good; for that a king is in notice of all countries, and ſo is a knight, but not barons, earldoms, dukedoms and the like. Neverthleſſe 39 E. 3. fo. 35. en title de briefe 517. a writ was abated for not naming the defendant earle of Angus, although it be a dignity in Scotland: but the reaſon is ſhewed to be, for that he had alway a writ to attend at the parliament of England. And by this, the judges ſaid, that the 9th objection being matter of inconvenience in places of honour was anſwered with this addition, that no naturalizing could make them barons of parliament of England for their dignities in Scotland, neither did naturalizing give any man a place in parliament, except he were choſen, or gave him any lands or goods except he could purchaſe them.

For the matter of the great ſeal the judges ſhewed, that the ſeal was alterable by the king at his pleaſure, and he might make one ſeal for both kingdoms, for ſeals, coyn, and leagues are of abſolute prerogative to the king without parliament, not reſtrained to any aſſent of the people. But for further reſolution of this point, how far the great ſeal doth command out of England, they made this diſtinction, that the great ſeal was current for remedials which groweth upon complaint of the ſubjects, and thereupon writs are addreſſed under the great ſeal of England, which writs are limited their precinct to be within the places of the juriſdiction of the courts that muſt give the redreſſe of the wrong. And therefore writs are not to go into Ireland, nor the Iſles, nor Wales, nor the counties palatine; becauſe the kings courts here have not power to hold plea of lands or things there. But the great ſeal hath a power preceptory to the perſon, which power extendeth to any place where the perſon may be found. And for this the lord Cook cited Nicholas Ludlowes caſe in 4 E. 3. in the Tower record rotulo clauſo numero 21. that Ludlow being at Rome, a commandment under the great ſeal was ſent to him to return. So Berties caſe in queen Maries time, and ſir Franc. Inglefields in queen Elizabeths time, the privy ſeal went to command them to return into the realm, and for not coming their lands were ſeized, as appeareth by my lord Diers report of both thoſe caſes. So the caſe before of 39 E. 3. fo. 35. a parliament writ was current into Scotland, to the earle of Angus; and 14 H. 8. a habeas corpus into the Iſle of Man; which habeas corpus is a preceptory writ to have the body of his ſubject, and may be directed into Scotland, or any place where the king hath miniſters, otherwiſe how ſhall the king come by the perſon of his ſubject whom he would command. So as where remedial writs run not, yet preceptories under the great ſeal do; and therefore the poſition of the great ſeal not to be current in Scotland holdeth for remedials, not for preceptories: and this doth anſwer the objection, that the great ſeal is current in ſubordinate kingdoms, or dukedoms, and not in all places of the kings dominions in diſtinct kingdoms.

And as to the rule taken by the civilians, cum duo jura concurrunt in una perſona, æquum eſt ac ſi eſſent in diverſis, that holdeth not in things perſonal but real: and therefore a marqueſſe, that is a baron and an earle, can by the ſtatute of 21 H. 8. have no more chaplains then his beſt dignity alloweth, and not for every dignity.

And as to the objection that none can be born a natural ſubject of two kingdoms, they denied that abſolutely; for although locally he can be born but in one, yet effectually the allegiance of the king extending to both, his birthright ſhall extend to both.

And as to the objection that rex & regnum be relatives, and therefore the allegiance of a king can extend but to that kingdom; they anſwered, that rex and regna were relatives, but rex & regnum be not ſo relatives, as a king can be king but of one kingdom, for that were proprium quarto modo, viz. omni, ſoli & ſemper, which clearly holdeth not, but that his kingly power extending to divers nations and kingdoms, all owe him equal ſubjection, and are equally born to the benefit of his protection. And although he is to govern them by their diſtinct laws, yet any one of the people coming into the other is to have the benefit of the laws whereſoever he cometh, and is to bear the burthens and taxes of the place where he cometh; but living in one, or for his livelyhood in one, he is not to be taxed in the other, becauſe laws ordain taxes impoſitions and charges, as a diſcipline of ſubjection particularized to every particular nation.

And ſo theſe 3 judges delivered their opinions openly, and the reſt were ready and did affirme the ſame to be all their opinions, but only juſtice Walmeſly who differed in the main point, the reſt were Warburton and Daniel, of the Common Place, Fenner, Williams, and Tanfield, of the Kings Bench, Snigg and Altham, barons of the Exchequer.

Speech of lord Bacon, as counſel for Calvin in the Exchequer-Chamber. From the laſt 4to. ed. of his works, vol. 2. p. 514.

May it pleaſe your Lordſhips,

THIS caſe your lordſhips do well perceive to be of exceeding great conſequence. For whether you do meaſure that by place, that reacheth not only to the realm of England, but to the whole iſland of Great Britain; or whether you meaſure that by time, that extendeth not only to the preſent time, but much more to future generations,

Et nati natorum, et qui naſcentur ab illis.

And therefore as that is to receive at the bar a full and free debate, ſo I doubt not but that ſhall receive from your lordſhips a ſound and juſt reſolution according to law, and according to truth. For, my lords, though he were thought to have ſaid well, that ſaid that for his word, rex fortiſſimus; yet he was thought to have ſaid better, even in the opinion of a king himſelf, that ſaid, veritas fortiſſima, et prævalet: and I do much rejoice to obſerve ſuch a concurrence in the whole carriage of this cauſe to this end, that truth may prevail.

The caſe no feigned or framed caſe; but a true caſe between true parties.

The title handled formerly in ſome of the king's courts, and free-hold upon it; uſed indeed by his majeſty in his high wiſdom to give an end to this great queſtion, but not raiſed; occaſio, as the ſchoolmen ſay, arrepta, non porrecta.

The caſe argued in the King's Bench by Mr. Walter with great liberty, and yet with good approbation of the court: the perſons aſſigned to be of counſel on that ſide, inferior to none of their quality and degree in learning; and ſome of them moſt converſant and exerciſed in the queſtion.

The judges in the King's Bench have adjourned it to this place for conference with the reſt of their brethren. Your lordſhip, my lord chancellor, though you be abſolute judge in the court where you ſit, and might have called to you ſuch aſſiſtance of judges as to you had ſeemed good; yet would not forerun or lead in this caſe by any opinion there to be given; but have choſen rather to come yourſelf to this aſſembly; all tending, as I ſaid, to this end, whereunto I for my part do heartily ſubſcribe, ut vincat veritas, that truth may firſt appear, and then prevail. And I do firmly hold, and doubt not but I ſhall well maintain, that this is the truth, that Calvin the plaintiff is ipſo jure by the law of England a natural born ſubject, to purchaſe free-hold, and to bring real actions within England. In this caſe I muſt ſo conſider the time, as I muſt much more conſider the matter. And therefore though it may draw my ſpeech into farther length; yet I dare not handle a caſe of this nature confuſedly, but purpoſe to obſerve the ancient and exact form of pleadings; which is,

First, to explain or induce.
Then, to confute, or anſwer objections.
And laſtly, to prove, or confirm.

And firſt for explanation. The outward queſtion in this caſe is no more, but whether a child, born in Scotland ſince his majeſty's happy coming to the crown of England, be naturalized in England, or no. But the inward queſtion or ſtate of the queſtion evermore beginneth, where that which is confeſſed on both ſides doth leave.

It is confeſſed, that if theſe two realms of England and Scotland were united under one law and one parliament, and thereby incorporated and made as one kingdom, that the poſt-natus of ſuch an union ſhould be naturalized.

It is confeſſed, that both realms are united in the perſon of our ſovereign; or, becauſe I will gain nothing by ſurreption, in the putting of the queſtion, that one and the ſame natural perſon is king of both realms.

It is confeſſed, that the laws and parliaments are ſeveral. So then, whether this privilege and benefit of naturalization be an acceſſory or dependency upon that which is one and joint, or upon that which is ſeveral, hath been, and muſt be the depth of this queſtion. And therefore your lordſhips do ſee the ſtate of this queſtion doth evidently lead me by way of inducement to ſpeak of three things: the king, the law, and the privilege of naturalization. For if you well underſtand the nature of the two principals, and again the nature of the acceſſory; then ſhall you diſcern to whether principal the acceſſory doth properly refer, as a ſhadow to a body, or iron to an adamant.

And therefore your lordſhips will give me leave in a caſe of this quality, firſt to viſit and open the foundations and fountains of reaſon, and not begin with the poſitions and eruditions of a municipal law; for ſo was that done in the great caſe of Mines; and ſo ought that to be done in all caſes of like nature. And this doth not at all detract from the ſufficiency of our laws, as incompetent to decide their own caſes, but rather addeth a dignity unto them, when their reaſon appearing as well as their authority doth ſhew them to be as fine moneys, which are current not only by the ſtamp, becauſe they are ſo received, but by the natural metal, that is, the reaſon and wiſdom of them.

And maſter Littleton himſelf in his whole book doth commend but two things to the profeſſors of the law by the name of his ſons; the one, the inquiring and ſearching out the reaſons of the law; and the other, the obſerving of the forms of pleadings. And never was there any caſe that came in judgment that required more, that Littleton's advice ſhould be followed in thoſe two points, than doth the preſent caſe in queſtion. And firſt of the king.

It is evident that all other commonwealths, monarchies only excepted, do ſubſiſt by a law precedent. For where authority is divided amongſt many officers, and they not perpetual, but annual or temporary, and not to receive their authority but by election, and certain perſons to have voice only to that election, and the like; theſe are buſy and curious frames, which of neceſſity do pre-ſuppoſe a law precedent, written or unwritten, to guide and direct them. But in monarchies, eſpecially hereditary, that is, when ſeveral families or lineages of people do ſubmit themſelves to one line, imperial or royal, the ſubmiſſion is more natural and ſimple, which afterwards by laws ſubſequent is perfected and made more formal; but that is grounded upon nature. That this is ſo, it appeareth notably in two things; the one the platforms and patterns which are found in nature of monarchies; the original ſubmiſſions, and their motives and occaſions. The platforms are three:

The firſt is that of a father, or chief of a family; who governing over his wife by prerogative of ſex, over his children by prerogative of age and becauſe he is author unto them of being, and over his ſervants by prerogative of virtue and providence (for he that is able of body, and improvident of mind, is natura ſervus) that is a very model of a king. So is the opinion of Ariſtotle, lib. iii. Pol. cap. 14. where he ſaith, verum autem regnum eſt, cum penes unum eſt rerum ſumma poteſtas: quod regnum procurationem familiæ imitatur. And therefore Lycurgus, when one counſelled him to diſſolve the kingdom, and to eſtabliſh another form of eſtate, anſwered, ‘ Sir, begin to do that which you adviſe firſt at home in your own houſe:’ noting, that the chief of a family is as a king; and that thoſe, that can leaſt endure kings abroad, can be content to be kings at home. And this is the firſt platform, which we ſee is merely natural.

The ſecond is that of a ſhepherd and his flock, which Xenophon ſaith, Cyrus had ever in his mouth. For ſhepherds are not owners of the ſheep; but their office is to feed and govern. No more are kings proprietaries or owners of the people; for God is ſole owner of people. The nations, as the ſcripture ſaith, are his inheritance: but the office of kings is to govern, maintain, and protect people. And that is not without a myſtery, that the firſt king that was inſtituted by God, David, for Saul was but an untimely fruit, was tranſlated from a ſhepherd, as you have it in Pſalm lxxviii. Et elegit David ſervum ſuum, de gregibus ovium ſuſtulit eum,—paſcere Jacob ſervum ſuum, et Iſrael hæreditatem ſuam. This is the ſecond platform; a work likewiſe of nature.

The third platform is the government of God himſelf over the world, whereof lawful monarchies are a ſhadow. And therefore both amongſt the Heathen, and amongſt the Chriſtians, the word, ſacred, hath been attributed unto kings, becauſe of the conformity of a monarchy with a divine majeſty; never to a ſenate or people. And ſo you find it twice in the lord Coke's reports; once in the ſecond book, the biſhop of Wincheſter's caſe; and his fifth book, Cawdrie's caſe. And more anciently in the 10 of H. VII. fol. 18. rex eſt perſona mixta cum ſacerdote; an attribute, which the ſenate of Venice, or a canton of Swiſſes, can never challenge. So, we ſee, there be precedents or platforms of monarchies, both in nature, and above nature; even from the monarch of heaven and earth to the king, if you will, in an hive of bees. And therefore other ſtates are the creatures of law; and this ſtate only ſubſiſteth by nature.

For the original ſubmiſſions, they are four in number. I will briefly touch them.

The firſt is paternity or patriarchy, which was when a family growing ſo great as it could not contain itſelf within one habitation, ſome branches of the deſcendants were forced to plant themſelves into new families; which ſecond families could not by a natural inſtinct and inclination but bear a reverence, and yield an obeiſance, to the eldeſt line of the ancient family from which they were derived.

The ſecond is the admiration of virtue, or gratitude towards merit, which is likewiſe naturally infuſed into all men. Of this Ariſtotle putteth the caſe well, when it was the fortune of ſome one man, either to invent ſome arts of excellent uſe towards man's life, or to congregate people that dwelt ſcattered into one place where they might cohabit with more comfort, or to guide them from a more barren land to a more fruitful, or the like: upon theſe deſerts, and the admiration and recompenſe of them, people ſubmitted themſelves.

The third, which was the moſt uſual of all, was conduct in war, which even in nature induceth as great an obligation as paternity. For as men owe their life and being to their parents in regard of generation, ſo they owe that alſo to ſaviours in the wars in regard of preſervation. And therefore we find in chap. xviii. of the book of Judges, ver. xxii. dixerunt omnes viri ad Gideon, dominare noſtri, tu et filii tui, quoniam ſervaſti nos de manu Madian. And ſo we read when it was brought to the ears of Saul, that the people ſung in the ſtreets, Saul hath killed his thouſand, and David his ten thouſand of enemies, he ſaid ſtraightways: quid ei ſupereſt niſi ipſum regnum? For whoſoever hath the military dependence, wants little of being king.

The fourth is an inforced ſubmiſſion, which is conqueſt, whereof it ſeemed Nimrod was the firſt precedent, of whom it is ſaid; ipſe cœpit potens eſſe in terra, et erat robuſtus venator coram Domino. And this likewiſe is upon the ſame root, which is the ſaving or gift as it were of life and being; for the conqueror hath power of life and death over his captives; and therefore where he giveth them themſelves, he may reſerve upon ſuch a gift what ſervice and ſubjection he will.

All theſe four ſubmiſſions are evident to be natural and more ancient than law.

To ſpeak therefore of law, which is the ſecond part of that which is to be ſpoken of by way of inducement. Law no doubt is the great organ by which the ſovereign power doth move, and may be truly compared to the ſinews in a natural body, as the ſovereignty may be compared to the ſpirits: for if the ſinews be without the ſpirits, they are dead and without motion; if the ſpirits move in weak ſinews, it cauſeth trembling: ſo the laws, without the king's power, are dead; the king's power, except the laws be corroborated, will never move conſtantly, but be full of ſtaggering and trepidation. But towards the king himſelf the law doth a double office or operation. The firſt is to intitle the king, or deſign him; and in that ſenſe Bracton ſaith well, lib. 1. fol. 5. and lib. 3. fol. 107. lex facit quod ipſe ſit rex; that is, it defines his title; as in our law, that the kingdom ſhall go to the iſſue female; that it ſhall not be departable amongſt daughters; that the half-blood ſhall be reſpected, and other points differing from the rules of common inheritance. The ſecond is, that whereof we need not fear to ſpeak in good and happy times, ſuch as theſe are, to make the ordinary power of the king more definite or regular; for it was well ſaid by a father, plenitudo poteſtatis eſt plenitudo tempeſtatis. And although the king, in his perſon, be ſolutus legibus, yet his acts and grants are limited by law, and we argue them every day.

But I demand, do theſe offices or operations of law evacuate or fruſtrate the original ſubmiſſion, which was natural; or ſhall it be ſaid that all allegiance is by law? No more than it can be ſaid, that poteſtas patris, the power of the father over the child, is by law: and yet no doubt laws do diverſly define of that alſo; the law of ſome nations having given fathers power to put their children to death; others, to ſell them thrice; others, to diſinherit them by teſtament at pleaſure, and the like. Yet no man will affirm, that the obedience of the child is by law, though laws in ſome points do make it more poſitive: and even ſo it is of allegiance of ſubjects to hereditary monarchs, which is corroborated and confirmed by law, but is the work of the law of nature. And therefore you ſhall find the obſervation true, and almoſt general in all ſtates, that their lawgivers were long after their firſt kings, who governed for a time by natural equity without law. So was Theſeus long before Solon in Athens: ſo was Eurytion and Sous long before Lycurgus in Sparta: ſo was Romulus long before the Decemviri. And even amongſt ourſelves there were more ancient kings of the Saxons; and yet the laws ran under the name of Edgar's laws. And in the refounding of the kingdom in the perſon of William the Conqueror, when the laws were in ſome confuſion for a time, a man may truly ſay, that king Edward I. was the firſt lawgiver, who enacting ſome laws, and collecting others, brought the law to ſome perfection. And therefore I will conclude this point with the ſtile, which divers acts of parliaments do give unto the king; which term him very effectually and truly, 'our natural ſovereign liege lord.' And as it was ſaid by a principal judge here preſent when he ſerved in another place, and queſtion was moved by ſome occaſion of the title of Bullein's lands, that he would never allow, that queen Elizabeth (I remember it for the efficacy of the phraſe) ſhould be a ſtatute queen, but a common-law queen: ſo ſurely I ſhall hardly conſent, that the king ſhall be eſteemed or called only our rightful ſovereign, or our lawful ſovereign, but our natural liege ſovereign; as acts of parliament ſpeak: for as the common law is more worthy than the ſtatute law; ſo the law of nature is more worthy than them both.

Having ſpoken now of the king and the law, it remaineth to ſpeak of the privilege and benefit of naturalization itſelf; and that according to the rules of the law of England.

Naturalization is beſt diſcerned in the degrees whereby the law doth mount and aſcend thereunto. For it ſeemeth admirable unto me, to conſider, with what a meaſured hand, and with how true proportions, our law doth impart and confer the ſeveral degrees of this benefit. The degrees are four.

The firſt degree of perſons, as to this purpoſe, that the law takes knowledge of, is an alien enemy; that is, ſuch a one as is born under the obeiſance of a prince or ſtate that is in hoſtility with the king of England. To this perſon the law giveth no benefit or protection at all; but if he come into the realm after war proclaimed, or war in fact, he comes at his own peril, he may be uſed as an enemy: for the law accounts of him but, as the ſcripture ſaith, as of a ſpy that comes to ſee the weakneſs of the land. And ſo it is in 2 Rich. III. fol. 2. Nevertheleſs, this admitteth a diſtinction. For if he come with ſafe-conduct otherwiſe it is: for then he may not be violated, either in perſon or goods. But yet he muſt fetch his juſtice at the fountain-head, for none of the conduit pipes are open to him; he can have no remedy in any of the king's courts; but he muſt complain himſelf before the king's privy council: there he ſhall have a proceeding ſummary from hour to hour, the cauſe ſhall be determined by natural equity, and not by rules of law; and the decree of the council ſhall be executed by aid of the Chancery, as in 13 Ed. IV. And this is the firſt degree.

The ſecond perſon is an alien friend, that is, ſuch a one as is born under the obeiſance of ſuch a king or ſtate as is confederate with the king of England, or at leaſt not in war with him. To this perſon the law allotteth this benefit, that as the law accounts, that the hold it hath over him, is but a tranſitory hold, for he may be an enemy; ſo the law doth indue him but with a tranſitory benefit, that is, of moveable goods and perſonal actions. But for free-hold, or leaſe, or actions real or mixt, he is not enabled, except it be in autre droit. And ſo it is 9 Ed. IV. fol. 7. 19 Ed. IV. fol. 6. 5 Mar. and divers other books.

The third perſon is a denizen, uſing the word properly, for ſometimes it is confounded with a natural born ſubject. This is one that is but ſubditus inſitivus, or adoptivus, and is never by birth, but only by the king's charter, and by no other mean, come he never ſo young into the realm, or ſtay he never ſo long. Manſion or habitation will not indenize him, no, nor ſwearing obedience to the king in a leet, which doth in-law the ſubject; but only, as I ſaid, the king's grace and gift. To this perſon the law giveth an ability and capacity abridged, not in matter, but in time. And as there was a time when he was not ſubject, ſo the law doth not acknowledge him before that time. For if he purchaſe free-hold after his denization, he may take it; but if he have purchaſed any before, he ſhall not hold it: ſo if he have children after, they ſhall inherit; but if he have any before, they ſhall not inherit. So as he is but privileged à parte poſt, as the ſchoolmen ſay, and not à parte ante.

The fourth and laſt degree is a natural born ſubject, which is evermore by birth, or by act of parliament; and he is complete and entire. For in the law of England there is nil ultra, there is no more ſubdiviſion or more ſubtile diviſion beyond theſe. And therein it ſeemeth to me, that the wiſdom of the law, as I ſaid, is to be admired both ways, both becauſe it diſtinguiſheth ſo far, and becauſe it doth not diſtinguiſh farther. For I know that other laws do admit more curious diſtinction of this privilege; for the Romans had, beſides jus civitatis, which anſwereth to naturalization, jus ſuffragii. For although a man were naturalized to take lands and inheritance, yet he was not enabled to have a voice at paſſing of laws, or at election of officers. And yet farther they have jus petitionis, or jus honorum. For though a man had voice, yet he was not capable of honour and office. But theſe be the devices commonly of popular or free eſtates, which are jealous whom they take into their number, and are unfit for monarchies. But by the law of England the ſubject, that is natural born, hath a capacity or ability to all benefits whatſoever; I ſay capacity or ability: but to reduce potentiam in actum, is another caſe. For an earl of Ireland, though he be naturalized in England, yet hath no voice in the parliament of England, except he have either a call by writ, or creation by patent; but he is capable of either.

But upon this quadripartite diviſion of the ability of perſons, I do obſerve to your lordſhips three things, being all effectually pertinent to the queſtion in hand.

The firſt is, that if any man conceive that the reaſons for the poſt-nati might ſerve as well for the ante-nati, he may by the diſtribution which we have made, plainly perceive his error. For the law looketh not back; and therefore cannot, by any matter ex poſt facto, after birth, alter the ſtate of the birth; wherein no doubt the law hath a grave and profound reaſon; which is this, in few words, nemo ſubito fingitur; aliud eſt naſci, aliud fieri. We indeed more reſpect and affect thoſe worthy gentlemen of Scotland, whoſe merits and converſations we know; but the law, that proceeds upon general reaſon, and looks upon no mens faces, affecteth and privilegeth thoſe which drew their firſt breath under the obeiſance of the king of England.

The ſecond point is, that by the former diſtribution it appeareth that there be but two conditions by birth, either alien, or natural born; nam tertium penitus ignoramus. It is manifeſt then, that if the poſt-nati of Scotland be not natural born, they are alien born, and in no better degree at all than Flemings, French, Italians, Spaniſh, Germans, and others, which are all at this time alien friends, by reaſon his majeſty is in peace with all the world.

The third point ſeemeth to me very worthy the conſideration, which is, that in all the diſtributions of perſons, and the degrees of abilities or capacities, the king's act is all in all, without any manner of reſpect to law or parliament. For it is the king that makes an alien enemy, by proclaiming a war, wherewith the law or parliament intermeddles not. So the king only grants ſafe-conducts, wherewith law and parliament intermeddle not. It is the king likewiſe that maketh an alien friend, by concluding a peace, wherewith law and parliament intermeddle not. It is the king that makes a denizen by his charter, abſolutely of his prerogative and power, wherewith law and parliament intermeddle not. And therefore it is ſtrongly to be inferred, that as all theſe degrees depend wholly upon the king's act, and no ways upon law or parliament; ſo the fourth, although it comes not by the king's patent, but by operation of law, yet that the law, in that operation, reſpecteth only the king's perſon, without reſpect of ſubjection to law or parliament. And thus much by way of explanation and inducement: which being all matter in effect confeſſed, is the ſtrongeſt ground-work to that which is contradicted or controverted.

There followeth the confutation of the arguments on the contrary ſide.

That which hath been materially objected, may be reduced to four heads.

The firſt is, that the privilege of naturalization followeth allegiance, and that allegiance followeth the kingdom.

The ſecond is drawn from that common ground, cum duo jura concurrunt in una perſona, æquum eſt ac ſi eſſent in duobus; a rule, the words whereof are taken from the civil law; but the matter of it is received in all laws; being a very line or rule of reaſon, to avoid confuſion.

The third conſiſteth of certain inconveniencies conceived to enſue of this general naturalization, ipſo jure.

The fourth is not properly an objection, but a pre-occupation of an objection or proof on our part, by a diſtinction deviſed between countries devolute by deſcent, and acquired by conqueſt.

For the firſt, it is not amiſs to obſerve that thoſe who maintain this new opinion, whereof there is altum ſilentium in our books of law, are not well agreed in what form to utter and expreſs that: for ſome ſaid that allegiance hath reſpect to the law, ſome to the crown, ſome to the kingdom, ſome to the body politic of the king: ſo there is confuſion of tongues amongſt them, as it commonly cometh to paſs in opinions that have their foundations in ſubtilty and imagination of man's wit, and not in the ground of nature. But to leave their words, and to come to their proofs: they endeavour to prove this conceit by three manner of proofs: firſt, by reaſon; then, by certain inferences out of ſtatutes; and laſtly, by certain book-caſes, mentioning and reciting the forms of pleadings.

The reaſon they bring is this; that naturalization is an operation of the law of England; and ſo indeed it is, that may be the true genus of it.

Then they add, that granted, that the law of England is of force only within the kingdom and dominions of England, and cannot operate but where it is in force. But the law is not in force in Scotland, therefore that cannot endure this benefit of naturalization by a birth in Scotland.

This reaſon is plauſible and ſenſible, but extremely erroneous. For the law of England, for matters of benefit or forfeitures in England, operateth over the world. And becauſe it is truly ſaid that reſpublica continetur pœna et præmio, I will put a caſe or two of either.

It is plain that if a ſubject of England had conſpired the death of the king in foreign parts, it was by the common law of England treaſon. How prove I that? By the ſtatute of 35 H. VIII. cap. 2. wherein you ſhall find no words at all of making any new caſe of treaſon which was not treaſon before, but only of ordaining a form of trial; ergo, it was treaſon before: and if ſo, then the law of England works in foreign parts. So of contempts, if the king ſend his privy ſeal to any ſubject beyond the ſeas, commanding him to return, and he diſobey, no man will doubt but there is a contempt, and yet the fact enduring the contempt was committed in foreign parts.

Therefore the law of England doth extend to acts or matters done in foreign parts. So of reward, privilege or benefit, we need ſeek no other inſtance than the inſtance in queſtion; for I will put you a caſe that no man ſhall deny, where the law of England doth work and confer the benefit of naturalization upon a birth neither within the dominions of the kingdom, nor king of England. By the ſtatute of 25 E. III. which, if you will believe Huſſey, is but a declaration of the common law, all children born in any parts of the world, if they be of Engliſh parents continuing at that time as liege ſubjects to the king, and having done no act to forfeit the benefit of their allegiance, are ipſo facto naturalized. Nay, if a man look narrowly into the law in this point, he ſhall find a conſequence that may ſeem at the firſt ſtrange, but yet cannot be well avoided; which is, that if divers families of Engliſh men and women plant themſelves at Middleborough, or at Roan, or at Liſbon, and have iſſue, and their deſcendents do intermarry amongſt themſelves, without any intermixture of foreign blood; ſuch deſcendents are naturalized to all generations: for every generation is ſtill of liege parents, and therefore naturalized; ſo as you may have whole tribes and lineages of Engliſh in foreign countries.

And therefore it is utterly untrue that the law of England cannot operate or confer naturalization, but only within the bounds of the dominions of England.

To come now to their inferences upon ſtatutes.

The firſt is out of this ſtatute which I laſt recited. In which ſtatute it is ſaid, that in four ſeveral places there are theſe words, 'born 'within the allegiance of England;' or again, 'born without the 'allegiance of England;' which, ſay they, applies the allegiance to the kingdom, and not to the perſon of the king. To this the anſwer is eaſy; for there is no trope of ſpeech more familiar than to uſe the place of addition for the perſon. So we ſay commonly, the line of York, or the line of Lancaſter, for the lines of the duke of York, or the duke of Lancaſter. So we ſay the poſſeſſions of Somerſet or Warwick, intending the poſſeſſions of the dukes of Somerſet or earls of Warwick. So we ſee earls ſign, Saliſbury, Northampton, for the earls of Saliſbury or Northampton. And in the very ſame manner the ſtatute ſpeaks, allegiance of England, for allegiance of the king of England. Nay more, if there had been no variety in the penning of that ſtatute, this collection had had a little more force; for thoſe words might have been thought to have been uſed of purpoſe and in propriety; but you may find in three other ſeveral places of the ſame ſtatute, allegiance and obeiſance of the king of England, and eſpecially in the material and concluding place, that is to ſay, children whoſe parents were at the time of their birth at the faith and obeiſance of the king of England. So that it is manifeſt by this indifferent and promiſcuous uſe of both phraſes, the one proper, the other improper, that no man can ground any inference upon theſe words, without danger of cavillation.

The ſecond ſtatute, out of which they infer, is a ſtatute made in 32 Hen. VIII. touching the policy of ſtrangers tradeſmen within this realm. For the parliament finding that they did eat the Engliſhmen out of trade, and that they entertained no apprentices but of their own nation, did prohibit that they ſhould receive any apprentice but the king's ſubjects. In which ſtatute is ſaid, that in nine ſeveral places there is to be found this context of words, 'aliens born out of the king's obe'dience;' which is pregnant, ſay they, and doth imply that there be aliens born within the king's obedience. Touching this inference, I have heard it ſaid, qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice; but this is not worthy the name of cortex, it is but muſcus corticis, the moſs of the bark. For it is evident that the ſtatute meant to ſpeak clearly and without equivocation, and to a common underſtanding. Now then there are aliens in common reputation, and aliens in preciſe conſtruction of law; the ſtatute then meaning not to comprehend Iriſhmen, or Jerſeymen, or Calaiſmen, for explanation ſake, leſt the word alien might be extended to them in a vulgar acceptance, added thoſe further words, 'born out of 'the king's obedience.' Nay, what if we ſhould ſay, that thoſe words, according to the received laws of ſpeech, are no words of difference or limitation, but of declaration or deſcription of an alien, as if it had been ſaid with a videlicet, aliens; that is, ſuch as are born out of the king's obedience? They cannot put us from that conſtruction. But ſure I am, if the bark make for them, the pith makes for us; for the privilege of liberty which the ſtatute means to deny to aliens of entertaining apprentices, is denied to none born within the king's obedience, call them aliens or what you will. And therefore by their reaſon, a poſt-natus of Scotland ſhall by that ſtatute keep what ſtranger apprentices he will, and ſo is put in the degree of an Engliſh.

The third ſtatute, out of which inference is made, is the ſtatute of 14 E. III. cap. ſolo, which hath been ſaid to be our very caſe; and I am of that opinion too, but directly the other way. Therefore to open the ſcope and purpoſe of that ſtatute: after that the title to the crown of France was devolute to king E. III. and that he had changed his ſtile, changed his arms, changed his ſeal, as his majeſty hath done, the ſubjects of England, ſaith the ſtatute, conceived a fear that the realm of England might become ſubject to the realm of France, or to the king as king of France. And I will give you the reaſons of the double fear, that it ſhould become ſubject to the realm of France. They had this reaſon of fear. Normandy had conquered England; Normandy was feudal of France. Therefore becauſe the ſuperior ſeigniory of France was now united in right with the tenancy of Normandy, and that England, in regard of the Conqueſt, might be taken as a perquiſite to Normandy, they had probable reaſon to fear, that the kingdom of England might be drawn to be ſubject to the realm of France. The other fear, that England might become ſubject to the king as king of France, grew no doubt of this foreſight, that the kings of England might be like to make their manſion and ſeat of their eſtate in France, in regard of the climate, wealth, and glory of that kingdom; and thereby the kingdom of England might be governed by the king's mandates and precepts iſſuing as from the king of France. But they will ſay, whatſoever the occaſion was, here you have the difference authoriſed of ſubjection to a king generally, and ſubjection to a king as king of a certain kingdom. But to this I give an anſwer three-fold.

Firſt, it preſſeth not the queſtion; for doth any man ſay that a poſt-natus of Scotland is naturalized in England, becauſe he is a ſubject of the king as king of England? No, but generally becauſe he is the king's ſubject.

Secondly, the ſcope of this law is to make a diſtinction between crown and crown; but the ſcope of their argument is to make a difference between crown and perſon.

Laſtly, this ſtatute, as I ſaid, is our very caſe retorted againſt them; for this is a direct ſtatute of ſeparation, which preſuppoſeth, that the common law had made an union of the crowns in ſome degree, by virtue of the union in the king's perſon, if this ſtatute had not been made to ſtop and croſs the courſe of the common law in that point; as if Scotland now ſhould be ſuitors to the king, that an act might paſs to like effect, and upon like fear. And therefore if you will make good your diſtinction in this preſent caſe, ſhew us a ſtatute for that. But I hope you can ſhew no ſtatute of ſeparation between England and Scotland. And if any man ſay that this was a ſtatute declaratory of the common law, he doth not mark how that is penned: for after a kind of hiſtorical declaration in the preamble, that England was never ſubject to France, the body of the act is penned thus: 'The king doth grant and eſtabliſh;' which are words merely introductive novæ legis, as if the king gave a charter of franchiſe, and did inveſt, by a donative, the ſubjects of England with a new privilege or exemption, which by the common law they had not.

To come now to the book-caſes which they put; which I will couple together, becauſe they receive one joint anſwer.

The firſt is 42 E. III. fol. where the book ſaith, exception was taken, that the plaintiff was born in Scotland at Roſs out of the allegiance of England.

The next is 22 H. VI. fol. 38. Adrian's caſe; where it is pleaded, that a woman was born at Bruges out of the allegiance of England.

The third is 13 Eliz. Dyer, fol. 300. where the caſe begins thus: Doctor Story qui notorie dignoſcitur eſſe ſubditus regni Angliæ. In all theſe three, ſay they, that is pleaded, that the party is ſubject of the kingdom of England, and not of the king of England.

To theſe books I give this anſwer, that they be not the pleas at large, but the words of the reporter, who ſpeaks compendiouſly and narratively, and not according to the ſolemn words of the pleading. If you find a caſe put, that it is pleaded a man was ſeiſed in fee-ſimple, you will not infer upon that, that the words of the pleading were in feodo ſimplici, but ſibi et hæredibus ſuis. But ſhew me ſome precedent of a pleading at large, of natus ſub ligeantia regni Angliæ; for whereas Mr. Walter ſaid that pleadings are variable in this point, he would fain bring it to that; but there is no ſuch matter; for the pleadings are conſtant and uniform in this point. They may vary in the word fides, or ligeantia, or obedientia, and ſome other circumſtances. But in the form of regni and regis they vary not: neither can there, as I am perſuaded, be any one inſtance ſhewed forth to the contrary. See 9 Eliz. 4 Baggot's Aſſize, fol. 7. where the pleading at large is entered in the book. There you have alienigena natus extra ligeantiam domini regis Angliæ. See the precedents in the book of Entries, pl. 7. and two other places; for there be no more: and there you ſhall find ſtill ſub ligeantia domini regis, or extra ligeantiam domini regis. And therefore the forms of pleading, which are things ſo reverend, and are indeed towards the reaſons of the law, as palma and pugnus, containing the reaſon of the law, opened or unfolded, or diſplayed, they make all for us. And for the very words of reporters in books, you muſt acknowledge and ſay, ilicet obruimur numero. For you have 22 Aſſ. pl. 25. 27 Aſſ. the prior of Shells caſe, pl. 48. 14 H. IV. fol. 19. 3 H. VI. fol. 35. 6 H. VIII. in my lord Dyer, fol. 2. In all theſe books, the very words of the reporters have 'the allegiance of the king,' and not, the allegiance of England. And the book in the 24 Edw. III. which is your beſt book, although while it is toſſed at the bar, you have ſometimes the words 'allegiance 'of England,' yet when it comes to Thorp, chief juſtice, to give the rule, he ſaith, 'we will be certified by the roll, whether Scotland be 'within the allegiance of the king.' Nay, that farther form of pleading beateth down your opinion, that it ſufficeth not to ſay that he is born out of the allegiance of the king, and ſtay there, but he muſt ſhew in the affirmative, under the allegiance of what king or ſtate he was born. The reaſon whereof cannot be, becauſe it may appear whether he be a friend or an enemy, for that in a real action is all one. Nor it cannot be becauſe iſſue ſhall be taken thereupon; for the iſſue muſt ariſe on the other ſide upon indigena pleaded and traverſed. And therefore it can have no other reaſon, but to apprize the court more certainly, that the country of the birth is none of thoſe that are ſubject to the king.

As for the trial, that it ſhould be impoſſible to be tried, I hold it not worth the anſwering; for the venire facias ſhall go either where the natural birth is laid, although it be but by fiction, or if it be laid according to the truth, it ſhall be tried where the action is brought, otherwiſe you fall upon a main rock, that breaketh your argument in pieces; for how ſhould the birth of an Iriſhman be tried, or of a Jerſeyman? Nay, how ſhould the birth of a ſubject be tried, that is born of Engliſh parents in Spain or Florence, or any part of world? For to all theſe the like objection of trial may be made, becauſe they are within no counties: and this receives no anſwer. And therefore I will now paſs on to the ſecond main argument.

It is a rule of the civil law, ſay they, cum duo jura, &c. when two rights do meet in one perſon, there is no confuſion of them, but they remain ſtill in the eye of law diſtinct, as if they were in ſeveral perſons: and they bring examples of one man biſhop of two ſees, or one parſon that is rector of two churches. They ſay this unity in the biſhop or the rector doth not create any privity between the pariſhioners or dioceſeners, more than if there were ſeveral biſhops, or ſeveral parſons. This rule I allow, as was ſaid, to be a rule not of the civil law only but of common reaſon, but receiveth no forced or coined but a true and ſound diſtinction or limitation; which is, that it evermore faileth and deceiveth in caſes where there is any vigour or operation of the natural perſon; for generally in corporations the natural body is but ſuffulcimentum corporis corporati, it is but as a ſtock to uphold and bear out the corporate body; but otherwiſe it is in the caſe of the crown, as ſhall be manifeſtly proved in due place. But to ſhew that this rule receiveth this diſtinction, I will put but two caſes. The ſtatute of 21 H. VIII. ordaineth that a marquis may retain ſix chaplains qualified, a lord treaſurer of England four, a privy-counſellor three. The lord treaſurer Paulet was marquis of Wincheſter, lord treaſurer of England, and privy-counſellor, all at once. The queſtion was, whether he ſhould qualify thirteen chaplains? Now by the rule cum duo jura he ſhould; but adjudged, he ſhould not. And the reaſon was, becauſe the attendance of chaplains concerned and reſpected his natural perſon; he had but one ſoul, though he had three offices. The other caſe which I will put is the caſe of homage. A man doth homage to his lord for a tenancy held of the manor of Dale; there deſcendeth unto him afterwards a tenancy held of the manor of Sale, which manor of Sale is likewiſe in the hands of the ſame lord. Now by the rule cum duo jura, he ſhould do homage again, two tenancies and two ſeigniories, though but one tenant and one lord, aquum eſt ac ſi eſſet in duobus. But ruled that he ſhould not do homage again. Nay in the caſe of the king he ſhall not pay a ſecond reſpect of homage, as upon grave and deliberate conſideration it was reſolved, 24 H. VIII. and uſus ſcaccarii, as there is ſaid, accordingly. And the reaſon is no other, but becauſe when a man is ſworn to his lord, he cannot be ſworn over again: he hath but one conſcience, and the obligation of this oath trencheth between the natural perſon of the tenant and the natural perſon of the lord. And certainly the caſe of homage and tenure, and of homage liege, which is one caſe, are things of a near nature, ſave that the one is much inferior to the other; but it is good to behold theſe great matters of ſtate in caſes of lower element, as the eclipſe of the ſun is uſed to be in a pail of water.

The third main argument containeth certain ſuppoſed inconveniences, which may enſue of a general naturalization ipſo jure, of which kind three have been ſpecially remembred.

The firſt is the loſs of profit to the king upon letters of denization and purchaſes of aliens.

The ſecond is the concourſe of Scotſmen into this kingdom, to the infeebling of that realm of Scotland in people, and the impoveriſhing of this realm of England in wealth.

The third is, that the reaſon of this caſe ſtayeth not within the compaſs of the preſent caſe; for although it were ſome reaſon that Scotſmen were naturalized, being people of the ſame iſland and language, yet the reaſon which we urge, which is, that they are ſubject to the ſame king, may be applied to perſons every way more eſtranged from us than they are; as if in future time, in the king's deſcendents, there ſhould be a match with Spain, and the dominions of Spain ſhould be united with the crown of England, by one reaſon, ſay they, all the Weſt-Indies ſhould be naturalized; which are people not only alterius ſoli but alterius cœli.

To theſe conceits of inconvenience, how eaſy it is to give anſwer, and how weak they are in themſelves, I think no man that doth attentively ponder them can doubt. For how ſmall revenue can ariſe of ſuch denizations; and how honourable were it for the king to take eſcheats of his ſubjects, as if they were foreigners, for ſeizure of aliens lands are in regard the king hath no hold or command of their perſons and ſervices; every one may perceive. And for the confluence of Scotſmen, I think, we all conceive the ſpring-tide is paſt at the king's firſt coming in. And yet we ſee very few families of them throughout the cities and boroughs of England. And for the naturalizing of the Indies, we can readily help that, when the caſe comes; for we can make an act of parliament of ſeparation, if we like not their conſort. But theſe being reaſons politic, and not legal, and we are not now in parliament, but before a judgment-ſeat, I will not meddle with them, eſpecially ſince I have one anſwer which avoids and confounds all their objections in law; which is, that the very ſelf-ſame objections do hold in countries purchaſed by conqueſt. For in ſubjects obtained by conqueſt, it were more profit to indenizate by the poll; in ſubjects obtained by conqueſt, they may come in too faſt. And if king Henry VII. had accepted the offer of Chriſtopher Columbus, whereby the crown of England had obtained the Indies by conqueſt or occupation, all the Indies had been naturalized by the confeſſion of the adverſe part. And therefore ſince it is confeſſed, that ſubjects obtained by conqueſt are naturalized, and that all theſe objections are common and indifferent, as well to caſe of conqueſt as caſe of deſcent, theſe objections are in themſelves deſtroyed.

And therefore, to proceed now to overthrow that diſtinction of deſcent and conqueſt. Plato ſaith well, the ſtrongeſt of all authorities is, if a man can alledge the authority of his adverſary againſt himſelf. We do urge the confeſſion of the other ſide, that they confeſſed the Iriſh are naturalized; that they confeſs the ſubjects of the iſles of Jerſey and Guernſey, and Berwick, to be naturalized; and the ſubjects of Calais and Tournay, when they were Engliſh, were naturalized; as you may find in the 5 Eliz. in Dyer, upon the queſtion put to the judges by ſir Nicholas Bacon lord keeper.

To avoid this, they fly to a difference, which is new-coined, and is—I ſpeak not to the diſadvantage of the perſons that uſe it, for they are driven to it tanquam ad ultimum refugium, but the difference itſelf—it is, I ſay, full of ignorance and error. And therefore, to take a view of the ſupports of this difference, they alledge four reaſons.

The firſt is, that countries of conqueſt are made parcel of England, becauſe they are acquired by the arms and treaſure of England. To this I anſwer, that it were a very ſtrange argument, that if I wax rich upon the manor of Dale, and upon the revenue thereof purchaſe a cloſe by it, that it ſhould make that parcel of the manor of Dale. But I will ſet this new learning on ground with a queſtion or caſe put. For I oppoſe them that hold this opinion with this queſtion, if the king ſhould conquer any foreign country by an army compounded of Engliſhmen and Scotſmen, as it is like whenſoever wars are ſo it will be, I demand, whether this country conquered ſhall be naturalized both in England and Scotland, becauſe it was purchaſed by the joint arms of both? And if yea, whether any man will think it reaſonable, that ſuch ſubjects be naturalized in both kingdoms; the one kingdom not being naturalized towards the other? Theſe are the intricate conſequences of conceits.

A ſecond reaſon they alledge is, that countries won by conqueſt become ſubject to the laws of England, which countries patrimonial are not; and that the law doth draw the allegiance, and allegiance naturalization.

But to the major propoſition of that argument, touching the dependency of allegiance upon law, ſomewhat hath been already ſpoken, and full anſwer ſhall be given when we come to it. But in this place it ſhall ſuffice to ſay, that the minor propoſition is falſe; that is, that the laws of England are not ſuperinduced upon any country by conqueſt; but that the old laws remain until the king by his proclamation or letters patent declare other laws; and then if he will he may declare laws which be utterly repugnant, and differing from the laws of England. And hereof many ancient precedents and records may be ſhewed, that the reaſon why Ireland is ſubject to the laws of England is not ipſo jure upon conqueſt, but grew by a charter of king John; and that extended but to ſo much as was then in the king's poſſeſſion; for there are records in the time of king E. I. and II. of divers particular grants to ſundry ſubjects of Ireland and their heirs, that they might uſe and obſerve the laws of England.

The third reaſon is, that there is a politic neceſſity of intermixture of people in caſe of ſubjection by conqueſt, to remove alienations of mind, and to ſecure the ſtate; which holdeth not in caſe of deſcent. Here I perceive Mr. Walter hath read ſomewhat in matter of ſtate; and ſo have I likewiſe; though we may both quickly loſe ourſelves in cauſes of this nature. I find by the beſt opinions, that there be two means to aſſure and retain in obedience countries conquered, both very differing, almoſt in extremes, the one towards the other.

The one is by colonies, and intermixture of people, and tranſplantation of families, which Mr. Walter ſpoke of; and it was indeed the Roman manner; but this is like an old relick, much reverenced and almoſt never uſed. But the other, which is the modern manner, and almoſt wholly in practice and uſe, is by garriſons and citadels, and liſts or companies of men of war, and other like matters of terror and bridle.

To the firſt of theſe, which is little uſed, it is true that naturalization doth conduce; but to the latter it is utterly oppoſite, as putting too great pride and means to do hurt in thoſe that are meant to be kept ſhort and low. And yet in the very firſt caſe, of the Roman proceeding, naturalization did never follow by conqueſt, during all the growth of the Roman empire; but was ever conferred by charters, or donations, ſometimes to cities and towns, ſometimes to particular perſons, and ſometimes to nations, until the time of Adrian the emperor, and the law in orbe Romano (a): and that law or conſtitution is not referred to title of conqueſt and arms only, but to all other titles; as by the donation and teſtament of kings, by ſubmiſſion and dedition of ſtates, or the like: ſo as this difference was as ſtrange to them as to us. And certainly I ſuppoſe it will ſound ſtrangely in the hearing of foreign nations, that the law of England ſhould ipſo facto naturalize ſubjects of conqueſts, and ſhould not naturalize ſubjects which grow unto the king by deſcent; that is, that it ſhould confer the benefit and privilege of naturalization upon ſuch as cannot at the firſt but bear hatred and rancour to the ſtate of England, and have had their hands in the blood of the ſubjects of England, and ſhould deny the like benefit to thoſe that are conjoined with them by a more amiable mean; and that the law of England ſhould confer naturalization upon ſlaves and vaſſals, for people conquered are no better in the beginning, and ſhould deny it to freemen: I ſay, it will be marvelled at abroad, of what complexion the laws of England be made, that breedeth ſuch differences. But there is little danger of ſuch ſcandals; for this is a difference that the law of England never knew.

The fourth reaſon of this difference is, that in caſe of conqueſt the territory united can never be ſeparated again. But in caſe of deſcent, there is a poſſibility. If his majeſty's line ſhould fail, the kingdoms may ſever again to their reſpective heirs; as in the caſe of 8 Henry VI. where it is ſaid, that if land deſcend to a man from the anceſtor on the part of his father, and a rent iſſuing out of it from an anceſtor on the part of the mother; if the party die without iſſue, the rent is revived. As to this reaſon, I know well the continuance of the king's line is no leſs dear to thoſe that alledge the reaſon, than to us that confute it. So as I do not blame the preſſing of the reaſon. But it is anſwered with no great difficulty. For, firſt, the law doth never reſpect remote and foreign poſſibilities, as notably appeared in the great caſe between ſir Hugh Cholmley and Houlford in the Exchequer, where one in the remainder, to the end to bridle tenant in tail from ſuffering a common recovery, granted his remainder to the king; and becauſe he would be ſure to have it out again without charge or trouble when his turn was ſerved, he limited it to the king during the life of tenant in tail. Queſtion grew, whether this grant of remainder were good, yea or no. And it was ſaid to be frivolous and void, becauſe it could never by any poſſibility execute; for tenant in tail cannot ſurrender; and if he died, the remainder likewiſe ceaſed. To which it was anſwered, that there was a poſſibility that it might execute, which was thus: put caſe, the tenant in tail ſhould enter into religion, having no iſſue; then the remainder ſhould execute, and the king ſhould hold the land during the natural life of tenant in tail, notwithſtanding his civil death. But the court una voce exploded this reaſon, and ſaid, that monaſteries were down, and entries into religion gone, and they muſt be up again ere this could be; and that the law did not reſpect ſuch remote and foreign poſſibilities. And ſo we may hold this for the like: for I think we all hope, that neither of thoſe days ſhall ever come, either for monaſteries to be reſtored, or for the king's line to fail. But the true anſwer is, that the poſſibility ſubſequent, remote or not remote, doth not alter the operation of law for the preſent. For that ſhould be, as if in caſe of the rent which you put, you ſhould ſay, that in regard that the rent may be ſevered, it ſhould be ſaid to be in eſſe in the mean time, and ſhould be grantable; which is clearly otherwiſe. And ſo in the principal caſe, if that ſhould be, which God of his goodneſs forbid, ceſſante cauſa ceſſat effectus, the benefit of naturalization for the time to come is diſſolved. But that altereth not the operation of the law; rebus ſic ſtantibus. And therefore I conclude, that this difference is but a device full of weakneſs and ignorance; and that there is one and the ſame reaſon of naturalizing ſubjects by deſcent, and ſubjects by conqueſt; and that is the union in the perſon of the king; and therefore that the caſe of Scotland is as clear as that of Ireland, and they that grant the one cannot deny the other. And ſo I conclude the ſecond part, touching confutation.

To proceed therefore to the proofs of our part, your lordſhips cannot but know many of them muſt be already ſpent in the anſwer which we have made to the objections. For corruptio unius, generatio alterius, holds as well in arguments, as in nature: the deſtruction of an objection begets a proof. But nevertheleſs I will avoid all iteration, leſt I ſhould ſeem either to diſtract your memories, or to abuſe your patience; but will hold myſelf only to theſe proofs which ſtand ſubſtantially of themſelves, and are not intermixed with matter of confutation. I will therefore prove unto your lordſhips that the poſt-natus of Scotland is by the law of England natural, and ought ſo to be adjudged, by three courſes of proof.

1. Firſt, upon point of favour of law.
2. Secondly, upon reaſons and authorities of law.
3. And laſtly, upon former precedents and examples.

1. Favour of law. What mean I by that? The law is equal, and favoureth not. It is true, not perſons; but things or matters it doth favour. Is it not a common principle, that the law favoureth three things, life, liberty, and dower? And what is the reaſon of this favour? This, becauſe our law is grounded upon the law of nature. And theſe three things do flow from the law of nature, preſervation of life natural; liberty, which every beaſt or bird ſeeketh and affecteth naturally; the ſociety of man and wife, whereof dower is the reward natural. It is well, doth the law favour liberty ſo highly, as a man ſhall enfranchiſe his bondman when he thinketh not of it, by granting to him lands or goods; and is the reaſon of it quia naturâ omnes homines erant liberi; and that ſervitude or villenage doth croſs and abridge the law of nature? And doth not the ſelf-ſame reaſon hold in the preſent caſe? For, my lords, by the law of nature all men in the world are naturalized one towards another; they were all made of one lump of earth, of one breath of God; they had the ſame common parents: nay, at the firſt they were, as the ſcripture ſheweth, unius labii, of one language, until the curſe; which curſe, thanks be to God, our preſent caſe is exempted from. It was civil and national laws that brought in theſe words and differences of civis and exterus, alien and native. And therefore becauſe they tend to abridge the law of nature, the law favoureth not them, but takes them ſtrictly; even as our law hath an excellent rule, that cuſtoms of towns and boroughs ſhall be taken and conſtrued ſtrictly and preciſely, becauſe they do abridge and derogate from the law of the land. So by the ſame reaſon all national laws whatſoever are to be taken ſtrictly and hardly in any point wherein they abridge and derogate from the law of nature. Whereupon I conclude, that your lordſhips cannot judge the law for the other ſide, except the caſe be luce clarius. And if it appear to you but doubtful, as I think no man in his right ſenſes but will yield it to be at leaſt doubtful, then ought your lordſhips, under your correction be it ſpoken, to pronounce for us becauſe of the favour of the law. Furthermore, as the law of England muſt favour naturalization as a branch of the law of nature, ſo it appears manifeſtly, that it doth favour it accordingly. For is it not much to make a ſubject naturalized? By the law of England, it ſhould ſuffice, either place or parents. If he be born in England, it is no matter though his parents be Spaniards, or what you will. On the other ſide, if he be born of Engliſh parents, it ſkilleth not though he be born in Spain, or in any other place of the world. In ſuch ſort doth the law of England open her lap to receive in people to be naturalized; which indeed ſheweth the wiſdom and excellent compoſition of our law, and that it is the law of a warlike and magnanimous nation fit for empire. For look, and you ſhall find that ſuch kind of eſtates have been ever liberal in point of naturalization: whereas merchant-like and envious eſtates have been otherwiſe.

For the reaſons of law joined with authorities, I do firſt obſerve to your lordſhips, that our aſſertion or affirmation is ſimple and plain: that it ſufficeth to naturalization, that there be one king, and that the party be natus ad fidem regis, agreeable to the definition of Littleton, which is: alien is he which is born out of the allegiance of our lord the king. They of the other ſide ſpeak of reſpects, and quoad, and quatenus, and ſuch ſubtilties and diſtinctions. To maintain therefore our aſſertion, I will uſe three kinds of proofs.

The firſt is, that allegiance cannot be applied to the law or kingdom, but to the perſon of the king; becauſe the allegiance of the ſubject is more large and ſpacious, and hath a greater latitude and comprehenſion than the law or the kingdom. And therefore it cannot be a dependency of that without the which it may of itſelf ſubſiſt.

The ſecond proof which I will uſe is, that the natural body of the king hath an operation and influence into his body politic, as well as his body politick hath upon his body natural; and therefore, that although his body politic of king of England, and his body politic of king of Scotland, be ſeveral and diſtinct, yet nevertheleſs his natural perſon, which is one, hath an operation upon both, and createth a privity between them.

And the third proof is the binding text of five ſeveral ſtatutes.

For the firſt of theſe, I ſhall make it manifeſt, that the allegiance is of a greater extent and dimenſion than laws or kingdom, and cannot conſiſt by the laws merely; becauſe it began before laws, it continueth after laws, and it is in vigour where laws are ſuſpended and have not their force.

That it is more ancient than law, appeareth by that which was ſpoken in the beginning by way of inducement, where I did endeavour to demonſtrate, that the original age of kingdoms was governed by natural equity, that kings were more ancient than lawgivers, that the firſt ſubmiſſions were ſimple, and upon confidence to the perſon of kings, and that the allegiance of ſubjects to hereditary monarchies can no more be ſaid to conſiſt by laws, than the obedience of children to parents.

That allegiance continueth after laws, I will only put the caſe, which was remembered by two great judges in a great aſſembly, the one of them now with God: which was; that if a king of England ſhould be expulſed his kingdom, and ſome particular ſubjects ſhould follow him in flight or exile in foreign parts, and any of them there ſhould conſpire his death, upon his recovery of his kingdom, ſuch a ſubject might by the law of England be proceeded with for treaſon committed and perpetrated at what time he had no kingdom, and in place where the law did not bind.

That allegiance is in vigour and force where the power of law hath a ceſſation, appeareth notably in time of wars; for ſilent leges inter arma. And yet the ſovereignty and imperial power of the king is ſo far from being then extinguiſhed or ſuſpended, as contrariwiſe it is raiſed and made more abſolute; for then he may proceed by his ſupreme authority and martial law, without obſerving formalities of the laws of his kingdom. And therefore whoſoever ſpeaketh of laws, and the king's power by laws, and the ſubjects obedience or allegiance to laws, ſpeak but of one half of the crown. For Bracton, out of Juſtinian, doth truly define the crown to conſiſt of laws and arms, power civil and martial, with the latter whereof the law doth not intermeddle: ſo as where it is much ſpoken, that the ſubjects of England are under one law, and the ſubjects of Scotland are under another law, it is true at Edinburgh or Sterling, or again in London or York; but if Engliſhmen and Scotſmen meet in an army royal before Calais, I hope, then they are under one law. So likewiſe not only in time of war, but in time of peregrination. If a king of England travel or paſs through foreign territories, yet the allegiance of his ſubjects followeth him; as appeareth in that notable caſe which is reported in Fleta, where one of the train of king Edward I. as he paſſed through France from the Holy Land, imbezeled ſome ſilver plate at Paris, and juriſdiction was demanded of this crime by the French king's counſel at law, ratione ſoli, and demanded likewiſe by the officers of king Edward, ratione perſonæ: and after much ſolemnity, conteſtation, and interpleading, it was ruled and determined for king Edward, and the party tried and judged before the knight marſhal of the king's houſe, and hanged after the Engliſh law, and execution in St. Germains meadows. And ſo much for the firſt proof.

(a) [The law here alluded to by lord Bacon is one, by which the emperor Antoninus Caracalla communicated the rights of a Roman citizen to the whole Roman empire. It is noticed in Juſtinian's Digeſt, lib. 1. tit. 5. l. 17. and in Novell. 79. c. 5. Antoninus Pius and other emperors have been named as authors of the law. But Heineccius, who is very full and ſatisfactory on the point, is clear in opinion, that this extenſion was firſt made by Caracalla. Heinecc. Syntagm. Append. lib. 1. ſ. 15. EDITOR.]

For my ſecond main proof, that is drawn from the true and legal diſtinction of the king's ſeveral capacities; for they that maintain the contrary opinion do in effect deſtroy the whole force of the king's natural capacity, as if it were drowned and ſwallowed up by his politic. And therefore I will firſt prove to your lordſhips, that his two capacities are in no ſort confounded. And ſecondly, that as his capacity politic worketh ſo upon his natural perſon, as it makes it differ from all other the natural perſons of his ſubjects; ſo è converſo, his natural body worketh ſo upon his politic, as the corporation of the crown utterly differeth from all other corporations within the realm.

For the firſt, I will vouch you the very words which I find in that notable caſe of the duchy, where the queſtion was, whether the grants of king Edward VI. for duchy lands ſhould be avoided in points of nonage. The caſe, as your lordſhips know well, is reported by Mr. Plowden as the general reſolution of all the judges of England, and the king's learned counſel, Rouſwell the ſolicitor only excepted. There I find the ſaid words, Comment. fol. 215. ‘There is in the king not a body natural alone, nor a body politic alone, but a body natural and politic together: corpus corporatum in corpore naturali, et corpus naturale in corpore corporato.’ The like I find in the great caſe of the lord Berkley ſet down by the ſame reporter, Comment. fol. 234. ‘Though there be in the king two bodies, and that thoſe two bodies are conjoined, yet are they by no means confounded the one by the other.’

Now then to ſee the mutual and reciprocal intercourſe, as I may term it, or influence or communication of qualities, that theſe bodies have the one upon the other. The body politic of the crown induceth the natural perſon of the king with theſe perfections; that the king in law ſhall never be ſaid to be within age; that his blood ſhall never be corrupted; and that if he were attainted before, the very aſſumption of the crown purgeth it; that the king ſhall not take but by matter of record, although he take in his natural capacity as upon a gift in tail; that his body in law ſhall be ſaid to be as it were immortal; for there is no death of the king in law, but a demiſe, as it is termed: with many other the like privileges and differences from other natural perſons, too long to rehearſe, the rather becauſe the queſtion laboureth not in that part. But on the contrary part let us ſee what operations the king's natural perſon hath upon his crown and body politic. Of which the chiefeſt and greateſt is, that it cauſeth the crown to go by deſcent, which is a thing ſtrange, and contrary to the courſe of all corporations, which evermore take in ſucceſſion, and not by deſcent; for no man can ſhew me in all the corporations of England, of what nature ſoever, whether they conſiſt of one perſon, or of many, or whether they be temporal or eccleſiaſtical, any one takes to him and his heirs, but all to him and his ſucceſſors. And therefore here you may ſee what a weak courſe that is, to put caſes of biſhops and parſons, and the like, and to apply them to the crown. For the king takes to him and his heirs in the manner of a natural body, and the word, ſucceſſors, is but ſuperfluous; and where that is uſed, that is ever duly placed after the word, heirs, ‘the king, his heirs, and ſucceſſors.’

Again, no man can deny but uxor et filius ſunt nomina naturæ. A corporation can have no wife, nor a corporation can have no ſon. How is it then, that it is treaſon to compaſs the death of the queen or of the prince? There is no part of the body politic of the crown in either of them, but it is intirely in the king. So likewiſe we find in the caſe of the lord Berkley, the queſtion was, whether the ſtatute of 35 Henry VIII. for that part which concerned queen Catharine Par's jointure, were a public act or no, of which the judges ought to take notice, not being pleaded; and judged a public act. So the like queſtion came before your lordſhip, my lord chancellor, in ſerjeant Heale's caſe; whether the ſtatute of 11 Edward III. concerning the intailing of the dukedom of Cornwall to the prince, were a public act or no; and ruled likewiſe a public act. Why? No man can affirm but theſe be operations of law, proceeding from the dignity of the natural perſon of the king; for you ſhall never find, that another corporation whatſoever of a biſhop, or maſter of a college, or mayor of London, worketh any thing in law upon the wiſe or ſon of the biſhop or the mayor. And to conclude this point, and withal to come near to the caſe in queſtion, I will ſhew you where the natural perſon of the king hath not only an operation in the caſe of his wife and children, but likewiſe in the caſe of his ſubjects, which is the very queſtion in hand. As for example, I put this caſe. Can a Scotſman, who is a ſubject to the natural perſon of the king, and not to the crown of England; can a Scotſman, I ſay, be an enemy by the law to the ſubjects of England? Or muſt he not of neceſſity, if he ſhould invade England, be a rebel and no enemy, not only as to the king, but as to the ſubject? Or can any letters of mart or repriſal be granted againſt a Scotſman that ſhall ſpoil an Engliſhman's goods at ſea? And certainly this caſe doth preſs exceeding near the principal caſe; for it proveth plainly, that the natural perſon of the king hath ſuch a communication of qualities with his body politic, as it makes the ſubjects of either kingdom ſtand in another degree of privity one towards the other, than they did before. And ſo much for the ſecond proof.

For the five acts of parliament which I ſpoke of, which are concluding to this queſtion.

The firſt of them is that concerning the baniſhment of Hugh Spencer in the time of king Edward II. in which act there is contained the charge and accuſation whereupon his exile proceeded. One article of which charge is ſet down in theſe words: ‘Homage and oath of the ſubject is more by reaſon of the crown than by reaſon of the perſon of the king. So that if the king doth not guide himſelf by reaſon in right of the crown, his lieges are bound by their oath to the crown to remove the king.’ By which act doth plainly appear the perilous conſequence of this diſtinction concerning the perſon of the king and the crown. And yet I do acknowledge juſtly and ingenuouſly a great difference between that aſſertion and this, which is now maintained: for it is one thing to make things diſtinct, another thing to make them ſeparable, aliud eſt diſtinctio, aliud ſeparatio; and therefore I aſſure myſelf, that thoſe that now uſe and urge that diſtinction, do as firmly hold, that the ſubjection to the king's perſon and to the crown are inſeparable, though diſtinct, as I do. And it is true that the poiſon of the opinion and aſſertion of Spencer is like the poiſon of a ſcorpion, more in the tail than in the body: for it is the inference that they make, which is, that the king may be depoſed or removed, that is the treaſon and diſloyalty of that opinion. But by your leave, the body is never a whit the more wholſom meat for having ſuch a tail belonging to it. Therefore we ſee that is locus lubricus, an opinion from which a man may eaſily ſlide into an abſurdity. But upon this act of parliament I will only note one circumſtance more, and ſo leave it, which may add authority unto it in the opinion of the wiſeſt; and that is, that theſe Spencers were not ancient nobles or great patriots that were charged and proſecuted by upſtarts and favourites: for then it might be ſaid, that it was but the action of ſome flatterers, who uſe to extol the power of monarchs to be infinite. But it was contrary; a proſecution of thoſe perſons being favourites by the nobility; ſo as the nobility themſelves, which ſeldom do ſubſcribe to the opinion of an infinite power of monarchs, yet even they could not endure, but their blood did riſe to hear that opinion, that ſubjection is owing to the crown rather than to the perſon of the king.

The ſecond act of parliament, which determined this caſe, is the act of recognition in the firſt year of his majeſty, wherein you ſhall find, that in two ſeveral places, the one in the preamble, the other in the body of the act, the parliament doth recogniſe, that theſe two realms of England and Scotland are under one imperial crown. The parliament doth not ſay under one monarchy or king, which might refer to the perſon, but under one imperial crown, which cannot be applied but to the ſovereign power of regiment comprehending both kingdoms. And the third act of parliament is the act made in the fourth year of his majeſty's reign, for the abolition of hoſtile laws; wherein your lordſhips ſhall find likewiſe in two places, that the parliament doth acknowledge, that there is an union of theſe two kingdoms already begun in his majeſty's perſon: ſo as by the declaration of that act, they have not only one king, but there is an union in inception in the kingdoms themſelves.

Theſe two are judgments in parliament by way of declaration of law, againſt which no man can ſpeak. And certainly theſe are righteous and true judgments to be relied upon; not only for the authority of them, but for the verity of them; for to any that ſhall well and deeply weigh the effects of law upon this conjunction, it cannot but appear, that although partes integrales of the kingdom, as the philoſophers ſpeak, ſuch as the laws, the officers, the parliament, are not yet commixed; yet nevertheleſs there is but one and the ſelf-ſame fountain of ſovereign power depending upon the ancient ſubmiſſion, whereof I ſpake in the beginning; and in that ſenſe the crowns and the kingdoms are truly ſaid to be united.

And the force of this truth is ſuch, that a grave and learned gentleman, that defended the contrary opinion, did confeſs thus far: that in ancient times, when monarchies, as he ſaid, were but heaps of people without any exact form of policy; that then naturalization and communication of privileges did follow the perſon of the monarch; but otherwiſe ſince ſtates were reduced to a more exact form: ſo as thus far we did conſent; but ſtill I differ from him in this, that theſe more exact forms, wrought by time and cuſtom and laws, are nevertheleſs ſtill upon the firſt foundation, and do ſerve only to perfect and corroborate the force and bond of the firſt ſubmiſſion, and in no ſort to diſannul or deſtroy it.

And therefore with theſe two acts do I likewiſe couple the act of 14 Edward III. which hath been alledged of the other ſide. For by collating of that act with this former two, the truth of that we affirm will the more evidently appear, according unto the rule of reaſon: oppoſita juxta ſe poſita magis eluceſcunt. That act of 14 is an act of ſeparation. Theſe two acts formerly recited are acts tending to union. This act is an act that maketh a new law; it is by the words of grant and eſtabliſh. Theſe two acts declare the common law as it is, being by words of recognition and confeſſion.

And therefore upon the difference of theſe laws you may ſubſtantially ground this poſition: that the common law of England, upon the adjunction of any kingdom unto the king of England, doth make ſome degree of union in the crowns and kingdoms themſelves; except by a ſpecial act of parliament they be diſſevered.

Laſtly, the fifth act of parliament which I promiſed, is the act made in the 42 of E. III. cap. 10. which is an expreſs deciſion of the point in queſtion. The words are, ‘item, (upon the petition put into parliament by the commons) that infants born beyond the ſeas in the ſeigniories of Calais, and elſewhere within the lands and ſeigniories that pertain to our ſovereign lord the king beyond the ſeas, be as able and inheritable of their heritage in England, as other infants born within the realm of England, it is accorded that the common law and the ſtatute formerly made be holden.’

Upon this act I infer thus much; firſt, that ſuch as the petition mentioneth were naturalized, the practice ſhews; then if ſo, it muſt be either by common law or ſtatute, for ſo the words report: not by ſtatute, for there is no other ſtatute but 25 E. III. and that extends to the caſe of birth out of the king's obedience, where the parents are Engliſh; ergo it was by the common law, for that only remains. And ſo by the declaration of this ſtatute at the common law, ‘all infants, born within the lands and ſeigniories (for I give you the very words again) that pertain to our ſovereign lord the king, (it is not ſaid, as are the dominions of England) are as able and inheritable of their heritage in England, as other infants born within the realm of England.’ What can be more plain? And ſo I leave ſtatutes and go to precedents; for though the one do bind more, yet the other ſometimes doth ſatisfy more.

For precedents, in the producing and uſing of that kind of proof, of all others it behoveth them to be faithfully vouched; for the ſuppreſſing or keeping back of a circumſtance, may change the caſe: and therefore I am determined to urge only ſuch precedents, as are without all colour or ſcruple of exception or objection, even of thoſe objections which I have, to my thinking, fully anſwered and confuted. This is now, by the providence of God, the fourth time that the line and kings of England have had dominions and ſeigniories united unto them as patrimonies, and by deſcent of blood; four unions, I ſay, there have been, incluſive with this laſt. The firſt was of Normandy, in the perſon of William, commonly called the Conqueror. The ſecond was of Gaſcoigne, and Guienne, and Anjou, in the perſon of king Henry II. in his perſon, I ſay, though by ſeveral titles. The third was of the crown of France, in the perſon of king Edward III. And the fourth of the kingdom of Scotland, in his majeſty. Of theſe I will ſet aſide ſuch as by any cavillation can be excepted unto. Firſt, I will ſet aſide Normandy; becauſe it will be ſaid, that the difference of countries accruing by conqueſt, from countries annexed by deſcent, in matter of communication of privileges, holdeth both ways, as well of the part of the conquering kingdom, as the conquered; and therefore that although Normandy was not a conqueſt of England, yet England was a conqueſt of Normandy, and ſo a communication of privileges between them. Again, ſet aſide France; for that it will be ſaid that although the king had a title in blood and by deſcent, yet that title was executed and recovered by arms, ſo as it is a mixt title of conqueſt and deſcent, and therefore the precedent not ſo clear.

There remains then Gaſcoigne and Anjou, and that precedent likewiſe I will reduce and abridge to a time, to avoid all queſtion. For it will be ſaid of them alſo, that after they were loſt and recovered in ore gladii, that the ancient title of blood was extinct; and that the king was in upon his new title by conqueſt. And Mr. Walter hath found a book-caſe in 13 H. VI. abridged by Mr. Fitz-Herbert, in title of Protection, placito 56. where a protection was caſt, quia profecturus in Gaſconiam with the earl of Huntingdon, and challenged becauſe it was not a voyage royal; and the juſtices thereupon required the ſight of the commiſſion, which was brought before them, and purported power to pardon felonies and treaſon, power to coin money, and power to conquer them that reſiſt: whereby Mr. Walter, finding the word conqueſt, collected that the king's title at that time was reputed to be by conqueſt. Wherein I may not omit to give obiter that anſwer which law and truth provide, namely, that when any king obtaineth by war a country whereunto he hath right by birth, that he is ever in upon his ancient right, not upon his purchaſe by conqueſt; and the reaſon is, that there is as well a judgment and recovery by war and arms, as by law and courſe of juſtice. For war is a tribunal-ſeat, wherein God giveth the judgment, and the trial is by battle or duel, as in the caſe of trial of private right: and then it follows, that whoſoever cometh in by eviction, comes in his remitter: ſo as there will be no difference in countries whereof the right cometh by deſcent, whether the poſſeſſion be obtained peaceably or by war. But yet nevertheleſs, becauſe I will utterly take away all manner of evaſion and ſubterfuge, I will yet ſet apart that part of time, in and during the which the ſubjects of Gaſcoigne and Guienne might be thought to be ſubdued by a re-conqueſt. And therefore I will not meddle with the prior of Shelley's caſe, though it be an excellent caſe; becauſe it was in the time of 27 E. III. neither will I meddle with any caſes, records, or precedents, in the time of king H. V. or king H. VI. for the ſame reaſon; but will hold myſelf to a portion of time from the firſt uniting of theſe provinces in the time of king H. II. until the time of king John, at what time thoſe provinces were loſt; and from that time again unto the ſeventeenth year of the reign of king E. II. at what time the ſtatute of prærogativa regis was made, which altered the law in the point in hand.

That both in theſe times the ſubjects of Gaſcoigne, and Guienne, and Anjou, were naturalized for inheritance in England by the laws of England, I ſhall manifeſtly prove; and the proof proceeds, as to the former time, which is our caſe, in a very high degree à minore ad majus, and as we ſay, à multo fortiori. For if this privilege of naturalization remained unto them when the countries were loſt, and became ſubjects in poſſeſſion to another king, much more did they enjoy it as long as they continued under the king's ſubjection.

Therefore to open the ſtate of this point. After theſe provinces were, through the perturbations of the ſtate in the unfortunate time of king John, loſt and ſevered, the principal perſons which did adhere unto the French, were attainted of treaſon, and their eſcheats here in England taken and ſeized. But the people, that could not reſiſt the tempeſt when their heads and leaders were revolted, continued inheritable to their poſſeſſions in England; and reciprocally the people of England inherited and ſucceeded to their poſſeſſions in Gaſcoigne, and were both accounted ad fidem utriuſque regis, until the ſtatute of prærogativa regis; wherein the wiſdom and juſtice of the law of England is highly to be commended. For of this law there are two grounds of reaſon, the one of equity, the other of policy. That of equity was, becauſe the common people were in no fault, but, as the ſcripture ſaith in a like caſe, quid fecerunt oves iſtæ? It was the cowardiſe and diſloyalty of their governors that deſerved puniſhment, but what had theſe ſheep done? And therefore to have puniſhed them, and deprived them of their lands and fortunes, had been unjuſt. That of policy was, becauſe if the law had forthwith, upon the loſs of the countries by an accident of time, pronounced the people for aliens, it had been a kind of acceſſion of their right, and a diſclaimer in them, and ſo a greater difficulty to recover them. And therefore we ſee the ſtatute, which altered the law in this point, was made in the time of a weak king, that, as it ſeemed, deſpaired ever to recover his right, and therefore thought better to have a little preſent profit by eſcheats, than the continuance of his claim, and the countenance of his right, by the admitting of them to enjoy their inheritance as they did before.

The ſtate therefore of this point being thus opened, it reſteth to prove our aſſertion, that they were naturalized; for the clearing whereof I ſhall need but to read the authorities, they be ſo direct and pregnant. The firſt is the very text of the ſtatute of prærogativa regis. Rex habebit eſcaetas de terris Normannorum, cujuſcunque feodi fuerint, ſalvo ſervitio, quod pertinet ad capitales dominos feodi illius: et hoc ſimiliter intelligendum eſt, ſi aliqua hæreditas deſcendat alicui nato in partibus tranſmarinis, et cujus anteceſſores fuerunt ad fidem regis Franciæ, ut tempore regis Johannis, et non ad fidem regis Angliæ, ſicut contigit de baronia Monumetæ, &c.

By which ſtatute it appears plainly, that before the time of king John there was no colour of any eſcheat, becauſe they were the king's ſubjects in poſſeſſion, as Scotland now is; but only it determines the law from that time forward.

This ſtatute, if it had in it any obſcurity, it is taken away by two lights; the one placed before it, and the other placed after it; both authors of great credit, the one for ancient, the other for late times.

The former is Bracton, in his cap. de exceptionibus, lib. 5. fol. 427. and his words are theſe: eſt etiam et alia exceptio, quæ tenenti competit ex perſona petentis, propter defectum nationis, quæ dilatoria eſt, et non perimit actionem; ut ſi quis alienigena, qui fuerit ad fidem regis Franciæ, et actionem inſtituat verſus aliquem, qui fuerit ad fidem regis Angliæ, tali non reſpondeatur, ſaltem donec terræ fuerint communes. By theſe words it appeareth, that after the loſs of the provinces beyond the ſeas, the naturalization of the ſubjects of thoſe provinces was in no ſort extinguiſhed, but only was in ſuſpence during the time of war, and no longer; for he ſaith plainly, that the exception, which we call plea, to the perſon of an alien, was not peremptory, but only dilatory; that is to ſay, during the time of war, and until there were peace concluded, which he terms by theſe words, donec terræ fuerint communes: which, though the phraſe ſeem ſomewhat obſcure, is expounded by Bracton himſelf in his fourth book, fol. 297. to be of peace made and concluded, whereby the inhabitants of England and thoſe provinces might enjoy the profits and fruits of their lands in either place communiter, that is, reſpectively, or as well the one as the other. So as it is clear they were no aliens in right, but only interrupted and debarred of ſuits in the king's courts in time of war.

The authority after the ſtatute is that of Mr. Stamford, the beſt expoſitor of a ſtatute that hath been in our law; a man of reverend judgment and excellent order in his writings. His words are in his expoſition upon the branch of the ſtatute which we read before. 'By this branch it 'ſhould appear, that at this time men of Normandy, Gaſcoigne, Guienne, 'Anjou, and Britain, were inheritable within this realm, as well as Engliſhmen; becauſe that they were ſometimes ſubjects to the kings of England, and under their dominion, until king John's time, as is aforeſaid: 'and yet after his time, thoſe men, ſaving ſuch whoſe lands were taken 'away for treaſon, were ſtill inheritable within this realm till the making 'of this ſtatute; and in the time of peace between the two kings of 'England and France, they were anſwerable within this realm, if they 'had brought any action for their lands and tenements.'

So as by theſe three authorities, every one ſo plainly purſuing the other, we conclude that the ſubjects of Gaſcoigne, Guienne, Anjou, and the reſt, from their firſt union by deſcent, until the making of the ſtatute of prærogativa regis, were inheritable in England, and to be anſwered in the king's courts in all actions, except it were in time of war. Nay more, which is de abundanti, that when the provinces were loſt, and diſannexed, and that the king was but king de jure over them, and not de facto, yet nevertheleſs the privilege of naturalization continued.

There reſteth yet one objection, rather plauſible to a popular underſtanding than any ways forcible in law or learning, which is a difference taken between the kingdom of Scotland and theſe duchies; for that the one is a kingdom, and the other was not ſo; and therefore that thoſe provinces, being of an inferior nature, did acknowledge our laws, and ſeals, and parliament, which the kingdom of Scotland doth not.

This difference was well given over by Mr. Walter; for it is plain that a kingdom and abſolute dukedom, or any other ſovereign eſtate, do differ honore, and not poteſtate: for divers duchies and countries, that are now, were ſometimes kingdoms; and divers kingdoms, that are now, were ſometimes duchies, or of other inferior ſtile: wherein we need not travel abroad, ſince we have in our own ſtate ſo notorious an inſtance of the country of Ireland, whereof king H. VIII. of late time was the firſt that writ himſelf king, the former ſtile being lord of Ireland, and no more; and yet kings had the ſame authority before, that they have had ſince, and the ſame nation the ſame marks of a ſovereign ſtate, as their parliaments, their arms, their coins, as they now have: ſo as this is too ſuperficial an allegation to labour upon.

And if any do conceive that Gaſcoigne and Guienne were governed by the laws of England: firſt, that cannot be in reaſon; for it is a true ground, that whereſoever any prince's title unto any country is by law, he can never change the laws, for that they create his title: and therefore no doubt thoſe duchies retained their own laws; which if they did, then they could not be ſubject to the laws of England. And next, again, the fact or practice was otherwiſe, as appeareth by all conſent of ſtory and record: for thoſe duchies continued governed by the civil law, their trials by witneſſes, and not by jury, their lands teſtamentary, and the like.

Now for the colours that ſome have endeavoured to give, that they ſhould have been ſubordinate to the government of England; they were partly weak, and partly ſuch as make ſtrongly againſt them: for as to that, that writs of habeas corpus under the great ſeal of England have gone to Gaſcoigne, it is no manner of proof; for that the king's writs, which are mandatory, and not writs of ordinary juſtice, may go to his ſubjects into any foreign parts whatſoever, and under what ſeal it pleaſeth him to uſe. And as to that, that ſome acts of parliament have been cited, wherein the parliaments of England have taken upon them to order matters of Gaſcoigne; if thoſe ſtatutes be well looked into, nothing doth more plainly convince the contrary; for they intermeddle with nothing but that that concerneth either the Engliſh ſubjects perſonally, or the territories of England locally, and never the ſubjects of Gaſcoigne. For look upon the ſtatute of 27 E. III. cap. 5. there it is ſaid, that there ſhall be no foreſtalling of wines. But by whom? Only by Engliſh merchants; not a word of the ſubjects of Gaſcoigne; and yet no doubt they might be offenders in the ſame kind. So in the ſixth chapter it is ſaid, that all merchants Gaſcoignes may ſafely bring wines into what part it ſhall pleaſe them. Here now are the perſons of Gaſcoignes. But then the place whither? Into the realm of England. And in the ſeventh chapter, that erects the ports of Bourdeaux and Bayonne for the ſtaple towns of wine; the ſtatute ordains, 'that if any,' but who? 'Engliſh merchant, or his 'ſervants, ſhall buy or bargain other where, his body ſhall be arreſted by 'the ſteward of Gaſcoigne, or the conſtable of Bourdeaux.' True, for the officers of England could not catch him in Gaſcoigne. But what ſhall become of him, ſhall he be proceeded with within Gaſcoigne? No, but he ſhall be ſent over into England into the Tower of London.

And this doth notably diſcloſe the reaſon of that cuſtom which ſome have ſought to wreſt the other way: that cuſtom, I ſay, whereof a form doth yet remain, that in every parliament the king doth appoint certain committees in the upper-houſe to receive the petitions of Normandy, Guienne, and the reſt; which, as by the former ſtatute doth appear, could not be for the ordering of the governments there, but for the liberties and good uſage of the ſubjects of thoſe parts when they came hither; or vice verſa, for the reſtraining of the abuſes and miſdemeanors of our ſubjects when they went thither.

Wherefore I am now at an end. For us to ſpeak of the miſchiefs, I hold it not fit for this place, leſt we ſhould ſeem to bend the laws to policy, and not to take them in their true and natural ſenſe. It is enough that every man knows, that it is true of theſe two kingdoms, which a good father ſaid of the churches of Chriſt: ſi inſeparabiles inſuperabiles. Some things I may have forgot, and ſome things perhaps I may forget willingly; for I will not preſs any opinion or declaration of late time which may prejudice the liberty of this debate; but ex dictis, et ex non dictis, upon the whole matter I pray judgement for the plaintiff.

The writ of aſſiſe.

JAMES, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to the ſheriff of Middleſex, greeting: Robert Calvin, gent. hath complained to us, that Richard Smith, and Nicholas Smith, unjuſtly, and without judgment, have diſſeiſed him of his freehold in Haggard, otherwiſe Haggerſton, otherwiſe Aggerſton, in the pariſh of St. Leonard, in Shoreditch, within 30 years now laſt paſt; and therefore we command you, that if the ſaid Robert ſhall ſecure you to proſecute his claim, then that you cauſe the ſaid tenement to be reſeiſed with the chattels, which within it were taken, and the ſaid tenement with the chattels, to be in peace until Thurſday next after 15 days of St. Martin next coming; and in the mean time, cauſe 12 free and lawful men of that neighbourhood to view the ſaid tenement, and the names of them to be inbreviated; and ſummon them by good ſummoners, that they be then before us wherever we ſhall then be in England, ready thereof to make recognition; and put by ſureties, and ſafe pledges, the aforeſaid Richard and Nicholas or their bailiffs (if they cannot be found,) that they be then there, to hear the recognition; and have there the ſummoners, the names of the pledges, and this writ. Witneſs our ſelf at Weſtminſter, the 3d day of November, in the fifth year of our reign of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the one and fortieth.

For 40s. paid in the hanper,

Kindeſley.

Middleſex, ſſ.

The Count.

THE aſſiſe cometh to recognize, if Rich. Smith, and Nich. Smith, unjuſtly, and without judgment, did diſſeiſe Rob. Calvin, gent. of his freehold in Haggard, otherwiſe Haggerſton, otherwiſe Aggerſton, in the pariſh of St. Leonard in Shoreditch, within thirty years now laſt paſt: and whereupon, the ſaid Robert, who is within the age of twenty-one years, by John Parkinſon and William Parkinſon, his guardians, by the court of the ſaid king here to this being jointly and ſeverally ſpecially admitted, complaineth; that they diſſeiſed him of one meſſuage with the appurtenances, &c.

Alien née pleaded in bar.

And the ſaid Richard and Nicholas, by William Edwards, their attorney, come and ſay, that the ſaid Robert ought not to be anſwered to his writ aforeſaid, becauſe they ſay, that the ſaid Robert is an alien, born on the 5th day of November, in the 3d year of the reign of the K. that now is, of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the thirty-ninth, at Edinburgh, within his kingdom of Scotland, aforeſaid, and within the allegiance of the ſaid lord the king of the ſaid kingdom of Scotland, and out of the allegiance of the ſaid lord the king of his kingdom of England; and at the time of the birth of the ſaid Robert Calvin, and long before, and continually afterwards, the aforeſaid kingdom of Scotland, by the proper rights, laws, and ſtatutes of the ſame kingdom, and not by the rights, laws, or ſtatutes of this kingdom of England, was and yet is ruled and governed. And this he is ready to verify, and thereupon prayeth judgment, if the ſaid Robert, to his ſaid writ aforeſaid, ought to be anſwered, &c.

Demurrer.

And the aforeſaid Robert Calvin ſaith, that the aforeſaid plea, by the aforeſaid Richard and Nicholas above pleaded, is inſufficient in law, to bar him the ſaid Robert from having an anſwer to his writ aforeſaid; and that the ſaid Robert, to the ſaid plea in manner and form aforeſaid pleaded, needeth not, nor by the law of the land is bound to anſwer; and this he is ready to verify, and hereof prayeth judgment; and that the ſaid Richard and Nicholas, to the aforeſaid writ of the ſaid Robert, may anſwer.

Joinder.

And the ſaid Richard and Nicholas, foraſmuch as they have above alledged ſufficient matter in law to bar him the ſaid Robert from having an anſwer to his ſaid writ, which they are ready to verify; which matter the aforeſaid Robert doth not gainſay, nor to the ſame doth in any ways anſwer, but the ſaid averment altogether refuſeth to admit as before; pray judgment, if the aforeſaid Robert ought to be anſwered to his ſaid writ, &c.

Continuances.

And becauſe the court of the lord the king here, are not yet adviſed of giving their judgment of and upon the premiſes, day thereof is given to the parties aforeſaid; before the lord the king at Weſtminſter, until Monday next after 8 days of St. Hilary, to hear their judgment thereof, becauſe the court of the lord the king here thereof are not yet, &c. And the aſſiſe aforeſaid remains to be taken before the ſaid lord the king, until the ſame Monday there, &c. And the ſheriff to diſtrain the recognitors of the aſſiſe aforeſaid: and in the interim to cauſe a view, &c. At which day, before the lord the king at Weſtminſter, come as well the aforeſaid R. Calvin, by his guardians aforeſaid, as the aforeſaid Rich. Smith and Nic. Smith, by their attorney aforeſaid; and becauſe the court of the lord the king here of giving their judgment of and upon the premiſes is not yet adviſed, day thereof is given to the parties aforeſaid before the lord the king at Weſtminſter, until Monday next after the morrow of the Aſcenſion of our Lord, to hear their judgment; becauſe the court of the lord the king here are not yet, &c. And the aſſiſe aforeſaid remains further to be taken, until the ſame Monday there, &c. and the ſheriff as before to diſtrain the recognitors of the aſſiſe aforeſaid, and in the interim to cauſe a view, &c. At which day, before the lord the king at Weſtminſter, come as well the aforeſaid Robert Calvin by his guardians aforeſaid, as the aforeſaid Richard Smith and Nicholas Smith, by their attorney aforeſaid, &c. and becauſe the court of the lord the king here, &c.

Curia adverſare vult.

The queſtion.

THE queſtion of this caſe as to matter in law was, whether Robert Calvin the plaintiff (being born in Scotland ſince the crown of England deſcended to his majeſty) be an alien born, and conſequently diſabled to bring any real or perſonal (a) action for any lands within the realm of England.

How this caſe hath proceeded.

After this caſe had been argued in the court of King's Bench, at the bar, by the counſel learned of either party, the judges of that court, upon conference and conſideration of the weight and importance thereof, adjourned the ſame (according to the ancient and ordinary courſe and order of the law) into the (b) Exchequer-Chamber, to be argued openly there; firſt by the counſel learned of either party, and then by all the judges of England; where afterwards the caſe was argued by Bacon ſolicitor general, on the part of the plaintiff, and by Laur. Hide, for the defendant; and afterward by Hobart attorney general, for the plaintiff, and by ſerjeant Hutton, for the defendant; and in Eaſter term laſt, the caſe was argued by Heron, puiſne baron of the Exchequer, and Foſter, puiſne judge of the court of Common Pleas; and on the ſecond day appointed for this caſe, by Crook, puiſne judge of the King's Bench, and Altham, baron of the Exchequer; the third day by Snigge, baron of the Exchequer, and Williams, one of the judges of the King's Bench; the fourth day by Daniel, one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas, and by Yelverton, one of the judges of the King's Bench: and in Trinity term following, by Warburton, one of the judges of the Common Pleas, and Fenner, one of the judges of the King's Bench; and after by Walmeſley, one of the judges of the Common Pleas, and Tanfield, chief baron; and at two ſeveral days in the ſame term, Coke, chief juſtice of the Common Pleas, Fleming, chief juſtice of the King's Bench, and ſir Thomas Eggerton, lord Elleſmere, lord chancellor of England, argued the caſe (the like plea in diſability of Robert Calvin's perſon being pleaded mutatis mutandis in the Chancery in a ſuit there for evidence concerning lands of inheritance, and by the lord chancellor adjourned alſo into the Exchequer-Chamber, to the end that one rule might over-rule both the ſaid caſes.)

The arguments and objections on the part of the defendant.

And firſt (for that I intend to make as ſummary a report as I can) I will at the firſt ſet down ſuch arguments and objections as were made and drawn out of this ſhort record againſt the plaintiff, by thoſe that argued for the defendants. It was obſerved, that in this plea there were four nouns, quatuor nomina, which were called, nomina operativa, becauſe from them all the ſaid arguments and objections on the part of the defendants were drawn; that is to ſay, 1. Ligeantia (which is twice repeated in the plea, for it is ſaid, infra ligeantiam domini regis regni ſui Scot', & extra ligeantiam domini regis regni ſui Angl'.) 2. Regnum (which alſo appeareth to be twice mentioned, viz. regnum Angl', and regnum Scot'.) 3. Leges (which are twice alledged, viz. leges Angl', and leges Scot', two ſeveral and diſtinct laws.) 4. Alienigena (which is the concluſion of all, viz. that Robert Calvin is alienigena).

1. Ligeantia. By the firſt it appeareth, that the defendants do make two ligeances, one of England, and another of Scotland, and from theſe ſeveral ligeances two arguments were framed, which briefly may be concluded thus. 1. Whoſoever is born infra ligeantiam, within the ligeance of king James of his kingdom of Scotland, is alienigena, an alien born, as to the kingdom of England; but Robert Calvin was born at Edinburgh, within the ligeance of the king of his kingdom of Scotland; therefore Robert Calvin is alienigena, an alien born, as to the kingdom of England. 2. Whoſoever is born extra ligeantiam, out of the ligeance of king James of his kingdom of England, is an alien as to the kingdom of England; but the plaintiff was born out of the ligeance of the king of his kingdom of England; therefore the plaintiff is an alien, &c. Both theſe arguments are drawn from the very words of the plea, viz. quod præd' Robertus eſt alienigena, natus 5 Nov. anno regni domini regis nunc Angl' &c. tertio apud Edenburgh infra regnum Scot', ac infra ligeantiam dicti domini regis dicti regni ſui Scot', ac extra ligeantiam dicti domini regis regni ſui Angl'.

(b) 2 Bulſt. 146.

2. Regna. From the ſeveral kingdoms, viz. regnum Angl' and regnum Scot', three arguments were drawn. 1. Quando (a) duo jura (imo dua regna) concurrunt in una perſona, æquum eſt ac ſi eſſent in diverſis; but in the king's perſon there concur two diſtinct and ſeveral kingdoms; therefore it is all one as if they were in divers perſons, and conſequently the plaintiff is an alien, as all the antenati are, for that they were born under the ligeance of another king. 2. Whatſoever is due to the king's ſeveral politic capacities of the ſeveral kingdoms is ſeveral and divided; but ligeance of each nation is due to the king's ſeveral politic capacities of the ſeveral kingdoms; ergo, the ligeance of each nation is ſeveral and divided, and conſequently the plaintiff is an alien, for that they that are born under ſeveral ligeances are aliens one to another. 3. Where the king hath ſeveral kingdoms by ſeveral titles and deſcents, there alſo are the ligeances ſeveral; but the king hath theſe two kingdoms by ſeveral titles and deſcents; therefore the ligeances are ſeveral. Theſe three arguments are collected alſo from the words of the plea before remembered.

3. Leges. From the ſeveral and diſtinct laws of either kingdom, they did reaſon thus. 1. Every ſubject, that is born out of the extent and reach of the laws of England, cannot by judgment of thoſe laws be a natural ſubject to the king, in reſpect of his kingdom of England; but the plaintiff was born at Edinburgh, out of the extent and reach of the laws of England; therefore the plaintiff, by the judgment of the laws of England, cannot be a natural ſubject to the king, as of his kingdom of England. 2. That ſubject, that is not at the time and in the place of his birth inheritable to the laws of England, cannot be inheritable or partaker of the benefits and privileges given by the laws of England; but the plaintiff at the time, and in the place of his birth, was not inheritable to the laws of England, but only to the laws of Scotland; therefore he is not inheritable or to be partaker of the benefits or privileges of the laws of England. 3. Whatſoever appeareth to be out of the juriſdiction of the laws of England, cannot be tried by the ſame laws; but the plaintiff's birth at Edinburgh is out of the juriſdiction of the laws of England; therefore the ſame cannot be tried by the laws of England. Which three arguments were drawn from theſe words of the plea, viz. quodque tempore nativitatis præd' Roberti Calvin, ac diu antea, & continuè poſtea, præd' regnum Scot' per jura, leges & ſtatuta ejuſdem regni propria, & non per jura, leges, ſeu ſtatuta hujus regni Angl' regulat' & gubernat' fuit, & adhuc eſt.

4. Alienigena. From this word alienigena they argued thus: every ſubject that is alien' gentis (i. e.) alien' ligeant', eſt alienigena; but ſuch a one is the plaintiff; therefore, &c.

And to theſe nine arguments all that was ſpoken learnedly and at large by thoſe that argued againſt the plaintiff may be reduced.

But it was reſolved by the lord chancellor and twelve judges, viz. the two chief juſtices, the chief baron, juſtice Fenner, Warburton, Yelverton, Daniel, Williams, baron Snigge, baron Altham, juſtice Crooke, and baron Heron, that the plaintiff was no alien, and conſequently that he ought to be anſwered in this aſſiſe by the defendants.

How this caſe was argued by the lord chancellor and the judges.

This caſe was as elaborately, ſubſtantially, and judicially argued by the lord chancellor, and by my brethren the judges, as I ever read or heard of any; and ſo in mine opinion the weight and conſequence of the cauſe, both in præſenti & perpetuis futuris temporibus juſtly deſerved; for though it was one of the ſhorteſt and leaſt that ever we argued in this court, yet was it the longeſt and weightieſt that ever was argued in any court, the ſhorteſt in ſyllables, and the longeſt in ſubſtance; the leaſt for the value (and yet not tending to the right of that leaſt) but the weightieſt for the conſequent, both for the preſent, and for all poſterity. And therefore it was ſaid, that thoſe that had written de foſſilibus did obſerve, that gold, hidden in the bowels of the earth, was in reſpect of the maſs of the whole earth, parvum in magno; but of this ſhort plea it might be truly ſaid (which is more ſtrange) that here was magnum in parvo.

Job, 8. 8.

And in the arguments of thoſe that argued for the pl. I ſpecially noted, that albeit they ſpake according to their own heart, yet they ſpake not out of their own head and invention: wherein they followed the counſel given in God's book, interroga priſtinam generationem (for out of the old fields muſt come the new corn) & diligenter inveſtiga patrum memoriam, and diligently ſearch out the judgments of our forefathers, and that for divers reaſons. Firſt, on our own part, heſterni enim ſumus & ignoramus, & vita noſtra ſicut umbra ſuper terram; for we are but of yeſterday, (and therefore had need of the wiſdom of thoſe that were before us) and had been ignorant (if we had not received light and knowledge from our forefathers) and our days upon the earth are but as a ſhadow, in reſpect of the old ancient days and times paſt, wherein the laws have been by the wiſdom of the moſt excellent men, in many ſucceſſions of ages, by long and continual experience (the trial of right and truth) fined and refined, which no one man, (being of ſo ſhort a time) albeit he had in his head the wiſdom of all the men in the world, in any one age could ever have effected or attained unto. And therefore it is optima regula, qua nulla eſt verior aut firmior in jure, neminem oportet eſſe ſapientiorem legibus; no man ought to take upon him to be wiſer than the laws. Secondly, in reſpect of our forefathers. Ipſi (ſaith the text) docebunt te, & loquentur tibi, & ex corde ſuo proferunt eloquia, they ſhall teach thee, and tell thee, and ſhall utter the words of their heart, without all equivocation or mental reſervation; they (I ſay) that cannot be daunted with fear of any power above them, nor be dazzled with the applauſe of the popular about them, nor fretted with any diſcontentment (the matter of oppoſition and contradiction) within them, but ſhall ſpeak the words of their heart, without all affection or infection whatſoever.

Co. Lit. 97. b.

Alſo in their arguments of this cauſe concerning an alien, they told no ſtrange hiſtories, cited no foreign laws, produced no alien precedents; and that for two cauſes: the one, for that the laws of England are ſo copious in this point, as, God willing, by the report of this caſe ſhall appear; the other, leſt their arguments, concerning an alien born, ſhould become foreign, ſtrange, and an alien to the ſtate of the queſtion, which, being quæſtio juris concerning freehold and inheritance in England, is only to be decided by the laws of this realm. And albeit I concurred with thoſe that adjudged the plaintiff to be no alien, yet do I find a mere ſtranger in this caſe, ſuch a one as the eye of the law (our books and book-caſes) never ſaw, as the ears of the law (our reporters) never heard of, nor the mouth of the law (for judex eſt lex loquens) the judges our forefathers of the law never taſted: I ſay, ſuch a one, as the ſtomach of the law, our exquiſite and perfect records of pleadings, entries, and judgments (that make equal and true diſtribution of all caſes in queſtion) never digeſted. In a word, this little plea is a great ſtranger to the laws of England, as ſhall manifeſtly appear by the reſolution of this caſe.

The method that the reporter doth uſe.

And now that I have taken upon me to make a report of their arguments, I ought to do the ſame as truly, fully, and ſincerely as poſſibly I can; howbeit, ſeeing that almoſt every judge had in the courſe of his argument a peculiar method, and I muſt only hold myſelf to one, I ſhall give no juſt offence to any, if I challenge that which of right is due to every reporter, that is, to reduce the ſum and effect of all to ſuch a method, as, upon conſideration had of all the arguments, the reporter himſelf thinketh to be fitteſt and cleareſt for the right underſtanding of the true reaſons and cauſes of the judgment and reſolution of the caſe in queſtion.

What things did fall into conſideration in this caſe.

In this caſe five things did fall into conſideration. 1. Ligeantia. 2. Leges. 3. Regna. 4. Alienigena. 5. What legal inconveniences would enſue on either ſide.

1. Concerning ligeance: 1. It was reſolved what ligeance was. 2. How many kinds of ligeances there were. 3. Where ligeance was due. 4. To whom it was due. And laſt, how it was due.

2. For the laws: 1. That ligeance or obedience of the ſubject to the ſovereign is due by the law of nature. 2. That this law of nature is part of the laws of England. 3. That the law of nature was before any judicial or municipal law in the world. 4. That the law of nature is immutable, and cannot be changed.

3. As touching the kingdoms: how far forth by the act of law the union is already made, and wherein the kingdoms do yet remain ſeparate and divided.

4. Of alienigena, an alien born: 1. What an alien born is in law. 2. The diviſion and diverſity of aliens. 3. Incidents to every alien. 4. Authorities in law. 5. Demonſtrative concluſions upon the premiſes, that the plaintiff can be no alien.

5. Upon due conſideration had of the conſequent of this caſe: what inconveniences legal ſhould follow on either party.

And theſe ſeveral parts I will in this report purſue in ſuch order as they have been propounded; and firſt de ligeantia.

The 1ſt general part, what ligeance is.

1. (b) Ligeance is a true and faithful obedience of the ſubject due to his ſovereign. This ligeance and obedience is an incident inſeparable to every ſubject: for as ſoon as he is born, he oweth by birth-right ligeance and obedience to his ſovereign. Ligeantia eſt vinculum fidei: and ligeantia eſt quaſi legis eſſentia. Ligeantia eſt ligamentum, quaſi ligatio mentium; quia ſicut ligamentum eſt connexio articulorum & juncturarum, &c. As the ligatures or ſtrings do knit together the joints of all the parts of the body, ſo doth ligeance join together the ſovereign and all his ſubjects, quaſi uno ligamine. Glanville, who wrote in the reign of H. 2. lib. 9. cap. 4. ſpeaking of the connexion which ought to be between the lord and tenant that holdeth by homage, ſaith, that mutua debet eſſe domini & fidelitatis connexio, ita quod quantum debet domino ex homagio, tantum illi debet dominus ex dominio, præter ſolam reverentiam, and the lord (ſaith he) ought to defend his tenant. But between the ſovereign and the ſubject there is without compariſon a higher and greater connexion; for as the ſubject oweth to the king his true and faithful ligeance and obedience, ſo the ſovereign is to govern and protect his ſubjects, regere & protegere ſubditos ſuos; ſo as between the ſovereign and ſubject there is duplex & reciprocum ligamen; quia ſicut ſubditus regi tenetur ad obedientiam, ita rex ſubdito tenetur ad protectionem: merito igitur ligeantia dicitur a ligando, quia continet in ſe duplex ligamen. And therefore it is holden in 20 H. 7. 8. a. that there is a liege or ligeance between the king and the ſubject. And Forteſcue, cap. 13. rex (c) ad tutelam legis corporum & bonorum ſubditorum erectus eſt. And in the acts of parliament of 10 R. 2. cap. 5. and 11 R. 2. cap. 1. 14 H. 8. cap. 2. &c. ſubjects are called liege people; and in the acts of parliament in 34 H. 8. cap. 1. and 35 H. 8. cap. 3. &c. the king is called the liege lord of his ſubjects. And with this agreeth M. Skeene in his book de expoſitione verborum, (which book was cited by one of the judges which argued againſt the plaintiff) ligeance is the mutual bond and obligation between the king and his ſubjects, whereby ſubjects are called his liege ſubjects, becauſe they are bound to obey and ſerve him; and he is called their liege lord, becauſe he ſhould maintain and defend them. Whereby it appeareth, that in this point the law of England and of Scotland is all one. Therefore it is truly ſaid, that protectio trahit ſubjectionem, & ſubjectio protectionem. And hereby it plainly appeareth, that ligeance doth not begin by the oath in the leet; for many men owe true ligeance that never were ſworn in a leet, and the ſwearing in a leet maketh no (d) denization, as the book is adjudged in 14 H. 4. fol. 19. b. This word ligeance is well expreſſed by divers ſeveral names or ſynonyma which we find in our books. Sometimes it is called the obedience or obeyſance of the ſubject to the king, obedientia regi, 9 E. 4. 7. b. 9 E. 4. 6. (e) 2 R. 3. 2. a. in the book of Entries, ejectione firm' 7. 14 H. 8. cap. 2. 22 H. 8. cap. 8. &c. Sometimes he is called a natural liege man that is born under the power of the king, ſub poteſtate regis, 4 H. 3. (f) tit. Dower. Vide the ſtat. of 11 E. 3. c. 2. Sometimes ligeance is called faith, fides, ad fidem regis, &c. Bracton, who wrote in the reign of H. 3. lib. 5. tractat' de exception', cap. 24. fol. 427. Eſt etiam alia exceptio quæ competit ex perſonâ quærentis, propter defectum nationis, ut ſi quis alieni-

gena qui fuit ad fidem regis Franc', &c. And Fleta (which book was made in the reign of E. 1.) agreeth therewith; for l. 6. c. 47. de except' ex emiſſione participis, it is ſaid, vel dicere potuit, quod nihil juris clamare poterit tanquam particeps, eo quod eſt ad fidem regis Franciæ, quia alienigenæ repelli debent in Angl' ab agendo, donec fuerunt ad fidem reg' Angl'. Vide 25 E. 3. de natis ultra mare, faith and ligeance of the king of England; and Litt. lib. 2. cap. Homage, (a) ſaving the faith that I owe to our ſovereign lord the king; and Glanv. l. 9. c. 1. ſalva fide debita dom' regi & hæredibus ſuis. Sometimes ligeance is called ligealty, 22 Aſſ. pl. 25. By all which it evidently appeareth, that they that are born under the obedience, power, faith, ligealty, or ligeance of the king, are natural ſubjects, and no aliens. So, as ſeeing now it doth appear what ligeance is, it followeth in order, that we ſpeak of the ſeveral kinds of ligeance. But herein we need to be very wary, for this caveat the law giveth, ubi lex non diſtinguit, nec nos diſtinguere debemus; and certainly lex non diſtinguit, but where omnia membra dividentia are to be found out and proved by the law itſelf.

How many kinds of ligeances there be.

2. There is found in the law 4 kinds of ligeances; the firſt is, ligeantia naturalis, abſoluta, pura & indefinita; and this originally is due by nature and birth-right, and is called alta ligeantia, and he that oweth this is called ſubditus natus. The ſecond is called ligeantia acquiſita, not by nature but by acquiſition or denization, being called a denizen, or rather donaizon, becauſe he is ſubditus datus. The third is ligeantia localis, wrought by the law, and that is when an alien that is in amity cometh into England, becauſe as long as he is within England he is within the king's protection; therefore ſo long as he is here, he oweth unto the king a local obedience or ligeance, for that the one (as it hath been ſaid) draweth the other. The fourth is a legal obedience, or ligeance which is called legal, becauſe the municipal laws of this realm have preſcribed the order and form of it; and this to be done upon oath at the torn or leet.

Co.Lit. 129. a.

Co.Lit. 129. a.

The firſt, that is, ligeance natural, &c. appeareth by the ſaid acts of parliament, wherein the king is called natural liege lord, and his people natural liege ſubjects. This alſo doth appear in the indictments of treaſon (which of all other things are the moſt curiouſly and certainly indicted and penned) for in the indictment of the lord Dacre, in 26 H. 8. it is ſaid, præd' dominus Dacre debitum fidei & ligeant' ſuæ, quod præfato domino regi naturaliter & de jure impendere debuit, minime curans, &c. And Reginald Pool was indicted in 30 H. 8. for committing treaſon contra dom' regem ſupremum & naturalem dominum ſuum. And to this end were cited the indictment of Edward duke of Somerſet in 5 E. 6. and many others both of ancient and later times. But in the indictment of treaſon of John Detbick in 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. it is ſaid, quod præd' Johannes machinans, &c. prædict' dominum Philippum & dominam Mariam ſupremos dominos ſuos, and omitted (naturales) becauſe king Philip was not his natural liege lord. And of this point more ſhall be ſaid when we ſpeak of local obedience. The ſecond is ligeant' acquiſita, or denization; and this in the books and records of the law appeareth to be three-fold. 1. Abſolute, as the common denizations be, to them and their heirs, without any limitation or reſtraint. 2. Limited, as when the king doth grant letters of denization to an alien, and to the heirs (b) males of his body, as it appeareth in 9 E. 4. fol. 7, 8. in Baggot's caſe; or to an alien for term of his life, as was granted to J. Reynel, 11 H. 6. 3. It may be granted upon (c) condition, for (d) cujus eſt dare, ejus eſt diſponere, whereof I have ſeen divers precedents. And this denization of an alien may be effected three manner of ways; by parliament, as it was in 3 H. 6. 55. in Dower; by letters patent, as the uſual manner is; and by conqueſt, as if the king and his ſubjects ſhould conquer another kingdom or dominion, as well antenati as poſtnati, as well they which fought in the field, as they which remained at home, for defence of their country, or employed elſewhere, are all denizens of the kingdom or dominion conquered. Of which point more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

Ligeantia acquiſita.

Ligeantia localis.

3. Concerning the local obedience it is obſervable, that as there is a local protection on the king's part, ſo there is a (e) local ligeance of the ſubjects part. And this appeareth in 4 Mar. Br. 32. (f) & 3 & 4 Phil. & Mar. Dyer, 144. Sherley a Frenchman, being in amity with the king, came into England, and joined with divers ſubjects of this realm in treaſon againſt the king and queen, and the indictment concluded (g) contra ligeant' ſuæ debitum; for he owed to the king a local obedience, that is, ſo long as he was within the king's protection; which local obedience being but momentary and uncertain, is yet ſtrong enough to make a natural ſubject, for if he hath iſſue here, that iſſue is (h) a natural born ſubject; à fortiori, he that is born under the natural and abſolute ligeance of the king (which, as it hath been ſaid, is alta ligeantia) as the plaintiff in the caſe in queſtion was, ought to be a natural born ſubject; for localis ligeantia eſt ligeantia infima & minima, & maxime incerta. And it is to be obſerved, that it is nec cœlum, nec ſolum, neither the climate nor the ſoil, but ligeantia and obedientia that make the ſubject born; for if enemies ſhould come into the realm, and poſſeſs a town or fort, and have iſſue there, that iſſue is no ſubject to the king of England, though he be born upon his ſoil, and under his meridian, for that he was not born under the ligeance of a ſubject, nor under the protection of the king. And concerning this local obedience, a precedent was cited in Hilar. 36 Eliz. when Stephano Ferrara de Gama, and Emanuel Lewis Tinoco, two Portugueſe born, coming into England under queen Elizabeth's ſafe conduct, and living here under her protection, joined with doctor Lopez in treaſon within this realm againſt her majeſty; and in this caſe two points were reſolved by the judges. Firſt, that their indictment ought to begin, that they intended treaſon contra dominam reginam, &c. omitting theſe words (naturalem domin' ſuam) and ought to conclude contra (i) ligeant' ſuæ debitum. But if an (k) alien enemy come to invade this realm, and be taken in war, he cannot be indicted of treaſon; for the indictment cannot conclude contra ligeant' ſuæ debitum, for he never was in the protection of the king, nor ever owed any manner of ligeance unto him, but malice and enmity, and therefore he ſhall be put to death by martial law. And ſo it was in anno 15 H. 7. (l) in Perkin Warbeck's caſe, who, being an alien born in Flanders, feigned himſelf to be one of the ſons of Edward the fourth, and invaded this realm with great power, with an intent to take upon him the dignity royal: but being taken in the war, it was reſolved by the juſtices, that he could not be puniſhed by the common law, but before the conſtable and marſhal (who had ſpecial commiſſion under the great ſeal to hear and determine the ſame according to martial law) he had ſentence to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, which was executed accordingly. And this appeareth in the book of Griffith attorney-general, by an extract out of the book of Hobart, attorney-general to king H. 7.

Ligeantia legalis.

4. Now are we to ſpeak of legal ligeance, which in our books, viz. 7 E. 2. tit. Avowry 211. 4 E. 3. fol. 42. 13 E. 3. tit. Avowry 120, &c. is called ſuit royal, becauſe that the ligeance of the ſubject is only due unto the king. This oath of ligeance appeareth in Britton, who wrote in anno 5 E. 1. cap. 29. (and is yet commonly in uſe to this day in every leet) and in our books; the effect whereof is: 'You ſhall ſwear, that from this day forward, you ſhall be true and faithful to our ſovereign lord king James, and his heirs, and truth and faith ſhall bear of life and member, and terrene honour, and you ſhall neither know nor hear of any ill or damage intended unto him, that you ſhall not defend. So help you Almighty God.' The ſubſtance and effect hereof is as hath been ſaid due by the law of nature, ex inſtitutione naturæ, as hereafter ſhall appear. The form and addition of the oath is, ex proviſione hominis. In this oath of ligeance five things were obſerved. 1. That for the time it is indefinite, and without limit, 'from this day forward.' Secondly, two excellent qualities are required, that is, to be 'true and faithful.' 3. To whom, 'to our ſovereign lord the king, and his heirs:' (and albeit Britton doth ſay, to the king of England, that is ſpoken propter excellentiam, to deſign the perſon, and not to confine the ligeance; for a ſubject doth not ſwear his ligeance to the king, only as king of England, and not to him as king of Scotland, or of Ireland, &c. but generally to the king.) 4. In what manner; 'and faith and troth ſhall bear, &c. of life and member,' that is, until the letting out of the laſt drop of our deareſt heart's blood. 5. Where and in what places ought theſe things to be done, in all places whatſoever; for, 'you ſhall neither know nor hear of any ill or damage, &c.' that you ſhall not defend, &c. ſo as natural ligeance is not circumſcribed within any place. It is holden 12 H. 7. 18. b. that he, that is ſworn in the leet, is ſworn to the king for his ligeance, that is, to be true and faithful to the king; and if he be once ſworn for his ligeance, he ſhall not be ſworn again during his life. And all letters patent of denization be, that the patentee ſhall behave himſelf tanquam verus & fidelis ligeus domini regis. And this oath of ligeance at the torn and leet was firſt inſtituted by king Arthur; for ſo I read, inter leges ſancti Edwardi regis ante Conqueſtum, 3 cap. 35. Et quod omnes principes & comites, proceres, milites & liberi homines debent jurare, &c. in Folkemote, & ſimiliter omnes proceres regni, & milites & liberi homines univerſi totius regni Britann' facere debent in pleno Folkemote fidelitatem domino regi, &c. Hanc legem invenit Arthurus, qui quondam fuit inclytiſſimus rex Britonum, &c. Hujus legis authoritate expulit Arthurus rex Saracenos et inimicos a regno, &c. et hujus legis authoritate Etheldredus rex uno et eodem die per univerſum regnum Danos occidit. Vide Lambert inter leges regis Edwardi, * &c. fol. 135 & 136. By this it appeareth, when and from whom this legal ligeance had his firſt inſtitution within this realm. Ligeantia in the caſe in queſtion is meant and intended of the firſt kind of ligeance, that is, of ligeance natural, abſolute, &c. due by nature and birth-right. But if the plaintiff's father be made a denizen, and purchaſe lands in England to him and his heirs, and die ſeiſed, this land ſhall never deſcend to the plaintiff; for that the king by his letters patent may make a denizen, but cannot naturalize him to all purpoſes, as an act of parliament may do; neither can letters patent make any inheritable in this caſe, that by the common law cannot inherit. And herewith agreeth 36 H. 6. tit. Denizen, Br. 9.

Homage is two fold.
Vaug. 279.

Homage in our book is two-fold, that is to ſay, homagium ligeum, and that is as much as ligeance, of which Bracton ſpeaketh, l. 2. c. 35. f. 79. Soli regi debet' ſive dominio ſeu ſervitio, and there is homagium feodale, which hath his original by tenure. In Fit. Nat. Brev. 269. there is a writ for reſpiting of this later homage, which is due ratione feodi ſive tenuræ: ſciatis quod reſpectuamus homagium nobis de terr' et tenementis quæ tenenter de nobis in capite debit'. But homagium ligeum, i. ligeantia, is inherent and inſeparable, and cannot be reſpited.

Where natural ligeance is due.

3. Now are we come to (and almoſt paſt) the conſideration of this circumſtance, where natural ligeance ſhould be due: for by that which hath been ſaid, it appeareth, that ligeance, and faith and truth, which are her members and parts, are qualities of the mind and ſoul of man, and cannot be circumſcribed within the predicament of ubi; for that were to confound predicaments, and to go about to drive (an abſurd and impoſſible thing) the predicament of quality into the predicament of ubi. Non reſpondetur ad hanc quæſtionem, ubi eſt? To ſay, verus et fidelus ſubditus eſt; ſed ad hanc quæſtionem, qualis eſt? Recte & apte reſpondetur, verus & fidelis ligeus, &c. eſt. But yet for the greater illuſtration of the matter, the point was handled by itſelf, and that ligeance of the ſubject was of as great an extent and latitude, as the royal power and protection of the king, et è converſo. It appeareth by the ſtat. of 11 H. 7. cap. 1. and 2 E. 6. cap. 2. that the ſubjects of England are bound by their ligeance to go with the king, &c. in his wars, as well within the realm, &c. as without. And therefore we daily ſee, that when either Ireland, or any other of his majeſty's dominions, be infeſted with invaſion or inſurrection, the king of England ſendeth his ſubjects out of England, and his ſubjects out of Scotland alſo into Ireland, for the withſtanding or ſuppreſſing of the ſame, to the end his rebels may feel the ſwords of either nation. And ſo may his ſubjects of Guernſey, Jerſey, Iſle of Man, &c. be commanded to make their ſwords good againſt either rebel or enemy, as occaſion ſhall be offered. Whereas if natural ligeance of the ſubjects of England ſhould be local, that is, confined within the realm of England or Scotland, &c. then were not they bound to go out of the continent of the realm of England or Scotland, &c. And the opinion of Thirninge in 7 H. 4. tit. Protect' 100. is thus to be underſtood, that an Engliſh ſubject is not compellable to go out of the realm without wages, according to the ſtatutes of 1 E. 3. c. 7. 18 E. 3. c. 8. 18 H. 6. c. 19. &c. 7 H. 7. c. 1. 3 H. 8. c. 5. &c. In ann. 25 E. 1. Bigot earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, and earl marſhal of England, and Bohun earl of Hereford and high conſtable of England, did exhibit a petition to the king in French (which I have ſeen anciently recorded) on the behalf of the commons of England, concerning how and in what ſort they were to be employed in his majeſty's wars out of the realm of England; and the record ſaith, that, poſt multas & varias altercationes, it was reſolved, they ought to go but in ſuch manner and form as after was declared by the ſaid ſtatutes, which ſeem to be but declarative of the common law. And this doth plentifully and manifeſtly appear in our books, being truly and rightly underſtood. In 3 H. 6. tit. Protection 2. one had the benefit of a protection, for that he was ſent into the king's wars in comitiva of the protector; and it appeareth by the record, and by the chronicles alſo, that this employment was into France; the greateſt part thereof then being under the king's actual obedience, ſo as the ſubjects of England were employed into France for the defence and ſafety thereof: in which caſe it was obſerved, that ſeeing the protector, who was prorex, went, the ſame was adjudged a voyage royal. 8 H. 6. fol. 16. b. the lord Talbot went with a company of Engliſhmen into France, then alſo being for the greateſt part under the actual obedience of the king, who had the benefit of their protections allowed unto them. And here were obſerved the words of the writ in the Regiſter, fol. 88. where it appeareth that men were employed in the king's wars out of the realm per præceptum noſtrum, and the uſual words of the writ of protection be in obſequio noſtro. * 32 H. 6. fol. 4. a. it appeareth, that Engliſhmen were preſſed into Guyienne, † 44 E. 3. 12. a. into Gaſcoyne with the duke of Lancaſter, 17 H. 6. tit. Protection, into ‖ Gaſcoyne with the earl of Huntington, ſteward of Guienne, 11 and 12 H. 4. 7. a. into (a) Ireland, and out of this realm with the duke of Glouceſter and the lord Knolles: vide (b) 19 H. 6. 35. b. And it appeareth in 19 Ed. 2. tit. Avowry 224. 26 Aſſ. 66. 7 H. 4. 19, &c. that there was forinſecum ſervitium, foreign ſervice, which Bracton, fol. 36. calleth regale ſervitium; and in Fitz. N. B. 28. that the king may ſend men to ſerve him in his wars beyond the ſea. But thus much (if it be not in ſo plain a caſe too much) ſhall ſuffice for this point for the king's power, to command the ſervice of his ſubjects in his wars out of the realm, whereupon it was concluded, that the ligeance of a natural-born ſubject was not local, and confined only to England. Now let us ſee what the law ſaith in time of peace, concerning the king's protection and power of command, as well without the realm, as within, that his ſubjects in all places may be protected from violence, and that juſtice may equally be adminiſtered to all his ſubjects.

In cujus*, &c. per unum annum duratur'. T. &c. By all which it is manifeſt, that the protection and government of the king is general over all his dominions and kingdoms, as well in time of peace by juſtice, as in time of war by the ſword, and that all be at his command, and under his obedience. Now ſeeing power and protection draweth ligeance, it followeth, that ſeeing the king's power command and protection extendeth out of England, that ligeance cannot be local, or confined within the bounds thereof. He that is abjured the realm, qui abjurat regnum amittit regnum, ſed non regem, amittit patriam, ſed non patrem patriæ: for notwithſtanding the abjuration, he oweth the king his ligeance, and he remaineth within the king's protection; for the king may pardon and reſtore him to his country again. So ſeeing that ligeance is a quality of the mind, and not confined within any place; it followeth, that the plea, that doth confine the ligeance of the plaintiff to the kingdom of Scotland, infra ligeantiam regis regni ſui Scotiæ, & extra ligeantiam regis regni ſui Angliæ, whereby the defendants do make one local ligeance for the natural ſubjects of England, and another local ligeance for the natural ſubjects of Scotland, is utterly inſufficient, and againſt the nature and quality of natural ligeance, as often it hath been ſaid. And Coke, chief juſtice of the court of Common Pleas, cited a ruled caſe out of Hingham's reports, tempore E. 1. which in his argument he ſhewed in court written in parchment, in an ancient hand of that time. Conſtance de N. brought a writ of ayel againſt Roger de Cobledike, and others, named in the writ, and counted that from the ſeiſin of Roger her grandfather it deſcended to Gilbert his ſon, and from Gilbert to Conſtance, as daughter and heir. Sutton dit, ſir, el ne doit eſte reſponde, pur ceo que el eſt Francois & nient de la ligeance ne a la foy Denglitterre, & demand judgement ſi el doit action aver: that is, ſhe is not to be anſwered, for that ſhe is a French woman, and not of the ligeance, nor of the faith of England, and demanded judgment, if ſhe this action ought to have. Bereford (then chief juſtice of the court of Common Pleas) by the rule of the court diſalloweth the plea, for that it was too ſhort, in that it referred ligeance and faith to England, and not to the king. And thereupon Sutton ſaith as followeth; ſir, nous voilomus averre, que el ne eſt my de la ligeance Denglitterre, ne a la foy le roy, et demand jugement, et ſi vous agardes que el doit eſte reſponde, nous dirromus aſſets: that is, ſir, we will aver, that ſhe is not of the ligeance of England, nor of the faith of the king, and demand judgment, &c. Which latter words of the plea (nor of the faith of the king) referred faith to the king indefinitely and generally, and reſtrained not the ſame to England, and thereupon the plea was allowed for good, according to the rule of the court: for the book ſaith, that afterward the plaintiff deſired leave to depart from her writ. The rule of that caſe of Cobledike, did (as Coke chief juſtice ſaid) over-rule this caſe of Calvin, in the very point now in queſtion; for that the plea in this caſe doth not refer faith or ligeance to the king indefinitely and generally, but limiteth and reſtraineth faith and ligeance to the kingdom, extra ligeantiam regis regni ſui Angliæ, out of the ligeance of the king of his kingdom of England: which afterwards the lord chancellor and the chief juſtice of the King's Bench, having copies of the ſaid ancient report, affirmed in their arguments. So as this point was thus concluded, quod ligeantia naturalis nullis clauſtris coercetur, nullis metis refrænatur, nullis finibus premitur.

4 & 5. By that which hath been ſaid it appeareth, that this ligeance is due only to the king; ſo as therein the queſtion is not now, cui, ſed quomodo debetur. It is true, that the king hath two capacities in him: one a natural body, being deſcended of the blood royal of the realm; and this body is of the creation of Almighty God, and is ſubject to death, infirmity, and ſuch like: the other is a ‖ politick body or capacity, ſo called, becauſe it is framed by the policy of man (and in 21 E. 4. 39. b. is called a myſtical body;) and in this capacity the king is eſteemed to be immortal, inviſible, not ſubject to death, infirmity, infancy, (a) nonage, &c. Pl. Com. in the caſe of the lord Barkley 238. and in the caſe of the Duchy 213. 6 E. 3. 291. and 26 Aſſ. pl. 54. Now ſeeing the king hath but one perſon, and ſeveral capacities, and one politick capacity for the realm of England, and another for the realm of Scotland, it is neceſſary to be conſidered, to which capacity ligeance is due. And it was reſolved, that it was due to the natural perſon of the king (which is ever accompanied with the politick capacity, and the politick capacity as it were appropriated to the natural capacity) and it is not due to the politick capacity only, that is, to his crown or kingdom diſtinct from his natural capacity, and that for divers reaſons. Firſt, every ſubject (as it hath been affirmed by thoſe that argued againſt the plaintiff) is preſumed by law to be ſworn to the king, which is to his natural perſon, and likewiſe the king is ſworn to his ſubjects, (as it appeareth in Bracton, lib. 3. de actionibus, cap. 9. fol. 107.) which oath he taketh in his natural perſon: for the politick capacity is inviſible and immortal; nay, the politick body hath no ſoul, for it is framed by the policy of man. 2. In all indictments of treaſon, when any do intend or compaſs mortem & deſtructionem domini regis (which muſt needs be underſtood of his natural body, for his politick body is immortal, and not ſubject to death) the indictment concludeth, contra (b) ligeantiæ ſuæ debitum; ergo, the ligeance is due to the natural body. Vide Fit. Juſtice of Peace 53. and Pl. Com. 384. in the earl of Leiceſter's caſe. 3. It is true, that the king in genere dieth not, but, no queſtion, in individuo he dieth: as for example, H. 8. E. 6. &c. and queen Eliz. died, otherwiſe you ſhould have many kings at once. In 2 and 3 Ph. and Mar. Dyer 128. (c) one Conſtable diſperſed divers bills in the ſtreets in the night, in which it was written, that king E. 6. was alive and in France, &c. and in Coleman-ſtreet, in London, he pointed to a young man, and ſaid that he was king Edward the ſixth. And this being ſpoken de individuo (and accompanied with other circumſtances) was reſolved to be high treaſon; for the which Conſtable was attainted and executed. 4. A (d) body politick (being inviſible) can as a body politick neither make or take homage: Vide 33 H. 8. tit. Fealty, Brook 15. 5. In fide, in faith or ligeance, nothing ought to be feigned, but ought to be ex fide non ficta. 6. The king holdeth the kingdom of England by birth-right inherent, by deſcent from the blood royal, whereupon ſucceſſion doth attend; and therefore it is uſually ſaid, to the king, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, wherein heirs is firſt named, and ſucceſſors is attendant upon heirs. And yet in our ancient books ſucceſſion and ſucceſſor are taken for hereditance and heirs. Bract. lib. 2. de acquirendo rerum dominio, c. 29. Et ſciend' eſt, quod hæreditas eſt ſucceſſio in univerſum jus quod defunctus anteceſſor habuit, ex cauſâ quacunque acquiſitionis vel ſucceſſionis, & alibi affinitatis jure nulla ſucceſſio permittitur. But the title is by deſcent. By queen Elizabeth's death the crown and kingdom of England deſcended to his majeſty, and he was fully and abſolutely thereby king, without any eſſential ceremony or act to be done ex poſt facto: for coronation is but a royal ornament and ſolemnization of the royal deſcent, but no part of the title. In the firſt year of his majeſty's reign, before his majeſty's coronation, Watſon (e) and Clerke, ſeminary prieſts, and others, were of opinion, that his majeſty was no complete and abſolute king before his coronation, but that coronation did add a confirmation and perfection to the deſcent; and therefore (obſerve their damnable and damned conſequent) that they by ſtrength and power might before his coronation take him and his royal iſſue into their poſſeſſion, keep him priſoner in the Tower, remove ſuch counſellors and great officers as pleaſed them, and conſtitute others in their places, &c. and that theſe and other acts of like nature could not be treaſon againſt his majeſty, before he were a crowned king. But it was clearly reſolved by all the judges of England, that preſently by the deſcent his majeſty was completely and abſolutely king, without any eſſential ceremony or act to be done ex poſt facto; and that (f) coronation was but a royal ornament, and outward ſolemnization of the deſcent. And this appeareth evidently by infinite precedents and book-caſes; as (taking one example in a caſe ſo clear for all) king Henry VI. was not crowned until the eighth year of his reign, and yet divers men before his coronation were attainted of treaſon, of felony, &c. and he was as abſolute and complete a king, both for matters of judicature, as for grants, &c. before his coronation, as he was after, as it appeareth in the Reports of the 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 years of the ſame king. And the like might be produced for many other kings of this realm, which for brevity in a caſe ſo clear I omit. By which it manifeſtly appeareth, that by the laws of England there can be no * interregnum within the ſame. If the king be ſeiſed of land by a defeaſible title, and dieth ſeiſed, this deſcent ſhall toll the entry of him that right hath, as it appeareth by 9 (g) E. 4. 51. But if the next king had it by ſucceſſion, that ſhould take away no entry, as it appeareth by Littleton, fol. 97. If a diſſeiſor of an infant convey the land to the king who dieth ſeiſed, this deſcent taketh away the entry of the infant, as it is ſaid in 34 H. 6. fol. 34. (h) 45. lib. Aſſ. pl. 6. Plow. Com. 234. where the caſe was; king H. 3. gave a manor to his brother the earl of Cornwal in tail (at what time the ſame was a fee-ſimple conditional) king H. 3. died, the earl before the ſtatute of donis conditional' (having no iſſue) by deed exchanged the manor with warranty for other lands in fee, and died without iſſue, and the warranty and aſſets deſcended upon his nephew king Edward I. and it was adjudged, that this warranty and aſſets, which deſcended upon the natural perſon of the king, barred him of the poſſibility of reverter. In the reign of Ed. 2. the Spencers, the father and the ſon, to cover the treaſon hatched in their hearts, invented this damnable and damned opinion, that homage and oath of ligeance was more by reaſon of the king's crown (that is, of his politic capacity) than by reaſon of the perſon of the king, upon which opinion they inferred execrable and deteſtable conſequences. 1. If the king do not demean himſelf by reaſon in the right of his crown, his lieges be bound by oath to remove the king. 2. Seeing that the king could not be reformed by ſuit of law, that ought to be done by the ſword. 3. That his lieges be bound to govern in aid of him, and in default of him. All which were condemned by two parliaments; one in the reign of Ed. 2. called Exilium Hugonis le Spencer, and the other in ann. 1. Ed. 3. c. 1. Bracton, lib. 2. de acquirendo rerum dominio, c. 24. f. 55, ſaith thus, eſt enim corona regis facere juſtitiam & judic', & tenere pacem, & ſine quibus corona conſiſtere non poteſt nec tenere. Hujuſmodi autem jura ſive juriſdictiones ad perſonas vel tenementa transferri non poterunt, nec a privatâ perſonâ poſſideri, nec uſus nec executio juris, niſi hoc datum fuit ei deſuper, ſicut juriſdictio delegata delegari non poterit quin ordinaria remaneat cum ipſo rege. Et lib. 3. de actionibus, cap. 9. fol. 107. ſeparare autem debet rex, cum ſit Dei vicarius in terrâ, jus ab injuriâ, æquum ab iniquo, ut omnes ſibi ſubjecti honeſte vivant, & quod nullus alium lædat, & quod unicuique quod ſuum fuerit rectâ contributione reddatur. In reſpect whereof one ſaith, that corona eſt quaſi cor ornans, cujus ornamenta ſunt miſericordia & juſtitia. And therefore a king's crown is an hieroglyphic of the laws, where juſtice, &c. is adminiſtered; for ſo ſaith P. Val. l. 41. p. 400. coronam dicimus legis judicium eſſe, propterea quod certis eſt vinculis complicata, quibus vita noſtra veluti religata coercetur. Therefore if you take that which is ſignified by the crown, that is, to do juſtice and judgment, to maintain the peace of the land, &c. to ſeparate right from wrong, and the good from the ill; that is to be underſtood of that capacity of the king, that in rei veritate hath capacity, and is adorned and endued with endowments as well of the ſoul, as of the body, and thereby able to do juſtice and judgment according to right and equity, and to maintain the peace, &c. and to find out and diſcern the truth, and not of the inviſible and immortal capacity that hath no ſuch endowments; for of itſelf it hath neither ſoul nor body. And where divers books and acts of parliament ſpeak of the ligeance of England, as 31 E. 3. tit. Coſinage 5. 42 Ed. 3. 2. 13 E. 3. tit. Brief 677. 25 Ed. 3. ſtat. de natis ultra mare; all theſe and other ſpeaking briefly in a vulgar manner (for (i) loquendum ut vulgus) and not pleading (for ſentiendum ut docti) are to be underſtood of the ligeance due by the people of England to the king; for no man will affirm, that England itſelf, taking it for the continent thereof, doth owe any ligeance or faith, or that any faith or ligeance ſhould be due to it: but it manifeſtly appeareth, that the ligeance or faith of the ſubject is proprium quarto modo to the king, omni, ſoli, & ſemper. And oftentimes in the reports of our book-caſes, and in acts of parliament alſo, the crown or kingdom is taken for the king himſelf *, as in Fitzh. Natur. Brev. fol. 5. Tenure in capite is a tenure of the crown, and is a ſeigniory in groſs, that is of the perſon of the king: and ſo is 30 H. 8. Dyer fol. 44, 45. a tenure in chief, as of the crown, is merely a tenure of the perſon of the king, and therewith agreeth 28 H. 8. tit. Tenure Br. 65. The ſtatute of 4 H. 5. cap. ultimo, gave priors aliens, which were conventual to the king and his heirs, by which gift ſaith 34 H. 6. 34. the ſame were annexed to the crown. And in the ſaid act of 25 Ed. 3. whereas it is ſaid in the beginning, within the ligeance of England, it is twice afterward ſaid in the ſame act, within the ligeance of the king, and yet all one ligeance due to the king. So in 42 Ed. 3. fol. 2. where it is firſt ſaid, the ligeance of England, it is afterwards in the ſame caſe called, the ligeance of the king; wherein though they uſed ſeveral manner and phraſes of ſpeech, yet they intended one and the ſame ligeance. So in our uſual commiſſion of aſſiſe, of gaol-delivery, of oyer and terminer, of the peace, &c. power is given to execute juſtice, ſecundum legem & conſuetudinem regni noſtri Angliæ; and yet Littleton, lib. 2. in his chapter of Villenage, fol. 43. in diſabling of a man that is attainted in a premunire ſaith, that the ſame is the king's law; and ſo doth the Regiſter in the writ of ad jura regia ſtyle the ſame.

* i. e. Of the politic capacity.

The reaſons wherefore the king by judgment of law hath a politic capacity. 1 H. 7. 4.

The reaſons and cauſes, wherefore by the policy of the law the king is a body politic, are three, viz. 1. cauſa majeſtatis, 2. cauſa neceſſitatis, and 3. cauſa utilitatis. Firſt, cauſa majeſtatis, the king cannot give or take but by matter of record for the dignity of his perſon. Secondly, cauſa neceſſitatis, as to avoid the (k) attainder of him that hath right to the crown, as it appeareth in 1 H. 7. 4. leſt in the interim there ſhould be an (l) interregnum, which the law will not ſuffer. Alſo by force of this politic capacity, though the (m) king be within age, yet may he make leaſes and other grants, and the ſame ſhall bind him; otherwiſe his revenue ſhould decay, and the king ſhould not be able to reward ſervice, &c. Laſtly, cauſa utilitatis, as when lands and poſſeſſions deſcend from his collateral anceſtors, being ſubjects, as from the earl of March, &c. to the king, now is the king ſeiſed of the ſame in jure coronæ, in his politic capacity; for which cauſe the ſame ſhall go with the crown; and therefore, albeit queen Elizabeth was of the half-blood to queen Mary, yet ſhe in her body politic enjoyed all thoſe fee-ſimple lands, as by the law ſhe ought, and no collateral couſin of the whole blood to queen Mary ought to have the ſame. And theſe are the cauſes wherefore by the policy of the law the king is made a body politic: ſo as for theſe ſpecial purpoſes the law makes him a body politic, immortal and inviſible, whereunto our ligeance cannot appertain. But to conclude this point, our ligeance is to our natural liege ſovereign, deſcended of the blood royal of the kings of this realm. And thus much of the firſt general part de ligeantiâ.

De legibus. The ſecond general part.

Now followeth the ſecond part, de legibus, wherein theſe parts were conſidered: firſt, that the ligeance or faith of the ſubject is due unto the king by the law of nature: ſecondly, that the law of nature is part of the law of England: thirdly, that the law of nature was before any judicial or municipal law: fourthly, that the law of nature is immutable.

The law of nature. Wing's Max. 1. Co. Lit. 11. b. poſt. 14. b.

The law of nature is that which God at the time of creation of the nature of man infuſed into his heart, for his preſervation and direction; and this is lex æterna, the moral law, called alſo the law of nature. And by this law, written with the finger of God in the heart of man, were the people of God a long time governed, before the law was written by Moſes, who was the firſt reporter or writer of law in the world. The apoſtle in the ſecond chapter to the Romans ſaith, cum enim gentes, quæ legem non habent, naturaliter ea quæ legis ſunt faciunt. Q. And this is within that command of the moral law, honora patrem, which doubtleſs doth extend to him that is pater patriæ. And the apoſtle ſaith, omnis anima poteſtatibus ſublimioribus ſubdita ſit. And theſe be the words of the great divine, hoc Deus in ſacris ſcripturis jubet, hoc lex naturæ dictat, ut quilibet ſubditus obediat ſuperiori. And Ariſtotle, nature's ſecretary, lib. 5. Æthic. ſaith, that jus naturale eſt, quod apud omnes homines eandem habet potentiam. And herewith doth agree Bracton, lib. 1. cap. 5. and Forteſcue, cap. 8, 12, 13, and 16. Doctor and Student, cap. 2, and 4. And the reaſon hereof is, for that God and nature is one to all, and therefore the law of God and nature is one to all.

Juſtinian Inſt. lib. 1. cap. 2.

By this law of nature is the faith, ligeance, and obedience of the ſubject due to his ſovereign or ſuperior. And Ariſtotle 1 Politicorum proveth, that to command and to obey is of nature, and that magiſtracy is of nature: for whatſoever is neceſſary and profitable for the preſervation of the ſociety of man is due by the law of nature; but magiſtracy and government are neceſſary and profitable for the preſervation of the ſociety of man; therefore magiſtracy and government are of nature. And herewith accordeth Tully, lib. 3. de legibus, ſine imperio nec domus ulla, nec civitas, nec gens, nec hominum univerſum genus ſtare, nec ipſe denique mundus poteſt. This law of nature, which indeed is the eternal law of the Creator, infuſed into the heart of the creature at the time of his creation, was two thouſand years before any laws written, and before any judicial or municipal laws. And certain it is, that before judicial or municipal laws were made, kings did decide cauſes according to natural equity, and were not tied to any rule or formality of law, but did dare jura. And this appeareth by Forteſcue, cap. 12 and 13. and by Virgil that philoſophical poet, 7 Æneid.

Note.

> Hoc Priami geſtamen erat, cum jura vocatis

And 5th Æneid.

> ——Gaudet regno Trojanus Aceſtes,
> Indicitque forum & patribus dat jura vocatis.

And Pomponius, lib. 2. cap. de origine juris, affirmeth, that in Tarquinius Superbus's time there was no civil law written, and that Papirius reduced certain obſervations into writing, which was called Jus Civile Papirianum. Now the reaſon wherefore laws were made and publiſhed, appeareth in Forteſcue, cap. 13. and in Tully, lib. 2. Officiorum: at cum jus æquabile ab uno viro homines non conſequerentur, inventi ſunt leges. Now it appeareth by demonſtrative reaſon, that ligeance, faith, and obedience of the ſubject to the ſovereign, was before any municipal or judicial laws. 1. For that government and ſubjection were long before any municipal or judicial laws. 2. For that it had been in vain to have preſcribed laws to any, but to ſuch as owed obedience, faith, and ligeance before, in reſpect whereof they were bound to obey and obſerve them: fruſtra enim feruntur leges niſi ſubditis & obedientibus. Seeing then that faith, obedience, and ligeance, are due by the law of nature, it followeth that the ſame cannot be changed or taken away; for albeit judicial or municipal laws have inflicted and impoſed in ſeveral places, or at ſeveral times, divers and ſeveral puniſhments and penalties, for breach or not obſervance of the law of nature, (for that law only conſiſted in commanding or prohibiting, without any certain puniſhment or penalty) yet the very law of nature itſelf, never was nor could be (a) altered or changed. And therefore it is certainly true, that (b) jura naturalia ſunt immutabilia. And herewith agreeth Bracton, lib. 1. cap. 5. and Doctor and Student, cap. 5 and 6. And this appeareth plainly and plentifully in our books.

If a man hath a ward by reaſon of a ſeigniory, and is outlawed, he forfeiteth the wardſhip to the king: but if a man hath the wardſhip of his own ſon or daughter, which is his heir apparent, and is outlawed, he doth not (c) forfeit this wardſhip; for nature hath annexed it to the perſon of the father, as it appeareth in 33 H. 6. 55. b. Et bonus rex nihil a bono patre differt; & patria dicitur a patre, quia habet communem patrem, qui eſt pater patriæ. In the ſame manner, maris & fæminæ conjunctio eſt de jure naturæ, as Bracton in the ſame book and chapter, and St. Germin in his book of the Doctor and Student, cap. 5. do hold. Now if he, that is attainted of treaſon or felony, be ſlain by one that hath no authority, or executed by him that hath authority, but purſueth not his warrant, in this caſe his eldeſt ſon can have no appeal, for he muſt bring his appeal as heir, which being ex proviſione hominis, he loſeth it by the attainder of his father; but his (d) wife (if any he have) ſhall have an appeal, becauſe ſhe is to have her appeal as wife, which ſhe remaineth notwithſtanding the attainder, becauſe maris & fæminæ conjunctio is de jure naturæ, and therefore (it being to be intended of true and right matrimony) is indiſſoluble; and this is proved by the book in 33 H. 6. 57. So if there be mother and daughter, and the daughter is attainted of felony, now cannot ſhe be heir to her mother for the cauſe aforeſaid; yet after her attainder, if ſhe kill her mother, this is parricide and petit treaſon; for yet ſhe remaineth her daughter, for that is of nature; and herewith agreeth 21 E. 3. 17. b. If a man be attainted of felony or treaſon, he hath loſt the king's legal protection, for he is thereby utterly diſabled to ſue any action real or perſonal (which is a greater diſability than an alien in league hath) and yet ſuch a perſon ſo attainted hath not loſt that protection which by the law of nature is given to the king, for that is indelebilis & immutabilis, and therefore the king may protect and pardon him, and if any man kill him without warrant, he ſhall be puniſhed by the law as a manſlayer, and thereunto accordeth 4 Ed. 4. and 35 H. 6. 57. 2 Aſſ. pl. 3. By the ſtatute of 25 Ed. 3. cap. 22. a man attainted in a præmunire, is by expreſs words out of the king's protection generally; and yet this extendeth only to legal protection, as it appeareth by Littleton, fol. 43. for the parliament could not take away that protection which the law of nature giveth unto him; and therefore notwithſtanding that ſtatute, the king may protect and pardon him. And though by that ſtatute it was farther enacted, that it ſhould be done with him as with an enemy, by which words any man might have ſlain ſuch a perſon (as it is holden in 24 H. 8. tit. Coron. Br. 197.) until the ſtatute made anno 5 Eliz. cap. 1. yet the king might protect and pardon him. A man outlawed is out of the benefit of the municipal law; for ſo ſaith Fitz N. B. 161. a. utlegatus eſt quaſi extra legem poſitus: and Bract. l. 3. tract. 2. c. 11. ſaith, that caput gerit lupinum; yet is he not out either of his natural ligeance, or of the king's natural protection; for neither of them is tied to municipal laws, but is due by the law of nature, which (as hath been ſaid) was long before any judicial or municipal laws. And therefore if a man were outlawed for felony, yet was he within the king's natural protection, for no man but the ſheriff could execute him, as it is adjudged in 2 lib. Aſſ. pl. 3. Every ſubject is by his natural ligeance bound to obey and ſerve his ſovereign, &c. It is enacted by the parliament of 23 H. 6. that no man ſhould ſerve the king as ſheriff of any county above one year, and that, notwithſtanding any clauſe of non obſtante to the contrary, that is to ſay, notwithſtanding that the king ſhould expreſly diſpenſe with the ſaid ſtatute. Howbeit it is agreed in 2 H. 7. that againſt the expreſs purview of that act, the king may by a ſpecial non obſtante diſpenſe with that act, for that the act could not bar the king of the ſervice of his ſubject, which the law of nature did give unto him. By theſe and many other caſes that might be cited out of our books, it appeareth, how plentiful the authorities of our laws be in this matter. (dd) Wherefore to conclude this point (and to exclude all that hath been or could be objected againſt it) if the obedience and ligeance of the ſubject to his ſovereign be due by the law of nature, if that law be parcel of the laws, as well of England as of all other nations, and is immutable, and that poſtnati * and we of England are united by birth-right in obedience and ligeance (which is the true cauſe of natural ſubjection) by the law of nature; it followeth, that Calvin the plaintiff being born under one ligeance to one king, cannot be an alien born. And there is great reaſon, that the law of nature ſhould direct this caſe, wherein five natural operations are remarkable: firſt, the king hath the crown of England by birth-right, being naturally procreated of the blood royal of this realm: ſecondly, Calvin the plaintiff naturalized by procreation and birth-right, ſince the deſcent of the crown of England: thirdly, ligeance and obedience of the ſubject to the ſovereign, due by the law of nature: fourthly, protection and government due by the law of nature: fifthly, this caſe, in the opinion of divers, was more doubtful in the beginning, but the further it proceeded, the clearer and ſtronger it grew; and therefore the doubt grew from ſome violent paſſion, and not from any reaſon grounded upon the law of nature, quia quanto magis violentus motus (qui fit contra naturam) appropinquat ad ſuum finem, tanto debiliores & tardiores ſunt ejus motus; ſed naturalis motus, quanto magis appropinquat ad ſuum finem, tanto fortiores & velociores ſunt ejus motus. Hereby it appeareth how weak the objection grounded upon the rule of (e) quando duo jura concurrunt in unâ perſonâ, &c. is: for that rule holdeth not in perſonal things, that is, when two perſons are neceſſarily and inevitably required by law, as in the caſe of an alien born there is; and therefore no man will ſay, that now the king of England can make war or league with the king of Scotland, & ſic de cæteris: and ſo in caſe of an alien born, you muſt of neceſſity have two ſeveral ligeances to two ſeveral perſons. And to conclude this point concerning laws, non adverſatur diverſitas regnor' ſed regnant'; non patriarum, ſed patrum patriar'; non coronarum, ſed coronatorum; non legum municipalium, ſed regum majeſtatum. And therefore thus were directly and clearly anſwered as well the objections drawn from the ſeveralty of the kingdoms, ſeeing there is but one head of both, and the poſtnati and us joined in ligeance to that one head, which is copula & tanquam oculus of this caſe; as alſo the diſtinction of the laws, ſeeing that ligeance of the ſubjects of both kingdoms, is due to their ſovereign by one law, and that is the law of nature.

The 3d general part concerning both kingdoms.

For the third, it is firſt to be underſtood, that as the law hath wrought four unions, ſo the law doth ſtill make four ſeparations. The firſt union is of both kingdoms under one natural liege ſovereign king, and ſo acknowledged by the act of parliament of recognition. The 2d is an union of ligeance and obedience of the ſubjects of both kingdoms, due by the law of nature to their ſovereign: and this union doth ſuffice to rule and over-rule the caſe in queſtion; and this in ſubſtance is but a uniting of the hearts of the ſubjects of both kingdoms one to another, under one head and ſovereign. The 3d union is an union of protection of both kingdoms, equally belonging to the ſubjects of either of them: and therefore the two firſt arguments or objections drawn from two ſuppoſed ſeveral ligeances were fallacious, for they did disjungere conjungenda. The 4th union and conjunction is of the three lions of England and that one of Scotland, united and quartered in one eſcutcheon.

Concerning the ſeparations yet remaining: 1ſt, England and Scotland remain ſeveral and diſtinct kingdoms. 2. They are governed by ſeveral judicial or municipal laws. 3. They have ſeveral diſtinct and ſeparate parliaments. 4. Each kingdom hath ſeveral nobilities; for albeit a poſtnatus in Scotland, or any of his poſterity, be the heir of a nobleman of Scotland, and by his birth is legitimated in England, yet he is none of the (a) peers or nobility of England; for his natural ligeance and obedience, due by the law of nature, maketh him a ſubject and no alien within England: but that ſubjection maketh him not noble within England, for that nobility had his original by the king's creation, and not of nature. And this is manifeſted by expreſs authorities, grounded upon excellent reaſons in our books. If a baron, viſcount, earl, marquis, or duke of England, bring any action real or perſonal, and the defendant pleadeth in abatement of the writ, that he is no baron, viſcount, earl, &c. and thereupon the demandant or plaintiff taketh iſſue; this iſſue ſhall not be tried by jury, but by the (b) record of parliament, whether he or his anceſtor, whoſe heir he is, were called to ſerve there as a peer, and one of the nobility of the realm. And ſo are our books adjudged in 22 Aſſ. 24. 48 Edw. 3. 30. 35 H. 6. 40. 20. Eliz. Dyer 360. Vide in the ſixth part of my reports, in the counteſs of Rutland's caſe. So as the man, that is not de jure a peer, or one of the nobility, to ſerve in the upper houſe of the parliament of England, is not in the legal proceedings of law accounted noble within England. And therefore if a countee of France or Spain, or any other foreign kingdom, ſhould come into England, he ſhould not here ſue, or be ſued by the name of countee, &c. for that he is none of the nobles that are members of the upper houſe of the parliament of England; and herewith agree the book-caſes of (c) 20 Ed. 4. 6. a. b. and 11 Ed. 3. tit. Bre. 473. like law it is, and for the ſame reaſon, of an earl or baron of Ireland, he is not any peer, or of the nobility of this realm: and herewith agreeth the book in 8 R. 2. tit. (d) Proceſ. pl. ultim. where in an action of debt proceſs of outlawry was awarded againſt the earl of Ormond in Ireland; which ought not to have been, if he had been noble here. Vide Dyer (e) 20 Eliz. 360.

But yet there is a diverſity in our books worthy of obſervation, for the higheſt and loweſt dignities are univerſal; for if a king of a foreign nation come into England, by the leave of the king of this realm (as it ought to be) in this caſe he ſhall ſue and be ſued by the name of a king; and herewith agreeth 11 E. 3. tit. Br. (f) 473. where the caſe was, that Alice, which was the wife of R. de O. brought a writ of dower againſt John earl of Richmond, and the writ was præcip. Johann'. comiti Richmondiæ cuſtodi terr' & hæredis of William the ſon of R. de O. the tenant pleaded that he is duke of Britain, not named duke, judgment of the writ? But it is ruled, that the writ was good, for that the dukedom of Britain was not within the realm of England. But there it is ſaid, that if a man bring a writ againſt Edward (g) Baliol, and name him not king of Scotland, the writ ſhall abate for the cauſe aforeſaid. And hereof there is a notable precedent in Fleta, lib. 2. cap. 3. § 9. where treating of the juriſdiction of the king's court of Marſhalſea it is ſaid, et hæc omnia ex officio ſuo licite facere poterit (ſſ. ſeneſchal' aul' hoſpitii regis) non obſtante alicujus libertate, etiam in alieno regno, dum tamen reus in hoſpitio regis poterit inveniri; ſecundum quod contigit Pariſ. anno 14 Ed. 1. de Engelramo de Nogent capto in hoſpitio regis Angl' (ipſo rege tunc apud Pariſiam exiſtente) cum diſcis argenti furatis recenter ſuper facto, rege Franc' tunc preſente; & unde licèt curia regis Franc' de præd' latrone per caſtellanum Pariſ. petita fuerit, habitis hinc & inde tractatibus in conſilio regis Franc', tandem conſideratum fuit, quod rex Angl' illa regia prærogativa, & hoſpitii ſui privilegio uteretur, & gauderet; qui, coram Roberto Fitz-John milite tunc hoſpitii regis Angl' ſeneſchallo de latrocinio convictus, per conſiderationem ejus cur' fuit (h) ſuſpenſus in patibulo ſancti Germani de pratis. Which proveth, that though the king be in a foreign kingdom, yet he is judged in law a king there. The other part of the ſaid diverſity is proved by the book-caſe in 20 (i) E. 4. fol. 6. a. b. where in a writ of debt brought by ſir J. Douglas, knight, againſt Elizabeth Molford, the defendant demanded judgment of the writ, for that the plaintiff was an earl of Scotland, but not of England; and that our ſovereign lord the king had granted unto him ſafe conduct, not named by his name of dignity, judgment of the writ, &c. And there juſtice Littleton giveth the rule. The plaintiff (ſaith he) is an earl in Scotland, but not in England; and if our ſovereign lord the king grant to a duke of France a ſafe conduct to merchandize, and enter into his realm, if the duke cometh and bringeth merchandize into this land, and is to ſue an action here, he ought not to name himſelf duke, for he is not a duke in this land, but only in France. And theſe be the very words of that book-caſe; out of which I collect three things. Firſt, that the plaintiff was named by the name of a knight, whereſoever he received that degree of dignity. Vide (k) 7 H. 6. 14 b. accord. 2. That an earl of another kingdom or nation is no earl (to be ſo named in legal proceedings) within this realm: and herewith agreeth the book of (l) 11 Ed. 3. the earl of Richmond's caſe before recited. 3. That albeit the king by his letters patent of ſafe conduct do name him duke, yet that appellation maketh him no duke, to ſue or to be ſued by that name within England: ſo as the law in theſe points (apparent in our books) being obſerved, and rightly underſtood, it appeareth how cauſeleſs their fear was, that the adjudging of the plaintiff to be no alien ſhould make a confuſion of the nobilities of either kingdom.

The 4th general part, de alienigena.

Now are we in order come to the fourth noun (which is the fourth general part) alienigena; wherein ſix things did fall into conſideration. 1. Who was alienigena, an alien born by the laws of England. 2. How many kinds of aliens born there were. 3. What incidents belonged to an alien born. 4. The reaſon why an alien is not capable of inheritance or freehold within England. 5. Examples, reſolutions, and judgments reported in our books in all ſucceſſions of ages, proving the plaintiff to be no alien. 6. Demonſtrative concluſions upon the premiſes, approving the ſame.

Who is an alien.

Co. Lit. 128. b. 129. a. 4 Inſt. 152. Lit. ſect. 198.

1. An alien is a ſubject that is born out of the ligeance of the king, and under the ligeance of another, and can have no real or perſonal action for or concerning land; but in every ſuch action the tenant or defendant may plead, that he was born in ſuch a country which is not within the ligeance of the king, and demand judgment if he ſhall be anſwered. And this is in effect the deſcription which Lit. himſelf maketh, lib. 2. cap. 14. Villen. fol. 43. Alienigena eſt alienæ gentis ſeu alienæ ligeantiæ, qui etiam dicitur peregrinus, alienus, exoticus, extraneus, &c. Extraneus eſt ſubditus, qui extra terram, i. e. poteſtatem regis, natus eſt. And the uſual and right pleading of an alien born doth livelily and truly deſcribe and expreſs what he is. And therein two things are to be obſerved. Firſt, that the moſt uſual and beſt pleading in this caſe is both excluſive and incluſive, viz. extra ligeantiam domini regis, &c. & infra ligeantiam alterius regis, as it appeareth in (m) 9 Ed. 4. 7. b. Book of Entries, fol. 244, &c. which cannot poſſibly be pleaded in this caſe, for two cauſes. 1. For that one king is ſovereign of both kingdoms. 2. One ligeance is due by both to one ſovereign, and in caſe of an alien there muſt of neceſſity be ſeveral kings and ſeveral ligeances. Secondly, no pleading was ever extra regnum, or extra legem, which are circumſcribed to place; but extra ligeantiam, which (as it hath been ſaid) is not local or tied to any place.

Note.

Full. Ch. Hiſt. l. 1. 12.

It appeareth by Bracton, lib. 3. tract. 2. c. 15. fol. 134. that (n) Canutus the Daniſh King, having ſettled himſelf in this kingdom in peace, kept notwithſtanding (for the better continuance thereof) great armies within this realm. The peers and nobles of England diſtaſting this government by arms and armies, odimus accipitrem quia ſemper vivit in armis, wiſely and politicly perſuaded the king, that they would provide for the ſafety of him and his people, and yet his armies carrying with them many inconveniences ſhould be withdrawn; and therefore offered, that they would conſent to a law, that whoſoever ſhould kill an alien, and be apprehended, and could not acquit himſelf, he ſhould be ſubject to juſtice: but if the manſlayer fled, and could not be taken, then the town where the man was ſlain ſhould forfeit ſixty-ſix marks unto the king; and if the town were not able to pay it, then the hundred ſhould forfeit and pay the ſame unto the king's treaſure; whereunto the king aſſented. This law was penned quicunque occiderit Francigenam, &c. not excluding other aliens, but putting Francigena a Frenchman for example, that others muſt be like unto him, in owing ſeveral ligeance to a ſeveral ſovereign, that is, to be extra ligeantiam regis Angl', and infra ligeantiam alterius regis. And it appears before out of Bracton and Fleta, that both of them uſe the ſame example (in deſcribing of an alien) ad fidem regis Franciæ. And it was holden, that except it could be proved, that the party ſlain was an Engliſhman, that he ſhould be taken for an alien; and this was called Engleſherie, Engleſheria, that is, a proof that the party ſlain was an Engliſhman. (Hereupon Canutus preſently withdrew his armies, and within a while after loſt his crown, and the ſame was reſtored to his right owner.) The ſaid law of Engleſherie continued until 14 Ed. 3. cap. 4. and then the ſame was by act of parliament ouſted and aboliſhed. So amongſt the laws of William the firſt, (publiſhed by maſter Lambert, fol. 125.) omnis Francigena (there put, for example as before is ſaid, to expreſs what manner of perſon alienigena ſhould be) qui tèmpore Edvardi propinqui noſtri fuit particeps legûm & conſuetudinûm Anglorum (that is made denizen) quod dicunt ad ſcot & lot perſolvat ſecundum legem Anglorum.

How many kind of aliens there be.

Every man is either alienigena, an alien born, or ſubditus, a ſubject born. Every alien is either a friend that is in league, &c. or an enemy that is in open war, &c. Every alien enemy is either pro tempore, temporary for a time, or perpetuus, perpetual, or ſpecialiter permiſſus, permitted eſpecially. Every ſubject is either natus, born, or datus, given or made: and of theſe briefly in their order. An alien friend, as at this time, a German, a Frenchman, a Spaniard, &c. (all the kings and princes in Chriſtendom being now in league with our ſovereign; but a Scot being a ſubject, cannot be ſaid to be a friend, nor Scotland to be ſolum amici) may by the common law have, acquire, and get within this realm, by gift, trade, or other lawful means, any treaſure, or (o) goods perſonal whatſoever, as well as an Engliſhman, and may maintain any (p) action for the ſame: but (q) lands within this realm, or houſes (but for their neceſſary habitation only) alien friends cannot acquire, or get, nor maintain any action real or perſonal, for any land or houſe, unleſs the houſe be for their neceſſary habitation. For if they ſhould be diſabled to acquire and maintain theſe things, it were in effect to deny unto them trade and traffick, which is the life of every iſland. But if this alien become an enemy (as all alien friends may) then is he utterly diſabled to maintain any action, or get any thing within this realm. And this is to be underſtood of a temporary alien, that being an enemy, may be a friend, or being a friend may be an enemy. But a perpetual enemy (though there be no wars by fire and ſword between them) cannot maintain any action, or get any thing within this realm. All infidels are in law perpetui (r) inimici, perpetual enemies (for the law preſumes not that they will be converted, that being remota potentia, a remote poſſibility) for between them, as with the devils, whoſe ſubjects they be, and the Chriſtian, there is perpetual hoſtility, and can be no (s) peace; for as the apoſtle ſaith, 2 Cor. 6. 15. quæ autem conventio Chriſti ad Belial, aut quæ pars fideli cum infideli? And the law ſaith, Judæo Chriſtianum nullum ſerviat mancipium, nefas enim eſt quem Chriſtus redemit blaſphemum Chriſti in ſervitutis vinculis detinere. Regiſter 282. Infideles ſunt Chriſti & Chriſtianorum inimici. And herewith agreeth the book in 12 H. 8. fol. 4. where it is holden that a pagan cannot have or maintain any action at all. By what laws kingdoms gotten by conqueſt,&c. ſhall be governed. Dav. 30. b. 3 Keb. 402. *Salk.*411,412. 666. Comb. 55.

And upon this ground there is a diverſity between a conqueſt of a kingdom of a Chriſtian king, and the conqueſt of a kingdom of an infidel; for if a king come to a Chriſtian kingdom by conqueſt, ſeeing that he hath vitæ & necis poteſtatem, he may at his pleaſure alter and change the laws of that kingdom, but until he doth make an alteration of thoſe laws, the ancient laws of that kingdom remain. But if a Chriſtian king ſhould conquer a kingdom of an infidel, and bring them under his ſubjection, there ipſo facto the laws of the infidel are abrogated; for that they be not only againſt Chriſtianity, but againſt the law of God and of nature, contained in the Decalogue: and in that caſe, until certain laws be eſtabliſhed amongſt them, the king by himſelf, and ſuch judges as he ſhall appoint, ſhall judge them and their cauſes according to natural equity, in ſuch ſort as kings in ancient time did with their kingdoms, before any certain municipal laws were given, as before hath been ſaid. But if a king hath a kingdom by title of deſcent, there ſeeing by the laws of that kingdom he doth inherit the kingdom, he cannot change thoſe laws of himſelf, without conſent of parliament. Alſo if a king hath a Chriſtian kingdom by conqueſt, as king Henry the ſecond had Ireland, after king John had given unto them, being under his obedience and ſubjection, the laws of England for the government of that country, no ſucceeding king could alter the ſame without parliament.

Ireland.

And in that caſe while the realm of England and that of Ireland were governed by ſeveral laws, any that was born in Ireland was no alien to the realm of England. In which precedent of Ireland three things are to be obſerved. 1. That then there had been two deſcents, one from Henry the ſecond to king Richard the firſt, and from Richard to king John, before the alteration of the laws. 2. That albeit Ireland was a diſtinct dominion, yet, the title thereof being by conqueſt, the ſame by judgment of law might by expreſs words be bound by act of the parliament of England. 3. That albeit no reſervation were in king John's charter, yet by judgment of law a writ of error did lie in the King's Bench in England of an erroneous judgment in the King's Bench of Ireland. Furthermore, in the caſe of a conqueſt of a Chriſtian kingdom, as well thoſe that ſerved in wars at the conqueſt, as thoſe that remained at home for the ſafety and peace of their country, and other the king's ſubjects, as well antenati as poſtnati, are capable of lands in the kingdom or country conquered, and may maintain any real action, and have the like privileges and benefits there, as they may have in England.

Kelw. 202. pl. 19 4 Inſt. 71. F. N. B. 22. d. Vaugh. 290. 291.

The third kind of enemy is, inimicus permiſſus, an enemy that cometh into the realm by the king's ſafe-conduct, of which you may read in the Regiſter, fol. 25. Book of Entries, ejectione firmæ, 7, 32 H. 6. 23. b. &c.

Co. Lit. 129. a.

Now what a ſubject born is, appeareth at large by that which hath been ſaid de ligeantia: and ſo likewiſe de ſubdito dato, of a donaiſon: for that is the right name, ſo called, becauſe his legitimation is given unto him; for if you derive denizen from deins nee, one born within the obedience or ligeance of the king, then ſuch a one ſhould be all one with a natural-born ſubject. And it appeareth before out of the laws of king W. 1. of what antiquity the making of denizens by the king of England hath been.

Of the incidents to an alien. Lit. rep. 27.

3. There be regularly (unleſs it be in ſpecial caſes) three incidents to a ſubject born. 1. That the parents be under the actual obedience of the king. 2. That the place of his birth be within the king's dominion. And 3. The time of his birth is chiefly to be conſidered; for he cannot be a ſubject born of one kingdom that was born under the ligeance of a king of another kingdom, albeit afterwards one kingdom deſcend to the king of the other. 1. For the firſt, it is termed actual obedience, becauſe though the king of England hath abſolute right to other kingdoms or dominions, as France, Aquitain, Normandy, &c. yet ſeeing the king is not in actual poſſeſſion thereof, none born there ſince the crown of England was out of actual poſſeſſion thereof, are ſubjects to the king of England. 2. The place is obſervable, but ſo as many times ligeance or obedience, without any place within the king's dominions, may make a ſubject born; but any place within the king's dominions without obedience can never produce a natural ſubject. And therefore if any of the king's ambaſſadors in foreign nations have children there of their wives, being Engliſh women, by the common laws of England they are natural-born ſubjects, and yet they are born out of the king's dominions. But if enemies ſhould come into any of the king's dominions, and ſurpriſe any caſtle or fort, and poſſeſs the ſame by hoſtility, and have iſſue there, that iſſue is no ſubject to the king, though he be born within his dominions; for that he was not born under the king's ligeance or obedience. But 3. the time of his (a) birth is of the eſſence of a ſubject born; for he cannot be a ſubject to the king of England, unleſs at the time of his (a) birth he was under the ligeance and obedience of the king. And that is the reaſon that antenati in Scotland (for that at the time of their birth they were under the ligeance and obedience of another king) are aliens born, in reſpect of the time of their birth.

Cr. Car. 601. 602. March 91. Jenk. Cent. 3.

Wherefore an alien born is not capable of lands.

4. It followeth next in courſe to ſet down the reaſons, wherefore an alien born is not capable of inheritance within England; and that he is not for three reaſons. 1. The ſecrets of the realm might thereby be diſcovered. 2. The revenues of the realm (the ſinews of war, and ornament of peace) ſhould be taken and enjoyed by ſtrangers born. 3. It ſhould tend to the deſtruction of the realm. Which three reaſons do appear in the ſtatute of 2 H. 5. cap. and 4 H. 5. cap. ultimo. But it may be demanded, wherein doth that deſtruction conſiſt. Whereunto it is anſwered: firſt, it tends to deſtruction tempore belli; for then ſtrangers might fortify themſelves in the heart of the realm, and be ready to ſet fire on the commonwealth, as was excellently ſhadowed by the Trojan horſe in Virgil's ſecond book of his Æneid, where a very few men in the heart of the city did more miſchief in a few hours, than ten thouſand men without the walls in ten years. Secondly, tempore pacis, for ſo might many aliens born get a great part of the inheritance and freehold of the realm, whereof there ſhould follow a failure of juſtice (the ſupporter of the commonwealth), for that aliens born cannot be returned of juries (b) for the trial of iſſues between the king and the ſubject, or between ſubject and ſubject. And for this purpoſe, and many other, ſee a charter (worthy of obſervation) of king Ed. 3. written to pope Clement, datum apud Weſtm. 26. die Sept. ann. regni noſtri Franciæ 4. regni vero Angliæ 17.

Examples and authorities in law.

5. Now are we come to the examples, reſolutions, and judgments of former times; wherein two things are to be obſerved. Firſt, how many caſes in our books do over-rule this caſe in queſtion; for ubi (c) eadem ratio ibi idem jus, & de ſimilibus idem eſt judicium. 2. That for want of an expreſs text of law in terminis terminantibus, and of examples and precedents in like caſes (as was objected by ſome), we are driven to determine the queſtion by natural reaſon: for it was ſaid, ſi ceſſet lex ſcripta, id cuſtodiri oportet, quod moribus & conſuetudine inductum eſt; & ſi qua in re hoc defecerit, recurrendum eſt ad rationem. But that receiveth a threefold anſwer. Firſt, that there is no ſuch rule in the common or civil law; but the true rule of the civil law is, lex ſcripta ſi ceſſet, id cuſtodiri oportet quod moribus et conſuetudine inductum eſt; & ſi qua in re hoc defecerit, tunc id quod proximum & conſequens ei eſt; & ſi id non appareat, tunc jus, quo urbs Romana utitur, ſervari oportet. Secondly, if the ſaid imaginative rule be rightly and legally underſtood, it may ſtand for truth: for if you intend ratio for the legal and profound reaſon of ſuch, as by diligent ſtudy and long experience and obſervation are ſo learned in the laws of this realm, as out of the reaſon of the ſame they can rule the caſe in queſtion, in that ſenſe the ſaid rule is true: but if it be intended of the reaſon of the wiſeſt man that profeſſeth not the laws of England, then (I ſay) the rule is abſurd and dangerous; for (d) cuilibet in ſuâ arte perito eſt credendum, & quod quiſque (e) norit in hoc ſe exerceat. Et omnes prudentes illa admittere ſolent, quæ probantur iis, qui in ſuâ arte bene verſati ſunt. Ariſt. 1. Topicorum, cap. 6. Thirdly, there be multitudes of examples, precedents, judgments, and reſolutions in the laws of England, the true and unſtrained reaſon whereof doth decide this queſtion. For example,

Gaſcoin, Vaſconia, Gaſconia.

The dukedom of Acquitain, whereof Gaſcoin was parcel, and the earldom of Poitiers, came to king Henry the ſecond by the marriage of Eleanor, daughter and heir of William duke of Aquitain, and earl of Poitiers, which deſcended to Rich. 1. Hen. 3. Ed. 1. Ed. 2. Ed. 3. &c. In 27. lib. (f) Aſſ. pl. 48. in one caſe there appear two judgments and one reſolution to be given by the judges of both benches in this caſe following. The poſſeſſions of the prior of Chelſey in the time of war were ſeiſed into the king's hands, for that the prior was an alien born. The prior by petition of right ſued to the king; and the effect of his petition was, that before he became prior of Chelſey, he was prior of Andover; and whilſt he was prior there, his poſſeſſions of that priory were likewiſe ſeiſed for the ſame cauſe, ſuppoſing that he was an alien born; whereupon he ſued a former petition, and alledged that he was born in Gaſcoin within the ligeance of the king: which point being put in iſſue, and found by jury to be true, it was adjudged that he ſhould have reſtitution of his poſſeſſions generally without mentioning of advowſons. After which reſtitution, one of the ſaid advowſons became void, the prior preſented, againſt whom the king brought a quare impedit, wherein the king was barred; and all this was contained in the latter petition. And the book ſaith, that the earl of Arundel, and ſir Guy of B. came into the court of Common Pleas, and demanded the opinion of the judges of that court concerning the ſaid caſe, who reſolved, that upon the matter aforeſaid the king had no right to ſeize. In which caſe amongſt many notable points, this one appeareth to be adjudged and reſolved, that a man born in Gaſcoin under the king's ligeance, was no alien born, as to lands and poſſeſſions within the realm of England, and yet England and Gaſcoin were, 1. Several and diſtinct countries. 2. Inherited by ſeveral and diſtinct titles. 3. Governed by ſeveral and diſtinct municipal laws, as it appeareth amongſt the records in the Tower, Rot. Vaſc. 10. Ed. 1. num. 7. 4. Out of the extent of the great ſeal of England, and the juriſdiction of the Chancery of England. 5. The like objection might be made for default of trial, as hath been made againſt the plaintiff. And where it was ſaid that Gaſcoin was no kingdom, and therefore it was not to be matched to the caſe in hand, it was anſwered, that this difference was without a diverſity, as to the caſe in queſtion; for if the plea in the caſe at the bar be good, then without queſtion the prior had been an alien; for it might have been ſaid (as it is in the caſe at the bar) that he was born extra ligeantiam regis regni ſui Angliæ, & infra ligeantiam dominii ſui Vaſconiæ, and that they were ſeveral dominions, and governed by ſeveral laws: but then ſuch a conceit was not hatched, that a king having ſeveral dominions ſhould have ſeveral ligeances of his ſubjects. Secondly, it was anſwered, that Gaſcoin was ſometime a kingdom, and likewiſe Millan, Burgundy, Bavaria, Bretagne, and others, were, and now are become dukedoms. Caſtile, Arragon, Portugal, Barcelona, &c. were ſometime earldoms, afterwards dukedoms, and now kingdoms. Bohemia and Poland were ſometimes dukedoms, and now kingdoms; and (omitting many other, and coming nearer home) Ireland was before 32 H. 8. a lordſhip, and now is a kingdom, and yet the king of England was as abſolute a prince and ſovereign when he was lord of Ireland, as now, when he is ſtyled king of the ſame. 10 Ed. 3. 41. an exchange was made between an Engliſhman and a Gaſcoin, of lands in England and in Gaſcoin; ergo, the Gaſcoin was no alien, for then had he not been capable of lands in England. 1 H. 4. 1. the king brought a writ of right of ward againſt one Sybil, whoſe huſband was exiled into Gaſcoin; ergo, Gaſcoin is no parcel or member of England, for exilium eſt patriæ privatio, natalis ſoli mutatio, legum nativarum amiſſio. 4 E. 3. 10. b. the king directed his writ out of Chancery under the great ſeal of England, to the mayor of (g) Burdeaux (a city in Gaſcoin), then being under the king's obedience, to certify, whether one that was outlawed here in England, was at that time in the king's ſervice under him in obſequio regis: whereby it appeareth, that the king's writ did run into Gaſcoin, for it is the trial that the common law hath appointed in that caſe. But as to other caſes, it is to be underſtood, that there be two kinds of writs, brevia mandatoria & remedialia, & brevia mandatoria & non remedialia. Brevia mandatoria & remedialia, as writs of right, of formedon, &c. of debt, treſpaſs, &c. and ſhortly, all writs real and perſonal, whereby the party wronged is to recover ſomewhat, and to be remedied for that wrong was offered unto him, are returnable or determinable in ſome court of juſtice within England, and to be ſerved and executed by the ſheriffs, or other miniſters of juſtice within England; and theſe cannot by any means extend into any other kingdom, country, or nation, though that it be under the king's actual ligeance and obedience. But the other kind of writs, that are mandatory, and not remedial, are not tied to any place, but do follow ſubjection and ligeance, in what country or nation ſoever the ſubject is, as the king's writ to command any of his ſubjects reſiding in any foreign country to return into any of the king's own dominions, ſub fide et ligeantia quibus nobis tenemini. And ſo are the aforeſaid mandatory writs cited out of the Regiſter of protection for ſafety of body and goods, and requiring, that if any injury be offered, that the ſame be redreſſed according to the laws and cuſtoms of that place. Vide le Reg. fol. 26. Stamford Prærog. cap. 12. fol. 39. ſaith, that men born in Gaſcoin are inheritable to lands in England. This doth alſo appear by divers acts of parliament: for by the whole parliament, 39 E. 3. cap. 16. it is agreed, that the Gaſcoins are of the ligeance and ſubjection of the king. Vide 42 Ed. 3. cap. 2. & 28 H. 6. cap. 5. &c.

Guienne was another part of Aquitain, and came by the ſame title: and thoſe of Guienne were by act of parliament in 13 H. 4. not imprinted, ex rot parliament. eodem anno, adjudged and declared to be no aliens, but able to poſſeſs and purchaſe, &c. lands within this realm. And ſo doth Stamford take the law. Prærog. c. 12. f. 39.

And thus much of the dukedom of Aquitain, which (together with the earldom of Poitiers) came to king Henry the ſecond (as hath been ſaid) by marriage, and continued in the actual poſſeſſion of the kings of England by ten deſcents, viz. from the firſt year of king Henry the ſecond, unto the two and thirtieth year of king Henry the ſixth, which was upon the very point of three hundred years, within which duchy there were (as ſome write) 4 archbiſhopricks, 24 biſhopricks, 15 earldoms, 202 baronies, and above a thouſand captainſhips and bailliwicks: and in all this long time neither book-caſe nor record can be found wherein any plea was offered to diſable any of them that were born there, by foreign birth, but the contrary hereof directly appeareth by the ſaid book-caſe of (a) 27 *lib. 4 Inſt. 286.

The kings of England had ſometimes Normandy under actual ligeance and obedience. The queſtion is then, whether men born in Normandy, after one king had them both, were inheritable to lands in England; and it is evident by our books that they were: for ſo it appeareth by the declaratory act of 17 E. 2. de Prærog. Reg. c. 12. that they were inheritable to, and capable of lands in England; for the purview of that ſtatute is, quod rex habebit eſcaetas de terris Normannorum, &c. Ergo, Normans might have lands in England: et hoc ſimiliter intelligendum eſt, ſi aliqua hæreditas deſcendat alicui nato in partibus tranſmarinis, &c. Whereby it appeareth, that they were capable of lands within England by deſcent. And that this act of 17 E. 2. was but a declaration of the common law, it appeareth both by Bracton, who (as it hath been ſaid) wrote in the reign of Henry the third, lib. 3. tract. 2. c. 1. f. 116. and by Britton who wrote in 5 E. 1. c. 18. that all ſuch lands as any Norman had either by deſcent or purchaſe, eſcheated to the king for their treaſon, in revolting from their natural liege lord and ſovereign. And therefore Stamford Prærog. cap. 12. fol. 39. expounding the ſaid ſtatute of 17 E. 2. cap. 12. concludeth, that by that chapter it ſhould appear (as if he had ſaid, it is apparent without queſtion) that all men born in Normandy, Gaſcoin, Guienne, Anjou, and Britain, (whilſt they were under actual obedience) were inheritable within this realm as well as Engliſhmen. And the reaſon thereof was, for that they were under one ligeance due to one ſovereign. And ſo much (omitting many other authorities) for Normandy: ſaving I cannot let paſs the iſles of Guernſey and Jerſey, parts and parcels of the dukedom of Normandy, yet remaining under the actual ligeance and obedience of the king. I think no man will doubt, but thoſe that are born in Guernſey and Jerſey (though thoſe iſles are no parcel of the realm of England, but ſeveral dominions enjoyed by ſeveral titles, governed by ſeveral laws) are inheritable and capable of any lands within the realm of England, 1 E. 3. fol. 7. Commiſſion to determine the title of lands within the ſaid iſles, according to the laws of the iſles; and Mich. 41 E. 3. in the treaſury, quia negotium præd' nec aliqua alia negotia de inſulâ præd' emergentia non debent terminari, niſi ſecundum legem inſulæ præd', &c. And the Regiſter, fol. 22. rex fidelibus ſuis de Guernſey & Jerſey. King William the firſt brought this dukedom of Normandy with him, which by five deſcents continued under the actual obedience of the kings of England; and in or about the 6th year of king John, the crown of England loſt the actual poſſeſſion thereof, until king Henry the fifth recovered it again, and left it to king Henry the ſixth, who loſt it in the 28th of his reign; wherein were (as ſome write) one archbiſhoprick and ſix biſhopricks, and an hundred ſtrong towns and fortreſſes, beſides thoſe that were waſted in war.

Anjou, Tourain, and Mayne.

Maud the empreſs, the only daughter and heir of Henry the firſt, took to her ſecond huſband Jeffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, Tourain, and Mayne, who had iſſue king H. 2. to whom the ſaid earldom by juſt title deſcended, who, and the kings that ſucceeded him, ſtyled themſelves by the name of comes Andegav', &c. until king E. 3. became king of all France; and ſuch as were born within that earldom, ſo long as it was under the actual obedience of the king of England, were no aliens, but natural-born ſubjects, and never any offer made, that we can find, to diſable them for foreign birth.

Man, Mannia. 4 Inſt. 283, 284. Co. Lit. 11 b. Kelw. 202. pl. 19. 2 And. 155, 156.

But leave we Normandy and Anjou, and ſpeak we of the little, but yet ancient and abſolute kingdom of the Iſle of Man, as it appeareth by divers ancient and authentic records; as taking one for many. Artold king of Man ſued to king H. 3. to come into England to confer with him, and to perform certain things which were due to king H. 3. thereupon king H. 3. 21 Decemb. ann. regni ſui 34, at Winchester, by his letters patent gave licence to Artold king of Man as followeth. Rex omnibus ſalutem. Sciatis, quod licentiam dedimus, &c. Artoldo regi de Man veniendo ad nos in Angl' ad loquend' nobiſc' & ad faciend' nobis quod facere debet; & ideo vobis mandamus, quod ei regi in veniendo ad nos in Angl', vel ibi morando, vel inde redeundo, nullum faciat' aut fieri permittatis damnum, injur', moleſtiam, aut gravamen, vel etiam hominib' ſuis quos ſecum ducet; & ſi aliquid eis forisfact' fuerit, id eis ſine dilat' faciat' emendari. In cujus, &c. duratur' uſque ad feſt' S. Mich. Wherein two things are to be obſerved; 1. That ſeeing that Artold king of Man ſued for a licence in this caſe to the king, it proveth him an abſolute king, for that a monarch or an abſolute prince cannot come into England without licence of the king; but any ſubject being in league, may come into this realm without licence. 2. That the king in his licence doth ſtyle him by the name of a king. It was reſolved in 11 H. 8. that where an office was found after the deceaſe of Thomas earl of Derby, and that he died ſeiſed, &c. of the Iſle of Man, that the ſaid office was utterly void; for that the Iſle of Man, Normandy, Gaſcoin, &c. were out of the power of the Chancery, and governed by ſeveral laws; and yet none will doubt, but thoſe that are born within that iſle, are capable and inheritable of lands within the realm of England.

Wales was ſometime a kingdom, as it appeareth by 19 H. 6. fol. 6. and by the act of parliament of 2 H. 5. c. 6. but whilſt it was a kingdom, the ſame was holden, and within the fee, of the king of England; and this appeareth by our books, Fleta, lib. 1. cap. 16. 1 E. 3. 14. 8 E. 3. 59. 13 E. 3. tit. Juriſdict. 10 H. 4. 6. Plow. Com. 368. And in this reſpect, in divers ancient charters, kings of old time ſtyled themſelves in ſeveral manners, as king Edgar, Britanniæ Βασιλεὺς; Etheldredus, totius Albion' Dei providentiâ imperator; Edredus Magn' Britann' monarcha; which among many other of like nature I have ſeen. But by the ſtatute of 12 E. 1. Wales was united and incorporated into England, and made parcel of England in poſſeſſion; and therefore it is ruled in 7 H. 4. f. 13. a. that no protection doth lie quia moratur in Wallia, becauſe Wales is within the realm of England. And where it is recited in the act of 27 H. 8. that Wales was ever parcel of the realm of England, it is true in this ſenſe, viz. that before 12 E. 1. it was parcel in tenure, and ſince it is parcel of the body of the realm. And whoſoever is born within the fee of the king of England, though it be in another kingdom, is a natural-born ſubject, and capable and inheritable of lands in England, as it appeareth in Plow. Com. 126. And therefore thoſe that were born in Wales before 12 E. 1. whilſt it was only holden of England, were capable and inheritable of lands in England.

France, Gallia, Francia.

Now come we to France and the members thereof, as Callice, Guynes, Tournay, &c. which deſcended to king Edw. the third as ſon and heir to Iſabel, daughter and heir to Philip le Beau, king of France. Certain it is, whilſt king Henry the ſixth had both England, and the heart and greateſt part of France under his actual ligeance and obedience (for he was crowned king of France in Paris) that they that were then born in thoſe parts of France that were under actual ligeance and obedience, were no aliens, but capable of, and inheritable to lands in England. And that is proved by the writs in the Regiſter, fol. 26. cited before. But the inrollment of letters patent of denization in the Exchequer int' originalia, ann. 11 H. 6. with the lord treaſurer's remembrancer was ſtrongly urged and objected; for (it was ſaid) thereby it appeareth, that king H. 6. in anno 11 of his reign, did make denizen one Reynel born in France. Whereunto it was anſwered, that it is proved by the ſaid letters patent, that he was born in France, before king Henry the ſixth had the actual poſſeſſion of the crown of France, ſo as he was antenatus; and this appeareth by the ſaid letters patent, whereby the king granteth, that magiſter Johannes Reynel ſerviens noſter, &c. infra regnum noſtrum Franc' oriundus pro termino vitæ ſuæ ſit ligeus noſter, & eodem modo teneatur ſicut verus & fidelis noſter infra regnum Angl' oriundus, ac quod ipſe terras infra regnum noſtrum Angl' ſeu alia dominia noſtra perquirere poſſit & valeat. Now if that Reynel had been born ſince Henry the ſixth had the quiet poſſeſſion of France (the king being crowned king of France about one year before) of neceſſity he muſt be an infant of very tender age, and then the king would never have called him his ſervant, nor made the patent (as thereby may be collected) for his ſervice, nor have called him by the name of magiſter Johannes Reynel: but without queſtion he was antenatus, born before the king had the actual and real poſſeſſion of that crown.

Guines alſo, another part of France, was under the like obedience to king Henry the ſixth, as appeareth by 31 H. 6. fol. 4. And Tournay was under the obedience of Henry the eighth, as it appeareth by 5 El. Dyer, fol. 224. for there it is reſolved, that a baſtard born at Tournay, whilſt it was under the obedience of Henry the eighth, was a natural ſubject, as an iſſue born within this realm by aliens. If then thoſe that were born at Tournay, Calais, &c. whilſt they were under the obedience of the king, were natural ſubjects, and no aliens, it followeth, that when the kingdom of France (whereof thoſe were parcels) was under the king's obedience, that thoſe that were then born there, were natural ſubjects, and no aliens.

Next followeth Ireland, which originally came to the kings of England by conqueſt; but who was the firſt conqueror thereof, hath been a queſtion. I have ſeen a charter made by king Edgar in theſe words. Ego Edgarus Anglorum Βασιλευς, omniumque inſularum oceani, quæ Britanniam circumjacent, imperator & dominus, gratias ago ipſi Deo omnipotenti regi meo, qui meum imperium ſic ampliavit & exaltavit ſuper regnum patrûm meorum, &c. Mihi conceſſit propitia divinitas, cum Anglorum imperio, omnia regna inſularum oceani, &c. cum ſuis ferociſſimis regibus uſque Norvegiam, maximamque partem Hibern', cum ſuâ nobiliſſimâ civitate de Dublinâ, Anglorum regno ſubjugare, quapropter & ego Chriſti gloriam & laudem in regno meo exaltare, & ejus ſervitium amplificare devotus diſpoſui, &c. Yet for that it was wholly conquered in the reign of Henry the ſecond, the honour of the conqueſt of Ireland is attributed to him; and his ſtyle was, rex Angl', dominus Hibern', dux Normann', dux Aquitan', & comes Andegav', king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy, duke of Aquitain, and earl of Anjou. That Ireland is a dominion ſeparate and divided from England, it is evident from our books,

(b) Dyer* 360. and for that they retain unto this day divers of their ancient cuſtoms, the book in 20 H. 6. 8. holdeth, that Ireland is governed by laws and cuſtoms ſeparate and diverſe from the laws of England. A voyage royal may be made into Ireland. Vide (c) 11 H. 4. 7. a. and 7 (d) E. 4. 27. a. which proveth it a diſtinct dominion. And in anno 33 reg. El. it was reſolved by all the judges of England in the caſe of (e) Orurke an Iriſhman, who had committed high treaſon in Ireland, that he by the ſtatute of 23 H. 8. c. 33. might be indicted, arraigned, and tried for the ſame in England, according to the purview of that ſtatute; the words of which ſtatute be, 'that all treaſons, &c. committed by any (f) perſon out 'of the realm of England ſhall be from henceforth enquired of, &c.' and they all reſolved (as afterward they did alſo in ſir John Perrot's caſe) that Ireland was out of the realm of England, and that treaſons committed there were to be tried within England by that ſtatute. In the ſtatute of 4 H. 7. cap. 24. of (g) fines, proviſion is made for them that be out of this land, and it is holden in Plow. Com. in Stowel's caſe 375, that he that is in Ireland is out of this land, and conſequently within that proviſo. Might not then the like plea be deviſed as well againſt any perſon born in Ireland, as (this is againſt Calvin that is a poſtnatus) in Scotland? for the Iriſhman is born extra ligeantiam regis regni ſui Angl', &c. which be verba operativa in the plea: but all men know, that they are natural-born ſubjects, and capable of and inheritable to laws in England.

Scotland, Scotia.

Laſtly, to conclude this part with (h) Scotland itſelf. In ancient time part of (i) Scotland (beſides Berwick) was within the power and ligeance of the king of England, as appeareth by our books (k) 42 E. 3. 2. b. the lord Beaumont's caſe, 11 E. 3. c. 2, &c. and by precedents hereafter mentioned; and that part (though it were under the king of England's ligeance and obedience) yet was it governed by the laws of Scotland. Ex rotulis Scotiæ, anno 11 Ed. 3. amongſt the records in the Tower of London. Rex, &c. Conſtituimus Rich. Talebot juſticiarium noſtrum villæ Berwici ſuper Twedam, ac omnium aliarum terrarum noſtrarum in partibus Scot', ad faciend' omnia & ſingula quæ ad officium juſticiarii pertinent, ſecundum legem & conſuetudinem regni Scot'. And after anno 26 E. 3. ex eodem rot. Rex Henrico de Percey, Ricardo de Nevil, &c. Volumus & vobis & alteri veſtrum tenore præſentium committimus & mandamus, quod homines noſtri de Scot' ad pacem & obedientiam noſtram exiſtentes, legibus, libertatibus, & liberis conſuetudinibus, quibus ipſi & anteceſſores ſui tempore celebris memoriæ Alexandri quondam regis Scot' rationabiliter uſi fuerunt, uti et gaudere deberent, prout in quibuſdam indenturis, &c. plenius dicitur contineri. And there is a writ in the Regiſter 295. a. Dedimus poteſtatem recipiendi ad fidem & pacem noſtram homines de Galloway. Now the caſe in (l) 42 Ed. 3. 2. b. (which was within ſixteen years of the ſaid grant, concerning the laws in 26 E. 3.) ruleth it, that ſo many as were born in that part of Scotland, that was under the ligeance of the king, were no aliens, but inheritable to lands in England; yet was that part of Scotland in another kingdom governed by ſeveral laws, &c. And if they were natural ſubjects in that caſe, when the king of England had but part of Scotland, what reaſon ſhould there be, why thoſe that are born there, when the king hath all Scotland, ſhould not be natural ſubjects, and no aliens? So likewiſe (m) Berwick is no part of England, nor governed by the laws of England, and yet they that have been born there, ſince they were under the obedience of one king, are natural-born ſubjects, and no aliens, as it appeareth in 15 R. 2. cap. 7, &c. Vide (n) 19 H. 6. 35. b. and 39 H. 6. 39. a. And yet in all theſe caſes and examples, if this new deviſed plea had been ſufficient, they ſhould have been all aliens againſt ſo many judgments, reſolutions, authorities, and judicial precedents in all ſucceſſions of ages. There were ſometimes in England, whilſt the heptarchy laſted, ſeven ſeveral crowned kings of ſeven ſeveral and diſtinct kingdoms, but in the end the Weſt Saxons got the monarchy, and all the other kings melted (as it were) the crowns to make one imperial diadem, for the king of the Weſt Saxons over all. Now when the whole was under the actual and real ligeance and obedience of one king, were any, that were born in any of thoſe ſeveral and diſtinct kingdoms, aliens one to another? Certainly they, being born under the obedience of one king and ſovereign, were all natural-born ſubjects, and capable of and inheritable unto any lands in any of the ſaid kingdoms.

Berwick.

In the holy hiſtory reported by St. Luke, ex dictamine Spiritus Sancti, cap. 21 & 22 Act. Apoſtolorum, it is certain, that St. Paul was a Jew, born in Tarſus, a famous city of Cilicia; for it appeareth in the ſaid 21ſt chapter, ver. 39. by his own words, ego homo ſum quidem Judæus a Tarſo Ciliciæ, non ignotæ civitatis municeps. And in the 22d chapter, ver. 3. ego ſum vir Judæus natus Tarſo Ciliciæ, &c. and then made that excellent ſermon there recorded; which when the Jews heard, the text ſaith, verſe 22. levaverunt vocem ſuam, dicentes, tolle de terra hujuſmodi, non enim fas eſt eum vivere; vociferantibus autem eis et projicientibus veſtimenta ſua, & pulverem jactantibus in aerem. Claudius Lyſias the popular tribune, to pleaſe this turbulent and prophane multitude (though it were utterly againſt juſtice and common reaſon) the text ſaith, juſſit tribunus 1. induci eum in caſtra, 2. flagellis cædi, and 3. torqueri eum (quid ita?) ut ſciret propter quam cauſam ſic acclamarent; and when they had bound Paul with cords, ready to execute the tribune's unjuſt commandment, the bleſſed apoſtle (to avoid unlawful and ſharp puniſhment) took hold of the law of a heathen emperor, and ſaid to the centurion ſtanding by him, ſi hominem Romanum et indemnatum licet vobis flagellare? Which when the centurion heard, he went to the tribune and ſaid, quid acturus es? Hic enim homo cives Romanus eſt. Then came the tribune to Paul, and ſaid unto him; dic mihi ſi tu Romanus es? At ille dixit, etiam. And the tribune anſwered, ego multa ſumma civitatem hanc conſequutus ſum. But Paul not meaning to conceal the dignity of his birth-right ſaid, ego autem et natus ſum: as if he ſhould have ſaid to the tribune, you have your freedom by purchaſe of money, and I (by a more noble means) by birthright and inheritance. Protinus ergo (ſaith the text) deceſſerunt ab illo qui illum torturi erant: tribunus quoque timuit poſtquam reſcivit, quia civis Romanus eſſet, et quia alligaſſet eum. So as hereby it is manifeſt, that Paul was a Jew, born at Tarſus in Cilicia in Aſia Minor; and yet being born under the obedience of the Roman emperor, he was by birth a citizen of Rome in Italy in Europe, that is, capable of and inheritable to all privileges and immunities of that city. But ſuch a plea as is now imagined againſt Calvin might have made St. Paul an alien to Rome. For if the emperor of Rome had ſeveral ligeances for every ſeveral kingdom and country under his obedience, then might it have been ſaid againſt St. Paul, that he was extra ligeantiam imperatoris regni ſui Italiæ, et infra ligeantiam imperatoris regni ſui Ciliciæ, &c. But as St. Paul was Judæus patriâ et Romanus privilegio, Judæus natione et Romanus jure nationum; ſo may Calvin ſay, that he is Scotus patriâ & Anglus privilegio, Scotus natione & Anglus jure nationum.

Samaria in Syria was the chief city of the ten tribes; but it being uſurped by the king of Syria, and the Jews taken priſoners, and carried away in captivity, was after inhabited by the Panyms. Now albeit Samaria of right belonged to Jewry, yet becauſe the people of Samaria were not under actual obedience, by the judgment of the chief juſtice of the whole world they were adjudged alienigenæ, aliens: for in the Evangeliſt St. Luke, c. 17. when Chriſt had cleanſed the ten lepers, unus autem ex illis (ſaith the text) ut vidit quia mundatus eſſet, regreſſus eſt cum magnâ voce magnificans Deum et cecidit in faciem ante pedes ejus gratias agens, & hic erat Samaritanus. Et Jeſus reſpondens dixit, nonne decem mundati ſunt, et novem ubi ſunt? Non eſt inventus, qui rediret et daret gloriam Deo, niſi hic alienigena. So as by his judgment this Samaritan was alienigena, a ſtranger born, becauſe he had the place, but wanted obedience. Et ſi deſit obedientia non adjuvat locus. And this agreeth with the divine, who ſaith, ſi locus ſalvare potuiſſet, Satan de cœlo pro ſua inobedientia non cecidiſſet. Adam in Paradiſo non cecidiſſet. Lot in monte non cecidiſſet, ſed potius in Sodom.

6. Now reſteth the ſixth part of this diviſion, that is to ſay, ſix demonſtrative illations or concluſions, drawn plainly and expreſsly from the premiſes.

1. Every one that is an alien by birth, may be, or might have been an enemy by accident; but Calvin could never at any time be an enemy by any accident; ergo, he cannot be an alien by birth. Vide 33 H. 6. f. 1. a. b. the difference between an alien enemy, and a ſubject traitor. Hoſtes ſunt, qui nobis, vel quibus nos bellum decernimus; cæteri proditores, prædones, &c. Calvin was born under one natural ligeance and obedience due by the law of nature to one ſovereign; ergo he is a natural-born ſubject.

3. Whoſoever is born within the king's power or protection, is no alien: but Calvin was born under the king's power and protection: ergo he is no alien.

4. Every ſtranger born muſt at his birth be either amicus, or inimicus: but Calvin at his birth could neither be amicus nor inimicus; ergo he is no ſtranger born. Inimicus he cannot be, becauſe he is ſubditus; for that cauſe alſo he cannot be amicus; neither now can Scotia be ſaid to be ſolum amici, as hath been ſaid.

Antea.

5. Whatſoever is due by the law or conſtitution of man, may be altered; but natural ligeance or obedience of the ſubject to the ſovereign cannot be altered; ergo natural ligeance or obedience to the ſovereign is not due by the law or conſtitution of man. Again, whatſoever is due by the law of nature, cannot be altered; but ligeance and obedience of the ſubject to the ſovereign is due by the law of nature; ergo it cannot be altered. It hath been proved before, that ligeance or obedience of the inferior to the ſuperior, of the ſubject to the ſovereign, was due by the law of nature many thouſand years before any law of man was made; which ligeance or obedience (being the only mark to diſtinguiſh a ſubject from an alien) could not be altered; therefore it remaineth ſtill due by the law of nature. For leges naturæ perfectiſſimæ ſunt et immutabiles, humani vero juris conditio ſemper in infinitum decurrit, et nihil eſt in eo quod perpetuo ſtare poſſit. Leges humanæ naſcuntur, vivunt, & moriuntur.

Laſtly, whoſoever at his birth cannot be an alien to the king of England, cannot be an alien to any of his ſubjects of England; but the plaintiff at his birth could be no alien to the king of England; ergo the plaintiff cannot be an alien to any of the ſubjects of England. The major and minor both be propoſitiones perſpicue veræ. For as to the major it is to be obſerved, that whoſoever is an alien born, is ſo accounted in law in reſpect of the king. And that appeareth, 1. by the pleading ſo often before remembered, that he muſt be extra ligeantiam regis, without any mention making of the ſubject. 2. When an alien born purchaſeth any lands, the king only ſhall have them, though they be holden of a ſubject, in which caſe the ſubject loſeth his ſeigniory. And as it is ſaid in our books, an alien may purchaſe ad proficuum regis; but the act of law giveth the alien nothing: and therefore if a woman alien marrieth a ſubject, ſhe ſhall not be endowed, neither ſhall an alien be tenant by the curteſy. Vide 3 H. 6. 55. a. 4 H. 3. 179. 3. The ſubject ſhall plead, that the defendant is an alien born, for the benefit of the king, that he upon office found may ſeize; and that the tenant may yield to the king the land, and not to the alien, becauſe the king hath beſt right thereunto. 4. Leagues between our ſovereign and others are the only means to make aliens friends; et fœdera percutere, to make leagues, only and wholly pertaineth to the king. 5. Wars do make aliens enemies, and bellum indicere belongeth only and wholly to the king, and not to the ſubject, as appeareth in 19 Ed. 4. fol. 6. b. 6. The king only without the ſubject may make, not only letters of ſafe-conduct, but letters patent of denization, to whom, and how many he will, and enable them at his pleaſure to ſue any of his ſubjects in any action whatſoever, real or perſonal, which the king could not do without the ſubject, if the ſubject had any intereſt given unto him by the law in any thing concerning an alien born. Nay, the law is more preciſe herein than in a number of other caſes, of higher nature: for the king cannot grant to any other to make of ſtrangers born, denizens; it is by the law itſelf ſo inſeparably and individually annexed to his royal perſon (as the book is in 20 H. 7. fol. 8.). For the law eſteemeth it a point of high prerogative, jus majeſtatis, et inter inſignia ſummæ poteſtatis, to make aliens born ſubjects of the realm, and capable of the lands and inheritances of England in ſuch ſort as any natural-born ſubject is. And therefore by the ſtatute of 27 H. 8. c. 24. many of the moſt ancient prerogatives and royal flowers of the crown, as authority to pardon treaſon, murther, manſlaughter, and felony, power to make juſtices in eyre, juſtices of aſſiſe, juſtices of peace and gaol-delivery, and ſuch like, having been ſevered and divided from the crown, were again reunited to the ſame: but authority to make letters of denization, was never mentioned therein to be reſumed, for that never any claimed the ſame by any pretext whatſoever, being a matter of ſo high a point of prerogative. So as the pleading againſt an alien, the purchaſe by any alien, leagues, and wars between aliens, denizations, and ſafe-conducts of aliens, have aſpect only and wholly unto the king. It followeth therefore, that no man can be alien to the ſubject that is not alien to the king. Non poteſt eſſe alienigena corpori, qui non eſt capiti, non gregi qui non eſt regi.

The 5 general part concerning inconveniences.

Now we are come to conſider of legal inconveniences: and firſt of ſuch as have been objected againſt the plaintiff, and ſecondly of ſuch as ſhould follow, if it had been adjudged againſt the plaintiff.

Of ſuch inconveniences as were objected againſt the plaintiff, there remain only four to be anſwered; for all the reſt are clearly and fully ſatisfied before: 1. That if poſtnati ſhould be inheritable to our laws and inheritances, it were reaſon they ſhould be bound by our laws; but poſtnati are not bound by our ſtatute or common laws; for they having (as it was objected) never ſo much freehold or inheritance, cannot be returned of juries, nor ſubject to ſcot or lot, nor chargeable to ſubſidies or quinzimes, nor bound by any act of parliament made in England. 2. Whether one be born within the kingdom of Scotland or no, is not triable in England; for that it is a thing done out of this realm, and no jury can be returned for the trial of any ſuch iſſue: and what inconvenience ſhould thereof follow, if ſuch pleas that wanted trial ſhould be allowed (for then all aliens might imagine the like plea) they, that objected it, left it to the conſideration of others. 3. It was objected, that this innovation was ſo dangerous, that the certain event thereof no man could foreſee; and therefore, ſome thought it fit, that things ſhould ſtand and continue as they had been in former time, for fear of the worſt. 4. If poſtnati were by law legitimated in England, it was objected what inconvenience and confuſion ſhould follow, if (for the puniſhment of us all) the king's royal iſſue ſhould fail, &c. whereby thoſe kingdoms might again be divided. All the other arguments and objections, that have been made, have been all anſwered before, and need not to be repeated again.

1. To the firſt it was reſolved, that the cauſe of this doubt was the miſtaking of the law: for if a poſtnatus do purchaſe any lands in England, he ſhall be ſubject in reſpect thereof, not only to the laws of this realm, but alſo to all ſervices and contributions, and to the payment of ſubſidies, taxes, and public charges, as any denizen or Engliſhman ſhall be; nay, if he dwell in England, the king may command him, by a writ of ne exeat regnum, that he depart not out of England. But if a poſtnatus dwell in Scotland, and have lands in England, he ſhall be chargeable for the ſame to all intents and purpoſes, as if an Engliſhman were owner thereof, and dwelt in Scotland, Ireland, in the iſles of Man, Guernſey, or Jerſey, or elſewhere. The ſame law is of an Iriſhman that dwells in Ireland, and hath land in England. But if poſtnati, or Iriſhmen, men of the iſles of Man, Guernſey, Jerſey, &c. have lands within England, and dwell here, they ſhall be ſubject to all ſervices and public charges within this realm, as any Engliſhman ſhall be. So as to ſervices and charges, the poſtnati and Engliſhmen born are all in one predicament.

Co. Lit. 261. a. b. 6 Co. 47. a.

2. Concerning the trial, a threefold anſwer was thereunto made and reſolved: 1. That the like objection might be made againſt Iriſhmen, Gaſcoins, Normans, men of the iſles of Man, Guernſey, and Jerſey, of Berwick, &c. all which appear by the rule of our books to be natural-born ſubjects; and yet no jury can come out of any of thoſe countries and places, for trial of their births there. 2. If the demandant or plaintiff in any action concerning lands be born in Ireland, Guernſey, Jerſey, &c. out of the realm of England, if the tenant or defendant plead, that he was born out of the ligeance of the king, &c. the demandant or plaintiff may reply, that he was born under the ligeance of the king at ſuch place within England; and upon the evidence the place ſhall not be material, but only the iſſue ſhall be, whether the demandant or plaintiff were born under the ligeance of the king in any of his kingdoms or dominions whatſoever: and in that caſe the jury (if they will) may find the ſpecial matter, viz. the place where he was born, and leave it to the judgment of the court: and that jurors may take knowledge of things done out of the realm in this and like caſes, vide 7 H. 7. 8. b. 20 Ed. 3. Averment 34. 5 Ric. 2. tit. Trial 54. 15 Ed. 4. 15. 32 H. 6. 25. Fitz. Nat. Br. 196. Vide Dowdale's caſe, in the ſixth part of my Reports, fol. 47. and there divers other judgments be vouched. 3. Brown, in anno 32 H. 6. reporteth a judgment then lately given, that where the defendant pleaded, that the plaintiff was a Scot, born at St. John's town in Scotland, out of the ligeance of the king; whereupon they were at iſſue, and that iſſue was tried where the writ was brought, and that appeareth alſo by 27 Aſſ. pl. 24. that the jury did find the prior to be born in Gaſcoin. (for ſo much is neceſſarily proved by the words trove fuit.) And 20 Ed. 3. tit. Averment 34. in a juris utrum, the death of one of the vouchees was alledged at ſuch a caſtle in Britain, and this was enquired of by the jury. And it is holden in 5 Rich. 2. tit. Trial 54. that if a man be adhering to the enemies of the king in France, his land is forfeitable, and his adherency ſhall be tried where the land is, as oftentimes hath been done, as there it is ſaid by Belknap: and Fitz. Nat. Br. 196. in a mortdanc', if the anceſtor died in itinere peregrinationis ſuæ verſ. Terram Sanctam, the jury ſhall enquire of it. But in the caſe at bar, ſeeing the defendant hath pleaded the truth of the caſe, and the plaintiff hath not denied it, but demurred upon the ſame, and thereby confeſſed all matters of fact, the court now ought to judge upon the ſpecial matter, even as if a jury upon an iſſue joined in England, as it is aforeſaid, had found the ſpecial matter, and left it to the court.

3. To the third it was anſwered and reſolved, that this judgment was rather a renovation of the judgments and cenſures of the reverend judges and ſages of the law in ſo many ages paſt, than any innovation, as appeareth by the book and book-caſes before recited: neither have judges power to judge according to that which they think to be fit, but that which out of the laws they know to be right and conſonant to law. Judex bonus nihil ex arbitrio ſuo faciat, nec propoſito domeſticæ voluntatis, ſed juxta leges & jura pronuntiet. And as for timores, fears grounded upon no juſt cauſe, qui non cadunt in conſtantem virum, vani timores æſtimandi ſunt.

2 Ventris 6.

4. And as to the fourth, it is leſs than a dream of a ſhadow, or a ſhadow of a dream: for it hath been often ſaid, natural legitimation reſpecteth actual obedience to the ſovereign at the time of the birth: for as the antenati remain aliens as to the crown of England, becauſe they were born when there were ſeveral kings of the ſeveral kingdoms, and the uniting of the kingdoms, by deſcent ſubſequent, cannot make him a ſubject to that crown to which he was alien at the time of his birth; ſo albeit the kingdoms (which Almighty God of his infinite goodneſs and mercy divert) ſhould by deſcent be divided, and governed by ſeveral kings; yet it was reſolved, that all thoſe, that were born under one natural obedience, while the realms were united under one ſovereign, ſhould remain natural-born ſubjects, and no aliens; for that naturalization due and veſted by birth-right, cannot by any ſeparation of the crowns afterward be taken away; nor he, that was by judgment of law a natural ſubject at the time of his birth, become an alien by ſuch a matter ex poſt facto. And in that caſe, upon ſuch an accident, our poſtnatus may be ad fidem utriuſque regis, as Bracton ſaith in the afore-remembered place, fol. 427. Sicut Anglicus non auditur in placitando aliquem de terris & tenement' in Franciâ, ita nec debet Francigena & alienigena, qui fuerit ad fidem regis Franciæ, audiri placitando in Angliâ: ſed tamen ſunt aliqui Francigenæ in Franciâ, qui ſunt ad fidem utriuſque, et ſemper fuerunt ante Normanniam deperditam & poſt, et qui placitant hic et ibi, eâ ratione, quia ſunt ad fidem utriuſque, ſicut fuit Willielmus comes mareſchallus et manens in Anglia, et M. de Gynes manens in Franciâ, et alii plures. Concerning the reaſon drawn from the (a) etymologies, it made againſt them, for that by their own derivation, alienæ gentis and alienæ ligeantiæ is all one: but arguments drawn from etymologies, are too weak and too light for judges to build their judgments upon: for ſæpenumero ubi proprietas (b) verborum attenditur, ſenſus veritatis amittitur: and yet when they agree with the judgment of law, judges may uſe them for ornaments.

Note, on the abdication of k. J. 2. they were divided; but are now conſolidated by the union act.

But on the other ſide, ſome inconveniences ſhould follow, if the plea againſt the plaintiff ſhould be allowed. For, firſt, it maketh ligeance local; videlicet, ligeantia regis regni ſui Scotiæ, and ligeantia regis regni ſui Angliæ: whereupon ſhould follow, firſt, that faith or ligeance, which is univerſal, ſhould be confined within local limits and bounds; ſecondly, that the ſubjects ſhould not be bound to ſerve the king in peace or in war out of thoſe limits; thirdly, it ſhould illegitimate many, and ſome of noble blood, which were born in Gaſcoin, Guienne, Normandy, Calais, Tournay, France, and divers other of his majeſty's dominions, whilſt the ſame were in actual obedience, and in Berwick, Ireland, Guernſey and Jerſey, if this plea ſhould have been admitted for good. And ſecondly, this ſtrange and new-deviſed plea inclineth too much to countenance that dangerous and deſperate error of the Spencers, touched before, to receive any allowance within Weſtminſter-Hall.

In the proceeding of this caſe, theſe things were obſerved, and ſo did the chief juſtice of the Common Pleas publicly deliver in the end of his argument in the Exchequer-Chamber. Firſt, that no commandment or meſſage by word or writing was ſent or delivered from any whatſoever to any of the judges to cauſe them to incline to any opinion in this caſe; which I remember, for that it is honourable for the ſtate, and conſonant to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm. Secondly, there was obſerved, what a concurrence of judgments, reſolutions, and rules, there be in our books in all ages concerning this caſe, as if they had been prepared for the deciding of the queſtion of this point: and that (which never fell out in any doubtful caſe) no one opinion in all our books is againſt this judgment. Thirdly, that the five judges of the King's Bench, who adjourned this caſe into the Exchequer-Chamber, rather adjourned it for weight than difficulty, for all they in their arguments unâ voce concurred with the judgment. Fourthly, that never any caſe was adjudged in the Exchequer-Chamber with greater concordance and leſs variety of opinions, the lord-chancellor and twelve of the judges concurring in one opinion. Fifthly, that there was not in any remembrance ſo honourable, great, and intelligent an auditory at the hearing of the arguments of any Exchequer-Chamber caſe, as was at this caſe now adjudged. Sixthly, it appeareth, that juriſprudentia legis communis Angliæ eſt ſcientia ſocialis & copioſa: ſociable, in that it agreeth with the principles and rules of other excellent ſciences, divine and human: copious, for that *quamvis ad * ea quæ frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur*, yet in a caſe ſo rare, and of ſuch a quality, that loſs is the aſſured end of the practice of it (for no alien can purchaſe lands, but he loſeth them, and ipſo facto the king is entitled thereunto, in reſpect whereof a man would think few men would attempt it) there ſhould be ſuch a multitude and farrago of authorities in all ſucceſſions of ages, in our books and book-caſes, for the deciding of a point of ſo rare an accident. Et ſic determinata & terminata eſt iſta quæſtio.

Lord-chancellor Elleſmere's ſpeech in the Exchequer-Chamber, in the caſe of the poſtnati (c).

MY lords, mine age, mine infirmitie, and indiſpoſition of health, my decaie and weakeneſſe of memorie, and deſuetudo, and long diſcontinuance from this maner of legall exerciſe (aboue foureteene yeeres) haue bereaued mee of the meanes and helpes that ſhould inhable me to ſpeake in ſo great a caſe.

I feare therefore, that it will be deemed preſumption (if not worſe) that I aduenture to ſpeake heerein at all; ſpecially after ſo many learned and iudicious arguments of ſo many graue, learned, and reuerend iudges.

To ſay the ſame that hath beene ſaied, muſt needes be vnpleaſaunt, weariſome, and loathſome to the hearers; and not to ſay the ſame, is to ſpeake little to the purpoſe: for, what more can bee ſaied than hath beene?

Yet, for that the caſe is depending in Chancerie, and adiourned hither for difficultie in law, and there I muſt giue iudgement according to the law, whether the complainant bee inhabled, by lawe, to maintaine his ſuit in that court, or not; I holde it more fitting to deliuer the reaſons of my iudgement heere, where others haue beene heard, than there, before a few, which haue not heard that, which hath beene ſo learnedly argued and largely debated heere.

And therefore the caſe ſtanding thus, I will ſpeake what I thinke. And I muſt ſay, as one of the graue iudges ſaied, I can tell no newes; but ſome old things which I haue read and obſerued, I will remember; but I can not diuine, or propheſie de futuris, I leaue that as iuſtice Yeluerton did.

I am free and at libertie, nullius addictus iurare in verba magiſtri, and therefore I will ſpeake ingenuouſly and freely.

In the arguing of this caſe, ſome thinges, which are of great weight with mee, haue (in mine opinion) beene paſſed ouer too lightly; and ſome other thinges, which ſeeme to me but light, haue beene ouerweighed, as I thinke.

Halfe an howers time longer or ſhorter I meane not to ſtriue for; and therefore I will preſume on your patience, and aſſume to my ſelfe ſuch conuenient time as others haue done; and yet I will huſband time as well as I can.

I will not be abaſhed to ſtrengthen my weake memory with helpe of ſome ſcribled papers, as others haue done: for I accompt it a point of wiſedome to followe wiſe mens examples.

Other exordium, inſinuation, proteſtation, or preface for the matter it ſelfe, either to prepare attentiue and beneuolent auditors, or to ſtirre offence or miſlike againſt either partie, I meane not to vſe. It is fit for oratours; I neuer profeſſed the art; I had neuer ſkill in it: and it is not decorum for iudges, that ought to reſpect the matter, and not the humours of the hearers.

The exordium the ciuilians vſe in their ſentences I like well; in Dei nomine amen, & Deo primitùs inuocato. Other exordium I care not for.

(c) This argument was printed in 1609, with the following title:—The ſpeech of the lord chancellor of England, in the Eſchequer-Chamber, touching the poſt-nati. Before the ſpeech there was the following addreſs to the reader:

'To the louing readers.

'Before I preſumed to ſpeake in the Eſchequer-Chamber in R. C. caſe (which is now commonly called, the caſe of poſt-nati,) I conſidered mine age and infirmities, and how long I had diſcontinued from ſuch legall exerciſes. I might hereupon haue iuſtly challenged the priuiledge of ſilence. But greater and weightier reaſons ouerruled mee, and enforced mee to waiue the benefit of that priuiledge: for, looking into the nature of the queſtion then in hand, and examining the circumſtaunces, I found the caſe to bee rare, and the matter of great import and conſequence, as being a ſpeciall and principall part of the bleſſed and happy vnion of Great Britaine.

'I heard many learned and iudicious arguments, made by the reuerend iudges: and finding that they did not all concurre in opinion (though the number was indeede ſo few, of them that differed, that in Greeke it woulde not make a plurall number) and that ſome things were by them omitted, which ſeemed to mee to be both pertinent to the matter, and neceſſary to bee knowne, and more proper and fit to bee ſpoken by me, reſpecting the place I hould, than by them, that did wholy binde themſelues to the forme and rule of legall argument and diſcourſe: I thought that I coulde not, in duetie, ſit as a dumbe and idle hearer onelie; the cauſe being iudicially depending in the high court of Chancerie, where I was to iudge of it according to lawe, following the rule of mine owne conſcience, and the meaſure of mine owne vnderſtanding, and not to bee ſwayed with the weight of other mens opinions.

'I conſidered alſo, that althogh ſilentij tutum præmium is often true in humane policie, yet ſometime there is crimen reticentiæ; and therefore the prophet ſaid, væ mihi quia tacui. And Chryſoſtome obſerueth, that, tribus modis in veritatem peccatur: 1. veritatem præ timore tacendo: 2. veritatem in mendatium commutando: 3. veritatem non defendendo. Remembring this, my conſcience tould me, that howſoeuer ſilence might in this caſe haue excuſed mee of the ſecond, yet I could not haue eſcaped by ſilence, from offending in the firſt and laſt. And if Feſtus thoght it not reaſon, to ſend a priſoner, without ſhewing the cauſes which were layed againſt him, I might haue beene worthily & iuſtly cenſured, if vpon other mens arguments, and as it were ſide implicita, I ſhould haue pronounced my iudgement and ſentence in ſo great a cauſe, without declaring the grounds and reaſons whereupon I ſtood. Thus, duetie and neceſſitie (for, ratio ſapienti neceſſitas) were the cauſes that induced mee to ſpeake in this rare and weightie cauſe, and the force of truth moued mee to ſpeake that which I did ſpeake, without reſpect of pleaſing or diſpleaſing any. And ſo, hauing the warrant of a ſincere conſcience, which is truly ſaid to be, veluti comes, & teſtis, & iudex actionum, I haue in the Chancerie iudged and decreed the caſe for R. C. And the like iudgement is alſo giuen by the iudges of the Kings Bench, in the aſſiſe depending in that court. The decree and iudgement being thus paſſed, diuerſe vnperfect reports, and ſeuerall patches and pieces of my ſpeech haue bin put in writing, and diſperſed into many hands, and ſome offred to the preſſe. The kings maieſtie, hauing knowledge thereof, miſliked it; and thereupon commanded me to deliuer to him in writing, the whole diſcourſe of that which I ſaid in that cauſe.

'Thus I was put to an vnexpected new labour, to reuiew my ſcribled & broken papers. Out of which (according to the charge impoſed vpon me) I gathered all which I had before ſpoken, and ſo ſet it downe faithfully & plainly, and (as neare as I could) in the ſame words I vttered it. It pleaſed his ſacred maieſtie to take ſome view of it; and taking occaſion thereby, to remember the diligence of the lord chiefe iuſtice of the Common Place, for the ſummary report he had publiſhed of the iudges arguments, he gaue mee in charge to cauſe this to be likewiſe put in print, to preuent the printing of ſuch miſtaken and vnperfect reports of it, as were alreadie ſcattered abroad.

'Whatſoeuer it is, it was firſt conceiued & ſpoken out of conſcience & duty; and is now publiſhed in humble obedience to my moſt gracious ſoueraigne. And ſo I offer and commend it to your good acceptance and fauourable interpretation.

T. Elleſmere, Canc.'

The caſe.

The caſe now depending in Chauncerie, which is adiourned hither, is thus.

Robert Caluine, ſonne and heire apparant of Iames lord Caluine of Colcroſſe in the realme of Scotland, an infant of three yeares of age, borne in the ſaied realme of Scotland, maketh title by his bill to a meſſuage and garden with th' appurtenaunces in the pariſh of St. Buttolph without Biſhops-gate in the citie of London; and complaineth againſt Iohn Bingley, and Richard Griffin, for detaining the euidences concerning the ſame meſſuage and lands, and taking the profits thereof.

The defendants pleade, that the plaintife is an alien; and that in the third yeere of his maieſties raigne of England, and in the nine and thirtieth yere of his maieſties raigne of Scotland, hee was borne in the realme of Scotland, within the ligeance of his ſaid maieſtie, of his realme of Scotland, and out of the ligeance of our ſoueraigne lord the king of his realme of England.

And the defendants ſay further, that at the time of the birth of the complainant, and long before, and euer ſithence, the ſaied kingdome of Scotland was, and ſtill is, ruled and gouerned by the proper lawes and ſtatutes of the ſaid kingdome of Scotland, and not by the lawes and ſtatutes of this realme of England; and therefore the defendants demaund iudgement, whether the complainant ought to bee anſwered to his ſaid bill, or ſhall be receiued to proſecute the ſaid ſuite againſt the defendants, being for, and concerning the title of inheritance, and euidence touching the ſame.

Heereupon the complainant hath demurred in law.

This is the ſpeciall caſe now depending in the Chancerie; in which, and touching all like caſes in generall, mine opinion is, and ſince the queſtion was firſt mooued hath beene, that theſe poſt-nati are not aliens to the king, nor to his kingdome of England, but by their birth-right are liege ſubiects to the king, and capable of eſtates of inheritance and freehould of landes in England; and may haue and maintaine as wel reall as perſonall actions for the ſame: and that therefore the now complainant Robert Caluine ought to bee anſwered.

This opinion I did firſt conceiue vpon thoſe rules and reaſons in lawe (as well the common law of England, as the ciuile law) which heereafter in the courſe of my ſpeech I will remember. And in this opinion I haue beene ſince confirmed by many great and weighty reaſons.

The proceeding in the general caſe of poſt-nati. ſtat. 1. Iac. 16. Mart. 1603.

Firſt, in the ſtatute made in the firſt yeare of his maieſties raigne of England, authorizing the treatie betweene the commiſſioners for both the kingdomes, it is ſaid (as iuſtice Warburton noted well) that both the famous & ancient realmes of England and Scotland are now vnited in allegeance and loyall ſubiection in his royall perſon, to his maieſtie, and his poſteritie for euer.

Heere wee haue the iudgement of the parliament, that there is a vnitie in allegeance to one royall perſon; and therefore I ſee not how wee may out of imaginarie conceipts, and by ſubtile diſtinctions ſtraine our wittes to frame ſeuerall allegeances to one and the ſame royall perſon, contrary to ſo plaine a declaration made by parliament.

The proclamation, 2 Iacobi 20. Octobr. 1604.

Next followeth his maieſties proclamation 20 Octobris 1604, by which hee aſſumed to himſelfe the name and ſtile of king of Great Britaine: in which proclamation, among many other weighty reaſons, this is added for one, we haue receiued from thoſe that be ſkilful in the lawes of the land, that immediately vpon our ſucceſſion, diuerſe of our auncient lawes of this realme are ipſo facto expired; as namely, that of eſcuage, and of the naturalization of the ſubiects. This was not done ſodainely, nor lightly; but vpon graue and ſerious deliberation, and aduiſe: and therefore ſeemeth to mee to be a matter of great importaunce, and not to be lightly regarded.

The commiſſioners authorized by parliament, did begin 20 Octob. and did continue vntill 6 Decemb. 2 Iacobi.

The reſolution of the commiſſioners.

The ſame twentieth of October, theſe commiſſioners beganne their treatie. Of the graue and iudicious courſe which they held, in debating of the matter then propounded, I will forbeare to ſpeake: but for this point of naturalization now in queſtion, their reſolution in the end was thus:

That it ſhall be propounded to both the parliaments at the next ſeſſions, that an act be made containing a declaration, as followeth: that all the ſubiects of both the realmes, borne ſince the deceaſe of Elizabeth the late queen of England of happie memory, and all, that ſhal be born hereafter vnder the obedience of his maieſtie and his royall progeny, are by the common lawes of both the realmes, and ſhall be for euer, inhabled to obtaine, ſucceede, inherite, and poſſeſſe all lands, goods, and chattels, &c. as fully and amply as the ſubiects of either realme reſpectiuely might haue done, or may doe in any ſort within the kingdome where they were borne. This, after long debating, and graue and deliberate conſideration, was, in the end, the reſolution of the greater part of the commiſſioners, not one openly gaineſaying it. And diuerſe of the principall iudges of the realme were preſent at all times when the point was debated. And herein I note the wiſe and iudicious forme of that reſolution, which was not to propound to the parliament the making of a new lawe, but a declaration of the common lawes of both the realmes in this queſtion.

Now, if wee conſider who theſe commiſſioners were, what lords of the higher houſe, and what perſons of the common houſe, ſelected of all degrees, moſt eminent for their learning and iudgement, as well in ciuile and common law, as in knowledge, and experience other waies, beeing aſſiſted by the graue iudges of the realme: if this, I ſay, be well conſidered, then this reſolution muſt be accompted and eſteemed as a matter of great and weighty importance, and much to be regarded in the deciding of this queſtion.

The iudges opinion in parliament.

According to this act of the commiſſioners, the caſe was propounded in the next ſeſſion of parliament. In the higher houſe, the iudges were required to deliuer their opinions. There were then eleauen iudges preſent; whereof tenne did with one vniforme conſent affirme the law to be, that the poſt-nati were not aliens, but natural ſubiects (one onely diſſenting). After this, the queſtion was debated in a ſolemne conference betweene both the houſes of parliament at ſeuerall times, and at great length, and with much libertie; nothing was omitted that wit or art could inuent to obiect againſt this opinion; and that was done by men of great learning, and ſingular iudgement in the common lawe, and ciuile lawe, and by ſome other gentlemen of the common houſe, of rare gifts for their learning, knowledge, elocution and experience.

At this conference the iudges were preſent; who, after they had heard all that was, or could be ſaid, did confirme their former opinions, which they had before deliuered in the higher houſe: three of the chiefe of them declaring their reaſons, and all the reſt (ſauing one alone) concurring in the ſame. So, here was now a generall reſolution by all the iudges of the realme (one excepted) and that deliuered, not priuately, but in parliament; which without more adoe had beene ſufficient to haue decided and determined this queſtion.

The force and ſtrength of the kings proclamations.

Touching the proclamation, it was diſcreetely and modeſtly ſaied by a learned gentleman of the lower houſe, that it was of great reſpect, and much to bee regarded; but yet it was not binding, nor concluding: for, proclamations can neither make, nor declare lawes: and beſides, that this proclamation was not grounded vpon any reſolution of the reuerend iudges; but vpon the opinion of ſome ſkilfull in the lawes of this land.

Of the ſtrength of proclamations, being made by the king, by the aduiſe of his counſell and iudges, I will not diſcourſe; yet I will admoniſh thoſe that bee learned and ſtudious in the lawes, and by their profeſſion are to giue counſell, and to direct themſelues, and others, to take heede that they doe not contemne, or lightly regard ſuch proclamations.

And to induce them thereunto, I deſire them to looke vpon, and conſider aduiſedly theſe few proclamations, prouiſions, or ordinaunces, which I will point out vnto them; and of what validitie and force they haue beene houlden to bee in conſtruction of lawe, albeit they be neither ſtatutes, nor acts of parliament.

Fitzb. dower, 179.

M. 4. H. 3. in Dower, the defendant pleaded, quod petens eſt de poteſtate regis Franciæ, & reſidens in Francia; et prouiſum eſt à conſilio regis, quod nullus de poteſtate regis Franciæ reſpondeatur in Anglia, antequam Angli reſpondeantur de iure ſuo in Francia. This the plaintifes atturney could not denie; and thereupon the iudgement was, ideo ſine die.

Anno 20 Hen. 3. certaine prouiſions and ordinaunces were made which were called prouiſiones Merton, where the king aſſembled his archbiſhops, biſhops, earles, and barons for the coronation of the king, and his wife queene Elenor; and the words be, prouiſum eſt in curia dom. regis apud Merton coram Willihelmo Cantuarienſi archiepiſcopo, & coepiſcopis, ſuffraganeis ſuis; et coram maiori parte comitum & baronum Angliæ ibidem exiſtentium pro coronatione ipſius domini regis & Elionoræ reginæ, pro qua omnes vocati fuerunt, cum tractatum eſſet de communi vtilitate regni ſuper articulis ſulſcriptis, ita prouiſum fuit & conceſſum, tam a prædictis archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, comitibus, & baronibus, & alijs. De viduis primò, &c.

Fitzherbert Nat. Br. 32.

Fitzherbert citeth a prouiſion made anno 19 H. 3. in theſe words, et prouiſum fuit coram domino rege, archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, comitibus, & baronibus, quod nulla aſſiſa vltimæ, præſentationis de cætero capiatur de eccleſiis, præbendatis nec de præbendis. This prouiſion was alowed and continued for lawe, vntill W. 2. anno 13 Edw. 1. cap. 5. which prouides the contrary by expreſſe words.

Anno 6 Ed. 1. Explan. ſtat. Glouceſter.

Anno 6 Ed. 1. the king and his iudges made certaine explanations of the ſtatute of Glouceſter, which are called explanationes ſtatuti Gloceſtriæ: and theſe be the words, Poſtmodum per dominum regem & iuſticiarios ſuos factæ ſunt quædam explanationes quorundam articulorum ſuperius poſitorum. Which explanations haue euer ſince beene receiued as a law.

A proclamation. 15 Ed. 3.

There is a proclamation by king Ed. 3. bearing teſte at Weſtminſter anno 15 Ed. 3. And iudge Thorpes opinion pa. 39 Ed. 3. 7. both which I will now forbeare to report, and wiſh the ſtudents to reade the ſame in the printed bookes, where they ſhall ſee both the effect, and the reaſon, and the cauſe thereof; they are worth their reading, and may informe and direct them what iudgement to make of proclamations.

How the iudges opinion deliuered in parliament ought to be regarded.

Obiect.

Touching the opinion of the iudges, ſome haue obiected (yet modeſtly, and I ſuppoſe, according to their conſcience and vnderſtanding) that there is not like regarde to be had of iudges opinions giuen in parliament, as ought to bee of their iudgements in their proper courts and ſeates of iuſtice: for, in thoſe places their oath bindeth them; but not ſo in the other.

Reſponſ.

1. To this I anſwere: the reuerence, and woorthineſſe of the men is ſuch, as is not to bee quarrelled and doubted of, if there were no oathe at all: for, if men of ſo great and eminent places feare not God and his iudgements, euen out of a religious conſcience, which is frænum ante peccatum, & flagrum poſt peccatum, it may be doubted that the externall ceremonie of adding a booke will little auaile.

2. Their oath doth bind them as much in the court of parliament, as in their proper courts: for, that is the ſupreme court of all; and they are called thither by the kings writ, not to ſit as tell-clockes, or idle hearers; but, quòd perſonalitèr interſitis nobiſcum, ac cum cæteris de conſilio noſtro ſuper dictis negotiis tractaturi, veſtrumque conſilium impenſuri: and thoſe negotia be ardua & vrgentia negotia regni, &c. And their oath, amongeſt other thinges, is, that they ſhall counſell the king truely in his buſineſſe.

3. This exception may ſerue againſt the iudges, as well in caſes when they ſit and giue iudgement, as iuſtices of aſſiſes, niſi prius, oyer and terminer, and gaole deliuerie, as in this caſe of parliament: for, there they haue none other oath but their generall oath.

4. It becomes vs to eſteeme of iudges now, as our forefathers eſteemed them in times paſt; for, as they ſucceede them in time and place (I thanke God, and the king, I haue neither cauſe to feare any for diſpleaſure, pleaſure, nor to flatter any for fauour: wherefore I will neither be afraid, nor abaſhed to ſpeake what I thinke:) I ſay therefore, that as our iudges now ſucceed the former iudges, in time and place; ſo they ſucceede them, and are not inferior to them in wiſedome, learning, integritie, and all other iudicious and religious vertues.

Then let vs ſee what the wiſedome of parliaments in times paſt attributed to the iudges opinions declared in parliament; of which there bee many examples; but I will trouble you but with two or three.

I wil not remember Richard the ſeconds time (of which ſome of our chroniclers doe talke idely, and vnderſtand little) where power and might of ſome potent perſons oppreſſed iuſtice, and faithfull iudges, for expounding the law ſoundly, and truely.

1. The firſt, that I will remember, is this, in the parliament 28 H. 6. 16 Ianuarij, the commons made ſuite, that W. de la Poole duke of Suffolke ſhould bee committed to priſon for many treaſons and other hainous crimes committed by him. The lordes in parliament were in doubt what anſwer to giue; they demaunded the opinion of the iudges. Their opinion was, that hee ought not to bee committed; and their reaſon was, for that the commons did not charge him with anie particular offence, but with generall ſlaunders and reports; and therefore becauſe the ſpecialties were not ſhewed, hee was not to bee committed. This opinion was allowed; and thereupon 28 Ianuarij, the commons exhibited certaine ſpeciall articles againſt him, viz. that hee conſpired with the French king to inuade the realme, &c. And thereupon hee was committed to the Tower.

2. In the parliament anno 31 H. 6. in the vacation (the parliament being continued by prorogation) Thomas Thorpe the ſpeaker was condemned in a thouſand pounds dammages in an action of treſpaſſe, brought againſt him by the duke of Yorke, and was committed to priſon in execution for the ſame. After, when the parliament was re-aſſembled, the commons made ſuite to the king and the lords, to haue Thorpe the ſpeaker deliuered, for the good exploite of the parliament; whereupon the duke of Yorkes counſell declared the whole caſe at large. The lords demaunded the opinion of the iudges, whether, in that caſe, Thorpe ought to bee deliuered out of priſon by priuiledge of parliament. The iudges made this aunſwere, that they ought not to determine the priuiledge of that high court of parliament; but for the declaration of proceeding in lower courts, in caſes where writtes of ſuperſedeas for the priuiledge of the parliament be brought vnto them, they aunſwered, that if any perſon that is a member of the parliament bee arreſted in ſuch caſes as bee not for treaſon or felonie, or for ſuretie of peace, or condemnation had before the parliament, it is vſed that ſuch perſons be releaſed, and may make atturney, ſo as they may haue their freedome and libertie, freely to intend the parliament. Hereupon it was concluded, that Thorpe ſhould ſtill remaine in priſon according to the lawe, notwithſtanding the priuiledge of parliament, and that hee was the ſpeaker. Which reſolution was declared to the commons by Walter Moyle, one of the kings ſerieants at lawe. And then the commons were commaunded in the kings name, by the biſhop of Lincolne (in the abſence of the archbiſhop of Canterbury then chauncellor) to chooſe another ſpeaker.

3. In the parliament an. 7 H. 8. a queſtion was moued, whether ſpirituall perſons might bee conuented before temporall iudges for criminall cauſes. There ſir Iohn Fineux and the other iudges deliuered their opinion, that they might and ought to bee ſo. And their opinion was allowed, and maintained by the king and the lords: and D. Standiſh, who before had houlden the ſame opinion, was deliuered from the biſhops. And it is worth the noting, what wordes paſſed in that caſe betweene the archbiſhop of Canterbury and that worthy iudge Fineux.

Writs of errour ſued in parliament.

4. If a writ of errour bee brought in parliament vpon a iudgement giuen in the King's Bench, the lords of the higher houſe alone (without the commons) are to examine the errours; but that is by the aduiſe and counſell of the iudges, who are to informe them what the lawe is, and ſo to direct them in their iudgement. And if the iudgement bee reuerſed, then commaundement is to bee giuen to the lord chancellour to doe execution accordingly. And ſo it was in anno 17 R. 2. in a writte of errour brought in parliament by the deane and chapiter of Lichfield, againſt the prior and conuent of Newport-Panell, as appeareth by the record. But if the iudgement bee affirmed, then the court of the King's Bench are to proceede to execution of the iudgement, as it appeareth in Flowerdewes caſe P. 1 H. 7. fol. 19. But it is to bee noted, that in all ſuch writtes of errour, the lords are to proceede according to the lawe; and for their iudgement therein they are informed and guided by the iudges, and doe not follow their owne opinions or diſcretions otherwiſe.

This extrauagant diſcourſe touching proclamations, and iudges opinions deliuered in parliament, and how they ought to bee regarded, I haue thought materiall and neceſſarie, both in reſpect of the time wherein wee liue, and the matter which we haue in hand. And theſe bee thinges which I thinke haue beene too lightly paſſed ouer. But if you condemne it as impertinent, I muſt then confeſſe I haue preſumed too much vpon your patience; I pray you beare with mee, it is but my labour loſt, and a little time miſ-ſpent, if it ſeeme ſo vnto you: you are wont to pardon greater faultes; call it either a paſſe-time, or waſte-time, as pleaſeth you. Now, to returne to the caſe we haue in hand.

The proceſſe and forme of proceeding in the caſe of R. C. now in queſtion.

The generall queſtion hauing had this paſſage (by proclamation, by commiſſion, and by debating in parliament) remaineth yet without concluſion or iudgement: and as euerie man abounds in his owne ſence, ſo euery one is left to his owne opinion; ſpecially theſe that were not ſatisfied with the graue reſolution of the iudges in parliament, which (although ſome may tearme and accompt as bare opinions) I muſt alwayes valew, and eſteeme as a reall and abſolute iudgement. Now, I ſay, this generall queſtion is reduced to two particular caſes, and is iudicially depending in two the higheſt courts of iuſtice in this realme; and that is by one complainant againſt ſeuerall defendants for the freehoulde and inheritance of ſeuerall parcells of land: and (as M. Solicitor ſaid well) is a caſe, not fained, nor ſurmiſed, but a true caſe betweene true parties: and being quæſtio iuris, non facti, is by both theſe courts adiourned hither to bee decided, and determined by all the iudges of England, as the rareneſſe of the caſe, and the weight and importaunce of it, both for the preſent and the future, doth require.

And the caſe being of this nature and qualitie, it is not amiſſe to obſerue the proceeding in it: for, it is woorth the obſeruing, and not to bee forgotten. The defendants counſell, men of great learning, and in their profeſſion inferiour to none of their qualitie and degree, men conuerſant and well exerciſed in the queſtion, and ſuch as in the great conference in parliament, moſt of them were ſpecially ſelected and choſen (for ſo they wel deſerued) as moſt ſufficient, able, and fit, as well for learning and knowledge, as for all other giftes of witte and nature, to handle ſo great and rare a queſtion. And although it hath pleaſed them of their good diſcretion to vſe the paines but of a few in the debating and arguing of the caſe at the barre: yet no doubt that was done vpon mature deliberation and conference with all the reſidue: and whatſoeuer the ſpirites, the learning, the wiſedome, and knowledge of all the others, vpon long ſtudy could affoorde, was put into the mouth of thoſe few to ſerue as organs and inſtruments to deliuer it vnto vs; which they haue ſo well and ſufficiently performed, that they deſerue great praiſe and commendation: for, in my poore opinion, the witte of man could not deuiſe to ſay more touching this queſtion in lawe than they haue ſaied. And whatſoeuer hath beene ſithence ſpoken for that part, it is for the matter but the ſame in ſubſtance, which the counſell at the barre did deliuer; though it hath beene varied in forme, and amplified with other wordes and phraſes, and furniſhed with ſhew of ſome other ſtrained caſes and authorities.

The handling of it by the learned and reuerend iudges hath beene ſuch, as it may appeare to the world, that euerie one hath ſpoken his owne heart and conſcience; and hath laboured by long ſtudie to ſearch out the lawe and the true reaſon of the lawe in this rare caſe; and ſo they haue ſpoken, as coram Deo & angelis: none, with deſire to ſeeme popular; for nothing ought to bee tam populare quam veritas: none to ſeeme to be timeſeruers, or men-pleaſers; for the king (whome vnder God they ſerue) being pater patriæ, and ſoueraigne head of both theſe great vnited kingdomes, is to them both, like as the head of a naturall body is to all the members of the ſame, and is not, nor can not bee partiall more to one than to another. Hee deliteth in truth, and deſireth it; and without truth hee can not bee pleaſed. Hee ruleth by his lawe, and commaundeth his iudges to miniſter to all his ſubjects lawe and iuſtice ſincerely, and truely; and equally and indifferently, without any partiall reſpect.

It was neuer ſeene, but that in all rare and difficult caſes, there haue beene diuerſitie of opinions; but yet without breach of charitie, which is the bond of vnitie. So it hath happened in this caſe. The caſe hath beene argued at large by foureteene learned iudges; twelue of them haue concurred in iudgement, but vpon ſeuerall reaſons: for, as many wayes may leade to one end of the iourney; ſo diuerſe and ſeuerall reaſons may conduce to one true and certaine concluſion.

And here I may not omit the woorthie memorie of the late graue and reuerend iudge, ſir Iohn Popham, chiefe iuſtice of the King's Bench deceaſed (a man of great wiſedome, and of ſingular learning and iudgement in the lawe) who was abſolutely of the ſame opinion, as he often declared, as well in open parliament, as otherwiſe.

The apoſtle Thomas doubted of the reſurrection of our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt, when all the reſt of the apoſtles did firmly beleeue it: but that his doubting confirmed, in the whole church, the faith of the reſurrection.

The two woorthy and learned iudges that haue doubted in this caſe, as they beare his name, ſo I doubt not but their doubting hath giuen occaſion to cleare the doubt in others; and ſo to confirme in both the kingdomes, both for the preſent and the future, the truth of the iudgement in this caſe.

Thus, my lords, haue you hitherto nothing from mee but Amen, to that which all the iudges (ſauing two) haue ſaied; and much more you cannot expect from mee: yet, ſince I muſt giue iudgement in this caſe; and I ſaied in the beginning, that I would render the reaſons of my iudgement (for that is the courſe of argument I muſt houlde); I will now deliuer vnto you, what are the ſpeciall and principall reaſons that firſt haue induced mee, and ſtill mooue mee to houlde the opinion that I doe: and as I goe, I will indeuour to cleere ſome doubts and queſtions, that partly in the conference in parliament, and partly otherwiſe, I haue heard made; not onely touching this caſe it ſelfe, but alſo touching the forme and manner how it is to be decided and iudged.

How this caſe is to be iudged, and by what law.

The caſe is rare, and new (as it hath beene often ſaied); it was neuer decided terminis terminantibus; it was neuer iudged by any ſtatute lawe, which is a poſitiue lawe; nor by iudgement of the iudges of the common lawe.

Now, the firſt queſtion is (as ſome would haue it) how it is to be iudged, and by what lawe; and haue wiſhed that it might haue ſtayed vntill the parliament, and ſo bee decided by parliament. They that make this doubt, I will let them demurre, and die in their doubts: for, the caſe beeing adiourned hither before all the iudges of England, is now to be iudged by them according to the common lawe of England; and not tarrie for a parliament: for, it is no tranſcendent queſtion, but that the common lawe can and ought to rule it, and ouer-rule it, as iuſtice Williams ſaid well.

What is the common law of England: and whether it be ius ſcriptum.

Queſtioniſts.

But then this queſtion produceth another; that is, what is the common lawe of England? whether it be ius ſcriptum, or non ſcriptum? and ſuch other like niceties: for, wee haue in this age ſo many queſtioniſts; and quo modo and quare, are ſo common in moſt mens mouthes, that they leaue neither religion, nor lawe, nor king, nor counſell, nor policie, nor gouernment out of queſtion.

And the end they haue in this queſtion, what is the common lawe, is to ſhake and weaken the ground and principles of all gouernement: and in this particular queſtion of the law of England, to ouerthrow that law whereby this realme hath many hundred yeares beene gouerned in all honour and happineſſe: or at leaſt to caſt an aſperſion vpon it, as though it were weake and vncertaine. I will therefore declare mine opinion in this point plainely and confidently, as I thinke in my conſcience, and as I finde to be ſufficiently warranted by ancient writers, and good authorities voide of all exception.

The ground of the common law.

The common law of England is grounded vpon the law of God, and extendes itſelfe to the originall lawe of nature, and the vniuerſall lawe of nations.

When it reſpectes the church, it is called lex eccleſiæ Anglicanæ, as magna charta, ca. 1. Eccleſia Anglicana habeat omnia ſua iura integra & illæſa.

When it reſpectes the crowne, and the king, it is ſometimes called lex coronæ, as in ſtat. 25 Edw. 3. cap. 1. Lex coronæ Angliæ eſt & ſemper fuit, &c. And it is ſometimes called lex regia, as in Regiſtro fo. 61. Ad iura regia ſpectat: and, ad conſeruationem iurium coronæ noſtræ, & ad iura regia ne depereant, &c.

When it reſpectes the common ſubiects, it is called, lex terræ; as in magna charta ca. 29. Niſi per legale iudicium parium, vel per legem terræ.

The common law is not originally lex ſcripta.

Yet, in all theſe caſes, whether it reſpectes the church, the crowne, or the ſubiects, it is comprehended vnder this generall tearme, the common lawes of England: which, although they bee for a great parte thereof reduced into writing; yet they are not originally leges ſcriptæ.

This I firſt learned of the late lord treaſurer Burleigh (whoſe honourable memorie England can neuer forget) and hearing it from him, I indeuored by my priuate ſtudie to ſatisfie my ſelfe thorowlie in it. And, whoſoeuer ſhall well conſider the lawes of England, which were before the Conqueſt (whereof wee haue ſome remnants and patches) or ſince the Conqueſt vntill magna charta, anno 9 H. 3. will make little doubt of it.

In H. 2. time Glanuile writeth thus; leges Anglicanas licèt non ſcriptas, leges appellari non videtur abſurdum.

And in Hen. 3. time Bracton writeth thus; cùm autem ferè in omnibus regionibus vtantur legibus & iure ſcripto, ſola Anglia vſa eſt in ſuis finibus, iure non ſcripto & conſuetudine; in ea quidem, ex non ſcripto ius venit quod vſus comprobauit.

But I may not agree with Bracton, that ſola Anglia vſa eſt iure non ſcripto: for I find that the graueſt, and the greateſt learned writers of the ciuile lawe, both auncient and of this our time, doe hould the ſame opinion, touching the ciuile lawe it ſelfe, for thus they write: ex non ſcripto ius venit quod vſus approbauit. And thus; ius ciuile dictum ex non ſcripto natum eſt. And, ius non ſcriptum dicitur conſuetudo, non quod ſcripto perpetuò careat, hoc enim falſum eſt: nam & conſuetudines in memoriam conſtantiorem reducuntur in ſcripturam, vt cætera quoq. quæ ſine ſcriptura perficiuntur: ſed non ſcriptum ius eſt: id eſt, quòd à ſcriptura vis eius non cæpit nec pendeat. So, hereby it may appeare how in this wee concurre with the ciuile lawe.

How the common law of England may be knowne. Obiect.

But hereupon theſe queſtioniſts moue an other queſtion, viz. If the common lawe be not written, how then ſhall it be knowen?

Reſponſ.

To this I aunſwer; it is the common cuſtome of the realme (as Bracton ſaieth, ius venit quod vſus comprobauit): and it ſtandeth vpon two maine pillers and principall parts, by which it is to bee learned and knowen.

Maximes and principles.

1. The firſt is, certaine knowne principles and maximes, and ancient cuſtomes, againſt which there neuer hath beene, nor ought to bee any diſpute. As in caſes of ſubiects; an eſtate in fee-ſimple, for life, for yeeres, dower, curteſie, &c. In caſes of the crowne, the female to inherite: the eldeſt ſole to bee preferred: no reſpecte of halfe blood: no tenant in dower, or by the courteſie of the crowne: no diſabilitie of the king's perſon by infancie, &c.

Reſponſa prudentum.

2. The ſecond is, where there be no ſuch principles, then, former iudgements giuen in like caſes: and theſe be but arbitria iudicum, & reſponſa prudentum, receiued, allowed, and put in practiſe and execution by the king's authoritie.

Of theſe Bracton ſpeaketh; ego H. de Bracton animum erexi ad vetera iudicia iuſtorum perſcrutanda; facta ipſorum, conſilia, & reſponſa in vnam ſummam redigendo compilaui.

Lambard in explicatione verbi Hyde.

And before the Conqueſt, king Ethelbert cauſed a booke to bee made, which was called Decreta Iudiciorum: and king Alured did the like, as maſter Lambard, a iudicious and learned obſeruer of antiquities, doth remember.

Of theſe alſo the iudges ſpeake H. 33. H. 6. Moyle, fo. 8. we rule the law according to the auncient courſe. Aſhton, fol. 9. all our lawe is guided by vſe, and by ſtatute. And Pryſot ſaieth, fol. 9. there cannot be a poſitiue law, but ſuch as was iudged or made by ſtatute. Wherein I note alſo that hee equalleth a iudgement with a ſtatute.

In 36 H. 6. fol. 25. Forteſcue reaſoneth thus; the lawe is as I haue ſaide, and ſo hath beene alwaies ſince the lawe beganne.

In 37 H. 6. f. 22. Aſcue reaſons thus; ſuch a charter hath bin allowable in the time of our predeceſſours, which were as ſage and learned as wee bee.

In H. 4. Edw. 4. fol. 41. Markham reaſoneth thus; it is good for vs to doe as it hath bin vſed before this time, and not to keepe one way one day for one party, and another day the contrary for the other party: and ſo the former precedents be ſufficient for vs to follow: and iudgement was giuen accordingly.

Anno 36. H. 6.

And in the former caſe 36 H. 6. Forteſcue ſaith further; wee haue many courſes and formes which be houlden for lawe.

Alſo euerie one of theſe foure principall courts, the Chauncery, King's Bench, Common-Plees, and Eſchequer, haue in many things ſeuerall courſes and formes which are obſerued for law, and that not onely in that proper court, but alſo in all courtes through the realme; whereof many examples bee remembred in the caſe of the Mines in Plowden's Commentaries.

In nouo caſu nouum remedium.

3. The third: but if there be no ſuch former iudgements, nor direct examples or precedents, then this rule hath a further extention, which is this.

There is a rule in the common lawe, that in nouo caſu nouum remedium eſt apponendum. Et concordent clerici de breue faciendo, ita quod nullus recedat à Cancellaria ſine remedio: for the Chancery is properly officina iuſtitiæ & æquitatis; where all original writs (which in ancient times were the grounds of all ſuites) are deuiſed and framed. And theſe clerici were graue and auncient men; ſkilfull, and long experienced in the courſe of the Chancerie; and called clerici de prima forma: and of late time magiſtri Cancellariæ; who in new and ſtrange caſes, beſides their owne knowledge and experience, had oftentimes conference with the graue iudges for the deuiſing and framing of new writtes when neede required. And this I take to bee the ſame which is in the ſtatute W. 2. cap. 24. Et quotieſcunque de cætero euenerit in Cancellaria, quod in vno caſu reperitur breue, & in conſimili caſu, cadente ſub eodem iure & ſimili indigente remedio, non reperitur, concordent clerici de Cancellaria in breui faciendo, vel atterminent querentes in proximum parliamentum: et ſcribantur caſus in quibus concordare non poſſunt, & referant eos ad proximum parliamentum: et de conſenſu iuriſperitorum fiat breue, ne contingat de cætero, quòd curia regis deficiat conquerentibus in iuſticia perquirenda.

St. W. 2. ca. 24. anno 13 Ed. 1.

Wherein I note theſe three thinges. Firſt, the clerkes are to agree; and if they agree, that is an end, and ſtandes for lawe, and then no referrement to the parliament. Second, if the clerks agree not, and ſo the caſe be referred to the parliament; then de conſenſu iuriſperitorum fiat breue: ſo conſenſus iuriſperitorum is the rule, and not the multitude of vulgar opinions. The third is, that iuſtice faile not them which complaine; which will often faile, if you ſtay vntill a parliament; for parliaments are not to be called for the wrong of a few priuate ſubiects, but for the great and vrgent affaires of the king and the realme.

Vbi non eſt directa lex &c.

I finde alſo a like rule in the ciuile lawe; vbi non eſt directa lex ſtandum eſt arbitrio iudicis, vel producendum ad ſimilia. And another ſaith, de ſimilibus ad ſimilia iudicium & argumentatio recipiuntur.

Rex ſolus iudicat, &c.

4. Beſides theſe, there is an other generall and certaine rule in the ciuile lawe, which I reſerue to the laſt parte of that which I meane to ſpeake in this matter.

So, leauing that vnto a more proper place, I will hereupon conclude, that if there bee no former iudgements, nor examples, nor precedents to bee found, then concordia clericorum, & arbitrium iudicum is to ſeeke out the true and ſolide reaſon; and thereupon to ground their iudgements in all new caſes: for it was truely ſaide by a learned gentleman of the lower houſe, deficiente lege recurrendum eſt ad conſuetudinem: deficiente conſuetudine recurrendum ad rationem. And ſo from the iudges we ſhall haue reſponſa prudentum to decide all ſuch new caſes and queſtions. And according to this rule, all ſuch new doubts and queſtions haue beene reſolued and decided by the graue iudges in former times.

A requeſt to the profeſſors of the ciuile lawe.

But here, before I proceede further, I am to make a ſuite, which is this:

That whatſoeuer I haue ſpoken, or ſhall happen to ſpeake of the ciuile lawe; or whatſoeuer I ſhall cite out of any writer of that law, I pray fauor of my maſters that profeſſe it. I acknowledge that lawe to be auncient and generall in many parts of the world; and I reuerence the profeſſors of it, as men of great learning, wiſedome, and iudgement. I profeſſe it not; I haue learned little of it; but in that little I haue found that in the reall and eſſentiall partes of iuſtice, the ciuile and common lawe doe in many things concurre, though they differ much in the forme and manner of proceeding. And that which I ſhall haue occaſion to produce of that lawe, will bee to ſhew how the common law and ciuile doe agree in one reaſon and iudgement in thoſe things which I ſhall ſpeake of.

Yet I muſt take libertie to ſay, that neither in Spaine, nor in France (thoſe two great monarchies) it is not generally receiued nor allowed as a concluding and binding law.

They take there the reaſon of it onelie as a direction to their proceeding and iudgement: but to produce or alleadge it as a concluding or binding law, was no leſſe than capitis pæna.

Blacwood ca. 10.

This I make not of my ſelfe; for, beſides common practiſe and experience, I haue an honeſt and ſubſtantiall witneſſe, maſter Adam Blacwood a Scottiſhman, a man of ſingular learning in the ciuile lawe, who defendeth in like manner the lawes of Scotland, as appeareth in his learned booke intituled, Pro Regibus Apologia, written by him againſt a ſeditious dialogue or libell made by George Buchanan, de iure regni apud Scotos, where he tells him, aliud ſceptrum, aliud plectrum. But it is not amiſſe to recite his owne words, which are thus; Philippus cognomento Pulcher, cum Lutetiæ ſupremæ iuriſdictionis curiam inſtitueret, eam Romano iure ſolutam eſſe declarauit: in eamq. ſententiam vetus extat eius curiæ decretum, ne cauſarum patroni Romanarum legum auctoritatem patriæ legibus opponant. Sed cum illæ bono & æquo niti videntur & probabilem vtilitatis publicæ cauſam continere, nos earum vtimur haud imperio, ſed ratione, cui omnes homines naturæ præſcripto ſubijciuntur. Quin etſi quid aduerſus rationem legum Romanarum perperàm ac temerè iudicatum eſt, id earum multis pænis haud æſtimatur, ſed vel principis, vel ſuperioris magiſtratus arbitratu. Nam cùm in publici muneris partem admittimur, & conceptis verbis inauguramur, ſolemni ſacramento regiarum & municipalium legum atq. morum obſeruationem, nulla Romani iuris mentione, ſpondemus. Apud Hiſpanos capitis pænam ijs indictam legimus, qui Romanarum legum auctoritatem vel in foro laudarent, vel in puluere ſcholaſtico profiterentur. Sed ſi quid occurreret patrijs legibus ac moribus indefinitum quod iudicanti religionem adferret, vnicum erat eximendo ſcrupulo regis conſulendi remedium. Alaricus Toloſæ regnans, idem Gothis imperauit, vt ſi quis aduerſus ipſius leges ciuile Romanorum ius citaret, temerè factum morte lueretur.

Recurrend. ad rationem, &c.

Quod non lego non credo.

Now to returne to that which I haue touched before, I ſay, that when there is no direct lawe, nor preciſe example, we muſt recurrere ad rationem, & ad reſponſa prudentum: for, although quod non lego, non credo, may bee a true and certaine rule in diuinitie; yet for interpretation of lawes, it is not alwaies ſo: for wee muſt diſtinguiſh betweene fidem moralem, and fidem diuinam, or elſe wee ſhall confound many things in the ciuile and politike gouernement of kingdomes and ſtates. For, the firſt precedent, which wee haue now, had no precedent when it began; but as Tacitus ſaith, quæ nunc vetuſtiſſima creduntur noua fuerunt; & quod hodie exemplis tuemur, inter exempla futurum eſt. And to thoſe that hould, that nothing is to bee done but by former examples, Horace ſpeaketh thus; O imitatores ſeruum pecus: and Cicero ſaith, non exempla maiorum quærenda, ſed conſilium eſt eorum à quibus exempla nata ſunt explicandum.

Thus hath iuſtice beene duely adminiſtred in England, and thereby the kings haue ruled, the people haue beene gouerned, and the kingdome hath flouriſhed for many hundred yeeres; and then no ſuch buſie queſtioniſts moued any quarrell againſt it.

Expoſition of ſtatutes.

Thus haue all doubts growing vpon magna charta, and charta de foreſta, made in king Henry the thirds time, and vpon the ſtatutes of Weſtmin. 1. Weſtm. 2. Weſtm. 3. and many other ſtatutes made in Ed. 1. time: and vpon prærogatiua regis, and many other ſtatutes made in Ed. 2. time, beene from time to time expounded; and ſo of later times, the ſtatutes of fines, of vſes, of willes, and many more.

Expoſition of lawes.

Thus alſo haue all doubts and caſes, whereof there was no ſtatute or poſitiue lawe, beene alwaies expounded: for ſuch are moſt of the caſes which wee haue in our yeere-bookes, and bookes of reports, which are in effect nothing but reſponſa prudentum, as iuſtice Crooke did truely ſay.

Lawes obſolete.

Vpon this reaſon it is, that ſome lawes, as well ſtatute lawe as common law, are obſolete and worne out of vſe: for, all humane lawes are but leges temporis: and the wiſedome of the iudges found them to bee vnmeete for the time they liued in, although very good and neceſſarie for the time wherein they were made. And therefore it is ſaide, leges humanæ naſcuntur, vigent, & moriuntur, & habent ortum, ſtatum, & occaſum.

Lawes changed.

By this rule alſo, and vpon this reaſon it is, that oftentimes auncient lawes are changed by interpretation of the iudges, as well in caſes criminall as ciuile.

In criminall caſes the law was voluntas reputabitur pro facto; but it is not ſo now, ſauing in treaſon onely.

In an appeale of maime Britton, fol. 48. ſaith, ſoit le iudgement, que il perde autiel member, come il auer tolle a le plaintiſe; but it is not ſo now.

In auncient time, one preſent, aiding, comforting, and aſſiſting to a murder, was taken to bee no principall, but an acceſſorie, as it appeareth M. 40 Edw. 3. fol. 42. & 40. Li. Aſſ. p. 8. & p. 25. But now in that caſe hee is iudged a principall. And ſo it was ruled by all the iuſtices M. 4 H. 7. 18. and ſo Plowden affirmeth the lawe to be, in his Commentaries fol. 99. & 100.

In ciuile cauſes in auncient time, the lawe was houlden, that hee in remainder in taile could not haue an action of waſte, nor be receiued vpon default of tenant for life: but afterwards, the lawe was often iudged otherwiſe; and ſo is the common experience and practiſe at this day.

In anno 40 Ed. 3. 28. Fynchden, chiefe iuſtice of the Common Place, ſaith, that in ancient time the vicar could not haue an action againſt the parſon; but hee ſaieth the contrarie is vſed at this day, which is the better.

In ancient time a diſſeiſee could not enter vpon the feoffee of the diſſeiſor, for ſauing of the warranty; but for many yeeres the lawe hath beene houlden otherwiſe, and ſo the common practiſe yet remaineth.

Conſtruction of words.

By this rule it is alſo, that words are taken and conſtrued, ſometimes by extenſion; ſometimes by reſtriction; ſometimes by implication; ſometimes a disjunctiue for a copulatiue; a copulatiue for a disjunctiue; the preſent tenſe for the future; the future for the preſent; ſometimes by equity out of the reach of the wordes; ſometime words taken in a contrary ſence; ſometime figuratiuely, as continens pro contento, and many other like: and of all theſe, examples be infinite, as well in the ciuile lawe as common lawe.

Iudges conſulted with the priuie counſell.

And oftentimes the reuerend iudges haue had a graue regarde in their proceeding, that before they would reſolue, or giue iudgement in ſuch new caſes, they deſired to conſult with the kings priuie counſell; as appeareth in diuerſe caſes in king Edward the third his time.

39 E. 3. li. Aſ. p. 1.

R. W. aſſaulted Adam Brabſon in preſence of the iuſtices of aſſiſe at Winchester, for which A. B. complained by bill before the ſaid iuſtices, alledging this offence to bee in deſpite of the king and his iuſtices, to his dammage of an hundred pounds. R. W. pleaded, not guiltie; and was found guiltie, and dammages taxed to tenne pounds. Thereupon the iudges awarded him to priſon in the ſheriſes keeping. And for the fine, and that which ſhould be further done for the king, for the aſſault done in the preſence of the iudges, they would haue the aduiſe of the kings counſell: for in a like caſe, becauſe R. C. did ſtrike a iurour at Weſtminſter, which paſſed in an enqueſt againſt one of his friends; it was adiudged by all the counſell, that his right hand ſhould be cut off, and his lands and goods forfeited to the king. Theſe be the words in the booke.

M. 19 Ed. 3. iudgement 174.

In this caſe I note three things.

1. The iudges conſulted with the counſell.

2. They haue a like caſe before when the counſell was alſo conſulted with, viz. anno 19 E. 3. and yet they would not proceede in this caſe before they had againe conſulted with the counſell.

3 That before anno 19 Edw. 3. there was no like caſe nor precedent for ſuch a iudgement; and therefore the iudges would not of themſelues pronounce that heauy iudgement before they had conferred with the counſell touching the ſame. And after they had the opinion and aduiſe of the kings counſell, they proceeded to that iudgement.

M. 39 Ed. 3. 35.

Thomas Vghtred knight brought a forme-done againſt a poore man and his wife; they came and yeelded to the demaundant, which ſeemed ſuſpitious to the court: whereupon they examined the matter, and ſtaied iudgement, becauſe it was ſuſpitious. And Thorpe ſaide, that in the like caſe of Giles Blacket it was ſpoken of in parliament: and wee were commaunded, that when any like caſe ſhould come, we ſhould not go to iudgement without good aduiſe. Wherefore ſue to the counſell, and as they will haue vs to doe, wee will; and otherwiſe not, in this caſe.

M. 40 Ed. 3. 34.

Greene and Thorpe were ſent by the iudges to the kings counſel (where there were 24 biſhops and earles) to demand of them, whether by the ſtatute 14 Ed. 3. ca. 6. a word may be amended in a writ, aſwell as a letter or a ſillable; for, the ſtatute ſpeakes but of a letter or a ſillable: and it was anſwered, that it may well be amended: for, there cannot be a word without a ſillable; and that it was a nice queſtion of ſo ſage men.

Thus arbitria iudicum and reſponſa prudentum haue beene receiued, allowed, and reuerenced in all times as poſitiue lawe; and ſo it muſt be ſtill; for, otherwiſe much miſchiefe and great inconuenience will enſue. For new caſes happen euery day: no lawe euer was, or euer can be made, that can prouide remedie for all future caſes, or comprehend all circumſtances of humane actions which iudges are to determine. Therefore, when ſuch happen, and complaint is made; what ſhall iudges doe? Shall they giue no remedie to the partie grieued? Shall they ſtay for a parliament? Interim patitur iuſtus. They muſt therefore follow dictamen rationis; and ſo giue ſpeedie iuſtice. And in many matters of materiall circumſtances they muſt guide themſelues by diſcretion.

Iudges to be directed by reaſon and diſcretion.

As in iudging vpon preſumptions; to diſcerne which be præſumptiones temerariæ, which probabiles, which violentæ.

So for time; what is a conuenient time, and what not.

So for waſte; what is waſte puniſhable, and what not.

So for tenders of money; what is a conuenient place for tender of mony, and what not: and what is a lawfull tender, and what not.

So for diſparagement; what is a diſparagement, and what not: and ſo of other the like caſes, which are infinite.

Obiect. That the common lawe is vncerten.

If it be ſaid (for ſo ſome haue ſaid) that if this be thus, then the common lawe of England is vncerten; and ſo the rule of iuſtice, by which the people are gouerned, is too pliable, and too weake, and vncerten.

Reſponſ.

By the ſame reaſon it may be ſaid, that all the lawes of all nations are vncerten: for, in the ciuile lawe, which is taken to be the moſt vniuerſall and generall lawe in the world, they hould the ſame rule and order in all caſes which be out of the direct words of the lawe; and ſuch caſes be infinite: for as I ſaide, new caſes ſpring euery day, as malice and fraude increaſeth. 'And ſince the Roman empire beganne, moſt of their lawes bee either edicta principum, or arbitria iudicum, or reſponſa prudentum. And in their iudgements they are guided by arreſts and former iudgements, as may appeare in the books of many that haue collected ſuch arreſts. And they attribute ſo much to ſuch former iudgements, that as Pryſot equalleth them to a poſitiue lawe, ſo they hould, that ſententia facit ius, & res iudicata pro veritate accipitur, & legis interpretatio legis vim obtinet.

Nay (which is more vncerten) ſometimes they relie vpon doctours opinions deliuered in their prelections and treatiſes. And when they finde them varying, and differing one from another (as ſometimes they doe) then they preferre that which is communior opinio: and ſo in good reaſon they may: for, pluralitas idem ſentientium ſemper ſuperat; quia faciliùs inuenitur quod à pluribus quæritur.

But to conclude this point, I would aſke of theſe noueliſts, what they would haue done in Sibill Belknappes caſe, if they had liued in Henry the fourths time?

M. 2 H. 4. 7.

Sir Robert Belknappe, that reuerend and learned iudge, of whom ſundrie noble and worthy perſons, and ſome now of great and eminent place in England, are deſcended, was baniſhed out of the realme, (relegatus in Vaſconiam) not for any deſert or offence of his, but by the might of his potent enemies, and malice of the time. The lady his wife continued in England; ſhe was wronged; ſhe brought a writ in her owne name alone, not naming her husband. Exception was taken againſt it, becauſe her husband was liuing; and it was adiudged good, and ſhee recouered; and the iudge Markeham ſaid;

Ecce modo mirum quòd fœmina fert breue regis,
Non nominando virum coniunctum robore legis.

Here was a rare and a new caſe, yet it was not deferred vntill a parliament: it was iudged, and her wrong was righted by the common law of England, and that ex arbitrio iudicum, & ex reſponſis prudentum; and yet it was counted mirum with an ecce.

Now to apply this to R. Caluines caſe. His caſe is rare and new: ſo was that. There is no direct law for him in preciſe and expreſſe tearmes; there was neuer iudgement before touching any borne in Scotland, ſince king Iames beganne his happie raigne in England; hee is the firſt that is brought in queſtion: ſo there was no direct lawe for Sibill Belknap to ſue in her owne name without her huſband, who was then liuing; nay rather there was direct lawe againſt it. Yet by the lawe of England ſhee had iudgement to recouer with an ecce modo mirum: ſo by the lawe of England iudgement ought to bee giuen for Robert Caluine, but not with an ecce modo mirum; but vpon ſtrong arguments deduced à ſimilibus, and ex dictamine rationis.

But before I come to thoſe arguments, I wil vſe a few words more touching ſome rules which I haue read for the interpretation of lawes.

Note foure formes of interpretation of lawes.

There is a graue and learned writer in the ciuile law that ſetteth downe foure waies and formes of interpretation of lawes: that is, firſt, interpretatio hiſtorica; ſecondly, etymologica; thirdly, analogica; fourthly, practica.

In the argument of this caſe all theſe formes haue beene vſed, and largely handled: and the two firſt be thoſe that ſeeme but light to me, and therefore in mine opinion haue beene too much ſtoode vpon, and ouerweighed.

Hiſtorica.

For the hiſtoricall interpretation, it is alwaies darke, obſcure, and vncerten, of what kingdome, countrey, or place ſoeuer you ſpeake; I doe alwaies and onely except the diuine hiſtories written in the Bible.

Liuy ſaith, in tanta rerum vetuſtate multi temporis errores implicantur.

Saint Auguſtine ſpeaking of the ſuppoſed bookes of Henoch ſaieth, libri iſti ob nimiam antiquitatem reijciuntur.

Wherefore, for this parte let this ſuffice, whether in the beginning there were one or ſeuerall kingdomes in Great Britaine; or one or ſeueral monarches and kings of theſe two great and famous kingdomes in Great Britaine. The king our ſoueraïgne is lawfully and lineally deſcended of the firſt great monarchs and kings of both the kingdomes; and that by ſo long a continued line of lawfull diſcent, as therein he exceedeth all the kings that the world now knoweth; and therefore to inquire further of hiſtoricall knowledge in this caſe, I hould it needeleſſe.

Fergus. Inas.

Etymologica.

For the etymologicall interpretation, there hath beene very much ſaied, euen as much as wit and art could deuiſe. There haue beene alleadged manie definitions, deſcriptions, diſtinctions, differences, diuiſions, ſubdiuiſions, alluſion of wordes, extenſion of wordes, conſtruction of wordes; and nothing left vnſearched to finde what is ligeantia, allegiantia, fides, obedientia, ſubiectio, ſubditi; and who bee aborigines, indigenæ, alienigenæ, aduenticij, denizati, &c. And much of this hath beene drawne out of ſome writers of the ciuile lawe; amongſt whome the etymologicall interpretation of the words ligeus, and ligeantia, is as vncerten and doubtfull, as it is with our common lawyers; and ſo vpon any of theſe there cannot be any certen rule found for iudges to iudge by, eſpecially in new and rare caſes.

As for definition, Vlpian teacheth vs, omnis definitio in iure ciuili eſt periculoſa: and it is ſaid, that definitio eſt duplex: propria, quæ conſtat ex genere, & differentia: impropria, quæ & deſcriptio vocatur, & eſt quælibet rei deſignatio: ſo definition and deſcription are often confounded, and both vncerten. Then, ſince both be vncerten and dangerous, I will leaue both, and ſeeke a more certen rule to iudge by.

As for etymologie of words, I agree with him which ſaieth, it is leuis & fallax, & plerumque ridicula. It is a pedant grammarians fault. Marcus Varro and others haue beene noted for it. And if you examine the examples which ſome doe bring, you will perceiue how ridiculous and vaine it is. So this rule will not ſerue to finde out that which wee ſeeke for. Theſe bee but tendiculæ verborum, & aucupationes ſyllabarum, as one calleth them: it may haue ſome vſe, and ſerue a turne in ſchooles, but it is too light for iudgements in lawe, and for the ſeates of iuſtice.

Aquinas ſetteth downe a more certen rule, in vocibus videndum, non tàm à quo, quam ad quid ſumantur. And words ſhould be taken ſenſu currenti: for vſe and cuſtome is the beſt expoſitor both of lawes and wordes, quem penes arbitrium & ius & norma loquendi.

Wherefore, of the many and diuerſe diſtinctions, diuiſions, and ſubdiuiſions, that haue beene made in this caſe, I will ſay no more but, confuſum eſt quicquid in puluerem ſectum eſt: and will conclude with biſhop Juel; a man may wander and miſſe his way in miſts of diſtinctions.

Ligeantia ſenſu currenti eſt vinculum fidei &c.

Then leauing theſe hiſtoricall and etymologicall interpretations, and theſe curious and ſubtile diſtinctions and diuiſions, I ſay, ligeantia, or allegiantia, vnderſtood ſenſu currenti, is vinculum fidei & obedientiæ, as iuſtice Daniel ſaid well. And hee that is borne in any of the kings dominions, and vnder the kings obedience, is the kings liege ſubiect, and borne ad fidem regis (for that is the proper and ancient word which the lawe of England hath vſed; ad fidem regis Angliæ, ad fidem regis Franciæ) and therefore hee cannot bee a ſtranger or alien to the king, or in any of his kingdomes; and by conſequence, is inhabled to haue lands in England, and to ſue, and be ſued in any reall action for the ſame.

And ligeantia hath ſometimes a more large extenſion: for, hee that is an alien borne out of the kings dominions, vnder the obedience of another king, if hee dwell in England, and be protected by the king and his lawes, hee oweth to the king the duetie of allegeance; and ſo hee is ligatus regi, and ligeus regis: and if hee commit treaſon, the indictment ſhall bee contra ligeantiæ ſuæ debitum, as it was in Shirley the Frenchmans caſe: yet is hee not the kings ſubiect: for, hee was not borne ad fidem regis. But, this is not that ligeance which wee muſt finde: for, in a true and lawfull ſubiect, there muſt bee ſubiectio, fides, & obedientia; and thoſe cannot bee ſeuered, no more than true faith and charitie in a true Chriſtian. And hee that hath theſe three à natiuitate, is ligeus regis, and cannot bee a ſtranger or alien to the king, or in his kingdomes. And that it is ſo, may be proued by the rule of the other two interpretations of lawe; that is, analogica, & practica.

Analogica.

King Iames hath now the kingdomes of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the iſles of Gernſey and Ierſey by diſcent; all theſe bee his dominions, and vnder his ſubiection and obedience.

King Henry the ſecond had England and Normandy by diſcent from his mother Mawd the empreſſe; and Aniow and Maine by diſcent from his father Geffery Plantagenet; and Ireland by conqueſt.

Henry the third had England and Ireland by diſcent from his grandfather Henry the ſecond; and Aquitany by diſcent from his grand-mother queene Elenor, wife to king Henry the ſecond, and daughter to the duke of Aquitany.

Edward the firſt had all the ſame by diſcent; and parte of Scotland by conqueſt.

Edward the ſecond and Edward the third had all the ſame by diſcent alſo: and beſides, Edward the third claimed all France by diſcent from his mother queene Iſabell, and had the moſt part of it in poſſeſſion; and ſo had Henry the fift and Henry the ſixt alſo.

Now if in theſe kings times, ſubiectes borne in thoſe countries, being then vnder their obedience, were no aliens, but capable of landes in England: and if at this time ſubiects borne in Ireland, or Gernſey and Ierſey, be no aliens, but capable of lands in England; then, by an analogicall interpretation, why ſhould not ſubiectes borne in Scotland be at this time in like degree? For, in proportion, and in likeneſſe, and conueniencie, there can bee no difference at all.

Practica: & ſic ad ſimilia.

But whether the ſubiects borne in thoſe countries in the time of thoſe kings were then capable of lands in England as naturall ſubiects; or were deemed aliens, is the queſtion: and therein interpretatio practica is to bee conſidered; and ſo the caſe is brought to be examined per ſimilia. And in diuinitie praxis ſanctorum eſt interpres præceptorum.

Now then the queſtion is, whether the kings ſubiects of England and Scotland, that be poſt-nati, may be reſembled to the kings ſubiects of Ireland, and the iſles of Gerneſey, &c. as now they bee; and to the ſubiectes of Normandie, Aniow, and Gaſcoyne, and parte of Scotland in former times, when the ſame were the dominions, and vnder the obedience of the king of England: for I ſpeake alwaies, and would be vnderſtoode of kingdomes and dominions in poſſeſſion, and vnder obedience, and not of thoſe whereunto the king hath right, but hath no poſſeſſion or obedience. I houlde, that in all points materiall concerning this queſtion they are alike, though not in all things: (for, then it were idem, and not ſimile:) and this can not bee better vnderſtoode, than by examining the obiections to the contrary: which in ſubſtance may bee reduced to foure in number.

Ireland. Obiect. 1.

Firſt for Ireland, it was gotten by conqueſt, and the conquerour may impoſe what lawes hee will vpon them: but it is otherwiſe of kingdomes comming by diſcent.

Reſponſ.

This is a conceipted difference, and lacks the foundation of reaſon, and hath not the true parts of a difference: for thoſe that are borne in Ireland, and thoſe that are borne in Scotland, are all alike for their birth within the kings dominions, and are borne vnder the like ſubiection and obedience to the king, and haue the like bond; nay, euen the ſame bond of allegiance; that is, they are borne ad fidem regis.

Beſides, where it is ſaid, the conquerour may impoſe what lawes hee will: then conſider how it was in the interim before king Iohn gaue lawes to Ireland.

Nay, which is more, I aſke whether the conquerour of Ireland can giue new lawes to England, and make Iriſhmen to bee as naturall borne ſubiectes in England (if their birth-right doe not giue it them) which before the Conqueſt they were not? For, that is properly the queſtion. But if any difference bee, the caſe of deſcent is the ſtronger: for, (as iuſtice Yeluerton ſaide) that is by an vndoubted title made by lawe; the other by a doubtfull title wonne by the ſword.

France.

But leaue Ireland gotten by conqueſt; what ſay you to the great kingdome of France; which Edward the third had firſt in right by lawfull deſcent, and after in poſſeſſion by triumphant conqueſt; and which Henry the ſixt held after in poſſeſſion by deſcent? Was euer doubt made, whether the ſubiects borne there ſo long as it was in ſubiection and obedience to the king, were capable of landes in England?

I will now turne the caſe, and aſke another queſtion; if king Iames our ſoueraigne had firſt beene king of England by lawfull deſcent (as now hee is) and after Scotland had deſcended vnto him, ſhould not the ſubiects of Scotland (I ſpeake ſtill of poſt-nati) haue beene iudged as naturall ſubiects in England, as thoſe of France were in Edward the thirds time?

Then, he hauing now both kingdomes by lineall, true, and lawfull deſcent, it can make no difference touching the capacitie of ſubiects, which kingdome deſcended to him firſt, and which ſecond; but both are to him alike. And it is cleere, poſt-nati in England are now capable and inheritable in Scotland, though ſome haue made a cauſeleſſe and needeleſſe doubt of it: and ſo on the other ſide thoſe of Scotland are in England.

Normandy and Aquitany. Obiect. 2.

It is ſaid, Normandie and Aquitanie were no monarchies or kingdomes, but dukedomes or ſeigniories in France, and holden of the crowne of France, and therefore not to bee reſembled to Scotland, which is an ancient and abſolute kingdome.

Reſponſ.

This obiection reacheth not to the reaſon of our queſtion: for, bee they kingdomes, bee they ſeigniories, yet the ſubiectes borne there, were borne out of the kingdome of England, and ſo in that reſpect aliens: but in that they were borne within the kings dominions, and vnder his ſubiection and obedience, they were no aliens, but liege and naturall borne ſubiectes to the king; and ſo capable and inheritable in England.

I ſay beſides, the dukes of Normandie and Aquitany were abſolute princes, and had ſoueraigne power in thoſe countries, although they did not beare the name of kings; as at this time the duke of Sauoy; the duke of Florence; the duke and ſtate of Venice; and of late, the great duke of Ruſſia; the duke of Burgundy; the archduke of Auſtria, &c.

So the difference in ſtile and name makes no difference in ſoueraignty: for, king Henry the eight had as abſolute ſoueraigntie in Ireland, when his ſtile was lord of Ireland, as when hee changed his ſtile, and was called, king of Ireland.

And, to ſay, that the tenure of the crowne of Fraunce ſhould giue any priuiledge to them of Normandie and Aquitanie in England is a ſtrange conceipt; it might rather bee obiected againſt them. But, as I ſaied before, they were borne within the kings dominions, and vnder his obeiſance, and therefore as ſubiects borne in England.

And if men may beleeue ſome auncient ſtories, Aquitany and Normandy had ſometimes kings, and were kingdoms of themſelues: and not depending nor ſubiect to the crowne of France: and the kingdome of France was then a ſmall portion of Gallia, and but a little one, in compariſon of that which it is at this day. And ſome ſay, that there were foure and twentie kings in Gaule: but as the kings of France increaſed in power and ſtrength, they ſubdued their neighbor-princes, and ſo that kingdome grew to that greatneſſe that now it is at; euen as the heptarchie in England was diſſolued, and made an intire kingdome, when one of the kings mightier than the reſt ſubdued his neighbors.

The crowne and great ſeale of England. Obiect. 3.

It is ſaied further, that Normandy and Aquitany were ſubiects to the crowne of England; and to the great ſeale of England; but ſo is not Scotland: ergo &c.

Reſponſ.

This ſtandeth not wel with that which was obiected before; that they were but ſeigniories houlden of the crowne of Fraunce. And it is true, that before Edward the thirds time, thoſe kings of England, that held thoſe great ſeigniories, did acknowledge, that they held the ſame of the crowne of Fraunce.

But theſe obiections be light, and not worth the time that hath beene ſpent about them. The ſoueraignetie is in the perſon of the king; the crowne is but an enſigne of ſoueraignety; the inueſture and coronation are but ceremonies of honour, and maieſtie; the king is an abſolute and perfect king before he be crowned, and without thoſe ceremonies.

The ſeale is to be altered and changed at the will and pleaſure of the king: hee may haue one, he may haue many, as pleaſeth him. The king did vſe queene Elizabeths ſeale, for diuerſe moneths after his comming into England; queene Elizabeth vſed king Philips & queene Maries ſeale for a time; and queene Marie vſed king Edwards ſeale. And all that was ſo done, was well and lawfully done. Many things were done by auncient kings of England before the Conqueſt by their ſignature, and ſigne manuell without anie ſeale at all; and ſome ſuch ſince the Conqueſt alſo: as graunts made by Maude the empreſſe to Albericke de Vere, and others.

The king may by his great ſeale commaund all his ſubiectes that bee vnder his obedience, whereſoeuer they bee in the world: ſo he did in Normandie; ſo he did in Aquitany; ſo hee did in that part of Scotland that he had in poſſeſſion. And in 24 Edw. 1. his iudges kept ordinary courts of iuſtice there: and I haue ſeene the records of placita exercitus regis apud Edinburgh, apud Roxburgh, apud S. Iohns-towne, &c. in Scotia. So hee may commaund his ſubiects, if they be in France, Spaine, Rome, or Turkie, or the Indies. And for ſeuerall ſeales the earle of Cheſter had a ſpeciall ſeale for that his auncient county palatine. The duke of Lancaſter had a ſpeciall ſeale for his new countie palatine. And after, when theſe counties came to the kinges poſſeſſion, the kinges continued ſeuerall ſeales in them both for the adminiſtration of iuſtice; but as ſubordinate to the great ſeale of England.

And I make little doubt, but if the king ſhall now commaund any of his ſubiects of Scotland vnder his great ſeale of England, they will (as they ought) duetifully obey him. As in king Edward the 1. Edward the 2. and Edward the 3. times, they commanded many of the lordes of that parte of Scotland which then was vnder their obedience.

I finde, that in 13 Edw. 2. quarto die Iunij, the king conſtituit Adomarum de Valentia comitem Pembrochiæ cuſtodem regni ſui; ac locum ſuum tenentem quamdiu rex in partibus tranſmarinis moram fecerit. And the next day, viz. die louis quinto die Iunij, rex ordinauit, quod magnum ſigillum ſuum remaneret clauſum in aliquo loco ſecuro, dum rex eſſet in partibus tranſmarinis: et ordinauit quoddam aliud paruum ſigillum interim pro regimine regni, ad breuia, &c. conſignanda, ſub teſte Adomari de Valentia comitis Pembroch. Nota, heere was a petty ſeale pro regimine regni, wherein are compriſed commiſſions for iuſtice, mandatoria, & ad breuia conſignanda; which is for remedialia, as they are termed.

Seueral lawes. Obiect. 4.

It is ſaide, that Scotland hath lawes that are proper for that kingdome, and that they are not ſubiect to the lawes of England, and ſo è contra.

And laſtly it was ſaide, that in England euery perſon was within the iuriſdiction of ſome leete, and at the age of twelue yeares euery one is to bee ſworne in the leete to bee foiall and loiall to the king of England; that is, to the lawes of England (for ſo hee vnderſtoode loiall): but poſt-nati in Scotland can not be ſo; and that they haue an other forme of oathe in Scotland: ergo, &c.

Reſponſ.

For this laſt parte, of the oathe in the leete, the lord chiefe baron did cleere it ſo plainely, as more needes not to be ſaid. This is legalis ligeantia, it is not alta ligeantia by birth, which is that which we haue now in queſtion.

The hiſtoricall diſcourſe that hath bin made of leetes, of law-dayes, of decenna, decennarij, of the tenne-mens tale, and the oathe of all male children of twelue yeeres, &c. taken at the leete, is no newes indeede, it is very olde.

Lambard in explicatione verbi centuria.

Maſter Lambard hath it all, and more too, at large in explicatione verborum in the word centuria; it was before the Conqueſt.

But it maketh nothing to this naturall allegeance and ſubiection of birth; it is not alta ligeantia by birth-right; it is but legalis ligeantia by policie: and Fitzherbert calleth it ſwearing to the lawe.

And if that were the onely bond and marke of allegeance, many are out of it, and ſo at libertie. As, children vnder twelue yeeres; yet ſometimes they may commit treaſon and felony; where, malitia ſupplet ætatem. So women of all ſortes; yet they may bee ſhrewd and daungerous traitours; and if they bee women nobly borne, or widowes that were wiues to noble men, they ſhall be tried per pares.

Alſo noble men of all ſortes, who are neither bound to attend the leete, nor to take that oathe, as appeereth by Britton cap. 29. treating of the court called the ſhirifes turne, out of which the leete ſeemeth to be extracted: for, whatſoeuer is not preſented in the leete may be preſented and puniſhed in the ſhirifs turne. And M. Kitchin citeth Britton in this point for the leete; and alleadgeth alſo the ſtatute of Marlebridge cap. 10. to the ſame purpoſe.

And at this day the view of francke-pleges, and the putting in of francke-pleges, and the decennarij, are but bare names of things paſt, the vſe and ſubſtance is obſolete and gone.

And, as it was ſaide, few in this place haue put in ſuch pleges, or taken that oath, and yet I truſt wee are good ſubiects, and beare true faith and allegeance.

But this hath beene ſo fully anſwered and cleered by the lord chiefe baron, and the lord Coke, chiefe iuſtice of the Common Pleas, as I doe wrong to ſpend time in it.

But touching the ſeuerall lawes; I ſay, that ſeuerall lawes can make no difference in matter of ſoueraigntie; and in the bond of allegeance and obedience to one king: and ſo it concludeth nothing for the point in queſtion.

Normandy and Aquitany had ſeuerall lawes differing from the lawes of England: ſo had Fraunce in king Edward the 3. and Henry the 6. his time.

Ireland, before king Iohns time, continued their auncient lawes, and ſo, for the moſt part, haue done euer ſince.

Gerneſey and Ierſey haue yet at this day ſeuerall lawes, which, for the moſt part, were the auncient lawes and cuſtomes of Normandie.

Wales had, and in many things yet haue ſeuerall lawes: ſo for the county palatine of Cheſter alſo.

Yet theſe neuer were, nor muſt not be cantelled and cut off from their allegeance and obedience to the king; nor the kings ſubiects borne there be incapable of lands and inheritaunce in England: for where there is but one ſoueraigne, all his ſubiects borne in all his dominions bee borne ad fidem regis; and are bound to him by one bond of faith and allegeance: and in that, one is not greater nor leſſer than an other: nor one to bee preferred before another: but all to bee obedient alike; and to be ruled alike; yet under ſeuerall lawes and cuſtomes. And as Saint Gregorie ſayeth of the church, in una fide nihil officit eccleſiæ ſanctæ diuerſa conſuetudo. So I will conclude for this point, that diuerſitie of lawes and cuſtomes makes no breach of that vnitie of obedience, faith, and allegeance which all liege ſubiects owe to their liege king and ſoueraigne lord. And as none of them can be aliens to the king, ſo none of them can bee aliens or ſtrangers in any of his kingdomes or dominions; nor aliens or ſtrangers one to another, no more than a Kentiſh-man to a Cheſhire-man; or è contra.

And therefore all, that haue bin borne in any of the kinges dominions ſince hee was king of England, are capable and inheritable in all his dominions without exception.

Defect of triall.

And as to the other parte of the obiection, that there will be defect of triall; for, things done in Scotland, cannot bee tried in England; I ſay, that that maketh little to our preſent queſtion, whether poſt-nati in Scotland be aliens in England, and not capable of landes in England: but it trencheth to caſt ſome aſperſion vpon the common lawe of England; that it is not ſufficient to giue iuſtice to the kinges ſubiectes for lacke of ſufficient meanes of triall of queſtions of fact But to this baron Altham gaue ſo full an aunſweare, as more cannot bee ſaied: and ſo hee did both cleare the doubt, and did vphould the ſufficiencie of the lawe of England in that behalfe. And it ſeemeth ſtrange, that this ſhould now bee found out to bee obiected againſt Scotland, ſince it was neuer heeretofore obiected for France, Normandie, Aquitany, nor is at this day for Ireland, Gerneſey, and Ierſey, &c. whereas all ſtand vpon the ſame reaſon for the point of triall. But the wiſedome of the lawe of England hath beene ſuch, as there neuer failed certen rules for triall of all queſtions in fact; and thoſe were fitted and adapted to the matter which was to bee tried. And therefore, whoſoeuer doth diligently obſerue it, hee ſhall finde in the courſe and practiſe of the lawes of England aboue twenty ſeuerall formes of trialls: as by battell; by iurie, and that in diuerſe kindes; by wager of lawe; by proofes; by examination; by inſpection; by certificates of diuerſe kindes; and by manie other wayes: and leſt there ſhould bee any defect in that behalfe, the law hath prouided ſeuerall formes of ioyning of iſſues; and in that, hath ſpeciall regard of things done out of the realme, as euerie ſtudent may ſee in the bookes of reports.

Thus I haue paſſed theſe foure obiections, and therefore for this part I conclude, that if argumentum à ſimili were euer good and concludent in lawe, my lords the iudges haue prooued this caſe by ſo many plaine and direct examples, and like caſes, and by ſo manie ſtrong arguments and ſolide reaſons drawne out of booke caſes, out of ſtatutes, out of the true rules and forme of pleading, and out of ancient records and precedents, ſome produced by M. Atturney, and many moe remembred by the iudges, as no one thing can bee more plainely exemplified, nor appeare more like to an other, than this caſe is to thoſe caſes which they haue remembred.

Recurrend. ad rationem.

But if examples and arguments à ſimili doe faile, then it remaineth recurrere ad rationem; and what reaſon that ought to bee, and how to bee vnderſtoode, is to be conſidered: for, it is ſaid, that lex eſt ratio ſumma, iubens ea quæ facienda ſunt, & prohibens contraria. So it muſt be the depth of reaſon, not the light and ſhallow diſtempered reaſons of common diſcourſers walking in Powles, or at ordinaries, in their feaſting and drinking, drowned with drincke, or blowne away with a whiffe of tobacco. Lucretius noteth, that in many there is rationis egeſtas: and Saint Gregory ſaith, qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem ſuam conſiderans cùr non videat, rationem videt: for, although reaſon and knowledge bee infinite, yet no man can haue more of it than hee is capable of: euery man muſt receiue it, and keepe it in his owne veſſell; he cannot borrow his neighbours braine-pan to put it in. And therefore it is not without cauſe, that one of the graueſt and beſt learned lawyers of our age, and a priuie counſellor to one of the greateſt monarches of Europe, deſcribeth thoſe that ſhould bee interpreters of lawes by foure ſpeciall qualities, that is, 1. Ætate graues, 2. Eruditione præſtantes, 3. Vſu rerum prudentes, 4. Publica authoritate conſtituti: ſo, there muſt be grauitie, there muſt be learning, there muſt be experience, and there muſt be authoritie: and if any one of theſe want, they are not to be allowed to be interpreters of the lawe.

Hopperus de vera iuris prudentia pag. 118.

How all theſe qualities concurre in theſe reuerend iudges, whom wee haue heard in this preſent caſe, I will ſpare to ſpeake what I thinke: for, Chryſoſtome teacheth mee, qui laudatur in facie, flagellatur in corde.

Hopperus ibid. page 119.

In ſeeking out this depth of reaſon, the ſame author giueth a caution, which is this; vitium quod in hoc genere fugi debet eſt, ne, ſi rationem non inuenias, mox legem ſine ratione eſſe clames. And in 36 H. 6. Forteſcue ſaieth the ſame in effect, which is thus; we haue many courſes and formes which bee houlden for lawe, and haue beene houlden and vſed becauſe of reaſon; and notwithſtanding the reaſon be not ready in memory, yet by ſtudy and labour a man may finde it.

Now when wee come to examine by reaſon, whether poſt-nati in Scotland ſhall be diſabled as aliens, or ſhall be capable of lands in England, as naturall borne ſubiects there; wee are firſt to conſider what is the reaſon whie aliens in the dominions, and vnder the obedience of other forraine princes, are not capable of landes in England. And ſurely, the true reaſon is, that which was noted by baron Altham; and hath ſince beene ofte remembred, viz. the danger that might thereby come to the king and the common-weale: ſpecially by drawing hither too great multitudes of them: for ſo the treaſure of the realme might bee tranſported by them into other forraine kingdomes and countries; whereby it might bee vſed againſt the king, and to the preiudice of the ſtate: and beſides, they might vnder-hand practiſe ſedition and rebellion in the kingdome, and cauſe many other daungers and inconueniences. But that reaſon cannot ſerue againſt poſt-nati in Scotland, now that there is but one king of both the kingdomes, no more than it can ſerue againſt thoſe that are borne in Ireland, or Gerneſey, or Ierſey: and therefore in reaſon they are as capable of landes in England, as the kings ſubiects of Ireland, and Gerneſey, and Ierſey are.

Obiections.

Againſt this, there haue alſo beene many obiections made, and reaſons deuiſed, that ſeeme witty, and haue ſome ſhew of probability to proue, that poſt-nati in Scotland are aliens, and ought not in reaſon to bee capable of landes in England, videlicet.

1. That England and Scotland were two ancient ſeuerall kingdomes vnder ſeuerall kings, and ſeuerall crownes.

2. That they continue yet ſeuerall kingdomes.

3. That they haue yet ſeuerall lawes, ſeuerall ſeales, ſeuerall crownes, and ſeuerall kings: for, it is ſaid, though king Iames be king of both, and hath but one naturall body, yet in iudgement of law, he is in reſpect of his two ſeuerall kingdomes, as two ſeuerall kings, and the ſubiects of each ſeuerall kingdome are bound to him by diſtinct allegeance, according to the ſeuerall lawes of the kingdome where they were borne.

And all this is grounded vpon this rule or fiction in lawe: quando duo iura concurrunt in vna perſona, æquum eſt ac ſi eſſent in diuerſis.

And vpon this ground is this new form of pleading deuiſed, which the defendants haue vſed in this caſe, ſuch as cannot be found in any record, euer to haue beene pleaded before; and may as well ſerue againſt the kinges ſubiectes of Ireland, as againſt the poſt-nati of Scotland. And ſithence in former times the like forme of pleading was neuer ſeene againſt any of the kings of Englandes ſubiects, which were borne in any of his dominions out of England, as in Normandie or Aquitanie, or in France (I meane ſuch part of it as was in the kinges poſſeſſion, and in ſubiection and obedience to him, and not in that parte of France which his enemies helde) it may be probably inferred, that it was then generally houlden, that neither ſuch a forme of pleading, nor the matter it ſelfe was ſufficient in lawe to diſable anie ſuch plaintiſe: for, againſt French-men that were not vnder the kings obedience wee finde it often pleaded. And as thoſe that were not ſubiects to the king, nor borne vnder his obedience, did then preſume to bring ſuites and actions in England; ſo it can not bee thought, but that the king hauing then ſo large and ample dominions beyond the ſeas, as Normandy and Aquitany, and many other partes of France, ſome of his ſubiects borne there, had cauſe to haue, and did bring the like ſuites in England. And ſithence no ſuch plea is found to haue beene then vſed againſt them, it can not in lawe and reaſon bee now allowed againſt the poſt-nati in Scotland: for, I may ſay as Aſcue ſaied in 37 H. 6. Our predeceſſors were as ſage and learned as we be.

P. 23 Elizab. Dyer 376.

And I ſee not, but that in this caſe a good argument may bee reaſonably deduced from the negatiue, as it was in the caſe reported by the great learned, and moſt graue and reuerend iudge ſir Iames Dyer, chiefe iuſtice of the Common Pleas, anno 23 Elizab. The queſtion there, was, whether an erroneous iudgement giuen in Rie, which is a member of the cinque-portes, might bee reuerſed in the Kinges Bench, or Common Place at Weſtminſter; and it was thus reſolued; ſed pro eo quod nullum tale breue in Regiſtro, nec in aliquibus præcedentibus curiarum prædictarum inueniri potuerat, dominus cancellarius Bromley per opinionem capitalium iuſticiariorum vtriuſque banci denegauit tale breue concedere. And ſo iuſtice Fenners argument houldeth well, viz. there is in this caſe no lawe to exclude the complainant, ergo hee is a liege and a naturall borne ſubiect.

But the forme of pleading in the time of king Ed. 1. in Cobledickes caſe, which was cited out of Hengham, (and the booke ſhewed heere by the lord chiefe iuſtice Coke) is ſo direct and plaine for this our queſtion, as nothing can be more plaine: and therefore I thinke it not amiſſe to report it againe.

That caſe was in effect and ſubſtaunce, thus:

A woman brought a writte of ayel againſt Roger Cobledicke, and declared of the ſeiſin of Roger her grand-father, and conueied the diſcent to Gilbert her father; and from him to the demaundant, as his daughter and heire. The tenant pleaded, that the demaundant was a French-woman, and not of the ligeance nor of the fidelitie of England; and demaunded iudgement if ſhee ought to haue the action againſt him. This plea was houlden to bee inſufficient; and thereupon the tenant amended his plea, and pleaded further, that the demaundant was not of the ligeance of England, nor of the fidelitie of the king; and demaunded iudgement, &c. And againſt that plea none exception was taken, but thereupon the demaundant prayed licence to depart from her writ. By this it appeareth plainely, that the firſt plea, alleadging that ſhe was a French-woman, and not of the ligeance, nor of the fidelitie of England, was inſufficient (and ſo declared by Berreford the chiefe iuſtice); for, there can bee no fidelitie nor allegeance due to England, reſpecting the land and ſoile without a ſoueraigne and king. But the ſecond plea alledging, that ſhee was not of the ligeance of England, nor of the fidelitie of the king, was good and ſufficient: for, to the king fidelitie and allegeance is due; and therefore, ſince ſhee failed in that, ſhe was not to be anſwered: and thereupon ſhe praied licence to departe from her writte, and ſo ſhe left her ſuite.

Stat. 14 E. 3. That the realme of England ſhall not be ſubiect to France.

Now, for the reaſons which haue beene drawne and ſtrained out of the ſtatute an. 14 Edw. 3. if they bee well examined, they ſerue little for this point which we haue in hand.

It is to be conſidered, at what time, and vpon what occaſion that ſtatute was made. King Edward the third being right heire to the crowne and kingdome of Fraunce by deſcent from his mother, and hauing ſpent many yeeres for the recouering of the ſame, reſolued to take vpon him the name and ſtile of king of France; being aduiſed thereunto by them of Flaunders. Hereupon he did take the ſtile of king of Fraunce; and altered his ſeale and his armes; and after a while, placed the armes of France before the ancient armes of England, as they are borne at this day. This gaue occaſion for the making of this ſtatute: for ſome people (aſcun gentes, ſaith the ſtatute) ſeeing this change, and conſidering the large and ample extent, and the magnificence of that great kingdome, beganne to doubt that the king would make his imperiall ſeate there; and conceiued thereby, that the kingdome of England, being the leſſer, ſhould bee in ſubiection of the king and kingdome of France, being the greater, and to bee gouerned and ruled by a vice-roy, or deputy, as they ſaw Ireland was. And though in the kings ſtile, England was placed before France, yet they ſawe the armes of France marſhalled before the armes of England; though at the firſt bearing thereof ſome ſay it was not ſo.

To cleere this doubt, and to take away this feare from the ſubiects of England, was this ſtatute made, as doth plainely appeare by the wordes of the ſtatute it ſelfe.

Now if you will make an apt and proper application of that caſe then betweene England and Fraunce, to this our caſe now, betweene Scotland and England, it muſt be thus:

1. Edw. 3. then king of England (being the leſſer) had afterwardes the kingdome of France (being the greater) by deſcent, and tooke the ſtile of king of France.

King Iames king of Scotland (beeing the leſſer) hath afterward the kingdome of England (being the greater) by deſcent, and taketh the ſtile of king of England.

2. King Ed. 3. altered his ſeale, and his armes, and placed the armes of Fraunce before the armes of England.

King Iames hath changed his ſeale, and his armes in England, and hath placed the armes of England before the armes of Scotland.

3. It was then doubted, that king Edw. 3. would remoue his court out of England, the leſſer, and keepe his imperiall ſeate and ſtate in France, the greater.

King Iames hath indeede remooued his court out of Scotland, the leſſer, and doth in his royall perſon (with the queene and prince, and all his children) keepe his imperiall ſeate in England, the greater.

4. In al theſe the caſes agree; but yet one difference there is, and that is in the ſtile: for king Ed. 3. in his ſtile placed England, the leſſer, being his ancient kingdome, before France, the greater, being newly deſcended vnto him.

But king Iames in his ſtile placeth England, the greater, though newly deſcended vnto him, before Scotland, the leſſer, being his ancient kingdome.

5. Now, this being thus; perhappes Scotland might out of this example haue conceiued the like doubt againſt England, as England did then againſt France: but as there was then no doubt made, whether the kings ſubiects borne in England ſhould be capable of lands in France; ſo, out of this ſtatute, and vpon this example no doubt can bee inferred, whether the kings ſubiects now borne in Scotland, ſhall be capable of lands in England.

But, all theſe obiections, and the ground whereupon they are framed, viz. quando duo iura &c. haue beene ſo thorowly and profoundly examined, and ſo learnedly and fully anſwered and cleered by the iudges, as I make no doubt but all wiſe and indifferent hearers be well ſatisfied therein.

And if there bee any ſo poſſeſſed with a preiudicate opinion againſt trueth, and reaſon, that will ſay in their owne heartes, licèt perſuaſeris non perſuadebis; and ſo, either ſerpent-like ſtop their eares, or elſe wilfully abſent themſelues, becauſe they would not heare the weakneſſe and abſurdities of their owne conceipts laied open and confuted: if there bee any ſuch I ſay (as I truſt there bee but few, and yet I feare there bee ſome) I would they had learned of Tertullian, that veritas docendo ſuadet, non ſuadendo docet. And I wiſh that they bee not found among the number of thoſe to whome Saint Paul ſaieth, ſi quis ignorat, ignoret: and Saint Iohn in the Apocalips, qui ſordidus eſt, ſordeſcat adhuc. And I will exhort with Saint Paul: qui tenet, teneat, and not wauer or doubt by ſuch weake arguments and obiections.

A dangerous diſtinction betweene the king and the crowne.

But in this new learning, there is one part of it ſo ſtrange, and of ſo daungerous conſequent, as I may not let it paſſe, viz. that the king is as a king diuided in himſelfe; and ſo as two kings of two ſeuerall kingdomes; and that there be ſeuerall allegeances, and ſeuerall ſubiections due vnto him reſpectiuely in regarde of his ſeuerall kingdomes, the one not participating with the other.

This is a daungerous diſtinction betweene the king and the crowne, and betweene the king and the kingdome: it reacheth too farre; I wiſh euery good ſubiect to beware of it. It was neuer taught, but either by traitours, as in Spencers bill in Edward the ſeconds time (which baron Snig, and the lord chiefe baron, and lord Coke remembred) or by treaſonable papiſts, as Harding in his confutation of the apologie maintaineth, that kings haue their authority by the poſitiue lawe of nations, and haue no more power, than the people hath, of whome they take their temporall iuriſdiction; and ſo Ficlerus Simanca, and others of that crew. Or by ſeditious ſectaries and puritans, as Buchannan de iure regni apud Scotos, Penry, Knox, and ſuch like. For, by theſe, and thoſe that are their followers, and of their faction, there is in their pamphlets too much ſuch traiterous ſeede ſowne.

Abſurdities in this dangerous diſtinction.

But leauing this, I will adde a little more, to prooue, that in reaſon Robert Caluine, and other like poſt-nati in Scotland, ought by lawe to be capable of landes in England: and for that, I wil remember one rule more which is certen and faileth not, and ought to bee obſerued in all interpretation of lawes; and that is, ne quid abſurdum, ne quid illuſorium admittatur.

But, vpon this ſubtile and dangerous diſtinction of faith and allegeance due to the king, and of faith and allegeance due to the crowne, and to the kingdome (which is the onely baſis and fundamentall maine reaſon to diſable the plaintiſe, and all poſt-nati) there follow too many groſſe, and fowle abſurdities, whereof I will touch ſome few, and ſo conclude, that in lawe and reaſon this ſubtile, but abſurd and dangerous diſtinction, ought not to be allowed.

This bond of allegeance, whereof wee diſpute, is vinculum fidei; it bindeth the ſoule and conſcience of euery ſubiect ſeuerally and reſpectiuely, to be faithfull and obedient to the king: and as a ſoule or conſcience cannot bee framed by policie; ſo faith and allegeance cannot bee framed by policie, nor put into a politike bodie. An oath muſt be ſworne by a naturall bodie; homage and fealtie muſt be done by a naturall bodie, a politike body cannot doe it.

Now then, ſince there is but one king, and ſoueraigne, to whome this faith and allegeance is due by all his ſubiects of England and Scotland, can any humane policie diuide this one king, and make him two kings? Can cor regis Angliæ be in manu Domini, and cor regis Scotiæ not ſo? Can there bee warres betweene the king of England and the king of Scotland, or betweene the kingdome of England and the kingdome of Scotland, ſo long as there is but one king? Can the king of England now ſend an army roial into Scotland againſt the king of Scotland? Can there bee any letters of marke or repriſall now graunted by the king of England, againſt the ſubiects of the king of Scotland? Can there bee any protections now, quia profecturus in exercitu Iacobi regis Angliæ in Scotiam? Nay ſhortly, can any man bee a true ſubiect to king Iames as king of England, and a traitor or rebell to king Iames as king of Scotland? Shall a foote breadth, or an inch breadth of ground, make a difference of birth-right of ſubiects borne vnder one king; nay, where there are not any certen bounds or limites knowne at all, but an imaginarie partition wall, by a conceipted fiction in lawe? It is enough to propound theſe and ſuch like queſtions, whereof many more might be remembred: they carry a ſufficient and plaine anſweare in themſelues: magis docet qui prudentèr interrogat.

As the king nor his heart cannot bee diuided, for hee is one entire king ouer all his ſubiectes, in which ſoeuer of his kingdomes or dominions they were borne, ſo hee muſt not bee ſerued nor obeyed by halues; he muſt haue intire and perfect obedience of his ſubiects: for, ligientia (as baron Heron ſaied well) muſt haue foure qualities; it muſt bee 1. pura & ſimplex: 2. integra & ſolida: 3. vniuerſalis non localis: 4. permanens, continua, & illæſa. Diuide a man's heart, and you loſe both parts of it, and make no heart at all; ſo hee that is not an intire ſubiect, but halfe faced, is no ſubiect at all; and hee, that is borne an intire and perfect ſubiect, ought by reaſon and lawe to haue all the freedomes, priuiledges, and benefites pertaining to his birth-right in all the kinges dominions; and ſuch are all the poſt-nati in England and Scotland. And the inconuenience of this imaginary locall allegeance hath beene ſo lately, and ſo fully declared by the lorde chiefe iuſtice Coke, as more needes not bee ſaied in it.

In ſome ſpeciall caſes there ſometime may bee a king of ſubiects without land in poſſeſſion, as iuſtice Fenner noted in the gouernement which Moſes had ouer the people of Iſrael in the wilderneſſe; and as in the caſe which ſir Iohn Popham the late lord chiefe iuſtice did put in the parliament. If a king and his ſubiects bee driuen out of his kingdome by his enemies, yet notwithſtanding hee continueth ſtill king ouer thoſe ſubiects, and they are ſtill bound vnto him by their bond of allegeance, whereſoeuer he and they bee. But there can not bee a king of land without ſubiects: for, that were but imperium in belluas, and, rex & ſubditi ſunt relatiua.

Rex ſolus iudicat, &c. I ſaied there was an other generall rule for expounding of lawes, which I reſerued to bee laſt ſpoken of. I will now but touch it; for, I will not ſtand to examine by humane reaſons, whether kings were before lawes, or lawes before kinges; nor how kings were firſt ordained; nor whether the kings or the people did firſt make lawes; nor the ſeuerall conſtitutions and frames of ſtates and common-weales; nor what Plato or Ariſtotle haue written of this argument. They were men of ſinguler learning and wiſedome; but wee muſt conſider the time, and the countrie, in which they liued, and in all their great learning they lacked the true learning of the knowledge of God. They were borne and liued in Greece, and in popular ſtates: they were enemies, or at leaſt miſlikers of all monarchies; yet one of them diſdained not to bee a ſeruant or mercenarie hireling to a monarch. They accompted all the world barbarous, but their owne countrey of Greece: their opinions therefore are no canons to giue lawes to kinges and kingdomes, no more than ſir Thomas Moores Vtopia, or ſuch pamphlets as wee haue at euerie marte.

Prou. c. 8. I beleeue him that ſaieth, per me reges regnant, & principes iuſta decernunt; and I make no doubt, but that as God ordained kings, and hath giuen lawes to kings themſelues, ſo hee hath authorized and giuen power to kings to giue lawes to their ſubiects; and ſo kings did firſt make lawes, and then ruled by their lawes, and altered and changed their lawes from time to time, as they ſawe occaſion, for the good of themſelues, and their ſubiects.

And this power they haue from God Almighty; for, as Saint Auguſtine ſaieth, in hoc reges Deo ſeruiunt ſicut eis diuinitùs præcipitur, in quantum ſunt reges, ſi in ſuo regno bona iubeant, mala prohibeant, non ſolum quæ pertinent ad humanam ſocietatem, verumetiam quæ ad diuinam religionem.

And I hould Thomas Aquinas his opinion to be good, rex ſolutus à legibus quòad vim coactiuam, ſubditus eſt legibus quòad vim directiuam propria voluntate. And for this opinion there is a ſtronger authoritie, euen from God himſelfe in Eccleſiaſtes, c. 8. ver. 2. ego os regis obſeruo; et præcepta iuramenti Dei: and ver. 4. ſermo illius poteſtate plenus eſt: nec dicere ei quiſquam poteſt, quare ita facias?

Now beeing led a little from the common lawe to the ciuile lawe, I finde in the ciuile lawe a direct text, warranting that generall rule which I reſerued to this place, which is this; inter æquitatem iuſque interpoſitam interpretationem nobis ſolis & licet & oportet inſpicere. Cod. 1. li. tit. 14. le. 1.

Ibidem le. 12. And another like text in theſe words, ſententia principis ius dubium declarans, ius facit quòad omnes. And ſome graue and notable writers in the ciuile lawe ſay, rex eſt lex animata: ſome ſay, rex eſt lex loquens: ſome others ſay, interpretantur legem conſuetudo & princeps: another ſaieth, rex ſolus iudicat de cauſa à iure non definita.

And as I may not forget Saint Auguſtines words, which are theſe; generale pactum eſt ſocietatis humanæ regibus ſuis obtemperare: ſo I may not wrong the iudges of the common lawe of England ſo much as to ſuffer an imputation to bee caſt vpon them, that they, or the common lawe doe not attribute as great power and authoritie to their ſoueraignes the kinges of England, as the Romane lawes did to their emperours: (a) for, Bracton, the chiefe iuſtice in the time of king Henry the third, hath theſe direct wordes, de chartis regijs & factis regum, non debent, nec poſſunt iuſticiarij nec priuatæ perſonæ diſputare. Nec etiam, ſi in illa dubitatio oriatur, poſſunt eam interpretari. Et in dubijs & obſcuris, vel ſi aliqua dictio duos contineat intellectus, domini regis erit expectanda interpretatio & voluntas; cum eius ſit interpretari cuius eſt condere. And Britton in the time of king Ed. 1. writeth as much in effect.

So as now if this queſtion ſeem difficult, that neither direct law, nor examples and precedents, nor application of like caſes, nor diſcourſe of reaſon, nor the graue opinion of the learned and reuerend iudges, can reſolue it, here is a true and certen rule, how both by the ciuile lawe, and the ancient common lawe of England it may and ought to be decided: that is, by ſentence of the moſt religious, learned, and iudicious king that euer this kingdome or iſland had.

But this caſe is ſo cleare as this needeth not at all.

And in this I would not be miſ-vnderſtoode, as though I ſpake of making of new lawes, or of altering the lawes now ſtanding; I meane not ſo, but I ſpeake only of interpretation of the lawe in new queſtions and doubts, as now in this preſent caſe: neither doe I meane hereby to derogate any thing from the high court of parliament; (farre be it from my thought) it is the great councell of the kingdome, wherein euery ſubiect hath intereſt. And to ſpeake of the conſtitution or forme of it, or how, or when it was firſt begunne, is for buſie queſtioniſts; it ought to bee obeyed and reuerenced, but not diſputed; and it is at this time impertinent to this queſtion.

But certen it is, it hath beene the wiſedome of the kinges of this realme to reſerue in themſelues that ſupreame power to call their nobles, clergie, and commons together, when they ſawe great and vrgent cauſes; and by that great councell to make edicts and ſtatutes for the weale of their people, and ſafetie of the kingdome and ſtate, as in anno 10 Edw. 3. the aſſembly at Nottingham for the great wars in France: and in anno 20 H. 3. Prouiſiones Merton, which I remembred before.

Obiect. of inconueniencie and frugalitie. There haue beene made ſome obiections of inconueniencie, as for bearing of ſcot and lot, and ſuch other charges; and ſome out of frugalitie, that the king ſhall loſe his profit of making denizens, and ſuch like. Theſe are ſo light as I leaue them to the winde; they are neither fit for parliament, nor councell, nor court.

Obiect. vpon diffidence. Another argument and reaſon againſt the poſt-nati hath beene lately made out of diffidence and miſtruſt, that they will come into England ſans number, and ſo as it were to ſurcharge our common; and that this may be in ſecula ſeculorum. I know not well what this meanes. The nation is ancient, noble, and famous; they haue many honourable and woorthie noblemen and gentlemen, and many wiſe and worthie men of all degrees and qualities; they haue lands and faire poſſeſſions in Scotland. Is it therefore to bee ſuppoſed, or can it in reaſon bee imagined, that ſuch multitude ſans number will leaue their natiue ſoile, and all tranſport themſelues hither? Hath the Iriſh done ſo, or thoſe of Wales, or of the iſles of Man, Gerneſey, and Ierſey? Whie ſhould we then ſuſpect it now more for Scotland?

Nay, doe you ſuppoſe that the kinge of England will euer ſuffer ſo great a parte of his dominions, and ſo great and famous a kingdome as Scotland is to be diſpeopled? It is a doubt imagined without any foundation or ground of reaſon. But if it were to bee doubted, the twelue iudges that haue concurred in opinion, and that late worthy iudge Popham, had as great cauſe to feare it as any others. They are wiſe; they are learned; they haue faire poſſeſſions and good eſtates; they haue poſteritie to care for as others haue.

Yet, admit it bee a matter worth the doubting of, what is that to the young poſt-nati that are not like in many yeares to come hither in ſuch number? Shall we vpon this cauſleſſe feare depriue them of their lawfull birth-right?

Haue wee ſeene in theſe fiue yeeres paſt anie more of them than this one alone that haue gotten any lands in England? And this little that he hath is ſo ſmall and poore a portion, that his purchaſe is not great, and therefore no iuſt cauſe of offence to any.

Ante nati. Nay, if you looke vpon the ante-nati, you ſhall find no ſuch confluence hither, but ſome few (and very few in reſpect of that great and populous kingdome) that haue done long and worthie ſeruice to his maieſtie, haue, and ſtill doe attend him, which I truſt no man miſlikes: for, there can bee none ſo ſimple, or childiſh (if they haue but common ſenſe) as to thinke that his maieſty ſhould haue come hither alone amongſt vs, and haue left behinde him in Scotland, and as it were caſte off, all his ould and worthie ſeruants.

And if theſe noble and worthie gentlemen of Scotland, I meane the ante-nati be louingly and brotherly entertained amongſt vs, with mutuall loue and beneuolence, that ſo we may coaleſcere, and be vnited together, by marriage, and otherwiſe (as in ſome particular caſes wee ſee it already happily begunne) no doubt God will bleſſe this vnion of both theſe nations, and make them, and the king, and Great Britaine to be famous through the world; and feared and redoubted of our enemies, and of all that wiſh vs ill: for, vis vnita fortior, & concordia multos facit vnum. But what may follow vpon ſuch arguments of diffidence and ſuſpition, which ſeeme but to hinder vnion, and to breede diſcord and diſſention I will not ſpeake. Let euery wiſe man conſider it well: for, humana conſilia caſtigantur vbi cæleſtibus ſe præferunt. And remember Saint Paules caution, ſi inuicem mordetis, videte ne ab inuicem conſumamini.

And for the reſemblance that hath bin made of this caſe of poſt-nati (but indeed for the vnion of both kingdomes) with the houſwifes cutting of her cloth by a threede, I will ſay but this, that if ſhee cut her peece of cloth in length aſwell as in breadth, all the threeds will bee cutte, and the cloth marred. And this cutting in this our caſe, is, to cutte all aſwell in length as in breadth, euen through all the kinges dominions; and ſo will rent aſunder the whole frame of the vnion, and cut in peeces all the threeds of allegeance.

(a) This language is ſurely very unguarded. Editor.

A queſtion, how long this ſuſpition and diſ-vnion ſhall continue ?

But now I wil aſke this queſtion: how long ſhall this ſuſpition and doubt continue ? Shall there bee a diſ-vnion for euer ? If it bee ſaied, no, but vntill the lawes and cuſtomes of both kingdomes bee made one and the ſame : then I aſke ; how, and when ſhall that be done ? And it may bee, that the conſtitutions of the countries bee ſuch as there can hardely in all things bee ſuch an abſolute and perfect reconciling or vniting of lawes as is fancied. Is it yet ſo betweene England and Wales, or betweene Kent and Cornewall, or betweene many other parts of this kingdome ? I ſay no; and I ſpeake it confidently and truely, it is not ſo, nor well can be ſo. Therefore let England and Scotland be in like degree now, as England and Wales were for many hundred yeeres, and in many things are yet ſtill ; and yet let vnion and loue increaſe amongſt vs, euen in ſecula ſeculorum. Let vs not be ſuch as St. Bernard noteth, amant quod non decet, timent quod non oportet, dolent vanè, gaudent vaniùs. And let vs no longer make queſtion, whether ſeuerall lawes and cuſtomes bee markes of ſeperation and diſ-vnion, or of ſeuerall allegeances; for certainely they are not.

Bernard.

Obiection vpon diuination.

One other reaſon remaines againſt theſe poſt-nati, and that is out of a prouident foreſight, or as it were a propheſying : what if a ſeperation of theſe kingdomes fall hereafter ?

Reſponſ.

Of this I can ſay but abſit omen. It is potentia remota (as iuſtice Williams ſaied) and I truſt in God remotiſſima : and I will euer pray to God that it neuer fall ſo, vntill the king of all kinges reſume all ſcepters and kingdomes into his owne hands. And let vs take heede of ſinnes of ingratitude and diſobedience ; and remember, that Adam and Eue were puniſhed, non propter pomum, ſed propter vetitum. And for ſuch prophets, let the prophet Ezechiel ca. 13. anſwer them, væ prophætis inſipientibus, qui ſequuntur ſpiritum ſuum, & nihil vident. And the prophet Eſay ſpeaketh to all ſuch with an other væ, væ illis qui diſpergunt.

Now then, as M. Solicitor beganne with ſeeking out the truth ; ſo I will conclude with Eſdras words, magna eſt veritas & præualet : and with this further, eatenus rationandum donec veritas inueniatur : cùm inuenta eſt veritas, figendum ibi iudicium : et in victoria veritatis, ſoli veritatis inimici pereunt.

The concluſion.

Thus I haue heere deliuered my concurrence in opinion with my lordes the iudges, and the reaſons that induce and ſatisfie my conſcience, that Ro. Caluine, and all the poſt-nati in Scotland, are in reaſon, and by the common lawe of England, naturall-borne ſubiects within the allegeance of the king of England ; and inhabled to purchaſe and haue free-hould and inheritance of lands in England ; and to bring reall actions for the ſame in England.

For, if they haue not this benefit by this bleſſed and happie vnion, then are they in no better caſe in England, than the king of Spaines ſubiects borne in Spaine, &c. And ſo by this vnion they haue gotten nothing : what they haue loſt iuſtice Yeluerton did well note.

And therefore I muſt giue iudgement in the Chancerie, that the defendants there ought to make direct anſwer to Ro. Caluines bill for the lands and euidences for which he complaines.

XVII. Proceedings againſt Mr. JAMES WHITELOCKE, in the Star-Chamber, in June, 10 Jam. I. 1613. for a Contempt of the King's Prerogative.

[Mr. Whitelocke, the ſubject of this proſecution, is ſuppoſed to have been the ſame gentleman, as afterwards became ſir James Whitelocke, the judge of that name, and father of Mr. Bulſtrode Whitelocke, the famous writer of the Memorials. See the note in vol. 3. of lord Bacon's works, laſt 4to ed. p. 471. He appears to have been proſecuted ſimply for giving a private verbal opinion as a barriſter, on a point of prerogative, againſt the crown, to ſir Robert Manſell ; who, being treaſurer of the navy and vice-admiral, had conſulted Mr. Whitelocke, on the legality of a commiſſion iſſued by king James for examining into and reforming the diſorders and abuſes of the navy. Ibid. At the ſame time, ſir Robert Manſell was himſelf charged, for queſtioning the prerogative of the crown, and animating the lord-admiral againſt the commiſſion. Ibid. ſame page, and the note in page 472. The hearing was at Whitehall before the lords of the council, with the intervention of lord chief juſtice Coke, lord chief baron Tanfield, and the maſter of the rolls ; the king's attorney and ſolicitor ſpeaking againſt Mr. Whitelocke, and Mr. Henry Montagu the king's ſerjeant againſt ſir Robert Manſell. Ibid. Both humiliated themſelves ; in conſequence of which they were recommended to the crown as proper objects of pardon, and were accordingly enlarged on the terms of ſubſcribing a ſubmiſſion. Ibid. & Reliq. Wotton, p. 421. 3d ed. there cited. The following ſpeech of lord Bacon, who was at this time attorney-general, is the only remnant we meet with of the proceedings in the caſe, excluſive of the circumſtances before-mentioned. The ſpeech ſeems imperfect, it ending abruptly. What there is of it, though not without paſſages characteriſtic of lord Bacon's nervous eloquence and curioſity of argument, is in our opinion far from ſtating any thing like a juſt ground of proſecution. In the preſent age it would be deemed a monſtrous doctrine to aſſert, that lawyers were not at liberty to give opinions to their clients on queſtions of prerogative. Little apology can be made for ſuch a doctrine even in lord Bacon's time ; for it was ever lawful for the ſubject to conteſt queſtions of prerogative in the king's courts ; and if it was ſo, how could it be contrary to law to take the advice of council on ſuch ſubjects ? Indeed lord Bacon profeſſes not to controvert the right of aſking and giving counſel in law. But then he qualifies this right by a diſtinction ; for he exempts and gives a privilege to high commiſſions of regimen and caſes of ſtate ; a deſcription ſo large and indefinite, that, if it ſhould be acquieſced in, it would leave few acts of the crown, on which a lawyer could ſafely give an opinion. Particular delicacy and caution certainly ought to be uſed, where the prerogative of the crown is drawn into queſtion ; and it may be poſſible for a lawyer to exerciſe the right of giving opinions ſo indecently and licentiouſly, as to render himſelf reſponſible criminally. But then the crime ariſes from the abuſe, not from the want of the right. It may alſo be poſſible to put a caſe ſo ſtrong, as to be beyond the line of a profeſſional opinion. Thus if a private lawyer ſhould be conſulted, whether the king had a right to the crown, who can doubt that he would anſwer ſuch a queſtion at his peril ? But the queſtion, on which Mr. Whitelocke gave his opinion, was not of this kind, being on a commiſſion from the crown, the legality of which it was competent to the ſubject to controvert, and conſequently to take legal advice about. On the whole, the true rule ſeems to be, that a barriſter may give his opinion on every queſtion, however relative to the king or his prerogative, which the ſubject may conteſt with the crown in a court of juſtice ; but that in exerciſing this right he muſt keep ſo within the bounds of an opinion, as not under the color of it to obtrude either private or public ſcandal. In reſpect to Mr. Whitelocke's particular caſe, the ſubject of the opinion he gave ſeems perfectly unexceptionable ; nor could it be an offence, that his opinion was againſt the extent of the prerogative, or that it was erroneous. The only ground then, on which he could be criminally reſponſible, was for ſome licentious and extraneous matter introduced into the opinion ; in reſpect to which no judgment can now be deciſively formed, as the words of the opinion do not appear ; though as far as a conjecture may be made from lord Bacon's manner of obſerving on the opinion, it was equally innocent both in ſubject and language.]

Speech of the attorney-general ſir Francis Bacon, from the 3d volume of the laſt 4to edition of his works, page 471.

My lords,

THE offence wherewith Mr. Whitelocke is charged, (for as to ſir Robert Manſell, I take it to my part only to be ſorry for his error) is a contempt of a high nature, and reſting upon two parts : on the one, a preſumptuous and licentious cenſure and defying of his majeſty's prerogative in general ; the other, a ſlander and traducement of one act or emanation hereof, containing a commiſſion of ſurvey and reformation of abuſes in the office of the navy.

This offence is fit to be opened and ſet before your lordſhips, as it hath been well begun, both in the true ſtate and in the true weight of it. For as I deſire, that the nature of the offence may appear in its true colours ; ſo, on the other ſide, I deſire, that the ſhadow of it may not darken or involve any thing that is lawful, or agreeable with the juſt and reaſonable liberty of the ſubject.

Firſt, we muſt and do agree, that the aſking and taking, and giving of counſel in law is an eſſential part of juſtice; and to deny that, is to ſhut the gate of juſtice, which in the Hebrews commonwealth was therefore held in the gate, to ſhew all paſſage to juſtice muſt be open: and certainly counſel in law is one of the paſſages. But yet, for all that, this liberty is not infinite and without limits.

If a jeſuited papiſt ſhould come, and aſk counſel (I put a caſe not altogether feigned) whether all the acts of parliament made in the time of queen Elizabeth and king James are void or no; becauſe there are no lawful biſhops ſitting in the upper houſe, and a parliament muſt conſiſt of lords ſpiritual and temporal and commons; and a lawyer will ſet it under his hand, that they be all void, I will touch him for high treaſon upon this his counſel.

So, if a puritan preacher will aſk counſel, whether he may ſtile the king defender of the faith, becauſe he receives not the diſcipline and preſbytery; and the lawyer will tell him, it is no part of the king's ſtile, it will go hard with ſuch a lawyer.

Or if a tribunitious popular ſpirit will go and aſk a lawyer, whether the oath and band of allegiance be to the kingdom and crown only, and not to the king, as was Hugh Spenſer's caſe, and he deliver his opinion as Hugh Spenſer did; he will be in Hugh Spenſer's danger.

So as the privilege of giving counſel proveth not all opinions: and as ſome opinions given are traiterous; ſo are there others of a much inferior nature, which are contemptuous. And among theſe I reckon Mr. Whitelocke's; for as for his loyalty and true heart to the king, God forbid I ſhould doubt it.

Therefore let no man miſtake ſo far, as to conceive, that any lawful and due liberty of the ſubject for aſking counſel in law is called in queſtion, when points of diſloyalty or of contempt are reſtrained. Nay, we ſee it is the grace and favour of the king and his courts, that if the caſe be tender, and a wiſe lawyer in modeſty and diſcretion refuſeth to be of council, for you have lawyers ſometimes too nice as well as too bold, they are then ruled and aſſigned to be of council. For certainly counſel is the blind man's guide; and ſorry I am with all my heart, that in this caſe the blind did lead the blind.

For the offence, for which Mr. Whitelocke is charged, I hold it great, and to have, as I ſaid at firſt, two parts; the one a cenſure, and, as much as in him is, a circling, nay a clipping, of the king's prerogative in general: the other, a ſlander and depravation of the king's power and honour in this commiſſion.

And for the firſt of theſe, I conſider it again in three degrees: firſt, that he preſumed to cenſure the king's prerogative at all. Secondly, that he runneth into the generality of it more than was pertinent to the preſent queſtion. And laſtly, that he hath erroneouſly, and falſely, and dangerouſly given opinion in derogation of it.

Firſt, I make a great difference between the king's grants and ordinary omiſſions of juſtice, and the king's high commiſſions of regiment, or mixed with cauſes of ſtate.

For the former, there is no doubt but they may be freely queſtioned and diſputed, and any defect in matter or form ſtood upon, though the king be many times the adverſe party.

But for the latter ſort, they are rather to be dealt with, if at all, by a modeſt, and humble intimation or remonſtrance to his majeſty, and his council, than by bravery of diſpute or peremptory oppoſition.

Of this kind is that properly to be underſtood, which is ſaid in Bracton, de chartis et factis regiis non debent, aut poſſunt, juſtitiarii aut privatæ perſonæ diſputare; ſed tutius eſt, ut expectetur ſententia regis.

And the king's courts themſelves have been exceeding tender and ſparing in it; ſo that there is in all our law, not three caſes of it. And in that very caſe of 24 Ed. 3 Aſſ. pl. s. which Mr. Whitelocke vouched, where as it was a commiſſion to arreſt a man, and to carry him to priſon, and to ſeize his goods without any form of juſtice or examination preceding; and that the judges ſaw it was obtained by ſurreption; yet the judges ſaid they would keep it by them, and ſhew it to the king's council.

But Mr. Whitelocke did not adviſe his client to acquaint the king's council with it, but preſumptuouſly giveth opinion, that it is void. Nay, not ſo much as a clauſe or paſſage of modeſty, as that he ſubmits his opinion to cenſure: that it is too great a matter for him to deal in; or this is my opinion, which is nothing, &c. But illotis manibus, he takes it into his hands, and pronounceth of it, as a man would ſcarcely do of a warrant of a juſtice of peace, and ſpeaks like a dictator, that this is law, and this is againſt law, &c.

XVIII. Proceedings againſt MARY Counteſs of SHREWSBURY, before a ſelect Council, for a Contempt in refuſing to anſwer fully before the Privy Council, or to ſubſcribe her Examination. Trin. 10 Jam. I. 1614.

[The occaſion, of examining lady Shrewſbury before the privy council, was her conduct in reſpect to the marriage of lady Stuart. This latter lady was firſt-couſin to James the firſt; for ſhe was the daughter of Charles earl of Lenox, the younger brother of James's father lord Darnley. Her mother was Elizabeth daughter of ſir William Cavendiſh. The counteſs of Shrewſbury was aunt to lady Arabella, being ſiſter to her mother. A marriage took place between lady Arabella and ſir William Seymour, who at the Reſtoration recovered the dukedom of Somerſet for his family. Being a marriage with one ſo nearly related in blood to the king, and without his conſent, it was deemed an offence againſt the royal prerogative, on which account lady Arabella and her huſband were impriſoned; the former in a private houſe at Lambeth, the latter in the Tower. But both eſcaped from their confinement with a view to retire abroad; and the counteſs of Shrewſbury was taken into cuſtody as privy and acceſſary to the eſcape of lady Arabella. On being examined by the privy-council, the counteſs refuſed to diſcover what ſhe knew of the affair of the marriage and eſcape, or to ſubſcribe her examination; and for this refuſal ſhe was brought before a ſelect council, whoſe proceedings on the occaſion are the ſubject of the following caſe.—What we ſhall firſt lay before the reader is lord Coke's account of the caſe, from his twelfth Report. Lord Bacon's ſpeech, which is next given, was firſt printed in the Cabala, but is here taken from the laſt edition of his works, vol. 3. p. 265. For further particulars, relative to the marriage of lady Arabella Stuart, and the proceedings againſt her, ſir William Seymour her huſband, and lady Shrewſbury, the curious reader may conſult Winwood's Memorials of State. See vol. 3. p. 117. 119. 201. 279. 280. 281. 454.

Extract from lord Coke's twelfth Report, ſerjeant Wilſon's edition, page 94.

Trin. 10 Jac. 1.

Of contempts. See 1 Hawk. ch. 21. per tot. ch. 22. ſect. 2, 3, 4. ch. 23. ſect. 1, 2, 3, &c. ch. 24. ſect. 2, 3, 4. 2 Hawk. ch. 10. ſect. 15, 17, 19.

IN this term, before a ſelect council at York-houſe; ſcil. the lord chancellor, the archbiſhop, the duke of Lenox, the earl of Northampton, lord privy ſeal, the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain, the earl of Worceſter, the earl of Pembroke, viſcount Erſkin, viſcount Rochford, the lord Zouch, the lord Knolls, the lord Wootton, the chancellor of the Exchequer, the chancellor of the duchy, Fleming chief juſtice of the King's Bench, Philips maſter of the rolls, Coke chief juſtice of the Common Pleas, and Tanfield chief baron.

The counteſs of Shrewſbury (the wife of Gilbert earl of Shrewſbury) then priſoner in the Tower, was brought before the ſaid lords, and by the attorney and ſolicitor of the king was charged with a high and great contempt of dangerous conſequence; for they declared that the lady Arbella, being of the blood royal, had married Seymour, ſecond ſon of the earl of Hertford, without privity or aſſent of the king, for which contempt the ſaid Seymour was committed to the Tower, and had eſcaped and fled beyond the ſeas; the lady Arbella being under reſtraint eſcaped alſo, and embarked herſelf upon the ſea, and was taken before ſhe got over; of which flight of the ſaid lady Arbella, the ſaid counteſs, being her aunt, very well knew and abetted, as is directly proved by Crompton, and not denied by the lady Arbella: and admit it, that the lady Arbella had no evil intent againſt the king (who had always a great and ſpecial care of her, and was very bountiful unto her, until her marriage with the ſaid Seymour, which was the pomum vetitum:) yet when ſhe fled, and when ſhe ſhould be environed with evil ſpirits, cum perverſis perverti poſſit, and when ſhe ſhall be in another ſphere, ſhe will not move within the ſame orb.

Acceſſorium innocenti.

Q. If illegal? Quid poſſit non eſt.

Quid proſunt legi? And the lords of the privy council, knowing the arcana imperii, did ſhew divers perilous conſequences, and the rather for this, that the ſaid counteſs is an obſtinate popiſh recuſant, and as was ſaid, perverted alſo the lady Arbella.

Now the charge was in two points.

1. That the ſaid counteſs of Shrewſbury, by commandment of the king, being called to the council-table, before the lords of the council at Whitehall, and there being required by the lords to declare her knowledge touching the ſaid points, and to diſcover what ſhe knew concerning them, for the ſafety of the king, and quiet of the realm; ſhe anſwered, that ſhe would not make any particular anſwer; and being again aſked by the king's command by the council at Lambeth, and being charged again to anſwer to the ſaid point, ſhe refuſed for two cauſes.

Univoca æquivoca.

Particulare ad generale.

1. For that ſhe had made a raſh vow that ſhe would not declare any thing in particular touching the ſaid points; and for that (as ſhe ſaid) it was better to obey God than man.
2. She ſtood upon her privilege of nobility, ſcil. to anſwer only when ſhe was called judicially before her peers; for that ſuch privilege was allowed (as ſhe ſaid) to William earl of Pembroke, and to the lord Lumley.

2. The ſecond point of her charge was, that when ſuch anſwer which ſhe had made was put in writing, and read to her, yet ſhe refuſed to ſubſcribe to it.

Which denial to diſcover and diſcharge her conſcience in a caſe which toucheth the ſafety of the king, and quiet of the realm, was urged by the king's council to be a great and high contempt, and that nobility hath not any ſuch privilege as is alleged, nor any ſuch allowance as was ſuppoſed; and that raſh and illegal vows make not an excuſe, and that this precedent being now upon the ſtage, was of very dangerous conſequence: and the ſaid counteſs hearing the charge, yet perſiſted in her obſtinate refuſal, for the ſame reaſons and cauſes upon which ſhe had inſiſted before: and the lord chancellor began, and the archbiſhop, and all the other lords began with the firſt, and adjudged it a great and high contempt, and the lord chancellor ſaid, that that was againſt the law of England, with which all the lords agreed.

And that no ſuch allowance was given to the ſaid earl of Pembroke, or to the lord Lumley in reſpect of their privilege of nobility, but that they were voces populi, & ideo non audiendæ: and the lord archbiſhop principally proved, that as well the contempt, as the ſaid raſh vow was againſt the law of God, which he and the earl of Northampton principally proved by divers texts and examples in holy ſcripture.

And the effect of all that which the three juſtices ſaid, was, that after the ſentences of all the learned, prudent, and honourable perſonages and counſellors of eſtate, they might well be ſilent; but in regard that ſilentium in ſenatu eſt vitium, they would ſpeak ſomething briefly, viz.

That three things in this caſe are to be well conſidered.

1. Whether the refuſals aforeſaid of the ſaid counteſs were offences in law againſt the king, his crown and dignity.
2. What manner of proceeding this is, and whether it was juſtifiable by precedent or reaſon.
3. What is the demerit of the offences, and how puniſhable.

As to the firſt, it was reſolved by the juſtices and maſter of the rolls, that the denying to be examined was a high and great contempt in law, againſt the king, his crown and dignity; and that if it ſhould be permitted, it would be an occaſion of many high and dangerous deſigns againſt the king and the realm, which cannot be diſcovered: and upon hope of impunity it will be an encouragement to offenders, as Fleming juſtice ſaid, to enterprize dangerous attempts. Nemo tenetur, &c.

And the maſter of the rolls ſaid, that it was not any privilege of nobility, to refuſe to be examined in this caſe, no more than of any ſubject.

Alſo, if one that is noble, and a peer of the realm, be ſued in the Star-Chamber, or in Chancery, they ought to anſwer upon their oaths, (a) and may be examined in the Star-Chamber upon interrogatories upon their oaths: and if one who is noble be produced as a witneſs between party and party, he ought to be ſworn, or otherwiſe his teſtimony is of no value; and ſo is the common experience in the ſaid courts: and the chief juſtice ſaid, that foraſmuch as where order is neglected, confuſion will follow, he would recite ſome of the honourable privileges which the law of England (more than any other law) attribute to the nobility of England in legal proceedings; and they will not be impertinent, but give a great light to the caſe now in hand. Quære the ex officio oath 12 Co. 26 27.

(1.) If a baron, viſcount, earl, or other lord of parliament and peer of the realm be plaintiff in any action, and the defendant will plead that the plaintiff is not a baron, viſcount, earl, &c. as he is named in the writ, this ſhall not be tried at the common law by jury, who may be corrupted, nor by witneſſes, as in the Star-Chamber, or Chancery, who may be ſuborned; but it ſhall be tried by the record in Chancery, which imports by itſelf ſolid truth; ſo great regard hath the law to the trial of their honour and dignity, &c. Parliament caſes, 3, &c. 2 Salk. 509, 510.

(2.) Their perſons have many honourable privileges in law.

1. At the ſuit of a ſubject their bodies ſhall not be arreſted, neither capias nor exigent lieth againſt them.

(a) But in 1628, the houſe of lords came to a reſolution, declaring it to be the antient right of the nobility of this kingdom and the lords of the upper houſe of parliament, to anſwer in all courts as defendants upon proteſtation of honour only. Journ. Dom. Proc. 6. May, 1628. This reſolution was in conſequence of an order, made about two years before by the Star-chamber againſt the earl of Lincoln, to anſwer a bill on oath; though this order had paſſed after great deliberation, and was founded on an unanimous opinion of the lords of the privy council, and of all the judges except Doderridge who was abſent. See the earl of Lincoln's caſe, W. Jo. 152. Hutt. 87. Cro. Cha. 64. In 1640, the lords renewed the declaration of this privilege in anſwering as defendants without oath, with an explanation, that it extended to all anſwers and examinations on interrogatories, in all cauſes as well criminal as civil, and in all courts and commiſſions, and alſo to the widows and dowagers of temporal peers. Journ. Dom. Proc. 31. Dec. 1640. The preſent practice of our courts of equity conforms to this order of the lords. EDITOR.

2. For the honour and reverence which the law gives to nobility, their bodies are not ſubject to torture in cauſâ criminis læſæ majeſtatis (a).
3. They are not to be ſworn in aſſiſes, juries, or other inqueſts.
4. If any ſervant of the king, named in the cheque-roll, compaſs or intend to kill any lord of parliament, or other lord of the king's council, this is felony.
5. In the Common Pleas, a lord of parliament ſhall have knights returned on his jury.
6. He ſhall have day of grace.
7. A lord of parliament ſhall not be tried in caſe of treaſon, felony, or miſpriſion of them, but by thoſe who are noble and peers of the realm.
8. In trial of a peer, the lords of parliament ſhall not ſwear, but they give their judgment ſuper fidem et ligeantiam domino regi debitam, ſo that their faith and allegiance ſtands in equipoiſe with an oath in the caſe of a common perſon in trial of life: and the writs of parliament, directed to the lords of parliament, are ſub fide & ligeantia, &c.

And the reaſon and cauſe, that the king gives them many other privileges, is for this, becauſe all honour and nobility is derived from the king as the true fountain: and the king honours with nobility, for two cauſes.

1. Ad conſulendum, and for that reaſon he gives them a robe.
2. Ad defendendum regem et regnum, and for that cauſe he gives them a ſword.

And foraſmuch as they derive their dignities, accompanied with all thoſe honourable privileges, from the king, to deny to anſwer, being required thereto by the king, to ſuch points as concern the ſafety of the king and quiet of the realm, is a high contempt and diſobedience, accompanied with great ingratitude.

This denial is contra ligeantiam ſuam debitam, againſt the faith and allegiance of a perſon noble, due to the king, and which the law greatly eſteems.

And that this denying is againſt her faith and allegiance appears by the ancient oath of allegiance, which is imprinted in the heart of every ſubject, ſcil. ero verus & fidelis, et veritatem præſtabo domino regi de vitâ et membro, et de terreno honore, ad vivendum et moriendum contra omnes gentes, &c. Et ſi cognoſcam aut audiam de aliquo damno aut malo quod domino regi evenire poterit, quod non revelato, &c. And this oath of allegiance is common to all ſubjects, as well thoſe of the nobility as commonalty. But the law hath greater account of the faith and allegiance of a nobleman, than of one of the commons, for this, that the breach of their allegiance is more dangerous to the king and eſtate, for corruptio optimorum eſt peſſima; and for this reaſon, the counteſs by her allegiance was bound, without being demanded, to reveal to the king what ſhe knows concerning the premiſes, upon which great miſchief may happen to the king and the realm. But being commanded by the king to declare her knowledge, the denying of it doth greatly aggravate the offence.

Qui contemnit præceptum, contemnit præcipientem.

Command and obedience are the ligament of government, and ligeantia eſt legis eſſentia; for without allegiance and obedience, the law cannot proceed.

As to the ſecond point, viz. concerning the manner of this proceeding.

1. Privative, it is not to fine and impriſon, or inflict corporal puniſhment upon the counteſs; for fine and impriſonment ought to be aſſeſſed in ſome court judicially.
2. Poſitive, the fine is ad monendum, or at the moſt ad minandum; it is ad inſtruendum non ad deſtruendum.

Vide the earl of Eſſex's caſe, 42 & 43 Eliz. 424.

This ſelected council is to expreſs what puniſhment this offence juſtly deſerved, if it be judicially proceeded within the Star-Chamber; for which reaſon this manner of proceeding is out of the mercy and grace of the king againſt this honourable lady, that ſhe ſeeing her offence may ſubmit herſelf to the king, without any puniſhment in any court judicially.

If ſentence ſhall be given in the Star-Chamber according to juſtice, you the lords ſhall be agents in it: but in this manner according to the mercy of the king, the king is only agent; the law hath put rules and limits to the juſtice of the king, but not unto his mercy, that is tranſcendant and without any limits of the law; et ideo proceſſus iſte eſt regalis plane & rege dignus.

Alſo inaſmuch as the allegiance and obedience of the ſubject, is the beſt flower in his imperial garland, to the intent, that it may neither be blaſted, nor impaired by this dangerous example, to the prejudice of his royal prerogative and poſterity, this proceeding hath been thought neceſſary: and this is fortified by the precedent of the earl of Eſſex, againſt whom ſuch proceedings were in this very place, anno 42 and 43 Eliz. reg.

And as to the laſt point it was reſolved by all quaſi una voce, that if a ſentence ſhould be given in the Star-Chamber judicially, ſhe ſhould be fined twenty thouſand pounds, and impriſoned during the king's pleaſure. Vide 12 Co. 69, &c.

Hoc in terrorem, ſed quære quid inde venit?

(a) It is ſurpriſing, that doctrine ſo reflecting on the law of England ſhould eſcape from one of lord Coke's character. His language as attorney-general at the trials of the earls of Eſſex and Southampton implies the ſame obnoxious tenet. But in his third Inſtitute he gives it as his opinion moſt deciſively, that all tortures of accuſed perſons are contrary to our law; and to prove it cites lord-chancellor Forteſcue's famous book de laudibus legum Angliæ, where he argues for a preference of our law to the civil law from the latter's allowance of torture. 3 Inſt. 35. In the caſe of Felton, for the murder of the duke of Buckingham, the judges were unanimous, that Felton could not be tortured by the rack; for no ſuch puniſhment, ſaid they, is known or allowed by our law. 1 Ruſh. 638. 639. As to the inſtances of torture collected by a moſt reſpectable writer of the preſent time, they only prove an irregularity of practice. Barringt. Ant. Stat. 4th ed. 33. 88. 395. EDITOR.

Speech of ſir Francis Bacon, from vol. 3. of his works, laſt 4to edit. page 265:

YOUR lordſhips do obſerve the nature of this charge: my lady of Shrewſbury, a lady wiſe, and that ought to know what duty requireth, is charged to have refuſed, and to have perſiſted in refuſal to anſwer, and to be examined in a high cauſe of ſtate, being examined by the council-table, which is a repreſentative body of the king. The nature of the cauſe, upon which ſhe was examined, is an eſſential point, which doth aggravate and increaſe this contempt and preſumption; and therefore of neceſſity with that we muſt begin.

How graciouſly and parent-like his majeſty uſed the lady Arabella before ſhe gave him cauſe of indignation, the world knoweth.

My lady notwithſtanding, extremely ill-adviſed, tranſacted the moſt weighty and binding part and action of her life, which is her marriage, without acquainting his majeſty; which had been a neglect even to a mean parent; but being to our ſovereign, and ſhe ſtanding ſo near to his majeſty as ſhe doth, and then chooſing ſuch a condition as it pleaſed her to chooſe, all parties laid together, how dangerous it was, my lady might have read it in the fortune of that houſe wherewith ſhe is matched; for it was not unlike the caſe of Mr. Seymour's grandmother.

The king nevertheleſs ſo remembered he was a king, as he forgot not he was a kinſman, and placed her only ſub libera cuſtodia.

But now did my lady accumulate and heap up this offence with a far greater than the former, by ſeeking to withdraw herſelf out of the king's power into foreign parts.

That this flight or eſcape into foreign parts might have been ſeed of trouble to this ſtate, is a matter whereof the conceit of a vulgar perſon is not uncapable.

For although my lady ſhould have put on a mind to continue her loyalty, as nature and duty did bind her; yet when ſhe was in another ſphere, ſhe muſt have moved in the motion of that orb, and not of the planet itſelf: and God forbid the king's felicity ſhould be ſo little, as he ſhould not have envy and enviers enough in foreign parts.

It is true, if any foreigner had wrought upon this occaſion, I do not doubt but the intent would have been, as the prophet ſaith, they have conceived miſchief, and brought forth a vain thing. But yet your lordſhips know that it is wiſdom in princes, and it is a watch they owe to themſelves and to their people, to ſtop the beginnings of evils, and not to deſpiſe them. Seneca ſaith well, non jam amplius levia ſunt pericula, ſi levia videantur; dangers ceaſe to be light, becauſe by deſpiſing they grow and gather ſtrength.

And accordingly hath been the practice both of the wiſeſt and ſtouteſt princes to hold for matter pregnant of peril, to have any near them in blood to fly into foreign parts. Wherein I will not wander; but take the example of king Henry the ſeventh, a prince not unfit to be paralleled with his majeſty. I mean not the particular of Perkin Warbeck, for he was but an idol or a diſguiſe; but the example I mean, is that of the earl of Suffolk, whom the king extorted from Philip of Auſtria. The ſtory is memorable, that Philip, after the death of Iſabella, coming to take poſſeſſion of his kingdom of Caſtile, which was but matrimonial to his father-in-law Ferdinando of Aragon, was caſt by weather upon the coaſt of Weymouth, where the Italian ſtory ſaith, king Henry uſed him in all things elſe as a prince, but in one thing as a priſoner; for he forced upon him a promiſe to reſtore the earl of Suffolk that was fled into Flanders. And yet this I note was in the 21ſt year of his reign, when the king had a goodly prince at man's eſtate, beſides his daughters, nay, and the whole line of Clarence nearer in title; for that earl of Suffolk was deſcended of a ſiſter of Edward the fourth. So far off did that king take his aim. To this action of ſo deep conſequence, it appeareth, you, my lady of Shrewſbury, were privy, not upon foreign ſuſpicions or ſtrained inferences, but upon vehement preſumptions, now clear and particular teſtimony, as hath been opened to you; ſo as the king had not only reaſon to examine you upon it, but to have proceeded with you upon it as for a great contempt; which if it be reſerved for the preſent, your ladyſhip is to underſtand it aright, that it is not defect of proof, but abundance of grace that is the cauſe of this proceeding; and your ladyſhip ſhall do well to ſee into what danger you have brought yourſelf. All offences conſiſt of the fact which is open, and the intent which is ſecret. This fact of conſpiring in the flight of this lady may bear a hard and gentler conſtruction; if upon overmuch affection to your kinſwoman, gentler; if upon practice or other end, harder. You muſt take heed how you enter into ſuch actions; whereof if the hidden part be drawn unto that which is open, it may be your overthrow; which I ſpeak not by way of charge, but by way of caution.

For that which you are properly charged with, you muſt know that all ſubjects, without diſtinction of degrees, owe to the king tribute and ſervice, not only of their deed and hand, but of their knowledge and diſcovery.

If there be any thing that imports the king's ſervice, they ought themſelves undemanded to impart it; much more if they be called and examined, whether it be of their own fact or of another's, they ought to make direct anſwer. Neither was there ever any ſubject brought in cauſes of eſtate to trial judicial, but firſt he paſſed examination; for examination is the entrance of juſtice in criminal cauſes; it is one of the eyes of the king's politic body; there are but two, information and examination; it may not be endured that one of the lights be put out by your example.

Your excuſes are not worthy your own judgment; raſh vows of lawful things are to be kept, but unlawful vows not; your own divines will tell you ſo. For your examples, they are ſome erroneous traditions. My lord of Pembroke ſpake ſomewhat that he was unlettered, and it was but when he was examined by one private counſellor, to whom he took exception. That of my lord Lumley is a fiction; the preeminences of nobility I would hold with to the laſt grain; but every day's experience is to the contrary. Nay, you may learn duty of lady Arabella herſelf, a lady of the blood, of an higher rank than yourſelf, who declining, and yet that but by requeſt neither, to declare of your fact, yieldeth ingenuouſly to be examined of her own. I do not doubt but by this time you ſee both your own error, and the king's grace in proceeding with you in this manner.

XIX. The Caſe of Mr. OLIVER ST. JOHN, on an Information ore tenus, in the Star-Chamber, 15 April, 1615, for writing and publiſhing a Paper againſt a Benevolence, collected under Letters of the Privy-Council.

[All that we have in print of the proceedings on this caſe is lord Bacon*'s ſpeech as attorney-general and proſecutor. See* 2 Bacon*'s works, laſt 4to edit.* 583. The paper which was the ground of the proſecution is in the Cabala. See page 332, of 2d part, 3d edit. The judgment of the court was that Mr. St. John ſhould pay a fine of 5000 l. and be impriſoned during the king's pleaſure. See the note in 3 Bacon, laſt 4to edit. 267. and the Introduc. to Bac. Lett. by Stevens. p. xxiii. The caſe appears to have been proſecuted with great anxiety; for according to a letter from lord Bacon to the king, lord chancellor Egerton, who from the infirmities of age was then on the point of reſigning the great ſeal, expreſſed a wiſh to attend the hearing, and ſo make it the concluſion of his ſervices. 3 Bac. 264. The grand argument of lord Bacon in favour of the benevolence was, that it was without compulſion. If in the repreſentation of the conduct of a rival and enemy, lord Bacon can be truſted, lord Coke, then chief juſtice of the King's Bench, at firſt gave it as his opinion, that the king could not ſo much as move any of his ſubjects for a benevolence, but afterwards retracted in the Star-Chamber, and there delivered the law in favour of it ſtrongly. Ibid. 483. 274.

In our introductory note to the caſe of impoſitions, benevolences were enumerated as one of the devices of extra-parliamentary taxation. Ante, page 29. As ſuch the ſtatute of 1 R. 3. c. 2. ſtiles them an unlawful invention, and annuls them for ever. But the benevolences, mentioned in this ſtatute, are deſcribed to have been ſo in name only, and to have been taken by coercion. Still therefore it was inſiſted, that gifts to the crown out of parliament, if really voluntary, were lawful. So lord Bacon argued in the following caſe; ſo in the ſame ſenſe lord Coke is ſtated to have declared the law; ſo lord Coke himſelf gives his opinion in his notes on benevolences in the 12th Report; and ſo according to him all the judges reſolved in the 40th of Elizabeth. 12 Co. 119. Lord Coke lays a ſtreſs on the ſtatute of 10 Hen. 7. c. 10. which, after reciting that many of the king's ſubjects had ſeverally granted to him diverſe ſums of money of their free wills and benevolence, and that ſome of theſe were in arrear, provides a remedy for compelling the payment. See Raſtall*'s edit. of the* Statutes. This ſtatute, it muſt be confeſſed, ſeems to give a legiſlative ſanction to ſuch benevolences as were really free offerings. But there is a later ſtatute, with words ſtrongly importing, that benevolences to the crown, though voluntary, cannot regularly be made out of parliament. The ſtatute we mean is the 13 Cha. 2. c. 4. which authoriſes the king to iſſue commiſſions under the great ſeal, for receiving voluntary ſubſcriptions for the ſupply of his occaſions; but limits commoners to 200 l. and peers to 400 l. a-piece, and alſo the time for ſubſcribing, and concludes with declaring, that no commiſſions or aids of this nature can be iſſued out or levied but by authority of parliament. This in effect concurs with lord Coke*'s firſt opinion in Mr.* St. John*'s caſe, as repreſented by lord* Bacon; the aim of the ſtatute being to condemn benevolences by the ſolicitation of commiſſions from the crown, and ſo to ſupply the defect of the ſtatute of Richard the third and of the Petition of Right, both of which point at compulſive benevolences. The inducement to ſuch a declaration of the law probably was an idea, that a formal ſolicitation from the crown muſt neceſſarily operate, on the minds of thoſe to whom it was addreſſed, with an influence almoſt equal to compulſion.—Thus at length it ſeems to be ſettled by the legiſlature, not only that compulſive benevolences are unlawful, but that all commiſſions from the crown to ſollicit and receive voluntary gifts are alſo unconſtitutional.]

Letter from Mr. Oliver St. John to the Mayor of Marlborough, which was the ſubject of the proſecution; taken from the Cabala, 3d edition, part 2. page 332.

AS I think, this kind of benevolence is againſt law, reaſon and religion.

1. The law is in the ſtatute called magna charta, 9 H. 3. cap. 29. that no free-man be any way deſtroy'd, but by laws of the land. Secondly, beſides that the ſaid ſtatute of magna charta is by all princes ſince eſtabliſhed and confirmed, it is, in the ſpecial caſe of voluntary or free grants, enacted and decreed 25 E. 1. cap. 5. that no ſuch be drawn into cuſtom: and cap. 6. that henceforth be taken no ſuch aids, taſks, free grants, or prizes, but by aſſent of all the realm, and for the good of the ſame. And in primo R. 3. cap. 2. that the ſubjects and commons in this realm, from henceforth ſhall in no wiſe be charged by any charge or impoſition called a benevolence, or any ſuch like charge; and that ſuch exactions, called a benevolence, ſhall be damned and annulled for ever.

Firſt, it is not only without, but againſt reaſon, that the commons, in their ſeveral and particulars, ſhould be relievers or ſuppliers of his majeſty's wants, who neither know his wants, nor the ſums that may be raiſed to ſupply the ſame.

Secondly, it is againſt reaſon, that the particular and ſeveral commons, diſtracted, ſhould oppoſe their judgement and diſcretion to the judgement and diſcretion of the wiſdom of their land aſſembled in parliament, who have there denied any ſuch aid.

It argueth in us want of love and due reſpect of our ſovereign lord and king, which ought to be in every of us towards each other, which is, to ſtay every one which we ſee falling, and reduce the current. What proſperity can be expected to befall either our king or nation, when the king ſhall, haply out of ignorance, or ('tis I hope) out of forgetfulneſs or headineſs, commit ſo great a ſin againſt his God, as is the violating of his great and ſolemn oath taken at his coronation, for the maintaining of his lawes, liberties and cuſtoms of this noble realm; and his ſubjects, ſome for fear, ſome in pride, ſome to pleaſe others, ſhall joyn hands to forward ſo unhappy an atchievement? Can he any way more highly offend the divine majeſty (whom he then invocated?) As alſo, can he then give unto another Hen. 4. (if ſuch an one ſhould riſe up, which God forbid) a greater advantage? Let thoſe articles put up againſt R. 2. be looked on, it will appear, that the breach of laws, infringing the liberties, and failing in this oath, were the main blemiſhes wherewith he could diſtain and ſpot the honour of that good and gentle prince; who indeed was rather by others abuſed, than of himſelf miſchievouſly any way diſpoſed.

2. As very irreligiouſly and uncharitably, we help forward the king's majeſty in that grievous ſin of perjury; ſo into what an helliſh danger we plunge ourſelves, even ſo many of us as contribute, is to be learned out of the ſeveral curſes and ſentences of excommunication given out againſt all ſuch givers, and, namely, the two following, viz. the great curſe given out, the 36 H. 3. againſt all breakers of the liberties and cuſtoms of the realm of England, with their abettors, councellours and executioners; wherein, by the ſentence of Boniface archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the chief part of all the biſhops of this land, are ipſo facto excommunicated. And that of 24 Ed. 1. denounced immediately upon the acts made againſt ſuch benevolence, free grants and impoſitions, had, and taken without common aſſent; which, becauſe it is not ſo large as that former, I will ſet down as our books deliver the ſame.

"In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, Amen. Whereas our ſovereign lord the king, to the honour of God, and of the holy church, and for the common profit of the realm, hath granted, for him and his heirs for ever, theſe articles above written: Robert archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate of all England, admoniſh'd all his province, once, twice, and thrice, becauſe that ſhortneſs will not ſuffer ſo much delay, as to give knowledge to all the people of England of theſe preſents in writing. We, therefore, enjoyn all perſons, of what eſtate ſoever they be, that they, and every of them, as much as in them is, ſhall uphold and maintain thoſe articles granted by our ſovereign lord the king in all points; and all thoſe that, in any point, do reſiſt, or break thoſe ordinances, or go about it by word or deed, openly or privately, by any manner of pretence or colour. We therefore, the ſaid archbiſhop, by our authority in writing expreſſed, do excommunicate and accurſe, and from the body of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and from all the company of Heaven, and from all the ſacraments of the holy church, do ſequeſter and exclude."

Sir, hearing that to-morrow the juſtices will be here about this buſie work of benevolence, wherein you have both ſent unto, and talked with me, and thinking that it may be, you would deliver up the names of the non-givers: foraſmuch as, I think, I ſhall ſcarcely be at home to make my further anſwer, if I ſhould be called for, I pray you, both hereby to underſtand my mind yourſelf, and if cauſe ſo require, to let the juſtices perceive as much. So leaving others to their own conſciences, whereby in that laſt and dreadful day they ſhall ſtand or fall before him who will reward every man according to his deeds, I commend you to the grace of the Almighty, and reſt

Your loving neighbour and friend,

Oliver St. John.

Speech of ſir Francis Bacon as attorney-general, addreſſed to the court of Star-Chamber, from his works, vol. 2. p. 583.

My lords,

I SHALL inform you ore tenus, againſt this gentleman Mr. I. S. a gentleman, as it ſeems, of an ancient houſe and name; but, for the preſent, I can think of him by no other name, than the name of a great offender. The nature and quality of his offence, in ſum, is this. This gentleman hath, upon advice, not ſuddenly by his pen, nor by the ſlip of his tongue; not privately, or in a corner, but publicly, as it were, to the face of the king's miniſters and juſtices, ſlandered and traduced the king our ſovereign, the law of the land, the parliament, and infinite particulars of his majeſty's worthy and loving ſubjects. Nay, the ſlander is of that nature, that it may ſeem to intereſt the people in grief and diſcontent againſt the ſtate: whence might have enſued matter of murmur and ſedition. So that it is not a ſimple ſlander, but a ſeditious ſlander, like to that the poet ſpeaketh of,—calamoſque armare veneno. A venomous dart that hath both iron and poiſon.

To open to your lordſhips the true ſtate of this offence, I will ſet before you, firſt, the occaſion whereupon Mr. I. S. wrought: then the offence itſelf in his own words: and laſtly, the points of his charge.

My lords, you may remember that there was the laſt parliament an expectation to have had the king ſupplied with treaſure, although the event failed. Herein it is not fit for me to give opinion of an houſe of parliament, but I will give teſtimony of truth in all places. I ſerved in the lower houſe, and I obſerved ſomewhat. This I do affirm, that I never could perceive but that there was in that houſe a general diſpoſition to give, and to give largely. The clocks in the houſe perchance might differ; ſome went too faſt, ſome went too ſlow; but the diſpoſition to give was general: ſo that I think I may truly ſay, ſolo tempore lapſus amor.

This accident happening thus beſides expectation, it ſtirred up and awaked in divers of his majeſty's worthy ſervants and ſubjects of the clergy, the nobility, the court, and others here near at hand, an affection loving and chearful, to preſent the king ſome with plate, ſome with money, as free-will offerings, a thing that God Almighty loves, a chearful giver: what an evil eye doth I know not. And, my lords, let me ſpeak it plainly unto you: God forbid any body ſhould be ſo wretched as to think that the obligation of love and duty, from the ſubject to the king, ſhould be joint and not ſeveral. No, my lords, it is both. The ſubject petitioneth to the king in parliament. He petitioneth likewiſe out of parliament. The king on the other ſide gives graces to the ſubject in parliament: he gives them likewiſe, and poureth them upon his people out of parliament; and ſo no doubt the ſubject may give to the king in parliament, and out of parliament. It is true the parliament is intercurſus magnus, the great intercourſe and main current of graces and donatives from the king to the people, from the people to the king: but parliaments are held but at certain times; whereas the paſſages are always open for particulars; even as you ſee great rivers have their tides, but particular ſprings and fountains run continually.

To proceed therefore: as the occaſion, which was the failing of ſupply by parliament, did awake the love and benevolence of thoſe that were at hand to give; ſo it was apprehended and thought fit by my lords of the council to make a proof whether the occaſion and example both, would not awake thoſe in the country of the better ſort to follow. Whereupon, their lordſhips deviſed and directed letters unto the ſheriffs and juſtices, which declared what was done here above, and wiſhed that the country might be moved, eſpecially men of value.

Now, my lords, I beſeech you give me favour and attention to ſet forth and obſerve unto you five points. I will number them, becauſe other men may note them; and I will but touch them, becauſe they ſhall not be drowned or loſt in diſcourſe, which I hold worthy the obſervation, for the honour of the ſtate and confuſion of ſlanderers; whereby it will appear moſt evidently what care was taken, that that which was then done might not have the effect, no nor the ſhew, no nor ſo much as the ſhadow of a tax; and that it was ſo far from breeding or bringing in any ill precedent or example, as contrariwiſe it is a corrective that doth correct and allay the harſhneſs and danger of former examples.

The firſt is, that what was done was done immediately after ſuch a parliament, as made general profeſſion to give, and was interrupted by accident: ſo as you may truly and juſtly eſteem it, tanquam poſthuma proles parliamenti, as an after-child of the parliament, and in purſuit, in ſome ſmall meaſure, of the firm intent of a parliament paſt. You may take it alſo, if you will, as an advance or proviſional help until a future parliament; or as a gratification ſimply without any relation to a parliament; you can no ways take it amiſs.

The ſecond is, that it wrought upon example, as a thing not deviſed or projected, or required; no nor ſo much as recommended, until many, that were never moved nor dealt with, ex mero motu, had freely and frankly ſent in their preſents. So that the letters were rather like letters of news, what was done at London, than otherwiſe: and we know exempla ducunt, non trahunt; examples they do but lead, they do not draw nor drive.

The third is, that it was not done by commiſſion under the great ſeal; a thing warranted by a multitude of precedents, both ancient, and of late time, as you ſhall hear anon, and no doubt warranted by law: ſo that the commiſſions be of that ſtile and tenour, as that they be to move and not to levy: but this was done by letters of the council, and no higher hand or form.

The fourth is, that theſe letters had no manner of ſhew of any binding act of ſtate: for they contain not any ſpecial frame or direction how the buſineſs ſhould be managed; but were written as upon truſt, leaving the matter wholly to the induſtry and confidence of thoſe in the country; ſo that it was an abſque compoto; ſuch a form of letters as no man could fitly be called to account upon.

The fifth and laſt point is, that the whole carriage of the buſineſs had no circumſtance compulſory. There was no proportion or rate ſet down, not ſo much as by way of a wiſh; there was no menace of any that ſhould deny; no reproof of any that did deny; no certifying of the names of any that had denied. Indeed, if men could not content themſelves to deny, but that they muſt cenſure and inveigh, nor to excuſe themſelves, but they muſt accuſe the ſtate, that is another caſe. But I ſay, for denying, no man was apprehended, no nor noted. So that I verily think, that there is none ſo ſubtle a diſputer in the controverſy of liberum arbitrium, that can with all his diſtinctions faſten or carp upon the act, but that there was free-will in it.

I conclude therefore, my lords, that this was a true and pure benevolence; not an impoſition called a benevolence, which the ſtatute ſpeaks of; as you ſhall hear by one of my fellows. There is a great difference, I tell you, though Pilate would not ſee it, between rex Judæorum, and ſe dicens regem Judæorum. And there is a great difference between a benevolence and an exaction called a benevolence, which the duke of Buckingham ſpeaks of in his oration to the city; and defineth it to be not what the ſubject of his good-will would give, but what the king of his good-will would take. But this, I ſay, was a benevolence wherein every man had a prince's prerogative, a negative voice; and this word, excuſe moy, was a plea peremptory. And therefore I do wonder how Mr. I. S. could foul or trouble ſo clear a fountain. Certainly it was but his own bitterneſs and unſound humours.

Now to the particular charge. Amongſt other countries, theſe letters of the lords came to the juſtices of D—ſhire, who ſignified the contents thereof, and gave directions and appointments for meetings concerning the buſineſs, to ſeveral towns and places within that county: and amongſt the reſt, notice was given unto the town of A. The mayor of A. conceiving that this Mr. I. S. being a principal perſon, and a dweller in that town, was a man likely to give both money and good example, dealt with him to know his mind. He intending, as it ſeems, to play prizes, would give no anſwer to the mayor in private, but would take time. The next day then being an appointment of the juſtices to meet, he takes occaſion, or pretends occaſion to be abſent, becauſe he would bring his papers upon the ſtage: and thereupon takes pen in hand, and inſtead of excuſing himſelf, ſits down and contriveth a ſeditious and libellous accuſation againſt the king and ſtate, which your lordſhips ſhall now hear, and ſends it to the mayor: and withal, becauſe the feather of his quill might fly abroad, he gives authority to the mayor to impart it to the juſtices, if he ſo thought good. And now, my lords, becauſe I will not miſtake or miſ-repeat, you ſhall hear the ſeditious libel in the proper terms and words thereof.

[Here the papers were read.]

My lords, I know this paper offends your ears much, and the ears of any good ſubject; and ſorry I am that the times ſhould produce offences of this nature: but ſince they do, I would be more ſorry they ſhould be paſſed without ſevere puniſhment: non tradite factum, as the verſe ſays, altered a little, aut ſi tradatis, facti quoque tradite pœnam. If any man have a mind to diſcourſe of the fact, let him likewiſe diſcourſe of the puniſhment of the fact.

In this writing, my lords, there appears a monſter with four heads, of the progeny of him that is the father of lyes, and takes his name from ſlander.

The firſt is a wicked and ſeditious ſlander; or, if I ſhall uſe the ſcripture phraſe, a blaſpheming of the king himſelf; ſetting him forth for a prince perjured in the great and ſolemn oath of his coronation, which is as it were the knot of the diadem; a prince that ſhould be a violator and infringer of the liberties, laws, and cuſtoms of the kingdom; a mark for an Henry the fourth; a match for a Richard the ſecond.

The ſecond is a ſlander and falſification, and wreſting of the law of the land groſs and palpable: it is truly ſaid by a civilian, tortura legum peſſima, the torture of laws is worſe than the torture of men.

The third is a ſlander and falſe charge of the parliament, that they had denied to give to the king; a point of notorious untruth.

And the laſt is a ſlander and taunting of an infinite number of the king's loving ſubjects, that have given towards this benevolence and free contribution; charging them as acceſſary and co-adjutors to the king's perjury. Nay, you leave us not there, but you take upon you a pontifical habit, and couple your ſlander with a curſe; but thanks be to God we have learned ſufficiently out of the ſcripture, that as the bird flies away, ſo the cauſeleſs curſe ſhall not come.

For the firſt of theſe, which concerns the king, I have taken to myſelf the opening and aggravation thereof; the other three I have diſtributed to my fellows.

My lords, I cannot but enter into this part with ſome wonder and aſtoniſhment, how it ſhould come into the heart of a ſubject of England to vapour forth ſuch a wicked and venomous ſlander againſt the king, whoſe goodneſs and grace is comparable, if not incomparable, unto any of the kings his progenitors. This therefore gives me a juſt and neceſſary occaſion to do two things: the one, to make ſome repreſentation of his majeſty; ſuch as truly he is found to be in his government, which Mr. I. S. chargeth with violation of laws and liberties: the other, to ſearch and open the depth of Mr. I. S. his offence. Both which I will do briefly; becauſe the one, I cannot expreſs ſufficiently; and the other, I will not preſs too far.

My lords, I mean to make no panegyric or laudative; the king delights not in it, neither am I fit for it: but if it were but a counſellor or nobleman, whoſe name had ſuffered, and were to receive ſome kind of reparation in this high court, I would do him that duty as not to paſs his merits and juſt attributes, eſpecially ſuch as are limited with the preſent caſe, in ſilence: for it is fit to burn incenſe where evil odours have been caſt and raiſed. Is it ſo that king James ſhall be ſaid to be a violator of the liberties, laws, and cuſtoms of his kingdoms? Or is he not rather a noble and conſtant protector and conſervator of them all? I conceive this conſiſteth in maintaining religion and the true church; in maintaining the laws of the kingdom, which is the ſubject's birth-right; in temperate uſe of the prerogative; in due and free adminiſtration of juſtice, and conſervation of the peace of the land.

For religion, we muſt ever acknowledge in the firſt place, that we have a king that is the principal conſervator of true religion through the Chriſtian world. He hath maintained it not only with ſceptre and ſword, but likewiſe by his pen; wherein alſo he is potent.

He hath awaked and re-authorized the whole party of the reformed religion throughout Europe; which through the inſolency and divers artifices and inchantments of the adverſe part, was grown a little dull and dejected: he hath ſummoned the fraternity of kings to enfranchiſe themſelves from the uſurpation of the ſee of Rome: he hath made himſelf a mark of contradiction for it.

Neither can I omit, when I ſpeak of religion, to remember that excellent act of his majeſty, which though it were done in a foreign country, yet the church of God is one, and the contagion of theſe things will ſoon paſs ſeas and lands: I mean, in his conſtant and holy proceeding againſt the heretic Vorſtius, whom, being ready to enter into the chair, and there to have authorized one of the moſt peſtilent and heatheniſh hereſies that ever was begun, his majeſty by his conſtant oppoſition diſmounted and pulled down. And I am perſuaded there ſits in this court one whom God doth the rather bleſs for being his majeſty's inſtrument in that ſervice.

I cannot remember religion and the church, but I muſt think of the ſeed-plots of the ſame, which are the univerſities. His majeſty, as for learning amongſt kings, he is incomparable in his perſon; ſo likewiſe hath he been in his government a benign or benevolent planet towards learning: by whoſe influence thoſe nurſeries and gardens of learning, the univerſities, were never more in flower nor fruit.

For the maintaining of the laws, which is the hedge and fence about the liberty of the ſubject, I may truly affirm it was never in better repair. He doth concur with the votes of the nobles; nolumus leges Angliæ mutare. He is an enemy of innovation. Neither doth the univerſality of his own knowledge carry him to neglect or paſs over the very forms of the laws of the land. Neither was there ever king, I am perſuaded, that did conſult ſo oft with his judges, as my lords that ſit here know well. The judges are a kind of council of the king's by oath and ancient inſtitution; but he uſeth them ſo indeed; he confers regularly with them upon their returns from their viſitations and circuits: he gives them liberty, both to inform him, and to debate matters with him; and in the fall and concluſion commonly relies on their opinions.

As for the uſe of the prerogative, it runs within the ancient channels and banks. Some things that were conceived to be in ſome proclamations, commiſſions, and patents, as overflows, have been by his wiſdom and care reduced; whereby, no doubt, the main channel of his prerogative is ſo much the ſtronger. For evermore overflows do hurt the channel.

As for adminiſtration of juſtice between party and party, I pray obſerve theſe points. There is no news of great ſeal or ſignet that flies abroad for countenance or delay of cauſes; protections rarely granted, and only upon great ground, or by conſent. My lords here of the council and the king himſelf meddle not, as hath been uſed in former times, with matters of meum and tuum, except they have apparent mixture with matters of eſtate, but leave them to the king's courts of law or equity. And for mercy and grace, without which there is no ſtanding before juſtice, we ſee, the king now hath reigned twelve years in his white robe, without almoſt any aſperſion of the crimſon dye of blood. There ſits my lord Hobart, that ſerved attorney ſeven years. I ſerved with him. We were ſo happy, as there paſſed not through our hands any one arraignment for treaſon; and but one for any capital offence, which was that of the lord Sanquhar; the nobleſt piece of juſtice, one of them, that ever came forth in any king's time.

As for penal laws, which lie as ſnares upon the ſubjects, and which were as a nemo ſcit to king Henry VII; it yields a revenue that will ſcarce pay for the parchment of the king's records at Weſtminſter.

And laſtly for peace, we ſee manifeſtly his majeſty bears ſome reſemblance of that great name, a prince of peace: he hath preſerved his ſubjects during his reign in peace, both within and without. For the peace with ſtates abroad, we have it uſque ad ſatietatem: and for peace in the lawyers phraſe, which count treſpaſſes, and forces, and riots, to be contra pacem; let me give your lordſhips this token or taſte, that this court, where they ſhould appear, had never leſs to do. And certainly there is no better ſign of omnia bene, than when this court is in a ſtill.

But, my lords, this is a ſea of matter; and therefore I muſt give it over, and conclude, that there was never king reigned in this nation that did better keep covenant in preſerving the liberties and procuring the good of his people: ſo that I muſt needs ſay for the ſubjects of England, as no doubt they do both know and acknowledge it; whatſoever a few turbulent diſcourſes may, through the lenity of the time, take boldneſs to ſpeak.

O fortunatos nimium ſua ſi bona nôrint;

And as for this particular, touching the benevólence, wherein Mr. I. S. doth aſſign this breach of covenant, I leave it to others to tell you what the king may do, or what other kings have done; but I have told you what our king and my lords have done: which, I ſay and ſay again, is ſo far from introducing a new precedent, as it doth rather correct, and mollify, and qualify former precedents.

Now, Mr. I. S. let me tell you your fault in few words: for that I am perſuaded you ſee it already, though I woo no man's repentance; but I ſhall, as much as in me is, cheriſh it where I find it. Your offence hath three parts knit together:

Your ſlander,
Your menace, and
Your compariſon.

For your ſlander, it is no leſs than that the king is perjured in his coronation oath. No greater offence than perjury; no greater oath than that of a coronation. I leave it; it is too great to aggravate.

Your menace, that if there were a Bullingbroke, or I cannot tell what, there were matter for him, is a very ſeditious paſſage. You know well, that howſoever Henry the fourth's act, by a ſecret providence of God, prevailed, yet it was but an uſurpation; and if it were poſſible for ſuch a one to be this day, wherewith it ſeems your dreams are troubled, I do not doubt, his end would be upon the block; and that he would ſooner have the ravens ſit upon his head at London-Bridge, than the crown at Weſtminſter. And it is not your interlacing of your 'God forbid,' that will ſalve theſe ſeditious ſpeeches: neither could it be a forewarning, becauſe the matter was paſt and not revocable, but a very ſtirring up and incenſing of the people. If I ſhould ſay to you, for example, 'if 'theſe times were like ſome former times, of king Henry VIII. or ſome 'other times which God forbid, Mr. I. S. it would coſt you your life;' I am ſure you would not think this to be a gentle warning, but rather that I incenſed the court againſt you.

And for your compariſon with Richard II. I ſee, you follow the example of them that brought him upon the ſtage, and into print, in queen Elizabeth's time, a moſt prudent and admirable queen. But let me intreat you, that when you will ſpeak of queen Elizabeth or king James, you would compare them to king Henry VII. or king Edward I. or ſome other parallels, to which they are alike. And this I would wiſh both you and all to take heed of, how you ſpeak ſeditious matter in parables, or by tropes or examples. There is a thing in an indictment called an inuendo; you muſt beware how you beckon or make ſigns upon the king in a dangerous ſenſe. But I will contain myſelf and preſs this no farther. I may hold you for turbulent or preſumptuous; but I hope you are not diſloyal: you are graciouſly and mercifully dealt with. And therefore having now opened to my lords, and, as I think, to your own heart and conſcience, the principal part of your offence, which concerns the king, I leave the reſt, which concerns the law, parliament, and the ſubjects that have given, to Mr. Serjeant and Mr. Solicitor.

XX. The Caſe of Duels; or Proceedings in the Star-Chamber, againſt Mr. WILLIAM PRIEST for writing and ſending a Challenge, and Mr. RICHARD WRIGHT for carrying it, 26 Jan. 11 Jam. I. 1615.

Charge of ſir Francis Bacon, the king's attorney-general.

My lords,

I THOUGHT it fit for my place, and for theſe times, to bring to hearing before your lordſhips ſome cauſe touching private duels, to ſee if this court can do any good to tame and reclaim that evil, which ſeems unbridled. And I could have wiſhed that I had met with ſome greater perſons, as a ſubject for your cenſure; both becauſe it had been more worthy of this preſence, and alſo the better to have ſhewed the reſolution myſelf hath to proceed without reſpect of perſons in this buſineſs. But finding this cauſe on foot in my predeceſſor's time, and publiſhed and ready for hearing, I thought to loſe no time in a miſchief that groweth every day: and beſides, it paſſes not amiſs ſometimes in government, that the greater ſort be admoniſhed by an example made in the meaner, and the dog to be beaten before the lion. Nay, I ſhould think, my lords, that men of birth and quality will leave the practice, when it begins to be vilified, and come ſo low as to barber-ſurgeons and butchers, and ſuch baſe mechanical perſons.

And for the greatneſs of this preſence, in which I take much comfort, both as I conſider it in itſelf, and much more in reſpect it is by his majeſty's direction, I will ſupply the meanneſs of the particular cauſe, by handling of the general point: to the end, that by the occaſion of this preſent cauſe, both my purpoſe of proſecution againſt duels, and the opinion of the court, without which I am nothing, for the cenſure of them, may appear, and thereby offenders in that kind may read their own caſe, and know what they are to expect; which may ſerve for a warning until example may be made in ſome greater perſon: which I doubt the times will but too ſoon afford.

Therefore before I come to the particular, whereof your lordſhips are now to judge, I think it time beſt ſpent to ſpeak ſomewhat.

Firſt, of the nature and greatneſs of this miſchief.

Secondly, of the cauſes and remedies.

Thirdly, of the juſtice of the law of England, which ſome ſtick not to think defective in this matter.

Fourthly, of the capacity of this court, where certainly the remedy of this miſchief is beſt to be found.

And fifthly, touching mine own purpoſe and reſolution, wherein I ſhall humbly crave your lordſhips aid and aſſiſtance.

For the miſchief itſelf, it may pleaſe your lordſhips to take into your conſideration, that when revenge is once extorted out of the magiſtrates hands, contrary to God's ordinance, mihi vindicta, ego retribuam, and every man ſhall bear the ſword, not to defend, but to aſſail; and private men begin once to preſume to give law to themſelves, and to right their own wrongs; no man can foreſee the danger and inconveniencies that may ariſe and multiply thereupon. It may cauſe ſudden ſtorms in court, to the diſturbance of his majeſty, and unſafety of his perſon. It may grow from quarrels to bandying, and from bandying to trooping, and ſo to tumult and commotion; from particular perſons to diſſenſion of families and alliances; yea, to national quarrels, according to the infinite variety of accidents, which fall not under foreſight. So that the ſtate by this means ſhall be like to a diſtempered and imperfect body, continually ſubject to inflammations and convulſions.

Beſides, certainly, both in divinity and in policy, offences of preſumption are the greateſt. Other offences yield and conſent to the law that it is good, not daring to make defence, or to juſtify themſelves; but this offence expreſsly gives the law an affront, as if there were two laws, one a kind of gown-law, and the other a law of reputation, as they term it. So that Paul's and Weſtminſter, the pulpit and the courts of juſtice, muſt give place to the law, as the king ſpeaketh in his proclamation, of ordinary tables, and ſuch reverend aſſemblies: the year-books and ſtatute-books muſt give place to ſome French and Italian pamphlets, which handle the doctrine of duels, which if they be in the right, tranſeamus ad illa, let us receive them, and not keep the people in conflict and diſtraction between two laws.

Again, my lords, it is a miſerable effect, when young men full of towardneſs and hope, ſuch as the poets call Auroræ filii, ſons of the morning, in whom the expectation and comfort of their friends conſiſteth, ſhall be caſt away and deſtroyed in ſuch a vain manner. But much more it is to be deplored when ſo much noble and genteel blood ſhould be ſpilt upon ſuch follies, as, if it were adventured in the field in ſervice of the king and realm, were able to make the fortune of a day, and to change the fortune of a kingdom. So as your lordſhips ſee what a deſperate evil this is; it troubleth peace; it diſ-furniſheth war; it bringeth calamity upon private men, peril upon the ſtate, and contempt upon the law.

Touching the cauſes of it; the firſt motive, no doubt, is a falſe and erroneous imagination of honour and credit; and therefore the king, in his laſt proclamation, doth moſt aptly and excellently call them bewitching duels. For, if one judge of it truly, it is no better than a ſorcery that enchanteth the ſpirits of young men, that bear great minds with a falſe ſhew, ſpecies falſa; and a kind of ſatanical illuſion and apparition of honour againſt religion, againſt law, againſt moral virtue, and againſt the precedents and examples of the beſt times and valianteſt nations; as I ſhall tell you by and by, when I ſhall ſhew you that the law of England is not alone in this point.

But then the ſeed of this miſchief being ſuch, it is nouriſhed by vain diſcourſes, and green and unripe conceits, which nevertheleſs have ſo prevailed, as though a man were ſtaid and ſober-minded, and a right believer touching the vanity and unlawfulneſs of theſe duels; yet the ſtream of vulgar opinion is ſuch, as it impoſeth a neceſſity upon men of value to conform themſelves, or elſe there is no living or looking upon mens faces: ſo that we have not to do, in this caſe, ſo much with particular perſons, as with unſound and depraved opinions, like the dominations and ſpirits of the air which the ſcripture ſpeaketh of.

Hereunto may be added, that men have almoſt loſt the true notion and underſtanding of fortitude and valour. For fortitude diſtinguiſheth of the grounds of quarrels whether they be juſt; and not only ſo, but whether they be worthy; and ſetteth a better price upon mens lives than to beſtow them idly. Nay, it is weakneſs and diſ-eſteem of a man's ſelf, to put a man's life upon ſuch liedger performances. A man's life is not to be trifled away: it is to be offered up and ſacrificed to honourable ſervices, public merits, good cauſes, and noble adventures. It is in expence of blood as it is in expence of money. It is no liberality to make a profuſion of money upon every vain occaſion; nor no more it is fortitude to make effuſion of blood, except the cauſe be of worth. And thus much for the cauſes of this evil.

For the remedies, I hope ſome great and noble perſon will put his hand to this plough, and I wiſh that my labours of this day may be but forerunners to the work of a higher and better hand. But yet to deliver my opinion as may be proper for this time and place, there be four things that I have thought on, as the moſt effectual for the repreſſing of this depraved cuſtom of particular combats.

The firſt is, that there do appear and be declared a conſtant and ſettled reſolution in the ſtate to aboliſh it. For this is a thing, my lords, muſt go down at once, or not at all; for then every particular man will think himſelf acquitted in his reputation, when he ſees that the ſtate takes it to heart, as an inſult againſt the king's power and authority, and thereupon hath abſolutely reſolved to maſter it; like unto that which was ſet down in expreſs words in the edict of Charles IX. of France touching duels, that the king himſelf took upon him the honour of all that took themſelves grieved or intereſted for not having performed the combat. So muſt the ſtate do in this buſineſs; and in my conſcience there is none that is but of a reaſonable ſober diſpoſition, be he never ſo valiant, except it be ſome furious perſon that is like a firework, but will be glad of it, when he ſhall ſee the law and rule of ſtate diſintereſt him of a vain and unneceſſary hazard.

Secondly, care muſt be taken that this evil be no more cockered, nor the humour of it fed; wherein I humbly pray your lordſhips, that I may ſpeak my mind freely, and yet be underſtood aright. The proceedings of the great and noble commiſſioners martial I honour and reverence much, and of them I ſpeak not in any ſort. But I ſay the compounding of quarrels, which is otherwiſe in uſe by private noblemen and gentlemen, it is ſo punctual, and hath ſuch reference and reſpect unto the received conceits, what's before-hand, and what's behind-hand, and I cannot tell what, as without all queſtion it doth, in a faſhion, countenance and authorize this practice of duels, as if it had in it ſomewhat of right.

Thirdly, I muſt acknowledge, that I learned out of the king's laſt proclamation, the moſt prudent and beſt applied remedy for this offence, if it ſhall pleaſe his majeſty to uſe it, that the wit of man can deviſe. This offence, my lords, is grounded upon a falſe conceit of honour; and therefore it would be puniſhed in the ſame kind, in eo quis rectiſſime plectitur, in quo peccat. The fountain of honour is the king and his aſpect, and the acceſs to his perſon continueth honour in life, and to be baniſhed from his preſence is one of the greateſt eclipſes of honour that can be. If his majeſty ſhall be pleaſed that when this court ſhall cenſure any of theſe offences in perſons of eminent quality, to add this out of his own power and diſcipline, that theſe perſons ſhall be baniſhed and excluded from his court for certain years, and the courts of his queen and prince, I think there is no man, that hath any good blood in him, will commit an act that ſhall caſt him into that darkneſs, that he may not behold his ſovereign's face.

Laſtly, and that which more properly concerneth this court: we ſee, my lords, the root of this offence is ſtubborn; for it deſpiſeth death, which is the utmoſt of puniſhments; and it were a juſt but a miſerable ſeverity, to execute the law without all remiſſion or mercy, where the caſe proveth capital. And yet the late ſeverity in France was more, where, by a kind of martial law, eſtabliſhed by ordinance of the king and parliament, the party that had ſlain another was preſently had to the gibbet, inſomuch as gentlemen of great quality were hanged, their wounds bleeding, leſt a natural death ſhould prevent the example of juſtice. But, my lords, the courſe which we ſhall take is of far greater lenity, and yet of no leſs efficacy; which is to puniſh, in this court, all the middle acts and proceedings which tend to the duel, which I will enumerate to you anon, and ſo to hew and vex the root in the branches, which, no doubt, in the end will kill the root, and yet prevent the extremity of law.

Now for the law of England, I ſee it excepted to, though ignorantly, in two points.

The one, that it ſhould make no difference between an inſidious and foul murder, and the killing of a man upon fair terms, as they now call it.

The other, that the law hath not provided ſufficient puniſhment, and reparations, for contumely of words, as the lye, and the like.

But theſe are no better than childiſh novelties againſt the divine law, and againſt all laws in effect, and againſt the examples of all the braveſt and moſt virtuous nations of the world.

For firſt, for the law of God, there is never to be found any difference made in homicide, but between homicide voluntary, and involuntary, which we term miſadventure. And for the caſe of miſadventure itſelf, there were cities of refuge; ſo that the offender was put to his flight, and that flight was ſubject to accident, whether the revenger of blood ſhould overtake him before he had gotten ſanctuary or no. It is true that our law hath made a more ſubtle diſtinction between the will inflamed and the will adviſed, between manſlaughter in heat and murder upon prepenſed malice or cold blood, as the ſoldiers call it; an indulgence not unfit for a choleric and warlike nation; for it is true, ira furor brevis, a man in fury is not himſelf. This privilege of paſſion the ancient Roman law reſtrained, but to a caſe: that was, if the huſband took the adulterer in the manner. To that rage and provocation only it gave way, that an homicide was juſtifiable. But for a difference to be made in caſe of killing and deſtroying man, upon a fore-thought purpoſe, between foul and fair, and as it were between ſingle murder and vied murder, it is but a monſtrous child of this latter age, and there is no ſhadow of it in any law divine or human. Only it is true, I find in the ſcripture that Cain inticed his brother into the field and ſlew him treacherouſly; but Lamech vaunted of his manhood, that he would kill a young man, and if it were to his hurt: ſo as I ſee no difference between an inſidious murder and a braving or preſumptuous murder, but the difference between Cain and Lamech.

As for examples in civil ſtates, all memory doth conſent, that Græcia and Rome were the moſt valiant and generous nations of the world; and, that which is more to be noted, they were free eſtates, and not under a monarchy; whereby a man would think it a great deal the more reaſon that particular perſons ſhould have righted themſelves. And yet they had not this practice of duels, nor any thing that bare ſhew thereof: and ſure they would have had it, if there had been any virtue in it. Nay, as he ſaith, fas eſt et ab hoſte doceri. It is memorable, that is reported by a counſellor ambaſſador of the emperor's, touching the cenſure of the Turks of theſe duels. There was a combat of this kind performed by two perſons of quality of the Turks, wherein one of them was ſlain, the other party was convented before the council of baſhaws. The manner of the reprehenſion was in theſe words. 'How durſt you undertake to fight 'one with the other? Are there not Chriſtians enough to kill? Did you 'not know that whether of you ſhall be ſlain, the loſs would be the 'great ſeignior's?' So as we may ſee that the moſt warlike nations, whether generous or barbarous, have ever deſpiſed this wherein now men glory.

It is true, my lords, that I find combats of two natures authorized, how juſtly I will not diſpute as to the latter of them.

The one, when upon the approaches of armies in the face one of the other, particular perſons have made challenges for trial of valours in the field upon the publick quarrel.

This the Romans called pugna per provocationem. And this was never, but either between the generals themſelves, who were abſolute, or between particulars by licence of the generals; never upon private authority. So you ſee David aſked leave when he fought with Goliah; and Joab, when the armies were met, gave leave, and ſaid, ‘ let the young men play ‘ before us.’ And of this kind was that famous example in the wars of Naples, between twelve Spaniards and twelve Italians, where the Italians bare away the victory; beſides other infinite like examples worthy and laudable, ſometimes by ſingles, ſometimes by numbers.

The ſecond combat is a judicial trial of right, where the right is obſcure, introduced by the Goths and the northern nations, but more anciently entertained in Spain. And this yet remains in ſome caſes as a divine lot of battle, though controverted by divines, touching the lawfulneſs of it: ſo that a wiſe writer ſaith, taliter pugnantes videntur tentare Deum, quia hoc volunt ut Deus oſtendat et faciat miraculum, ut juſtam cauſam habens victor efficiatur, quod ſæpe contra accidit. But howſoever it be, this kind of fight taketh its warrant from law. Nay, the French themſelves, whence this folly ſeemeth chiefly to have flown, never had it but only in practice and toleration, and never as authoriſed by law; and yet now of late they have been fain to purge their folly with extreme rigour, in ſo much as many gentlemen left between death and life in the duels, as I ſpake before, were haſtened to hanging with their wounds bleeding. For the ſtate found it had been neglected ſo long, as nothing could be thought cruelty, which tended to the putting of it down.

As for the ſecond defect pretended in our law, that it hath provided no remedy for lyes and fillips, it may receive like anſwer. It would have been thought a madneſs amongſt the ancient lawgivers, to have ſet a puniſhment upon the lye given, which in effect is but a word of denial, a negative of another's ſaying. Any lawgiver, if he had been aſked the queſtion, would have made Solon's anſwer: that he had not ordained any puniſhment for it, becauſe he never imagined the world would have been ſo fantaſtical as to take it ſo highly. The civilians, they diſpute whether an action of injury lie for it, and rather reſolve the contrary. And Francis the firſt of France, who firſt ſet on and ſtamped this diſgrace ſo deep, is taxed by the judgment of all wiſe writers for beginning the vanity of it; for it was he, that when he had himſelf given the lye and defy to the emperor, to make it current in the world, ſaid in a ſolemn aſſembly, ‘ that he was no honeſt man that would bear the lye:’ which was the fountain of this new learning.

As for words of reproach and contumely, whereof the lye was eſteemed none, it is not credible, but that the orations themſelves are extant, what extreme and exquiſite reproaches were toſſed up and down in the ſenate of Rome and the places of aſſembly, and the like in Græcia, and yet no man took himſelf fouled by them, but took them but for breath, and the ſtile of an enemy, and either deſpiſed them or returned them, but no blood ſpilt about them.

So of every touch or light blow of the perſon, they are not in themſelves conſiderable, ſave that they have got upon them the ſtamp of a diſgrace, which maketh theſe light things paſs for great matter. The law of England, and all laws, hold theſe degrees of injury to the perſon, ſlander, battery, maim, and death; and if there be extraordinary circumſtances of deſpite and contumely, as in caſe of libels, and baſtinadoes, and the like, this court taketh them in hand and puniſheth them exemplarily. But for this apprehenſion of a diſgrace, that a fillip to the perſon ſhould be a mortal wound to the reputation, it were good that men did hearken unto the ſaying of Gonſalvo, the great and famous commander, that was wont to ſay, a gentleman's honour ſhould be de tela craſſiore, of a good ſtrong warp or web, that every little thing ſhould not catch in it; when as now it ſeems they are but of cobweb-lawn or ſuch light ſtuff, which certainly is weakneſs, and not true greatneſs of mind, but like a ſick man's body, that is ſo tender that it feels every thing. And ſo much in maintenance and demonſtration of the wiſdom and juſtice of the law of the land.

For the capacity of this court, I take this to be a ground infallible: that whereſoever an offence is capital, or matter of felony, though it be not acted, there the combination or practice tending to that offence is puniſhable in this court as a high miſdemeanor. So practice to impoiſon, though it took no effect; waylaying to murder, though it took no effect; and the like; have been adjudged hainous miſdemeanors puniſhable in this court. Nay, inceptions and preparations in inferior crimes, that are not capital, as ſuborning and preparing of witneſſes that were never depoſed, or depoſed nothing material, have likewiſe been cenſured in this court, as appeareth by the decree in Garnon's caſe.

Why then, the major propoſition being ſuch, the minor cannot be denied: for every appointment of the field is but combination and plotting of murder. Let them gild it how they liſt, they ſhall never have fairer terms of me in place of juſtice. Then the concluſion followeth, that it is a caſe fit for the cenſure of the court. And of this there be precedents in the very point of challenge.

It was the caſe of Wharton, plaintiff againſt Ellekar and Acklam defendants, where Acklam, being a follower of Ellekar's, was cenſured for carrying a challenge from Ellekar to Wharton, though the challenge was not put in writing, but delivered only by word of meſſage; and there are words in the decree, that ſuch challenges are to the ſubverſion of government.

Theſe things are well known, and therefore I needed not ſo much to have inſiſted upon them, but that in this caſe I would be thought not to innovate any thing of my own head, but to follow the former precedents of the court, though I mean to do it more thoroughly, becauſe the time requires it more.

Therefore now to come to that which concerneth my part; I ſay, that by the favour of the king and the court, I will proſecute in this court in the caſes following.

If any man ſhall appoint the field, though the fight be not acted or performed.

If any man ſhall ſend any challenge in writing, or any meſſage of challenge.

If any man carry or deliver any writing or meſſage of challenge.

If any man ſhall accept or return a challenge.

If any man ſhall accept to be a ſecond in a challenge of either ſide.

If any man ſhall depart the realm, with intention and agreement to perform the fight beyond the ſeas.

If any man ſhall revive a quarrel by any ſcandalous bruits or writings, contrary to a former proclamation publiſhed by his majeſty in that behalf.

Nay, I hear there be ſome counſel learned of duels, that tell young men when they are before-hand, and when they are otherwiſe, and thereby incenſe and incite them to the duel, and make an art of it. I hope I ſhall meet with ſome of them too: and I am ſure, my lords, this courſe of preventing duels in nipping them in the bud, is fuller of clemency and providence, than the ſuffering them to go on, and hanging men with their wounds bleeding, as they did in France.

To conclude, I have ſome petitions to make firſt to your lordſhip, my lord chancellor, that in caſe I be advertiſed of a purpoſe in any to go beyond the ſea to fight, I may have granted his majeſty's writ of ne exeat regnum to ſtop him, for this giant beſtrideth the ſea, and I would take and ſnare him by the foot on this ſide; for the combination and plotting is on this ſide, though it ſhould be acted beyond ſea. And your lordſhip ſaid notably the laſt time I made a motion in this buſineſs, that a man may be as well fur de ſe, as felo de ſe, if he ſteal out of the realm for a bad purpoſe. As for the ſatisfying of the words of the writ, no man will doubt but he doth machinari contra coronam, as the words of the writ be, that ſeeketh to murder a ſubject; for that is ever contra coronam et dignitatem. I have alſo a ſuit to your lordſhips all in general, that for juſtice ſake, and for true honour's ſake, honour of religion, law, and the king our maſter, againſt this fond and falſe diſguiſe or puppetry of honour, I may in my proſecution, which, it is like enough, may ſometimes ſtir coals, which I eſteem not for my particular, but as it may hinder the good ſervice, I may, I ſay, be countenanced and aſſiſted from your lordſhips. Laſtly, I have a petition to the nobles and gentlemen of England, that they would learn to eſteem themſelves at a juſt price. Non hos quæſitum munus in uſus, their blood is not to be ſpilt like water or a vile thing; therefore that they would reſt perſuaded there cannot be a form of honour, except it be upon a worthy matter. But for this, ipſi viderunt, I am reſolved. And thus much for the general, now to the preſent caſe.

PRESENT,

George lord archbiſhop of Canterbury.
Thomas lord Elleſmere, lord chancellor of England.
Henry earl of Northampton, lord privy ſeal.
Charles earl of Nottingham, lord high admiral of England.
Thomas earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain.
John lord biſhop of London.
Edward lord Zouch.
William lord Knolles, treaſurer of the houſhold.
Edward lord Wotton, comptroller.
John lord Stanhope, vice-chamberlain.
Sir Edward Coke, knight, lord chief juſtice of England.
Sir Henry Hobart, knight, lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas.
Sir Julius Cæſar, knight, chancellor of the Exchequer.

THIS day was heard and debated at large the ſeveral matters of informations here exhibited by ſir Francis Bacon, knight, his majeſty's attorney-general: the one againſt William Prieſt, gentleman, for writing and ſending a letter of challenge, together with a ſtick, which ſhould be the length of the weapon: and the other againſt Richard Wright, eſquire, for carrying and delivering the ſaid letter and ſtick unto the party challenged, and for other contemptuous and inſolent behaviour uſed before the juſtices of the peace in Surry at their ſeſſions, before whom he was convented. Upon the opening of which cauſe, his highneſs's ſaid attorney-general did firſt give his reaſon to the court, why, in a caſe which he intended ſhould be a leading caſe for the repreſſing of ſo great a miſchief in the common-wealth, and concerning an offence which reigneth chiefly amongſt perſons of honour and quality, he ſhould begin with a cauſe which had paſſed between ſo mean perſons as the defendants ſeemed to be; which he ſaid was done, becauſe he found this cauſe ready publiſhed, and in ſo growing an evil, he thought good to loſe no time; whereunto he added, that it was not amiſs ſometimes to beat the dog before the lion; ſaying farther, that he thought it would be ſome motive for perſons of high birth and countenance to leave it, when they ſaw it was taken up by baſe and mechanical fellows; but concluded, that he reſolved to proceed without reſpect of perſons for the time to come, and for the preſent to ſupply the meanneſs of this particular caſe by inſiſting the longer upon the general point.

Wherein he did firſt expreſs unto the court at large the greatneſs and dangerous conſequence of this preſumptuous offence, which extorted revenge out of the magiſtrate's hands, and gave boldneſs to private men to be lawgivers to themſelves; the rather, becauſe it is an offence that doth juſtify itſelf againſt the law, and plainly gives the law an affront; deſcribing alſo the miſerable effect which it draweth upon private families, by cutting off young men, otherwiſe of good hope; and chiefly the loſs of the king and the commonwealth, by the caſting away of much good blood, which, being ſpent in the field upon occaſion of ſervice, were able to continue the renown which this kingdom hath obtained in all ages, of being eſteemed victorious.

Secondly, his majeſty's ſaid attorney-general did diſcourſe touching the cauſes and remedies of this miſchief that prevailed ſo in theſe times; ſhewing the ground thereof to be a falſe and erroneous imagination of honour and credit, according to the term which was given to thoſe duels by a former proclamation of his majeſty's, which called them bewitching duels, for that it was no better than a kind of ſorcery, which enchanteth the ſpirits of young men, which bear great minds, with a ſhew of honour in that which is no honour indeed; being againſt religion, law, moral virtue, and againſt the precedents and examples of the beſt times, and valianteſt nations of the world; which though they excelled for proweſs and military virtue in a public quarrel, yet know not what theſe private duels meant; ſaying farther, that there was too much way and countenance given unto theſe duels, by the courſe that is held by noblemen and gentlemen in compounding of quarrels, who uſe to ſtand too punctually upon conceits of ſatisfactions and diſtinctions, what is before-hand, and what behind-hand, which do but feed the humour: adding likewiſe, that it was no fortitude to ſhew valour in a quarrel, except there were a juſt and worthy ground of the quarrel; but that it was weakneſs to ſet a man's life at ſo mean a rate as to beſtow it upon trifling occaſions, which ought to be rather offered up and ſacrificed to honourable ſervices, public merits, good cauſes, and noble adventures. And as concerning the remedies, he concluded, that the only way was, that the ſtate would declare a conſtant and ſettled reſolution to maſter and put down this preſumption in private men, of whatſoever degree, of righting their own wrongs, and this to do at once; for that then every particular man would think himſelf acquitted in his reputation, when that he ſhall ſee that the ſtate takes his honour into their own hands, and ſtandeth between him and any intereſt or prejudice, which he might receive in his reputation for obeying. Whereunto he added likewiſe, that the wiſeſt and mildeſt way to ſuppreſs theſe duels, was rather to puniſh in this court all the acts of preparation, which did in any wiſe tend to the duels, as this of challenges and the like, and ſo to prevent the capital puniſhment, and to vex the root in the branches, than to ſuffer them to run on to the execution, and then to puniſh them capitally after the manner of France; where of late times gentlemen of great quality that had killed others in duel, were carried to the gibbet with their wounds bleeding, leſt a natural death ſhould keep them from the example of juſtice.

Thirdly, his majeſty's ſaid attorney-general did, by many reaſons which he brought and alledged, free the law of England from certain vain and childiſh exceptions, which are taken by theſe duelliſts. The one, becauſe the law makes no difference in puniſhment between an inſidious and foul murder, and the killing a man upon challenge and fair terms, as they call it. The other, for that the law hath not provided ſufficient puniſhment and reparation for contumely of words, as the lye, and the like. Wherein his majeſty's ſaid attorney-general did ſhew, by many weighty arguments and examples, that the law of England did conſent with the law of God and the law of nations in both thoſe points, and that this diſtinction in murder between foul and fair, and this grounding of mortal quarrels upon uncivil and reproachful words, or the like diſgraces, was never authoriſed by any law or ancient examples; but it is a late vanity crept in from the practice of the French, who themſelves ſince have been ſo weary of it, as they have been forced to put it down with all ſeverity.

Fourthly, his majeſty's ſaid attorney-general did prove unto the court by rules of law and precedents, that this court hath capacity to puniſh ſending and accepting of challenges, though they were never acted nor executed; taking for a ground infallible, that whereſoever an offence is capital or matter of felony, if it be acted and performed, there the conſpiracy, combination, or practice tending to the ſame offence, is puniſhable as a high miſdemeanor, although they never were performed. And therefore, that practice to impoiſon, though it took no effect, and the like, have been puniſhed in this court; and cited the precedent in Garnon's caſe, wherein a crime of a much inferior nature, the ſuborning and preparing of witneſſes, though they never were depoſed, or depoſed nothing material, was cenſured in this court. Whereupon he concluded, that for as much as every appointment of the field is in law but a combination of plotting of a murder, howſoever men might gild it; that therefore it was a caſe fit for the cenſure of this court: and therein he vouched a precedent in the very point, that in a caſe between Wharton plaintiff, and Ellekar and Acklam defendants. Acklam being a follower of Ellekar, had carried a challenge unto Wharton; and although it were by word of mouth, and not by writing, yet it was ſeverely cenſured by the court; the decree having words, that ſuch challenges do tend to the ſubverſion of government. And therefore his majeſty's attorney willed the ſtanders-by to take notice that it was no innovation that he brought in, but a proceeding according to former precedents of the court, although he purpoſed to follow it more thoroughly than had been done ever heretofore, becauſe the times did more and more require it. Laſtly, his majeſty's ſaid attorney-general did declare and publiſh to the court in ſeveral articles, his purpoſe and reſolution in what caſes he did intend to proſecute offences of that nature in this court; that is to ſay, that if any man ſhall appoint the field, although the fight be not acted or performed; if any man ſhall ſend any challenge in writing or meſſage of challenge; if any man ſhall carry or deliver any writing or meſſage of challenge; if any man ſhall accept or return a challenge; if any man ſhall accept to be a ſecond in a challenge of either part; if any man ſhall depart the realm with intention and agreement to perform the fight beyond the ſeas; if any man ſhall revive a quarrel by any ſcandalous bruits or writings contrary to a former proclamation, publiſhed by his majeſty in that behalf; that in all theſe caſes his majeſty's attorney-general, in diſcharge of his duty, by the favour and aſſiſtance of his majeſty and the court, would bring the offenders, of what ſtate or degree ſoever, to the juſtice of this court, leaving the lords commiſſioners martial to the more exact remedies: adding farther, that he heard there were certain counſel learned of duels, that tell young men when they are before-hand, and when they are otherwiſe, and did incenſe and incite them to the duel, and made an art of it; who likewiſe ſhould not be forgotten. And ſo concluded with two petitions, the one in particular to the lord chancellor, that in caſe advertiſement were given of a purpoſe in any to go beyond the ſeas to fight, there might be granted his majeſty's writ of ne exeat regnum againſt him; and the other to the lords in general, that he might be aſſiſted and countenanced in this ſervice.

After which opening and declaration of the general cauſe, his majeſty's ſaid attorney did proceed to ſet forth the proofs of this particular challenge and offence now in hand, and brought to the judgment and cenſure of this honourable court; whereupon it appeared to this honourable court by the confeſſion of the ſaid defendant Prieſt himſelf, that he, having received ſome wrong and diſgrace at the hands of one Hutcheſt, did thereupon, in revenge thereof, write a letter to the ſaid Hutcheſt, containing a challenge to fight with him at ſingle rapier; which letter the ſaid Prieſt did deliver to the ſaid defendant Wright, together with a ſtick containing the length of the rapier, wherewith the ſaid Prieſt meant to perform the fight. Whereupon the ſaid Wright did deliver the ſaid letter to the ſaid Hutcheſt, and did read the ſame unto him; and after the reading thereof, did alſo deliver to the ſaid Hutcheſt the ſaid ſtick, ſaying, that the ſame was the length of the weapon mentioned in the ſaid letter. But the ſaid Hutcheſt, dutifully reſpecting the preſervation of his majeſty's peace, did refuſe the ſaid challenge, whereby no farther miſchief did enſue thereupon.

This honourable court, and all the honourable preſence this day ſitting, upon grave and mature deliberation, pondering the quality of theſe offences, they generally approved the ſpeech and obſervations of his majeſty's ſaid attorney-general, and highly commended his great care and good ſervice in bringing a cauſe of this nature to public puniſhment and example, and in profeſſing a conſtant purpoſe to go on in the like courſe with others: letting him know, that he might expect from the court all concurrence and aſſiſtance in ſo good a work. And thereupon the court did by their ſeveral opinions and ſentences declare, how much it imported the peace and proſperous eſtate of his majeſty and his kingdom to nip this practice and offence of duels in the head, which now did overſpread and grow univerſal, even among mean perſons, and was not only entertained in practice and cuſtom, but was framed into a kind of art and precepts: ſo that, according to the ſaying of the ſcripture, miſchief is imagined like a law. And the court with one conſent did declare their opinions: that by the ancient law of the land, all inceptions, preparations, and combinations to execute unlawful acts, though they never be performed, as they be not to be puniſhed capitally, except it be in caſe of treaſon, and ſome other particular caſes of ſtatute law, ſo yet they are puniſhable as miſdemeanors and contempts: and that this court was proper for offences of ſuch nature; eſpecially in this caſe, where the bravery and inſolency of the times are ſuch as the ordinary magiſtrates and juſtices, that are truſted with the preſervation of the peace, are not able to maſter and repreſs thoſe offences, which were by the court at large ſet forth, to be not only againſt the law of God, to whom, and his ſubſtitutes, all revenge belongeth, as part of his prerogative, but alſo againſt the oath and duty of every ſubject unto his majeſty, for that the ſubject doth ſwear unto him by the ancient law allegiance of life and member; whereby it is plainly inferred, that the ſubject hath no diſpoſing power over himſelf of life and member to be ſpent or ventured according to his own paſſions and fancies, inſomuch as the very practice of chivalry in juſts and tournays, which are but images of martial actions, appear by ancient precedents not to be lawful without the king's licence obtained. The court alſo noted, that theſe private duels or combats were of another nature from the combats which have been allowed by the law, as well of this land as of other nations for the trial of rights or appeals. For that thoſe combats receive direction and authority from the law; whereas theſe contrariwiſe ſpring only from the unbridled humours of private men. And as for the pretence of honour, the court much miſliking the confuſion of degrees which is grown of late, every man aſſuming unto himſelf the term and attribute of honour, did utterly reject and condemn the opinion, that the private duel, in any perſon whatſoever, had any grounds of honour; as well becauſe nothing can be honourable that is not lawful, and that it is no magnanimity or greatneſs of mind, but a ſwelling and tumour of the mind, where there faileth a right and ſound judgment; as alſo for that it was rather juſtly to be eſteemed a weakneſs, and a conſcience of ſmall value in a man's ſelf to be dejected ſo with a word or trifling diſgrace, as to think there is no re-cure of it, but by the hazard of life; whereas true honour in perſons that know their own worth is not of any ſuch brittle ſubſtance, but of a more ſtrong compoſition. And finally, the court, ſhewing a firm and ſettled reſolution to proceed with all ſeverity againſt theſe duels, gave warning to all young noblemen and gentlemen, that they ſhould not expect the like connivance or toleration as formerly have been, but that juſtice ſhould have a full paſſage without protection or interruption. Adding, that after a ſtrait inhibition, whoſoever ſhould attempt a challenge or combat, in caſe where the other party was reſtrained to anſwer him, as now all good ſubjects are, did by their own principles receive the diſhonour and diſgrace upon himſelf.

And for the preſent cauſe, the court hath ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the ſaid William Prieſt and Richard Wright be committed to the priſon of the Fleet, and the ſaid Prieſt to pay five hundred pounds, and the ſaid Wright five hundred marks, for their ſeveral fines to his majeſty's uſe. And to the end, that ſome more public example may be made hereof amongſt his majeſty's people, the court hath further ordered and decreed, that the ſaid Prieſt and Wright ſhall at the next aſſizes, to be holden in the county of Surry, publickly in face of the court, the judges ſitting, acknowledge their high contempt and offence againſt God, his majeſty, and his laws, and ſhew themſelves penitent for the ſame.

Moreover, the wiſdom of this high and honourable court thought it meet and neceſſary, that all ſorts of his majeſty's ſubjects ſhould underſtand and take notice of that which hath been ſaid and handled this day touching this matter, as well by his highneſs's attorney-general, as by the lords judges, touching the law in ſuch caſes. And therefore the court hath enjoined Mr. Attorney to have ſpecial care to the penning of this decree, for the ſetting forth in the ſame ſummarily the matters and reaſons, which have been opened and delivered by the court touching the ſame; and nevertheleſs alſo at ſome time convenient to publiſh the particulars of his ſpeech and declaration, as very meet and worthy to be remembered and made known unto the world, as theſe times are. And this decree, being in ſuch ſort carefully drawn and penned, the whole court thought it meet, and ſo have ordered and decreed, that the ſame be not only read and publiſhed at the next aſſizes for Surry, at ſuch time as the ſaid Prieſt and Wright are to acknowledge their offences as aforeſaid; but that the ſame be likewiſe publiſhed and made known in all ſhires of this kingdom. And to that end the juſtices of aſſize are required by this honourable court to cauſe this decree to be ſolemnly read and publiſhed in all the places and ſittings of their ſeveral circuits, and in the greateſt aſſembly; to the end, that all his majeſty's ſubjects may take knowledge and underſtand the opinion of this honourable court in this caſe, and in what meaſure his majeſty and this honourable court purpoſeth to puniſh ſuch as ſhall fall into the like contempt and offences hereafter. Laſtly, this honourable court much approving that, which the right honourable ſir Edward Coke, knight, lord chief juſtice of England, did now deliver touching the law in this caſe of duels, hath enjoined his lordſhip to report the ſame in print, as he hath formerly done divers other caſes, that ſuch as underſtand not the law in that behalf, and all others, may better direct themſelves, and prevent the danger thereof hereafter.

XXI. Caſe of Mr. WILLIAM TALBOT, Hilary-Term, 11 Jam. I. on an Information ore tenus, in the Star-Chamber, for maintaining a Power in the Pope to depoſe and kill Kings.

[In lord Bacon's works there is a ſpeech by him as attorney-general and proſecutor in this caſe. 2 Bac. laſt 4to ed. 577. According to the title of the ſpeech, the cauſe of the proſecution appears to have been this. Mr. Talbot, who was a counſellor at law of Ireland, being aſked, whether the doctrine of Suarez in reſpect to the depoſing and killing of kings excommunicated was true or not, anſwered, that he ſubmitted his opinion to the judgment of the Roman catholic church. This anſwer he ſubſcribed, and we preſume, that it was given on being examined before the privy-council; though that circumſtance is not expreſsly ſtated by lord Bacon. What the judgment of the Star-Chamber was, we do not find noticed.]

Speech of ſir Francis Bacon attorney-general, the laſt day of Hilary-Term, 11 Jam. I.

My lords,

I BROUGHT before you the firſt ſitting of this term the cauſe of duels. But now this laſt ſitting I ſhall bring before you a cauſe concerning the greateſt duel which is in the Chriſtian world, the duel and conflict between the lawful authority of ſovereign kings, which is God's ordinance for the comfort of human ſociety, and the ſwelling pride and uſurpation of the ſee of Rome in temporalibus, tending altogether to anarchy and confuſion. Wherein if this pretence in the pope of Rome, by cartels to make ſovereign princes as the banditti, and to proſcribe their lives, and to expoſe their kingdoms to prey; if theſe pretences, I ſay, and all perſons that ſubmit themſelves to that part of the pope's power in the leaſt degree, be not by all poſſible ſeverity repreſſed and puniſhed, the ſtate of Chriſtian kings will be no other than the ancient torment deſcribed by the poets in the hell of the heathen; a man ſitting richly robed, ſolemnly attended, delicious fare, &c. with a ſword hanging over his head, hanging by a ſmall thread, ready every moment to be cut down by an accurſing and accurſed hand. Surely I had thought they had been the prerogatives of God alone, and of his ſecret judgments: ſolvam cingula regum, I will looſen the girdles of kings; or again, he poureth contempt upon princes; or, I will give a king in my wrath, and take him away again in my diſpleaſure; and the like. But if theſe be the claims of a mortal man, certainly they are but the myſteries of that perſon, which exalts himſelf above all that is called God, ſupra omne quod dicitur Deus. Note it well, not above God, though that in a ſenſe be true, but above all that is called God; that is, lawful kings and magiſtrates.

But, my lords, in this duel I find this Talbot, that is now before you, but a coward; for he hath given ground, he hath gone backward and forward; but in ſuch a faſhion, and with ſuch interchange of repenting and relapſing, as I cannot tell whether it doth extenuate or aggravate his offence. If he ſhall more publicly in the face of the court fall and ſettle upon a right mind, I ſhall be glad of it; and he that would be againſt the king's mercy, I would he might need the king's mercy: but nevertheleſs the court will proceed by rules of juſtice.

The offence, therefore wherewith I charge this Talbot, priſoner at the bar, is this in brief and in effect: that he hath maintained and maintaineth under his hand, a power in the pope for the depoſing and murdering of kings. In what ſort he doth this, when I come to the proper and particular charge, I will deliver it in his own words without preſſing or ſtraining.

But before I come to the particular charge of this man, I cannot proceed ſo coldly; but I muſt expreſs unto your lordſhips the extreme and imminent danger wherein our dear and dread ſovereign is, and in him we all, nay, all princes of both religions, for it is a common cauſe, do ſtand at this day, by the ſpreading and inforcing of this furious and pernicious opinion of the pope's temporal power: which though the modeſt ſort would blanch with the diſtinction of in ordine ad ſpiritualia, yet that is but an illuſion; for he, that maketh the diſtinction, will alſo make the caſe. This peril, though it be in itſelf notorious, yet becauſe there is a kind of dullneſs, and almoſt a lethargy in this age, give me leave to ſet before you two glaſſes, ſuch as certainly the like never met in one age; the glaſs of France, and the glaſs of England. In that of France the tragedies acted and executed in two immediate kings; in the glaſs of England, the ſame, or more horrible, attempted likewiſe in a queen and king immediate, but ending in a happy deliverance.

In France, Henry III. in the face of his army, before the walls of Paris, ſtabbed by a wretched Jacobine frier. Henry IV. a prince that the French do ſurname the Great, one that had been a ſaviour and redeemer of his country from infinite calamities, and a reſtorer of that monarchy to the ancient ſtate and ſplendor, and a prince almoſt heroical, except it be in the point of revolt from religion, at a time when he was as it were to mount on horſeback for the commanding of the greateſt forces that of long time had been levied in France, this king likewiſe ſtillettoed by a raſcal votary, which had been enchanted and conjured for the purpoſe.

In England, queen Elizabeth, of bleſſed memory, a queen comparable and to be ranked with the greateſt kings, oftentimes attempted by like votaries, Sommerville, Parry, Savage, and others, but ſtill protected by the watchman that ſlumbereth not. Again, our excellent ſovereign king James, the ſweetneſs and clemency of whoſe nature were enough to quench and mortify all malignity, and a king ſhielded and ſupported by poſterity; yet this king in the chair of majeſty, his vine and olive branches about him, attended by his nobles and third eſtate in parliament; ready in the twinkling of an eye, as if it had been a particular doomſday, to have been brought to aſhes, diſperſed to the four winds. I noted the laſt day my lord chief juſtice, when he ſpoke of this powder treaſon, he laboured for words; though they came from him with great efficacy, yet he truly confeſſed, and ſo muſt all men, that that treaſon is above the charge and report of any words whatſoever.

Now, my lords, I cannot let paſs, but in theſe glaſſes which I ſpeak of, beſides the facts themſelves and danger, to ſhew you two things: the one, the ways of God Almighty, which turneth the ſword of Rome upon the kings that are the vaſſals of Rome, and over them gives it power; but protecteth thoſe kings, which have not accepted the yoke of his tyranny, from the effects of his malice: the other, that, as I ſaid at firſt, this is a common cauſe of princes; it involveth kings of both religions; and therefore his majeſty did moſt worthily and prudently ring out the alarm-bell, to awake all other princes to think of it ſeriouſly, and in time. But this is a miſerable caſe the while, that theſe Roman ſoldiers do either thruſt the ſpear into the ſides of God's anointed, or at leaſt they crown them with thorns; that is, piercing and pricking cares and fears, that they can never be quiet or ſecure of their lives or ſtates. And as this peril is common to princes of both religions, ſo princes of both religions have been likewiſe equally ſenſible of every injury that touched their temporals.

Thuanus reports in his ſtory, that when the realm of France was interdicted by the violent proceedings of pope Julius the ſecond, the king, otherwiſe noted for a moderate prince, cauſed coins of gold to be ſtamped with his own image, and this ſuperſcription, perdam nomen Babylonis è terra. Of which Thuanus ſaith, himſelf had ſeen divers pieces thereof. So as this catholic king was ſo much incenſed at that time, in reſpect of the pope's uſurpation, as he did apply Babylon to Rome. Charles the fifth, emperor, who was accounted one of the pope's beſt ſons, yet proceeded in matter temporal towards pope Clement with ſtrange rigour; never regarding the pontificality, but kept him priſoner thirteen months in a peſtilent priſon; and was hardly diſſuaded by his council from having ſent him captive into Spain; and made ſport with the threats of Froſberg the German, who wore a ſilk rope under his caſſock, which he would ſhew in all companies; telling them that he carried it to ſtrangle the pope with his own hands. As for Philip the Fair, it is the ordinary example, how he brought pope Boniface the eighth to an ignominious end, dying mad and enraged; and how he ſtiled his reſcript to the pope's bull, whereby he challenged his temporals, ſciat fatuitas veſtra, not your beatitude, but your ſtultitude; a ſtile worthy to be continued in the like caſes; for certainly that claim is mere folly and fury. As for native examples here, it is too long a field to enter into them. Never kings of any nation kept the partition-wall between temporal and ſpiritual better in times of greateſt ſuperſtition. I report me to king Edward I. that ſet up ſo many croſſes, and yet croſſed that part of the pope's juriſdiction, no man more ſtrongly. But theſe things have paſſed better pens and ſpeeches: here I end them.

But now to come to the particular charge of this man, I muſt inform your lordſhips the occaſion and nature of this offence. There hath been publiſhed lately to the world a work of Suarez a Portugueſe, a profeſſor in the univerſity of Coimbra, a confident and daring writer, ſuch an one as Tully deſcribes in deriſion; nihil tam verens, quam ne dubitare aliqua de re videretur: one that fears nothing but this, leſt he ſhould ſeem to doubt of any thing. A fellow that thinks with his magiſtrality and gooſe-quill to give laws and menages to crowns and ſceptres. In this man's writing, this doctrine of depoſing or murdering kings ſeems to come to a higher elevation than heretofore; and it is more arted and poſitived than in others. For in the paſſages which your lordſhips ſhall hear read anon, I find three aſſertions which run not in the vulgar track, but are ſuch as wherewith mens ears, as I ſuppoſe, are not much acquainted. Whereof the firſt is, that the pope hath a ſuperiority over kings, as ſubjects, to depoſe them; not only for ſpiritual crimes, as hereſy and ſchiſm, but for faults of a temporal nature; foraſmuch as a tyrannical government tendeth ever to the deſtruction of ſouls. So by this poſition, kings of either religion are alike comprehended, and none exempted. The ſecond, that after a ſentence given by the pope, this writer hath defined of a ſeries, or ſucceſſion, or ſubſtitution of hangmen, or bourreaux, to be ſure, leſt an executioner ſhould fail. For he ſaith, that when a king is ſentenced by the pope to deprivation or death, the executioner who is firſt in place is he to whom the pope ſhall commit the authority, which may be a foreign prince, it may be a particular ſubject, it may be general, to the firſt undertaker. But if there be no direction or aſſignation in the ſentence ſpecial nor general, then, de jure, it appertains to the next ſucceſſor, a natural and pious opinion; for commonly they are ſons, or brothers, or near of kin, all is one, ſo as the ſucceſſor be apparent; and alſo that he be a catholic. But if he be doubtful, or that he be no catholic, then it devolves to the commonalty of the kingdom; ſo as he will be ſure to have it done by one miniſter or other. The third is, he diſtinguiſheth of two kinds of tyrants, a tyrant in title, and a tyrant in regiment; the tyrant in regiment cannot be reſiſted or killed without a ſentence precedent by the pope; but a tyrant in title may be killed by any private man whatſoever. By which doctrine he hath put the judgment of kings titles, which I will undertake are never ſo clean but that ſome vain quarrel or exception may be made unto them, upon the fancy of every private man; and alſo couples the judgment and execution together, that he may judge him by a blow, without any other ſentence.

Your lordſhips ſee what monſtrous opinions theſe are, and how both theſe beaſts, the beaſt with ſeven heads, and the beaſt with many heads, pope and people, are at once let in, and ſet upon the ſacred perſons of kings.

Now to go on with the narrative. There was an extract made of certain ſentences and portions of this book, being of this nature that I have ſet forth, by a great prelate and counſellor, upon a juſt occaſion; and there being ſome hollowneſs and heſitation in theſe matters, wherein it is a thing impious to doubt, diſcovered and perceived in Talbot, he was aſked his opinion concerning theſe aſſertions, in the preſence of the beſt: and afterwards they were delivered to him, that upon advice and ſedato animo, he might declare himſelf. Whereupon, under his hand, he ſubſcribes thus;

May it pleaſe your honourable good lordſhips: concerning this doctrine of Suarez, I do perceive, by what I have read in this book, that the ſame doth concern matter of faith, the controverſy growing upon expoſition of ſcriptures and councils, wherein, being ignorant and not ſtudied, I cannot take upon me to judge; but I do ſubmit my opinion therein to the judgment of the catholic Roman church, as in all other points concerning faith I do. And for matter concerning my loyalty, I do acknowledge my ſovereign liege lord king James, to be lawful and undoubted king of all the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and I will bear true faith and allegiance to his highneſs during my life.

William Talbot.

My lords, upon theſe words I conceive Talbot hath committed a great offence, and ſuch a one, as if he had entered into a voluntary and malicious publication of the like writing, it would have been too great an offence for the capacity of this court. But becauſe it grew by a queſtion aſked by a council of eſtate, and ſo rather ſeemeth, in a favourable conſtruction, to proceed from a kind of ſubmiſſion to anſwer, than from any malicious or inſolent will; it was fit, according to the clemency of theſe times, to proceed in this manner before your lordſhips. And yet let the hearers take theſe things right; for certainly, if a man be required by the council to deliver his opinion whether king James be king or no; and he deliver his opinion that he is not, this is high treaſon. But I do not ſay that theſe words amount to that; and therefore let me open them truly to your lordſhips, and therein open alſo the underſtanding of the offender himſelf, how far they reach.

My lords, a man's allegiance muſt be independent and certain, and not dependent and conditional. Elizabeth Barton, that was called the holy maid of Kent, affirmed, that if king Henry VIII. did not take Catharine of Spain again to his wife within a twelvemonth, he ſhould be no king: and this was treaſon. For though this act be contingent and future, yet the preparing of the treaſon is preſent.

And in like manner, if a man ſhould voluntarily publiſh or maintain, that whenſoever a bull of deprivation ſhall come forth againſt the king, that from thenceforth he is no longer king; this is of like nature. But with this I do not charge you neither; but this is the true latitude of your words, that if the doctrine touching the killing of kings be matter of faith, then you ſubmit yourſelf to the judgment of the catholic Roman church: ſo as now, to do you right, your allegiance doth not depend ſimply upon a ſentence of the pope's deprivation againſt the king; but upon another point alſo, if theſe of doctrines be already, or ſhall be declared to be matter of faith. But, my lords, there is little won in this: there may be ſome difference to the guilt of the party, but there is little to the danger of the king. For the ſame pope of Rome may, with the ſame breath, declare both. So as ſtill, upon the matter, the king is made but tenant at will of his life and kingdoms, and the allegiance of his ſubjects is pinned upon the pope's acts. And certainly it is time to ſtop the current of this opinion of acknowledgment of the pope's power in temporalibus; or elſe it will ſap and ſupplant the ſeat of kings. And let it not be miſtaken, that Mr. Talbot's offence ſhould be no more than the refuſing the oath of allegiance. For it is one thing to be ſilent, and another thing to affirm. As for the point of matter of faith, or not of faith, to tell your lordſhips plain, it would aſtoniſh a man to ſee the gulf of this implied belief. Is nothing excepted from it? If a man ſhould aſk Mr. Talbot whether he do condemn murder, or adultery, or rape, or the doctrine of Mahomet, or of Arius, inſtead of Suarez; muſt the anſwer be with this exception, that if the queſtion concern matter of faith, as no queſtion it doth, for the moral law is matter of faith, that therein he will ſubmit himſelf to what the church ſhall determine? And, no doubt, the murder of princes is more than ſimple murder. But to conclude, Talbot, I will do you this right, and I will not be reſerved in this, but to declare that that is true; that you came afterwards to a better mind; wherein, if you had been conſtant, the king, out of his great goodneſs, was reſolved not to have proceeded with you in courſe of juſtice: but then again you ſtarted aſide like a broken bow. So that by your variety and vacillation you loſt the acceptable time of the firſt grace, which was not to have convented you.

Nay, I will go farther with you. Your laſt ſubmiſſion I conceive to be ſatisfactory and complete. But then it was too late; the king's honour was upon it; it was publiſhed and a day appointed for hearing. Yet what preparation that may be to the ſecond grace of pardon, that I know not: but I know my lords, out of their accuſtomed favour, will admit you not only to your defence concerning that that hath been charged; but to extenuate your fault by any ſubmiſſion that now God ſhall put into your mind to make.

XXII. Proceedings againſt Mr. RICHARD CHAMBERS, in the Star-Chamber, for ſeditious Speeches before the Privy-Council, 5 Cha. I. 1629.

AT the ſame time [1629] ſir Robert Heath, the king's attorney-general, preferred an information in the Star-Chamber againſt Richard Chambers of the city of London, merchant. Wherein, firſt, he did ſet forth the gracious government of the king, and the great privileges which the merchants have in their trading, by paying moderate duties for the goods and merchandizes exported and imported; and ſetting forth, that the raiſing and publiſhing of undutiful and falſe ſpeeches, which may tend to the diſhonour of the king or the ſtate, or to the diſcouragement or diſcontentment of the ſubject, or to ſet diſcord or variance between his majeſty and his good people, are offences of dangerous conſequence, and by the law prohibited, and condemned under ſeveral penalties and puniſhments. That nevertheleſs the ſaid Richard Chambers, the 28th day of September laſt, being, amongſt other merchants, called to the council-board at Hampton-Court, about ſome things which were complained of in reference to the cuſtoms, did then and there, in an inſolent manner, in the preſence or hearing of the lords and other of his majeſties privy-council, then ſitting in council, utter theſe undutiful, ſeditious, and falſe words, that the merchants are in no part of the world ſo ſcrewed and wrung as in England; that in Turkey they have more encouragement. By which words, he the ſaid Richard Chambers, as the information ſetteth forth, did endeavour to alienate the good affection of his majeſties ſubjects from his majeſty, and to bring a ſlander upon his juſt government: and therefore the king's attorney prayed proceſs againſt him.

To this Mr. Chambers made anſwer, that having a caſe of ſilk grogerams brought from Briſtol by a carrier to London, of the value of 400 l. the ſame were, by ſome inferior officers, attending on the Cuſtom-Houſe, ſeized without this defendants conſent, notwithſtanding he offered to give ſecurity to pay ſuch cuſtoms as ſhould be due by law; and that he hath been otherwiſe grieved and damnified, by the injurious dealing of the under-officers of the Cuſtom-Houſe; and mentioned the particulars wherein: and that being called before the lords of the council, he confeſſeth, that out of the great ſenſe which he had of the injuries done him by the ſaid inferior officers, he did utter theſe words, that the merchants in England were more wrung and ſcrewed than in foreign parts. Which words were only ſpoken in the preſence of the privy-council, and not ſpoken abroad, to ſtir up any diſcord among the people; and not ſpoken with any diſloyal thought at that time of his majeſty's government, but only intending by theſe words to introduce his juſt complaint againſt the wrongs and injuries he had ſuſtained by the inferior officers; and that as ſoon as he had heard a hard conſtruction was given of his words, he endeavoured by petition to the lords of the council, humbly to explain his meaning, that he had not the leaſt evil thought as to his majeſties government; yet was not permitted to be heard, but preſently ſent away priſoner to the Marſhalſea: and when he was there a priſoner, he did again endeavour by petition to give ſatisfaction to the lords of the council; but they would not be pleaſed to accept of his faithful explanation, which he now makes unto this honourable court upon his oath; and doth profeſs from the bottom of his heart, that his ſpeeches only aimed at the abuſes of the inferior officers, who in many things dealt moſt cruelly with him and other merchants.

There were two of the clerks of the privy-council examined as witneſſes to prove the words, notwithſtanding the defendant confeſſed the words in his anſwer as aforeſaid, who proved the words as laid in the information. And on the ſixth of May, 1629, the cauſe came to be heard in the Star-Chamber, and the court were of opinion, that the words ſpoken were a comparing of his majeſty's government with the government of the Turks; intending thereby to make the people believe, that his majeſty's happy government may be termed Turkiſh tyranny; and therefore the court fined the ſaid Mr. Chambers in the ſum of 2000 l. to his majeſty's uſe, and to ſtand committed to the priſon of the Fleet, and to make ſubmiſſion for his great offence, both at the council-board, in court of Star-Chamber, and at the Royal Exchange.

There was a great difference of opinion in the court about the fine: and becauſe it is a remarkable caſe, here followeth the names of each ſeveral perſon who gave ſentence, and the fine they concluded upon, viz.

Sir Francis Cottington, chancellor of the Exchequer, his opinion was for 500 l. fine to the king, and to acknowledge his offence at the council-board, the Star-Chamber Bar, and the Exchange.

Sir Thomas Richardſon, lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas, 500 l. fine to the king, and to deſire the king's favour.

Sir Nicholas Hide, lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench, 500 l. and to deſire the king's favour.

Sir Humphrey May, chancellor,	1500 l.
Sir Edward Barret,	2000 l.
Doctor Neal, biſhop of Wincheſter,	3000 l.
Doctor Laud, biſhop of London,	3000 l.
Lord Carlton, principal ſecretary of ſtate,	3000 l.
Earl of Saliſbury,	1500 l.
Earl of Arundel, lord high marſhal,	3000 l.

So the fine was ſettled to 2000 l.

And all (except the two chief juſtices) concurred for a ſubmiſſion alſo to be made. And accordingly the copy of the ſubmiſſion was ſent to the warden of the Fleet, from Mr. Attorney-General, to ſhew the ſaid Richard Chambers, to perform and acknowledge it; and was as followeth:

"I Richard Chambers, of London, merchant, do humbly acknowledge, that whereas upon an information exhibited againſt me by the king's attorney-general, I was in Eaſter-Term laſt ſentenced by the honourable court of Star-Chamber, for that in September laſt, 1628. being convented before the lords and others of his majeſty's moſt honourable privy-council-board, upon ſome ſpeeches then uſed concerning the merchants of this kingdom, and his majeſty's well and gracious uſage of them; did then, and there, in inſolent, contemptuous, and ſeditious manner, falſely and maliciouſly ſay and affirm, that they, meaning the merchants, are in no parts of the world ſo ſcrewed and wrung as in England; and that in Turkey they have more encouragement. And whereas by the ſentence of that honourable court, I was adjudged, among other puniſhments juſtly impoſed upon me, to make my humble acknowledgment and ſubmiſſion of this great offence at this honourable board, before I ſhould be delivered out of the priſon of the Fleet, whereto I was then committed, as by the ſaid decree and ſentence of that court, among other things, it doth and may appear: now I the ſaid R. Chambers, in obedience to the ſentence of the ſaid honourable court, do humbly confeſs and acknowledge the ſpeaking of theſe words aforeſaid, for the which I was ſo charged, and am heartily ſorry for the ſame; and do humbly beſeech your lordſhips all to be honourable interceſſors for me to his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to pardon this great error and fault ſo committed by me."

When Mr. Chambers read this draught of ſubmiſſion, he thus ſubſcribed the ſame:

> "All the aboveſaid contents and ſubmiſſion, I Richard Chambers do utterly abhor and deteſt, as moſt unjuſt and falſe; and never till death will acknowledge any part thereof.
> Rich. Chambers."

Alſo he under-writ theſe texts of ſcripture to the ſaid ſubmiſſion, before he returned it.

That make a man an offender for a word, and lay a ſnare for him that reproveth in the gate, and turn aſide the juſt for a thing of nought.

Blame not before thou haſt examined the truth; underſtand firſt, and then rebuke: anſwer not before thou haſt heard the cauſe, neither interrupt men in the midſt of their talk.

Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth?

King Agrippa ſaid unto Paul, thou art permitted to ſpeak for thyſelf.

Thou ſhalt not wreſt the judgment of the poor in his cauſe, thou ſhalt not reſpect perſons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wiſe, and pervert the eyes of the righteous.

Wo to them that deviſe iniquity, becauſe it is in the power of their hand, and they covet fields, and take them by violence; and houſes, and take them away: ſo they oppreſs a man and his houſe, even a man and his heritage.

Thus ſaith the Lord God, let it ſuffice you, O princes of Iſrael: remove violence and ſpoil, and execute judgment and juſtice, take away your exactions from my people, ſaith the Lord God.

If thou ſeeſt the oppreſſion of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and juſtice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the higheſt regardeth, and there be higher than they.

Per me, Richard Chambers.

Afterwards in the term of Trinity, the 5th year of king Charles, it is found in the great roll of this year, that there is demanded there, of Richard Chambers of London, merchant, 2000 l. for a certain fine impoſed on him, hither ſent by virtue of a writ of our ſaid lord the king, under the foot of the great ſeal of England, directed to the treaſurer and barons of this Exchequer, for making execution thereof to the uſe of the ſaid lord the king, as is there contained; and now, that is to ſay, in the Octab of the Bleſſed Trinity, this term, comes the ſaid Richard Chambers in his own proper perſon, and demands oyer of the demand aforeſaid, and it is read unto him; and he demands oyer alſo of the writ aforeſaid, under the foot of the great ſeal of England hither ſent, and is read unto him in theſe words:

"CHARLES by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to his treaſurer and barons of his Exchequer, health. The extrete of certain fines taxed

“ and adjudged by us and our council, in our ſaid council, in our court of Star-Chamber, in the term of St. Michael, the term of St. Hilary, and the term of Eaſter laſt paſt, upon Thomas Barns, of the pariſh of St. Clement Danes in the county of Middleſex, carpenter, and others, ſeverally and dividedly, as they be there ſeverally aſſeſſed, we ſend unto you included in theſe preſents, commanding, that looking into them, you do that which by law you ought to do againſt them, for the levying of thoſe fines. Witneſs our ſelf at Weſtminſter, the 21ſt of May, in the year of our reign the 5th Mutas.”

And the tenor of the ſchedule to the ſaid writ annexed, as to the ſaid Richard Chambers, followeth in theſe words:

“ IN the term of Eaſter, the fifth year of king Charles, of Richard Chambers of London, merchant, 2000 l. which being read, heard, and by him underſtood, he complains, that he is grievouſly vexed and inquieted by colour of the premiſes; and that not juſtly, for that proteſting, that the great roll, and the matter therein contained, is not in law ſufficient, to which he hath no need, nor is bound by law to anſwer. Yet for plea the ſaid Richard Chambers ſaith, that he, of the demand aforeſaid, in the great roll aforeſaid mentioned, and every parcel thereof, ought to be diſcharged againſt the ſaid lord the king, for that he ſaid, that he from the time of the taxation of the aforeſaid fine, and long before, was a freeman and a merchant of this kingdom; that is to ſay, in the pariſh of the Bleſſed Mary of the Arches, in the ward of Cheap, London: and that by a certain act in the parliament of the lord Henry, late king of England, the third, held in the ninth year of his reign, it was provided by authority of the ſaid parliament, that a freeman ſhall not be amerced for a little offence, but according to the manner of the ſaid offence; and for a great offence, according to the greatneſs of the offence, ſaving to him his contenement or freehold; and a merchant in the ſame manner, ſaving unto him his merchandize; and a villain of any other than the king after the ſame manner to be amerced, ſaving his wainage; and none of the ſaid amerciaments to be impoſed but by the oaths of good and lawful men of the neighbourhood: and by a certain other act in the parliament of the lord Edward, late king of England, the firſt, held in the third year of his reign, it was and is provided, that no city, borough, or town, nor any man, ſhall be amerced, without reaſonable cauſe, and according to his treſpaſs; that is to ſay, a freeman, ſaving to him his contenement; a merchant, ſaving to him his merchandize; and a villain, ſaving to him his wainage: and this by their peers: and by the ſame act in the parliament of the ſaid lord Henry, late king of England, the third, held in the ninth year of his reign aforeſaid, it was and is provided by the authority of the ſaid parliament, that no freeman ſhould be taken or impriſoned, or diſſeized of his freehold, or liberties, or free-cuſtoms, or out-lawed, or baniſhed, or any way deſtroyed: and that the lord the king ſhould not go upon him, nor deal with him, but by a lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land: and by a certain act in parliament of the lord Edward, late king of England, the third, held in the fifth year of his reign, it was and is provided by the authority of the ſaid parliament, that no man henceforward ſhould be attached by reaſon of any accuſation, nor prejudged of life or member, nor that his lands, tenements, goods or chattels ſhould be ſeized into the hands of the lord the king againſt the form of the great charter, and the law of the land: and by a certain act in the parliament of the lord Henry, late king of England, the ſeventh, held in the third year of his reign, reciting, that by unlawful maintenances given of liveries, ſigns, and tokens, and retainders by indentures, promiſes, oaths, writings, and other imbraceries of the ſubjects of the ſaid lord the king, falſe demeanors of ſheriffs, in making of pannels, and other falſe returns, by taking of money by jurors, by great riots and unlawful aſſemblies, the policy and good government of this kingdom was almoſt ſubdued; and by not puniſhing of the ſaid inconveniencies, and by occaſion of the premiſſes, little or nothing was found by inquiſition; by reaſon thereof, the laws of the land had little effect in their execution, to the increaſe of murders, robberies, perjuries, and inſecurities of all men living, to the loſs of their lands, and goods, to the great diſpleaſure of Almighty God; it was ordained for reformation of the premiſſes, by authority of the ſaid parliament, that the chancellor and treaſurer of England for the time being, and the keeper of the privy-ſeal of the lord the king, or two of them, calling to them one biſhop, one lord temporal of the moſt honourable council of the lord the king, and the two chief juſtices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas for the time being, or two other juſtices in their abſence, by bill or information exhibited to the chancellor for the king, or any other, againſt any perſon, for any other ill behaviours aforeſaid, have authority of calling before them, by writ of privy-ſeal, ſuch malefactors, and of examining them and others by their diſcretion, and of puniſhing ſuch as they find defective therein, according to their demerits, according to the form and effect of the ſtatutes thereof made, in the ſame manner and form as they might and ought to be puniſhed, if they were thereof convinced according to the due courſe of law: and by a certain other act in the parliament of the lord Henry, late king of England, the eighth, held in the one and twentieth year of his reign, reciting the offences in the foreſaid ſtatute of the ſaid late king Henry the ſeventh, before-mentioned, by authority of the ſaid parliament, it was and is ordained and enacted, that henceforward the chancellor, treaſurer of England, and the preſident of the moſt honourable privy-council of the king, attending his moſt honourable perſon for the time being, and the lord keeper of the privy-ſeal of the lord the king, or two of them, calling to them one biſhop, and one temporal lord, of the moſt honourable council of the lord the king, and two chief juſtices of the King's Bench, and Common Pleas for the time being, or two juſtices in their abſence, by any bill or information then after to be exhibited to the chancellor of England, the treaſurer, the preſident of the moſt honourable council of the lord the king, or the keeper of the privy-ſeal of the lord the king for the time being, for any miſdemeanor in the aforeſaid ſtatute of king Henry the ſeventh aforeſaid before recited, from henceforth have full power and authority of calling before them, by writ or by privy-ſeal, ſuch malefactors, and of examining of them and others by their diſcretion, and of puniſhing thoſe that are found defective according to their demerits, according to the form and effect of the ſaid ſtatute of the aforeſaid lord king Henry the ſeventh, and of all other ſtatutes thereupon made not revoked and expired, in the ſame manner and form as they might and ought to be puniſhed, if they were convicted according to the due order of the laws of the ſaid lord the king. And by the aforeſaid writ, under the foot of the great ſeal, it manifeſtly appears, that the ſaid fine was impoſed by the lord the king and his council, and not by the legal peers of the ſaid Richard Chambers, nor by the law of the land, nor according to the manner of the pretended offence of the ſaid Richard Chambers, nor ſaving unto him his merchandize, nor for any offence mentioned in the ſaid ſtatutes. All and ſingular the which, the ſaid Richard Chambers is ready to verify to the court, &c. and demands judgment; and that he be diſcharged of the ſaid 2000 l. againſt the ſaid lord, the now king; and that as to the premiſſes he may be diſmiſſed from this court.

Waterhouſe.”

With this plea, he annexed a petition to the lord chief baron, and alſo to every one of the barons, humbly deſiring the filing of the plea, with other reaſons in the manner of a motion at the bar, becauſe he ſaid, counſel would not move, plead, nor ſet hand to it, as further appeareth.

The copy of the order upon Mr. Attorney's motion in the Exchequer, the 17th of July, 1629. after the plea put in, and order to file it. Per the lord chief baron.

“ TOuching the plea put into this court by Richard Chambers, to diſcharge himſelf of a fine of 2000 l. ſet on him in the Star-Chamber, foraſmuch as ſir Robert Heath, knight, his majeſties attorney-general, informed this court, that the ſaid Chambers in his ſaid plea recites divers ſtatutes, and Magna Charta, and what offences are puniſhable in the Star-Chamber, and how the proceedings ought to be; and upon the whole matter concludes, that the ſaid fine was impoſed by the king and his council, and not by a legal judgment of his peers, nor by the laws of the land, nor according to the manner of his offence, nor ſaving his merchandize, nor for any offence mentioned in the ſaid ſtatutes; which plea, Mr. Attorney conceiving it to be very frivolous and inſufficient, and derogatory to the honour and juriſdiction of the court of Star-Chamber, humbly prayeth might not be allowed of, nor filed: it is therefore this day ordered, that the ſaid plea ſhall be read on Saturday next; and then upon hearing the king's council, and the council of the ſaid Richard Chambers, this court will declare their further order therein; and in the mean time the ſaid plea is not to be filed nor delivered out.”

In Michaelmas Term following, Mr. Chambers was brought by a Habeas Corpus out of the Fleet; and the warden did return,

“ THAT he was committed to the Fleet by virtue of a decree in the Star-Chamber, by reaſon of certain words he uſed at the council-table, (viz.) that the merchants of England were ſcrewed up here in England more than in Turkey. And for theſe and other words of defamation of the government, he was cenſured to be committed to the Fleet, and to be there impriſoned until he had made his ſubmiſſion at the council-table, and to pay a fine of 2000 l. And now at the bar he prayeth to be delivered, becauſe this ſentence is not warranted by any law or ſtatute: for the ſtatute of 3 Hen. 7. which is the foundation of the court of Star-Chamber, doth not give them any authority to puniſh for words only. But all the court informed him, that the court of Star-Chamber was not erected by the ſtatute of 3 Hen. 7. but was a court many years before, and one of the moſt high and honourable courts of juſtice; and to deliver one who was committed by the decree of one of the courts of juſtice, was not the uſage of this court; and therefore he was remanded.”

As a concurrent proof of theſe proceedings concerning Mr. Chambers, we ſhall inſert here a petition of his (though out of time) to the long parliament.

To the parliament of the common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

The brief remonſtrance and humble petition of Richard Chambers, merchant, late alderman and ſheriff of the city of London:

SHEWING,

“ THAT in the parliament held in the years 1627 and 1628, it was voted and declared by the honourable houſe of commons, that whoſoever ſhall counſel or adviſe the taking or levying of the ſubſidy of tunnage and poundage, not granted by parliament, or ſhall be any actor or inſtrument therein, ſhall be reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth; and if any merchant or perſon whatſoever ſhall voluntarily yield or pay the ſaid ſubſidy of tunnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, they ſhall likewiſe be reputed betrayers of the liberties of England, and enemies to the ſame, as may appear by the ſaid order upon record.

“ In ſubmiſſion and obedience whereunto, the petitioner firſt oppoſed and withſtood the payment of tunnage and poundage (until they were ſettled by parliament) and all other illegal taxes; for which ſubmiſſion and obedience, in the years 1628 and 1629, the petitioner had 7060 pounds of his goods wrongfully taken and detained from him by the late king's officers and farmers of the Cuſtom-Houſe of London, for pretended duties, and a heavy ſentence and fine in the Star-Chamber, which was impoſed upon him in the year 1629. Beſides which loſſes, the petitioner further ſuffered in his perſon by ſix whole years impriſonment in the Fleet, for not ſubmitting to that ſentence and fine; and in the year 1637, nine months impriſonment in Newgate for withſtanding ſhip-money; by which loſſes and impriſonments, the petitioner was put by the exerciſe of his calling, and was wounded in his credit and reputation.

“Which ſufferings the honourable houſe of commons (upon the petitioners complaint in the year 1640,) taking into their grave conſiderations, were pleaſed to refer the examination thereof to a committee of fifty members, wherein were included the committee for the navy and cuſtoms; who being well ſatisfied of the truth thereof, by oath, and other good ſufficient proofs upon record, drew up their report, that the petitioner ought then to have 13680 pounds in part of reparation, leaving the reſt of thoſe reparations to the further judgment of the honourable houſe, as by the annexed copy of that report may further appear.

“In purſuit of which report, the parliament then levied and received from the old farmers and officers of the cuſtoms 50000 pounds for wrongs and abuſes done to the petitioner (chiefly) and other merchants, intending firſt to give to the petitioner ſatisfaction out of the ſame, becauſe he was the firſt man that oppoſed the pretended duties, and the greateſt ſufferer.

“Whereupon in the year 1642, the petitioner was choſen alderman, and in the year 1644 ſheriff of the city of London: which places the petitioner earneſtly endeavoured to ſhun; but ſuch were the earneſt importunities, and perſuaſive encouragements of divers members of the honourable houſe, (who then deſired to have the petitioner in place of truſt, for his former ſervice to the commonwealth) that the petitioner was conſtrained to accept not only of the place of alderman, but further underwent the office and charge of ſheriff of London, which ſtood the petitioner in 4000 pounds that year.

“But notwithſtanding the aforeſaid promiſes and intents of the parliament to give the petitioner ſatisfaction, ſuch were the great compulſive exigents, and urgent neceſſities of thoſe times, cauſed by the publick diſtractions, that the ſaid monies were converted to the publick uſe. Therefore the parliament deſired the petitioner to have a little patience, promiſing him ſpeedy ſatisfaction as well for the forbearance as for the principal debt. But the diſtractions continuing, the petitioner had neither intereſt nor any part of his principal. The parliament in the year 1648. in part of ſatisfaction, ſettled the petitioner in the office of ſurveyor and check in the Cuſtom-Houſe of London, then worth at leaſt 600 l. per annum; but the petitioner having enjoyed that place only eight months, was cauſeleſly ouſted by ſiniſter information of intruders, who have enjoyed that office and divided the profit thereof between them ever ſince that intruſion.

“Moreover, the late king, by privy-ſeal, owes to the petitioner's wife (who is the relict of Mr. Thomas Ferrer) for linnen cloth 5000*l.* and for money lent 1200 l. for which ſhe was aſſigned ſatisfaction out of the cuſtoms of tobacco. Beſides, ſhe was further aſſigned out of Sir Thomas Dawes office one hundred marks per annum. All which debts likewiſe lie wholly unſatisfied, to the petitioner's great prejudice.

“Beſides the aforeſaid loſſes, hinderances, expences, ſufferings, and forbearances of the profit of the ſaid office, the petitioner from time to time hath laid out himſelf for the common good, in acting, lending, ſpending, (and ſerving) when others refuſed; expoſed himſelf to that eminent danger at Branford, by leading out a troop of horſe for the privileges, liberties, and rights of the city of London and commonwealth, inſomuch, that thereby, and for want of his ſatisfaction aforeſaid, the petitioner, having conſumed his eſtate, hath been conſtrained to ſell and mortgage ſome part of his lands to pay creditors, and to maintain his family, having a wife and nine children; and is likely to be undone for obeying the parliament's commands, unleſs by the juſtice and commiſeration of this honourable aſſembly he be ſpeedily relieved and righted; for that ever ſince the ſaid reported ſum, the petitioner from time to time hath made his humble addreſſes to the ſupreme powers for the time being, for ſatisfaction thereof, and to be reſtored to the ſaid office, but could not prevail.

“The petitioner therefore humbly prays, that he may not periſh for acting for the public good according to the declaration of parliament; but that now after twenty-ſix years ſuffering, whereof twelve years in fruitleſs and weariſome waitings, this honourable aſſembly would now be pleaſed to take the unparalleled ſufferings of the petitioner into their grave conſiderations, for ſome ſpeedy courſe for the petitioner's ſatisfaction, to pay his debts, and redeem his lands, by ordering him the one moiety of his debt in ready money out of the daily cuſtoms of London, (from whence his firſt loſſes and ſufferings ſprang) and the other moiety to be diſcompted upon ſuch goods as the petitioner ſhall make entries of by exportation or importation in the Cuſtom-Houſe, London, until his debt with the intereſt be fully ſatisfied and paid; or any other ſpeedy way, as in your grave wiſdoms ſhall ſeem meet: and in like manner for his wife's debt, which is to pay debts and legacies: and that the petitioner may forthwith be reſtored to, and ſettled in the ſaid office, and have reparations from the intruders.

“Sept. 6. 1654. Richard Chambers.”

The petitioner being wearied out with twelve years attendance upon one parliament, in hopes of reparation for his impriſonment, troubles, and loſſes, during the eleven years former interval of parliament, in ſtanding for the liberty of the ſubject, grew infirm; and being not relieved, was reduced to a low eſtate and condition. He died in ſummer 1658, being about the age of ſeventy years.

XXIII. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber againſt Dr. ALEXANDER LEIGHTON, for a Libel, 4 June, 6 Cha. I. 1630.

[The following report of this caſe is extracted from 2 Ruſhworth, 55. Mrs. Macaulay, in her hiſtory, comments on the proceedings againſt Dr. Leighton with great ſeverity. 2 Macaul. Hiſt. 91. Indeed the cruelty of the ſentence is beyond excuſe.]

AN information formerly exhibited in the Star-Chamber againſt Alexander Leighton, a Scotſman born, and a doctor of divinity came to be heard the 4th of June in the court of Star-Chamber, for framing a book entitled, An Appeal to the Parliament, or a Plea againſt Prelacy, which he printed and publiſhed, during the ſitting of the laſt parliament: and delivered it to diverſe perſons in a way of preſenting juſt complaints (as he gave out) to the then commons houſe of parliament, 4 Carol. 1.

The defendant was charged by the ſaid information with framing, publiſhing, and diſperſing a ſcandalous book againſt king, peers, and prelates, wherein amongſt other things he ſets forth theſe falſe and ſeditious aſſertions and poſitions following.

1. ‘That we do not read of greater perſecution and higher indignity done upon God's people in any nation profeſſing the Goſpel, than in this our iſland, eſpecially ſince the death of queen Elizabeth.

2. ‘He terms the prelates of this realm men of blood, and enemies to God and the ſtate, and ſaith, that the maintaining and eſtabliſhing of biſhops within this realm is a main and maſter-ſin eſtabliſhed by law, and that miniſters ſhould have no voices in council deliberative and deciſive.

3. ‘He avowed the prelacy of our church to be antichriſtian and ſatanical; and terms the biſhops, ravens and magpies, that prey upon the ſtate.

4. ‘He terms the canons of our church, made anno 1603, nonſenſe canons.

5. ‘He diſallowed and contemned the ceremony of kneeling in the receiving of the ſacrament, alledging that the ſuggeſtion of falſe fears to the king by the prelacy, and the ſeeking of their own unlawful ſtanding, brought forth that received ſpawn of the beaſt, kneeling at the receiving of the ſacrament.

6. ‘He affirms that the prelates did corrupt the king, foreſtalling his judgment againſt God and goodneſs; and moſt audaciouſly and wickedly calleth his majeſty's royal conſort, our gracious queen, the daughter of Heth.

7. ‘He moſt impiouſly ſeems to commend him that committed the barbarous and bloody act of murdering the late duke of Buckingham; and to encourage others to ſecond him in the like wicked and deſperate attempt, to the deſtruction of others.

8. ‘He layeth a moſt ſeditious ſcandal upon the king, ſtate, and kingdom, wickedly affirming, that all that paſs by us ſpoil us, and we ſpoil all that rely upon us; and amongſt other particulars, inſtanceth the black pining death of the famiſhed Rochelers, to the number of 15000 in four months: by which paſſages and wicked poſitions and aſſertions, he did, as much as in him lay, ſcandalize his majeſties ſacred perſon, his religious wiſe and juſt government, the perſon of his royal conſort the queen, the perſons of the lords and peers of this realm, eſpecially the reverend biſhops.

9. ‘That in another place of the ſaid book, endeavouring to ſlander not only his majeſty's ſacred perſon and government, but alſo to detract from his royal power, in making laws and canons for government eccleſiaſtical, and in matters concerning the church, he ſaith, that the church hath her laws from the ſcripture, and that no king may make laws in the houſe of God: for if they might, then the ſcripture might be imperfect.

10. ‘And further charged, that in another place of the ſaid book, thinking to ſalve all with an expreſſion of his ſacred majeſty, he hath theſe words following; what pity it is, and indelible diſhonour it will be to you the ſtates repreſentative, that ſo ingenious and tractable a king ſhould be ſo monſtrouſly abus'd, to the undoing of himſelf and his ſubjects?’

Dr. Leighton's anſwer. The defendant in his anſwer confeſſed the writing of the book, but with no ſuch ill intention, as by the ſaid information is ſuggeſted; his end therein being only to remonſtrate certain grievances in church and ſtate, under which the people ſuffered, to the end the parliament might take them into conſideration, and ſo give ſuch redreſs, as might be for the honour of the king, the quiet of the people, and the peace of the church.

June 4. At the hearing of the cauſe, the defendent's anſwer was read at large, and the aforeſaid particulars charged in the information as ſeditious and ſcandalous, were alſo read out of the book. After which the court proceeded to give ſentence, and did there declare, that it evidently appeared upon proof, that the defendent had printed five or ſix hundred of the ſaid books, and that in their opinions he had committed a moſt odious and heinous offence, deſerving the ſevereſt puniſhment the court could inflict, for framing and publiſhing a book ſo full of moſt peſtilent, deviliſh and dangerous aſſertions, to the ſcandal of the king, queen and peers, eſpecially the biſhops.

The two lord chief juſtices being preſent, delivered their opinions, that they would without any ſcruple have proceeded againſt the defendent as for treaſon committed by him, if it had come before them; and other lords expreſsly affirm'd, that it was his majeſties exceeding great mercy and goodneſs, that he was brought to receive the cenſure of this court, and not queſtioned at another tribunal as a traitor.

And their lordſhips by an unanimous conſent adjudged and decreed, that Dr. Leighton ſhould be committed to the priſon of the Fleet, there to remain during life, unleſs his majeſty ſhall be graciouſly pleaſed to enlarge him; and he ſhall pay a fine of 10000 l. to his majeſty's uſe.

And in reſpect the defendent hath heretofore entered into the miniſtry, and this court, for the reverence of that calling, doth not uſe to inflict any corporal or ignominious puniſhment upon any perſon, ſo long as they continue in orders, the court doth refer him to the High-commiſſion, there to be degraded of his miniſtry; and that being done, he ſhall then alſo for further puniſhment and example to others, be brought into the pillory at Weſtminſter, (the court ſitting) and there whipped, and after his whipping be ſet upon the pillory for ſome convenient ſpace, and have one of his ears cut off, and his noſe ſlit, and be branded in the face with a double S S, for a ſower of ſedition; and ſhall then be carried to the priſon of the Fleet, and at ſome other convenient time afterwards ſhall be carried into the pillory at Cheapſide, upon a market-day, and be there likewiſe whipt, and then be ſet upon the pillory, and have his other ear cut off, and from thence be carried back to the priſon of the Fleet, there to remain during life, unleſs his majeſty ſhall be graciouſly pleaſed to inlarge him.

This ſentence being given toward the end of Trinity-Term, and the court not uſually ſitting after the term, unleſs upon emergent occaſions, and it requiring ſome time in the Eccleſiaſtical court, in order to the degradation of the defendent, it was Michaelmas-Term following before any part of the ſentence could be put in execution; but November the 4th he was accordingly degraded, and on Wedneſday November the 10th (being a Star-Chamber day) he was to have undergone the execution of this ſentence; but the evening before he eſcaped out of the Fleet, where he had been kept a cloſe priſoner, and information hereof being given to the lords of the privy-council, they ordered this hue and cry to be printed to retake him.

A hue and cry againſt Dr. Leighton, by order of the privy-council.

Whereas Alexander Leighton, a Scottiſh man born, who was lately ſentenced by the honourable court of Star-Chamber, to pay a great fine to his majeſty, and to undergo corporal puniſhment, for writing, printing, and publiſhing a very libellous and ſcandalous book againſt the king, and his government, hath this eleventh day of November eſcaped out of the priſon of the Fleet, where he was a priſoner: theſe are in his majeſties name to require and command all juſtices of peace, mayors, ſheriffs, bayliffs, cuſtomers, ſearchers and officers of the ports, and all other his majeſties loving ſubjects, to uſe all diligence for the apprehending of the ſaid Alexander Leighton; and being apprehended, ſafely to keep him in cuſtody, until his majeſty ſhall receive notice thereof, and ſhall give further direction concerning him. He is a man of low ſtature, fair complexion; he hath a yellowiſh beard, a high forehead, between forty and fifty years of age.

This hue and cry followed him to Bedfordſhire, where he was apprehended, and brought again a priſoner to the Fleet. Concerning whoſe eſcape, and executing of the ſentence upon him afterwards, the biſhop of London in his Diary, on the fourth of November, makes this memorial, viz.

'Leighton was degraded at the High-commiſſion, Tueſday the 9th of November; that night Leighton broke out of the Fleet, the warden ſays he got or was helped over the wall, and moreover profeſſed he knew not this till Wedneſday noon, he told it not me till Thurſday night. He was taken again in Bedfordſhire, and brought back to the Fleet, within a fortnight. Friday, November the 16th, part of his ſentence was executed upon him in this manner, in the new palace at Weſtminſter, in term time:

1. 'He was ſeverely whipt before he was put in the pillory.
2. 'Being ſet in the pillory, he had one of his ears cut off.
3. 'One ſide of his noſe ſlit.
4. 'Branded on one cheek with a red hot iron, with the letters S S; ſignifying a ſtirrer up of ſedition, and afterwards carried back again priſoner to the Fleet, to be kept in cloſe cuſtody.

'And on that day ſeven night, his ſores upon his back, ear, noſe, and face being not cured, he was whipt again at the pillory in Cheapſide, and there had the remainder of his ſentence executed upon him, by cutting off the other ear, ſlitting the other ſide of the noſe, and branding the other cheek.'

The ſevere puniſhment of this unfortunate gentleman many people pitied, he being a perſon well known both for learning, and other abilities; only his untempered zeal (as his country-men then gave out) prompted him to that miſtake, for which the neceſſity of affairs at that time required this ſeverity from the hand of the magiſtrate, more than perhaps the crime would do in a following juncture.

Afterwards thoſe who procured his eſcape were taken and brought into the Star-Chamber, and proceeded againſt, viz.

Attor. regis ore tenus verſus. Levingſton & alios. The defendents practiſing with one Leighton, a notable offender, to procure his eſcape out of the Fleet; Levingſton put off his cloak, hat and breeches, being all of a grey colour, and Anderſon his doublet, and Leighton put theirs on, and in that diſguiſe they all went out of the Fleet unſuſpected; but were afterwards taken again, and for theſe offences, and reſpect had of their penitency, they were only fined 500 l. a-piece, and committed to the Fleet during the king's pleaſure. (a) Star-chamber.

(a) In 1641 the houſe of commons came to ſeveral reſolutions in condemnation of the proceedings againſt Dr. Leighton. Particularly, they reſolved, that the fine and corporal puniſhment and impriſonment by the ſentence of the Star-Chamber were illegal, and that he ought to have ſatisfaction for his ſufferings and damages. *Journ. XXIV. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber, 29 May, 6 Cha. I. 1630, againſt the Earl of BEDFORD, the Earl of CLARE, the Earl of SOMERSET, Sir ROBERT COTTON, JOHN SELDEN, Eſq; OLIVER ST. JOHN, Eſq; and others, for publiſhing a ſeditious and ſcandalous Writing.

[The written piece, which gave occaſion to theſe proceedings, was a moſt unconſtitutional project for advancing the king's prerogative and revenue. It appears to have been ſent over from Italy by the famous ſir Robert Dudley, ſon of queen Elizabeth's favourite the earl of Leiceſter; and ſir Robert is ſuppoſed to have been the author; though if that was really ſo, it highly reflects on one, who on other accounts is tranſmitted to us with high encomiums for his mental endowments and accompliſhments, as the reader will ſee by conſulting ſir William Dugdale. See 2 Dugd. Baron. 222. It is probable, that the proſecution was commenced, in order to exculpate both James and Charles the Firſt, with their reſpective miniſters, from the imputation of approving of the project. It may ſeem ſurprizing to the reader, that ſuch perſons as Mr. Selden, and the other defendants named, except the earl of Somerſet, ſhould lie under a ſuſpicion of countenancing propoſitions ſo irreconcileable with their political profeſſions and conduct at the time. But, as there can be no reaſon for ſuppoſing that they gave their approbation to ſuch arbitrary propoſals, perhaps they were included in the proſecution from a ſuſpicion of having encouraged a belief, that the king ſecretly favoured the ſcheme and meditated to execute it. On conſulting the book intitled the Annals of James and Charles the Firſt, we obſerve that the author adopts a like conſtruction, adding that the piece in queſtion was written by ſir Robert Dudley at Florence, in 1613. See page 361.

We ſhall now lay before the reader, firſt the writing which was the cauſe of the proſecution; and ſecondly the account of the proceedings in the Star-Chamber; for both of which we are obliged to Mr. Ruſhworth.]

A Propoſition for his Majeſty's Service to bridle the Impertinence of Parliaments.

THE propoſition for your majeſty's ſervice, containeth two parts: the one to ſecure your ſtate, and to bridle the impertinency of parliaments: the other, to increaſe your majeſty's revenue, much more than it is.

1. Touching the firſt, having conſidered divers means, I find none ſo important to ſtrengthen your majeſty's regal authority, againſt all oppoſitions and practiſes of troubleſome ſpirits, and to bridle them, than to fortify your kingdom, by having a fortreſs in every chief town, and important place thereof, furniſhed with ordnance, munition, and faithful men, as they ought to be, with all other circumſtances fit for to be digeſted in a buſineſs of this nature; ordering withal, the trained ſoldiers of the country to be united in one dependency with the ſaid fort, as well to ſecure their beginning, as to ſuccour them in any occaſion of ſuſpect; and alſo to retain and keep their arms for more ſecurity, whereby the countries are no leſs to be brought in ſubjection, than the cities themſelves, and conſequently the whole kingdom; your majeſty having by this courſe the power thereof in your own hands. The reaſons of the ſuggeſts are theſe. 1. That in policy, there is a greater tie of the people by force and neceſſity, than merely by love and affection; for by the one, the government reſteth always ſecure; but by the other, no longer than the people are contented. 2. It forceth obſtinate ſubjects to be no more preſumptuous, then it pleaſeth your majeſty to permit them. 3. That to leave a ſtate unfurniſhed, is, to give the bridle thereof to the ſubjects; when, by the contrary, it reſteth only in the prince's hands. 4. That modern fortreſſes take long time in winning, with ſuch charge and difficulty, as no ſubjects in theſe times have means probable to attempt them. 5. That it is a ſure remedy againſt rebellion, and popular mutinies, or againſt foreign powers; becauſe they cannot well ſucceed, when by this courſe the apparent means is taken away to force the king and ſubject upon a doubtful fortune of a ſet battle, as was the cauſe that moved the pretended invaſion againſt the land, attempted by the king of Spain in the year 1588. 6. That your majeſty's government is the more ſecure, by the people's more ſubjection; and by their ſubjection, your parliament muſt be forced conſequently to alter their ſtyle, and to be conformable to your will and pleaſure; for their words and oppoſition import nothing, where the power is in your majeſty's own hands, to do with them what you pleaſe; being indeed the chief purpoſe of this diſcourſe, and the ſecret intent thereof, fit to be concealed from any Engliſh at all, either counſellors of ſtate, or other.

For theſe, and divers other weighty reaſons, it may be conſidered in this place, to make your majeſty more powerful and ſtrong, ſome orders be obſerved, that are uſed in fortified countries, the government whereof imports as much as the ſtates themſelves, I mean, in times of doubt or ſuſpect, which are theſe. Imprimis, that none wear arms or weapons at all, either in city or country, but ſuch as your majeſty may think fit to priviledge, and they to be enrolled. 2. That as many highways as conveniently may be done, be made paſſable through thoſe cities and towns fortified, to conſtrain the paſſengers to travel through them. 3. That the ſoldiers of fortreſſes be ſometimes choſen of another nation, if ſubject to the ſame prince; but howſoever, not to be born in the ſame province, or within forty or fifty miles of the fortreſs, and not to have friends or correſpondency near it. 4. That at all the gates of each walled town be appointed officers, not to ſuffer any unknown paſſengers to paſs, without a ticket, ſhewing from whence he came, and whither to go. And that the gates of each city be ſhut all night, and keys kept by the mayor or governor. 5. Alſo innkeepers to deliver the names of all unknown paſſengers that lodge in their houſes; and if they ſtay ſuſpiciouſly at any time, to preſent them to the governor: whereby dangerous perſons ſeeing theſe ſtrict courſes, will be more wary of their actions, and thereby miſchievous attempts will be prevented. All which being referred to your majeſty's wiſe conſideration, it is meet for me withal to give you ſome ſatisfaction of the charge and time to perform what is purpoſed, that you may not be diſcouraged in the difficulty of the one, or prolongation of the other; both which doubts are reſolved in one and the ſame reaſon, in reſpect that, in England, each chief town commonly hath a ruinated caſtle, well ſeated for ſtrength, whoſe foundation and ſtones remaining, may be both quickly repaired for this uſe, and with little charge and induſtry made ſtrong enough, I hope, for this purpoſe, within the ſpace of one year; by adding withal bulwarks and rampiers for the ordnance, according to the rules of fortification. The ordnance for theſe forts may be of iron, not to diſfurniſh your majeſty's navy, or be at a greater charge than is needful.

To maintain yearly the fort, I make account an ordinary pay, three thouſand men will be ſufficient, and will require forty thouſand pound charge per annum, or thereabouts, being an expence that inferior princes undergo, for their neceſſary ſafety. All which prevention, added to the invincible ſea-force your majeſty hath already, and may have, will make you the moſt powerful and obeyed king of the world: which I could likewiſe confirm by many examples, but I omit them for brevity, and not to confuſe your majeſty with too much matter. Your majeſty may find by the ſcope of this diſcourſe, the means ſhewed in general to bridle your ſubjects, that may be either diſcontent or obſtinate. So likewiſe am I to conclude the ſame intent particularly, againſt the perverſeneſs of your parliament, as well to ſuppreſs that pernicious humour, as to avoid their oppoſitions againſt your profit, being the ſecond part to be diſcourſed on: and therefore have firſt thought fit, for better prevention thereof, to make known to your majeſty the purpoſe of a general oath your ſubjects may take, for ſure avoiding of all rubs, that may hinder the concluſion of theſe buſineſſes. It is further meant, that no ſubject, upon pain of high treaſon, may refuſe the ſame oath, containing only matter of allegiance, and not ſcruples in points of conſcience, that may give pretence not to be denied. The effect of the oath is this, that all your majeſty's ſubjects do acknowledge you to be as abſolute a king and monarch within your dominions, as is among the Chriſtian princes; and your prerogative as great; whereby you may and ſhall of yourſelf, by your majeſty's proclamation, as well as other ſovereign princes doing the like, either make laws, or reverſe any made, with any other act ſo great a monarch as yourſelf may do, and that without further conſent of a parliament, or need to call them at all in ſuch caſes; conſidering, that the parliament in all matters, excepting cauſes to be ſentenced at the higheſt court, ought to be ſubject unto your majeſty's will, to give the negative or affirmative concluſion, and not be conſtrained by their impertinencies to any inconvenience, appertaining to your majeſty's regal authority; and this, notwithſtanding any bad pretence or cuſtom to the contrary in practiſe, which indeed were fitter to be offered a prince elected, without other right, than to your majeſty, born ſucceſſively king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and your heirs for ever; and ſo received, not only of your ſubjects, but alſo of the whole world. How neceſſary the dangerous ſupremacy of parliament's uſurpation is to be prevented, the example of Lewis the eleventh, king of France, doth manifeſt, who found the like oppoſition as your majeſty doth, and by his wiſdom ſuppreſſed it. And to the purpoſe here intended, which is not to put down altogether parliaments and their authority, being in many caſes very neceſſary and fit; but to abridge them ſo far, as they ſeek to derogate from your majeſty's regal authority, and advancement of your greatneſs; the caution in offering the aforeſaid oath, may require ſome policy, for the eaſier paſſage at firſt, either by ſingular or particular tractation; and that ſo near about one time over the land, as one government may not know what the other intendeth; ſo it may paſs the eaſier, by having no time of combination or oppoſition. There is another means alſo more certain than this, to bring to paſs the oath more eaſily, as alſo your profit, and what elſe pretended; which here I omit for brevity, requiring a long diſcourſe by itſelf, and have ſet it down in particular inſtructions to inform your majeſty.

2. The ſecond part of this diſcourſe is, touching your majeſty's profit, after your ſtate is ſecured: wherein I ſhould obſerve both ſome reaſonable content to the people, as alſo conſider the great expences that princes have now-a-days, more than in times paſt, to maintain their greatneſs, and ſafety of their ſubjects, who, if they have not wit or will to conſider their own intereſt ſo much indifferently, your majeſty's wiſdom muſt repair their defects, and force them to it by compulſion; but I hope there ſhall be no ſuch cauſe, in points ſo reaſonable, to increaſe your majeſty's revenue, wherein I ſet down divers means for your gracious ſelf to make choice of, either all or part at your pleaſure, and to put it in execution by ſuch degrees and cautions, as your great wiſdom ſhall think fit in a buſineſs of this nature.

Imprimis, the firſt means or courſe intended to increaſe your majeſty's revenues or profits withal, is of greateſt conſequence, and I call it a decimation, being ſo termed in Italy, where in ſome part it is in uſe, importing the tenth of all ſubjects eſtates, to be paid as a yearly rent to their prince, and as well monied-men in towns, as landed-men in the countries, their value and eſtates eſteemed juſtly as it is to the true value, though with reaſon; and this paid yearly in money: which courſe applied in England for your majeſty's ſervice, may ſerve inſtead of ſubſidies, fifteens, and ſuch like, which in this caſe are fit to be releaſed, for the ſubjects benefit and content, in recompence of the ſaid decima, which will yield your majeſty more in certainty, than they do caſually, by five hundred thouſand pounds per annum at the leaſt. Item, that when your majeſty hath gotten money into your hands by ſome courſes to be ſet down, it would be a profitable courſe to encreaſe your entrada, to buy out all eſtates and leaſes upon your own lands, in ſuch ſort, as they be made no loſers; whereby having your lands free, and renting it out to the true value, as it is moſt in uſe, and not employed as heretofore, at an old rent, and ſmall fines, you may then rent it out for at leaſt four or five times more money than the old rent comes unto. So as if your majeſty's lands be already but ſixty thouſand pounds per annum, by this courſe it will be augmented at the leaſt two hundred thouſand pounds per annum; and to buy out the tenants eſtates will come to a ſmall matter by the courſe, to make them no loſers, conſidering the gain they have already made upon the land: and this is the rather to be done, and the preſent courſe changed, becauſe it hath been a cuſtom uſed meerly to couſen the king. Item, whereas moſt princes do receive the benefit of ſalt in their own hands, as a matter of great profit, becauſe they receive it at the loweſt price poſſible, and vent it at double gain yearly; the ſame courſe uſed by your majeſty, were worth at leaſt one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds per annum. It is likewiſe in other parts, that all weights and meaſures of the land, either in private houſes, ſhops, or public markets, ſhould be viewed to be juſt, and ſealed once a year, paying to the prince for it; which in England, applied to your majeſty, with order to pay ſixpence for the ſealing of each ſaid weight or meaſure, would yield near ſixty thouſand pounds per annum. Item, tho' all countries pay a gabella for tranſportation of cloth, and ſo likewiſe in England; yet, in Spain, there is impoſt upon the wools, which in England is ſo great a wealth and benefit to the ſheep-maſters, as they may well pay you five pounds per cent. of the true value at the ſhearing, which I conceive may be worth one hundred and forty thouſand pounds per annum. Item, whereas the lawyers fees and gains in England be exceſſive, to your ſubjects prejudice; it were better for your majeſty to make uſe thereof, and impoſe on all cauſes ſentenced with the party, to pay five pounds per cent. of the true value that the cauſe hath gained him; and for recompence thereof, to limit all lawyers fees and gettings, whereby the ſubject ſhall ſave more in fees and charges, then he giveth to your majeſty in the gabella, which I believe may be worth, one year with another, fifty thouſand pounds. Item, whereas the inns and victualling-houſes in England are more chargeable to the travellers than in other countries, it were good for your majeſty to limit them to certain ordinaries, and raiſe beſides a large impoſition, as is uſed in Tuſcany, and other parts; that is, a prohibiting all inns and victualling-houſes, but ſuch as ſhall pay it; and to impoſe upon the chief inns and taverns, to pay ten pounds a-year to your majeſty, and the worſt five pounds per annum, and all ale-houſes twenty ſhillings per annum, more or leſs, as they are in cuſtom. Of all ſorts there are ſo many in England, that this impoſt may well yield one hundred thouſand pounds per annum to your majeſty. Item, in Tuſcany, and other parts, there is a gabella of all cattle, or fleſh, and horſes ſold in markets, paying three or four per cent. of what they are ſold for, which by conjecture may be worth in England, two hundred thouſand pounds per annum; uſing the like cuſtom upon fiſh, and other victuals, (bread excepted) and for this cauſe, fleſh, and fiſh, and victuals in the markets, to be priſed and ſold by weight, whereby the ſubject ſaveth more in not being couſened, than the impoſition impaireth them. Item, in Tuſcany is uſed a taxation of ſeven per cent. upon all alienation of lands to the true value. As alſo ſeven per cent. upon all dowries, or marriage-monies. The like, if it be juſtly uſed in England, were worth at leaſt one hundred thouſand pounds per annum; with many other taxations upon meal, and upon all merchandiſes in all towns, as well as port-towns, which here I omit, with divers others, as not ſo fit for England. And in ſatisfaction of the ſubject for theſe taxes, your majeſty may be pleaſed to releaſe them of wardſhips, and to enjoy all their eſtates at eighteen years old; and in the mean time, their profits to be preſerved for their own benefit. And alſo in forfeitures of eſtate by condemnation, your majeſty may releaſe the ſubject, as not to take the forfeiture of their lands, but their goods, high treaſon only excepted; and to allow the counſel of lawyers in caſe of life and death; as alſo not to be condemned without two witneſſes, with ſuch like benefit, which importeth much more their good than all the taxations named can prejudice them. Item, ſome of the former taxations, uſed in Ireland and in Scotland, as may eaſily be brought about by the firſt example thereof uſed in England, may very well be made to increaſe your revenue there, more than it is, by two hundred thouſand pounds per annum. Item, all offices in the land, great and ſmall, in your majeſty's grant, may be granted, with condition, to pay you a part yearly, according to the value: this, in time, may be worth (as I conceive) one hundred thouſand pounds per annum: adding alſo notaries, attornies, and ſuch like, to pay ſome proportion yearly towards it, for being allowed by your majeſty to practiſe, and prohibiting elſe any to practiſe in ſuch places. Item, to reduce your majeſty's houſhold to board-wages, as moſt other princes do, reſerving ſome few tables; this will ſave your majeſty ſixty thouſand pounds per annum, and eaſe greatly the ſubject beſides, both in carriages and proviſion, which is a good reaſon, that your majeſty in honour might do it. Item, I know an aſſured courſe in your majeſty's navy, which may ſave at leaſt forty thouſand pounds per annum, which requiring a whole diſcourſe by itſelf, I omit; only promiſe you to do it, whenſoever you command. Item, whereas your majeſty's laws do command the ſtrict keeping of faſting-days, you may alſo prohibit on thoſe days to eat eggs, cheeſe, and white-meats, but only ſuch as are contented to pay eighteen pence a year for the liberty to eat them, and the better ſort ten ſhillings. The employment of this may be for the defence of the land, in maintaining the navy, garriſons, and ſuch like, much after the faſhion of a Cruſado in Spain, as your majeſty knoweth, being firſt begun there, under the pretence to defend the land againſt the Moors. And the ſame uſed in England, as aforeſaid, may very well yield, one year with another, one hundred thouſand pounds, without any diſguſt to any, becauſe it is at every one's choice to give it or no. Laſtly, I have a courſe upon the Catholicks, and very ſafe for your majeſty, being with their good-liking, as it may be wrought, to yield you preſently at leaſt two hundred thouſand pounds per annum, by raiſing a certain value upon their lands, and ſome other impoſitions; which requiring a long diſcourſe by itſelf, I will omit it here, ſetting it down in my inſtructions. It will ſave your majeſty at leaſt one hundred thouſand pounds per annum, to make it pain of death, and confiſcation of goods and lands, for any of the officers to couſen you, which now is much to be feared they do, or elſe they could not be ſo rich; and herein to allow a fourth part benefit to them that ſhall find out the couſenage. Here is not meant officers of ſtate, as the lord treaſurer, &c. being officers of the crown. The ſum of all this account amounteth unto two millions, or twenty hundred thouſand pounds per annum: ſuppoſe it to be but one million and a half, as aſſuredly your majeſty may make by theſe courſes ſet down, yet it is much more than I promiſed in my letter for your majeſty's ſervice. Beſides, ſome ſums of money in preſent, by the courſes following: imprimis, by the prince's marriage, to make all the earls in England grandees of Spain, and principi, with ſuch like priviledges, and to pay twenty thouſand pounds a-piece for it. 2. As alſo, if you make them fœditaries of the towns belonging to their earldoms, if they will pay for it beſides, as they do to the king of Spain in the kingdom of Naples. And ſo likewiſe barons, to be made earls and peers, to pay nineteen thouſand pounds a-piece, I think might yield five hundred thouſand pounds, and oblige them more ſure to his majeſty. 3. To make choice of two hundred of the richeſt men of England in eſtate, that be not noblemen, and make them titulate, as is uſed in Naples, and paying for it; that is, a duke thirty thouſand pounds, a marqueſs fifteen thouſand pounds, an earl ten thouſand pounds, and a baron or viſcount five thouſand pounds. It is to be underſtood, that the antient nobility of barons, made earls, are to precede theſe as peers, tho' theſe be made marqueſſes or dukes; this may raiſe a million of pounds and more unto your majeſty. To make gentlemen of low quality, and francklins, and rich farmers, eſquires, to precede them, would yield your Majeſty alſo a great ſum of money in preſent. I know another courſe to yield your majeſty at leaſt three hundred thouſand pounds in money, which as yet the time ſerveth not to diſcover, until your majeſty be reſolved to proceed in ſome of the former courſes, which till then I omit. Other courſes alſo, that may make preſent money, I ſhall ſtudy for your majeſty's ſervice, and, as I find them out, acquaint you withal. Laſtly, to conclude all theſe diſcourſes, by the application of this courſe uſed for your profit, that it is not only the means to make you the richeſt king that ever England had, but alſo the ſafety augmented thereby to be moſt ſecure, beſides what was ſhewed in the firſt part of this diſcourſe; I mean, by the occaſion of this taxation, and raiſing of monies, your majeſty ſhall have cauſe and means to imploy in all places of the land ſo many officers and miniſters, to be obliged to you for their own good and intereſt, as nothing can be attempted againſt your perſon, or royal ſtate, over land, but ſome of them ſhall, in all probability, have means to find it out, and hinder it. Beſides, this courſe will detect many diſorders and abuſes in the public government, which were hard to be diſcovered by men indifferent. To prohibit gorgeous and coſtly apparel to be worn, but by perſons of good quality, ſhall ſave the gentry of the kingdom much more money, than they ſhall be taxed to pay unto your majeſty. Thus withal I take my leave, and kiſs your gracious hands, deſiring pardon for my error I may commit herein.

Extract from Ruſhworth's Hiſtorical Collections, vol. 2. page 51.

ON the 29th of May, 1630, a great cauſe was brought to hearing in the Star-Chamber, concerning a diſcourſe, entituled, A Propoſition for his Majeſties Service to bridle the Impertinency of Parliaments. Wherein the king's attorney-general was plaintiff, the earl of Bedford, the earl of Clare, the earl of Somerſet, ſir Robert Cotton, John Selden, Oliver St. John, and others, defendants: which diſcourſe we have inſerted at large in the Appendix to the firſt part of Hiſtorical Collections. Here now followeth the anſwers of the defendants, and the judgment of the court thereupon, viz.

After the king's attorney-general opened the aforementioned information, the anſwer of Robert earl of Somerſet to the ſaid information, was alſo opened by his council, to this effect:

That the diſcourſe, as he believed, was either the ſame that was ſhewed him in the time of his attendance near his late majeſty king James, or had many of the ſame things in it: and finding no cauſe of concealing a propoſition made in a former king's time, and having no apprehenſion, that ſcandal to his majeſty, or the preſent government, might thereby happen, he caſually imparted it to the earls of Bedford and Clare, who, after peruſal thereof, delivered their opinion concerning it, at their next meeting; 'that it was a phantaſtick project of ſome brain-ſick traveller, 'who had made collections of ſome princes in Italy, and other foreign 'ſtates, no way ſuitable to the government of this kingdom.'

And further ſaid, that (beſides that one time) there was never any conference, nor any paſſage by letter or otherwiſe, betwixt them concerning it, or with any other perſon, and denied that he either contrived the propoſition, or knew of the contriving thereof, or ever imagined that his majeſty would innovate the antient form of government, diſpoſe of the eſtates of his ſubjects without their conſents, make or repeal laws by proclamation without conſent of parliament, plant garriſons in his principal cities and towns, or put in execution any part of the ſaid diſcourſe: and the reaſon why he did not preſent the diſcourſe to his majeſty, or ſome of the lords of the council, or ſome magiſtrate, was, becauſe he did not conceive the ſame did in any ſort concern the time of his majeſties government, but was contrived in ſome former time, as appeared manifeſtly, by the particulars therein contained; and that about ſixteen or ſeventeen years ago, ſir David Fowles ſhewed him the project, to whom he replied, 'that he was ſatisfied no uſe could be made thereof, and ſo he 'redelivered it, and concluded that the divulging thereof was in his 'opinion pardoned by the general pardon granted upon his now majeſties 'coronation.'

The reſt of the defendents denied any their contrivance thereof, alledging the author (as they were informed) was living beyond ſea, and that they ought not to be queſtioned for it, being writ in the time of king James, and not in reference to his now majeſties government, denying that they had the leaſt thought or intention to ſcandalize the government; for that they rejected the diſcourſe as ſoon as they read it, as a fooliſh and impertinent iſſue of ſome projecting brain; and they averred their deteſtation of ſuch a project, and that they bore loyal hearts to his majeſty, and bleſſed God for the happy and peaceable government under him.

After the publication of the cauſe in order to a hearing, it appeared by the depoſitions of ſir David Fowles, that he received the ſaid writing from one Mr. Yates, in the time of king James, who brought it from ſir Robert Dudly at Florence, together with a letter, deſiring him to deliver it to the earl of Somerſet, that he might communicate it to king James, which was done accordingly, and that in his hearing the earl ſignified a diſlike thereof; and that he received it back from the earl (being the original) and kept it by him till the lords of the council ſent for it, and that he made no copy thereof.

It appeared alſo by the depoſitions of other witneſſes, that this diſcourſe, nine years ago, was bought by them in Little-Britain amongſt other manuſcripts.

So this cauſe coming to hearing, a great preſence of nobility being in court, the attorney-general opened the charge. But before much proceeding, his majeſty ſent word unto the lord keeper Coventry, then in court, that the queen was brought to bed of a ſon, and a private meſſage alſo was delivered to him from the king; whereupon the lord keeper declared in court, that his moſt ſacred majeſty had taken this matter into his moſt ſerious conſideration, and although the ſame was of ſo high a nature, as it was neceſſary to be brought in queſtion, (being contrary to many laws and ſtatutes, and the common law itſelf) yet his majeſty ballancing the ſame in the ſcales of juſtice and mercy (the author of the diſcourſe being diſcovered to live beyond the ſeas) found theſe defendents rather fitting to be objects of his mercy, than juſtice, they being ſome of them noblemen, and ſuch as his majeſty did and doth well eſteem and like of, in his royal opinion: and that his majeſty was the rather inclined to extend his goodneſs, in regard of the time; it having now pleaſed the great juſtice of heaven to bleſs his majeſty and his kingdom with a royal iſſue of his body, a hopeful prince, the great joy and long expectation both of king and kingdom.

Upon this declaration of the king's pleaſure, the lord keeper made known, that the court by his majeſties ſpecial command was to proceed no further in the hearing of this cauſe: but ordered the project, or book, to be burnt, as ſeditious and ſcandalous both to his majeſty, the ſtate, and government of this kingdom. And ordered the proceedings to be taken off the file.

XXV. Proceedings in the Court of Chivalry, on an Appeal of High-Treaſon, by Donald Lord Rea, againſt Mr. DAVID RAMSEY, 7 Cha. I. 1631.

[The following caſe is an inſtance of awarding a trial by duel in the court of Chivalry, though afterwards the duel was prevented. There are two accounts of it, which we ſhall ſubmit to our readers. One is from Sanderſon's Hiſtory of the Life and Reign of Charles the Firſt, page 164. to 173. The other is from Ruſhworth's Hiſtorical Collections, vol. 2. pages 62, 106, 112. Biſhop Burnet relates the hiſtory of the accuſation in his Lives of the Dukes of Hamilton, principally with a view to juſtify the firſt duke of Hamilton, whoſe name was involved in the affair. See Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 11. to 14. The biſhop, it is obſervable, charges Sanderſon with giving a journal of the procedure on lord Rea's appeal, in order to impeach the duke of Hamilton's loyalty. In Ruſhworth there is a letter from Charles the firſt to the duke of Hamilton, which explains what was done in the court of Chivalry, and amply proves, that the king was quite ſatisfied of the duke's innocence. This letter forms a part of Ruſhworth's relation As to the account in the Annals of James and Charles the Firſt, it is merely a copy of Sanderſon, with the addition of the king's letter from Ruſhworth.]

Sanderſon's Relation.

WHEN friends fall out their faults are found, as appears by the quarrell between Donnold lord Rey, a Scotiſh highlander, or rather more northward of the iſles Orkney, and one David Ramſey a true Scot courtier, concerning words and deſigns of treaſon againſt the king and kingdom, which becauſe Ramſey denied, they are admitted the trial by combate, the manner being as followeth.

The day prefixt for trial was the 28 of November, 1631, before Robert earl of Lindſey, lord high chamberlain of England, and now pro tempore deputed lord high conſtable of England.

Thomas earl of Arundel, earl marſhall of England.
The earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain of the kings houſhold.
The earl of Dorſet, chamberlain to the queens houſhold.
The earl of Carlile.
Earl of Malgrave.
Earl of Morton.
Viſcount Wimbleton.
Viſcount Wentworth.
Viſcount Falkland.
Sir Henry Vane.

The place was the Painted Chamber at Weſtminſter: at the upper end thereof a bench was erected four foot high for the conſtable, and marſhal, and lords aſſiſtants. Under them ſeats about a ſquare table, filled with the heralds of arms, and ſerjeants at arms, and other officers of the court. Directly under the upper bench ſate the regiſter doctor Dethick, and over againſt him doctor Duck the kings advocate for the marſhals court. Behinde him at the bar were the two pews for the appellant and defendant.

At eight a clock comes the earl marſhal (uſhered in with nine heralds, and three ſerjeants at arms) bearing his marſhal truncheon of gold, tipped with black, and commanding room, and giving orders, retired into the upper houſe of parliament, and then returned into the court, as to make way for the high conſtable, who followed, and all took place in their degrees.

The earl marſhal riſes, makes obedience to the conſtable, and paſſing forward meets ſir William Seager king of heralds, and both of them preſent to the conſtable his commiſſion, which he received with his hat off: and delivered it to the regiſter to reade, in effect,

That his majeſty being informed by Donnold lord Rey, how David Ramſey eſquire, had plotted, and was privy unto divers treaſons and conſpiracies againſt his royal perſon, government, and kingdoms. In the ſearch whereof the king had uſed all ways and means for the diſcovery of the truth: the one of them accuſing, the other denying, and ſo no certain ſecurity to his own perſon and his ſubjects: therefore he doth authorize the ſaid Robert Bartie earl of Lindſey lord high conſtable, for to call unto him Thomas earl of Arundel earl marſhal, and with him ſuch other peers, ſheriffs, and officers, as he thinks fit, to hold a marſhal's court, for ſifting the truth between the ſaid parties, &c.

Then the king of heralds delivers to the conſtable, his ſilver verge or ſtaff, half a yard in length, headed with a crown of gold. Then the earl marſhal delivered a key to a herald, to fetch in the appellant uſhered in by the herald, and accompanied with his ſureties, ſir Pierce Crosby, ſir Walter Crosby, ſir William Forbiez, ſir Robert Gordon, and ſir William Evers. He was apparelled in black velvet trimmed with ſilver buttons, his ſword in a ſilver imbroidered belt, in his order of a Scotiſh baronet, about his neck, and ſo with reverence entered into his pew. His council doctor Reeves ſtanding by. His behaviour (like himſelf, tall, ſwarthy, black, but comely) very port-like and of ſtaid countenance.

The defendant was alike uſhered in by another herald. His ſureties were the lord Roxborough and lord Abercorn: and his deport like himſelf, ſtern and brave, a fair, ruddy, yellow-headed buſh of hair, (ſo large, and in thoſe days unuſual, that he was called Ramſey Redhead). His apparel ſcarlet, over-laced with ſilver, the ground hardly diſcerned, and lined with ſky-coloured pluſh, but unarmed, without a ſword. After his reverence to the court, he faced the appellant, who alike ſterned a countenance at him.

After O yes! the earl marſhal told them the effect of the commiſſion, and the power of this court, which was not of any ſtrange nature, but legal and juſtifiable as any other trial in Weſtminſter-Hall; and that there had been no more nor other trials of this kinde of late, we were to attribute it to Gods goodneſs, the juſtice of the king, and loyalty of the ſubject, with the providence of ſtate, and wiſhed there might be no more in time to come; and that to expect any combate, this court he hoped would prevent it by the diſcovery of the light, and ſo magna eſt veritas, & prævalebit.

He referred the further proceedings unto doctor Duck, the kings advocate, who ſpake thus in effect.

That the kings majeſty had committed the trial of the buſineſs to your grace my lord high conſtable, the earl marſhal, and this court, which courſe was warrantable by the laws of other nations, and alſo by our own, who have uſed the ſame manner of trial.

That our law admitted ſundry proofs for treaſon, which in other matters it did not: that all ſubjects were bound to diſcover treaſons: and cited two ancient civilians, Hieronymus and Tiberius, who gave their reaſons for this kinde of trial. And he mentioned ſundry records of our own chronicles and examples herein, as the duke of Norfolk combating againſt the duke of Hartford in Henry 4. his time; Jo. Ely and William Scroop againſt Ballamon at Burdeaux, the king being there; the lord Morley impeached Mountague earl of Saliſbury; and that Thomas of Walſingham and Thomas of Woodſtock in their learned writings, expreſſed ſundry preſidents for this manner of proceeding; wiſhing the court in Gods name to go on to the trial, and the appellant to give in his evidence.

Then the appellant came up upon the table, to whom the earl marſhal delivered the petition, which he had the day before exhibited to the king. And the defendant being alſo called up, the petition was read, which was in effect, that he having accuſed Ramſey of treaſon, and alſo Meldram his kinſman, and of confederacy, againſt whom captain Nothwick was witneſs, therefore had deſired, that the court would proceed againſt Meldram firſt.

But he was told by the court, that their caſes differing, the appellant was ordered to deliver in his charge againſt the defendant, which he did, in writing by bill, containing ſundry particulars, viz.

That in May laſt in the Low-Countreys, Ramſey complained to him againſt the court of England.

That the matters of church and ſtate was ſo out of frame as muſt tend to a change, if not deſolation.

That therefore he had abandoned the kingdom, to live where now he was, and to expect a mutation forthwith, to which end he had brought preſent moneys to maintain him at ſix pounds a day for three years. That marqueſs Hamilton had a great army promiſed to him, for pay whereof the king had given in hand ten thouſand pound, and all the wine cuſtomes in Scotland for ſixteen years, preſently to be ſold for the armies ſubſiſtence. And that he ſtaid but for ammunition and powder to come over, for which his lordſhip was to mediate with his majeſty of Sweden and the States, and then link themſelves together, of whoſe minde Rey ſhould know hereafter.

That their friends in Scotland had gotten therefore arms and powder out of England, and that what he ſhould procure in Holland was to be brought over by the marqueſs; and that all Scotland were ſure to them except three.

That France and Spain thirſted for England, but Hamilton would defeat them for himſelf. His onely fear was of Denmark, where he meant to land, and either to take him off, or make a party.

That afterwards at Amſterdam, Ramſey with Alexander Hamilton ſolicited him the lord Rey to be true to them, and to be of their council, though as yet they durſt not reveal too much of Hamilton's ſecrets, but if he repaired to England, he would intruſt him with letters; and that his brother in law Sea-port knew all.

This being the effect of the charge. He added,

That if Ramſey would deny it, he was a villain and a traitour, which he would make good. And therewith caſt him his glove.

Ramſey denied all, and ſaid, Rey was a liar, a barbarous villain, and threw down his glove, proteſting, to gar him dy for it, if he had had him in place for that purpoſe.

Rey was temperate, without any paſſion, but ſmiling, replied, Mr. Ramſey, we will not contend here. Anſwer to my bill.

Then Ramſey offered ſome reaſons of the impoſſibility of the charge, the ſlender numbers of men from England, but ſix thouſand raw ſouldiers, againſt three kingdoms, whom the firſt proclamation might diſſipate. That the marqueſs was neither ſo wicked, nor weak in judgment: and if he ſhould conceit to ſurprize the king, what hope had he againſt his children and kindred? And therefore (ſaid he) my lord Rey is a barbarous villain, and a liar, and he will gar him dy for it, or loſe his deareſt bloud.

He was interrupted by the earl marſhal, telling him, he muſt not ſtand upon conjectures, but anſwer the bill of form according to law, and was adviſed to take counſel therein.

Then Ramſey in general acknowledged all the particular circumſtances of time and place alleged by Rey, and the diſcourſe to that effect; but concluded, that no treaſon was intended or uttered, and craved counſel to anſwer, which was granted.

And ſo the court adjourned to the fifth of December, but upon a freſh arreſt by the earl marſhal they were to put in bail for appearance, which were the old ſecurity; and Ramſey ordered to anſwer upon oath. At which day appearing, the fame of the cauſe brought thither ſuch a crowd of people as was not imaginable.

Rey entered as before in manner and habit: but Ramſey was new ſuited in black ſatten, and preſented his anſwer in writing to this effect:

That having well conſidered the time, place, and communication with the lord Rey beyond the ſeas, (as before urged) he confeſſes;

That Rey demanded of him, whether the marqueſs Hamilton intended to come over and follow the wars? He ſaid, yes; and told him of his forces ſix thouſand men, and of the ten thouſand pounds in money, and wine-cuſtomes in Scotland, which he would ſell to maintain the army, and that he would come ſo provided with ammunition, that being joyned with his friends he valued no enemy. Upon which Rey replied, that his own two regiments ſhould wait upon him: but the place of theſe forces to meet was at ſea, and there to receive directions from the king of Swede, where to rendezvouz. Upon which Rey ſaid, that his life and fortunes ſhould wait on the marqueſs; who being told of his friendſhip, wrote a letter to Rey, which Ramſey delivered, in effect, that Rey would get ſome ammunition from the king of Swede, which was wanting. And that, ſpeaking in general of matters amiſs in England, Rey anſwered, God amend all. To whom Ramſey replied, by God, Donnold, we muſt help him to amend all. And to all the other matters and things he utterly denies, and craves revenge upon Rey's perſon by dint of ſword.

Then doctor Eden of council for Ramſey ſpake to the court, that being aſſigned his council, his opinion was, that the defendant might decline the combate, and reply to the appellant's bill in brief, with theſe reaſons:

Firſt, that by the words in the bill, no man can be charged a traitor by one that is guilty in his own particular, and ſo is not tied to be defendant, nor to anſwer ſuch a bill.

Secondly, the incertainty and doubtfulneſs of the words in the charge; ſo that till the court doth cenſure them to be treaſonable, the defendant is not tied to anſwer.

Thirdly, the appellant refers the combate till the laſt, if he cannot in the mean time prove the charge by any other ways; then he offers to make it good by his body. So then, the defendant may forbear his anſwer, and decline the combate.

And now my lords (ſaid he) I humbly ſhall acquaint you with the defendants anſwer to me in private, which was,

That though in law he might, yet in honour and innocency he would not, decline the combate, but being his own conſent, his advocate hath the leſs to ſay for him. And ſo time was given for Rey's replication till Friday after.

Reys councel moved, whereas Dr. Eden had excepted at ſome words in the charge, he anſwered, that whoever was accuſed of treaſon, was not to inſiſt, how polluted the anſwer was, but how to approve and clear himſelf: then to refer the combate to the laſt, was well done, ultimum refugium, to expoſe his life, for God, the king and his country.

This ſpeech being ſomewhat peremptory, and directory to the court, he was told,

That the court needed not his direction, as to the tryall of combate, their wiſdoms would conſider of that when it was time; and ſo the court adjourned, both parties being admitted to have common lawyers; but to plead onely by civilians.

This day come, Rey appears as before; but Ramſey in a new ſuit, of aſh-colour cloth, opened with ſcarlet colour, the cloke ſcarlet cloth, lined with aſh coloured velvet, and the whole ſuit and cloke overlaid with ſilver and ſky coloured lace.

The former proceedings were read by the regiſter; and thereupon the appellants replication preſented to the high conſtable: in effect, that Ramſey in his anſwer had cunningly ſlipt over a part of the charge, which was, that the lord Rey proteſted, he was not ingaged in wars, for want of ſubſiſtence, and therefore would not hazard in any deſigne, without ſure knowledge, upon which words, depends much of the matter and main of that part of the bill. And ſo ripping up the ſeveral charges of the bill, the ſtrength, reaſons, and likelihood, and the defendants defects in not clearing the chief points, they went on with the councel.

It was his part to inforce the charge againſt Ramſey to this effect.

He obſerved, that the firſt day, Ramſey denied all the charge, whileſt he ſtood upon poſitive reſolution, but afterwards his councel brought him to particulars, and taught him to anſwer ſuperficially; firſt he knew nothing, and yet now ſo much. No doubt there was ſome ſtranger enterprize by the marqueſſe Hamilton, then to ſerve the king of Swede, by Ramſeys profeſſing that Hamilton was a proteſtant, and bore arms for religion, not caring with whom to grapple; from hence obſerving, that they intended ſomewhat to attempt of themſelves. Ramſey ſtiled the marqueſſe his maſter in diſcourſe, and in many of his letters produced, much of the diſcovery by Rey was to fiſh out of Ramſey the truth of his doubtful words; how unlikely it was that Rey having two regiments of old ſouldiers, captain of the king of Swedes dragoons in good pay for all, ſhould offer to ſerve Hamilton who was to be commanded by the king.

And that Ramſey might decline the combate, or forbear anſwering till the laſt, was a ſtrange opinion of councel; becauſe, combate was to be reſerved till all other means of diſcovery fayled, and therefore Rey his reaſons were ſupplimental proofs; and requeſting Meldrams teſtimony; but however he was now ready, if the court thinks fit to give the combate preſently.

And concluded with an example in caſe of murther. Two men fight in ſecret, the one is ſlain, the other flies, and though without any witneſſe of the fact, his ſeeking to eſcape condemns him guilty. So Ramſey having been accuſed of treaſon above three moneths by the lord Rey, and both confined, Ramſey diſpairing of his cauſe, ſeeks his flight from juſtice by ſending to Rey a private challenger, being a ſufficient conviction in law, as by ancient preſidents in this court: viz. Kiteles, after an appeal, ſends a challenger to Scroop, and was therefore adjudged guilty.

Doctor Duck anſwered to all. That firſt, it was prudence for Ramſey to anſwer in general negatively, having been newly landed from ſea; and might be excuſed till time and conſideration, to refreſh his memory, being not upon oath; and as yet, the defendant need not anſwer perfectly, till further time and favour, to view the exhibits in court by copies, which he deſires.

And directly urged againſt the lord Reys replication, not to be allowed; becauſe, Rey, referring himſelf now to proofs, might have ſaved the trouble of this court of honour and chivalrie and hazzard of their perſons by combate, which intends the trial without proofs; and that the defendant having ingaged his ſureties, but to this day, he humbly deſires the time and place to be ordered for the ſudden combate, according to the law of arms, and cuſtom of this court; ſaying, that the duel foreſeen, muſt enſue upon the appeal and denial; and therefore ought now to be granted.

Doctor Reeves moved for continuance of the replication, and conſented to the combate; the court admitted the replication, and ordered time till Wedneſday for exceptions thereto.

Doctor Duck offered ſome reaſons to ſatisfy Rey, and extremely to cenſure Ramſey, where he was interrupted and told by the earl marſhall, that the court will ſave him the labour and councel, till the rejoynders be put in, and then to be ordered.

Doctor Eden ſhewed, that the copies of the letters exhibited were not given out: nor ſhall, ſayes the earl marſhal, till the court have conſidered of the contents, and ſo they were read.

The one was from Ramſey to Rey, certifying him of paſſages in the Low-Countreys ſince their parting, to put the marqueſſe in minde of directing him how to diſpoſe of the ammunition and arms in his cuſtody; ſubſcribed, your ſervant, Ramſey.

The other from the lord marqueſſe, to the lord Rey, congratulating his love and affection, expreſſing a great deſire to meet him in Germany, upon any termes he would propoſe; and that Ramſey the bearer was inſtructed for him to treat with the king of Swede, whom he deſires to favour and aſſiſt, which will oblige him his friend and ſervant, Hamilton.

Doctor Duck opened the whole matter, and each particular, inſiſting, that my lord Reys evidence being for the king, and he a perſon of honour, and peer of Scotland, his teſtimony was ſufficient.

And moves that Mr. Meldram might be admitted for ſupply, for though they were not joynt witneſſes together, of the words, which made the charge; yet for as much that they were ſpoken aſunder, and agreeing together, made up a full proof: that no teſtimony may be neglected in matters of treaſon. That if any part of the charge was denied by the defendant, and proved by the appellant, it might convince him in a manner of the whole: and urged the offence of Ramſeys challenging Rey. But more of that hereafter.

But doctor Reeves proſecuted the matter, for that Ramſey's councel endeavoured to prove that he might decline the combate, or forbear anſwering, becauſe of ſome words which reflected upon my lord Rey as matter of reproach, that Rey had uttered words of treaſon to catch Ramſey, and then to turn informer. But (ſaid he) no office can be accounted baſe, when the king and kingdoms ſafety is concern'd; citing a ſtory out of Livie, that the Romans confederate with the Sanubies, were to undergo a baſe office that ſtood not with honour, and reſolved, ſo long as it was advantagious to the Romane ſtate, it might with honour be undertaken.

Doctor Eden was earneſt to excuſe himſelf for putting in theſe words againſt the lord Rey, ſaying, that his client enforced to have them inſerted.

But being a point of honour, the earl marſhal interpoſed, that true it was, the beſt man may not refuſe the baſeſt office to preſerve a king and nation; but again, it was moſt unworthy the degree of honour, for any man to angle and intrap another, and then to preſent him to that kings juſtice.

Then the pleaders argued concerning Meldrams teſtimony, that no proof ought to be omitted for the king; but it was offered for Ramſey to joyn iſſue upon that point in law; for the bill was laid againſt him not general, but particular to place, time and matter, viz. that in May laſt in a ſhip, and afterwards at Amſterdam, then again at Delph, Ramſey ſhould ſay ſuch and ſuch words, which if Meldram would juſtifie, beſides himſelf, they ought to be admitted, otherwiſe it was no good matter, but muſt refer to a new bill.

That the defendant had anſwered fully, for that the lord Rey profered his ſervice to the marqueſſe without preſſing to know any deſigne. That nothing in the letters could convict Ramſey. That the lord Rey ſtanding upon his great offices under the king of Swede, and ſo not neceſſitated to ſerve the marqueſſe, he had not thoſe places of command then, but ſince; and that ſince his coming into England, he ſaid that he would have ſerved under the marqueſs, and concluded that Ramſey and the marqueſs might uſe ſuch words, and yet not intend treaſon to his majeſty.

But having in this tryal medled ſo much with the marqueſs, the court was fain to enter an order or protection, to clear the marqueſs his words or actions from diſhonour.

Then the court proceeded to examine witneſſes viva voce.

Archibal Rauken was to prove the challenge as the bringer: upon theſe queſtions he confeſſed, that he was in Ramſey's chamber at Richmond the laſt of October.

That Ramſey did not imploy him to carry any challenge to the lord Rey; but at that time Ramſey told him, that it was his grief to be reſtrayned not to meet Rey, who was a trayterous villain, and wiſhed to meet him in the open fields at Barn-Elms, he would make him dye for it, and tear his heart, with other ſuch words of reproach, and wiſhed this deponent to tell Rey ſo much, which he did, but it was three weeks after, and then, not until the lord Rey told him, that Ramſey had ſent him a challenge; ſo that ſaid Ramſey, my meſſage was but a relation, not a challenge.

But Rauken was obſerved to falter from what he affirmed before Dr. Reeves, and others, viz. to have carried the challenge, and that Ramſey could not deny it; ſo that Rauken was threatned not to accuſe Ramſey.

Gilbert Seaton depoſed, that Ramſey ſaid, he had made it come to Rey's ears, to have ended this buſineſſe without troubling the king or lords.

Then doctor Duck ſummoned up all the proceedings, obſerving that formerly in the preſence of the king, Ramſey had with deep proteſtations and oath denied the time, place, and matter which he now confeſſeth, and though then not examined upon oath, yet in France and other countreys, the very holding up of the hand is an oath, and ſo Tertullian ſayes of the Romanes, and Ramſey confeſſing part, he might be guilty of the whole charge.

Doctor Eden ſaid, that Rey was not a competent witneſſe againſt Ramſey, though for the king, for he was particeps criminis; capitalis inimicus: for the firſt his bill made him ſo; for if Ramſey ſpake treaſon, ſo did Rey; for the ſecond, it appeareth by Rey's violent proſecution, and if all failed, his ſword muſt make it good; and ſo the defendant was not bound to anſwer, nor to accept the challenge unleſſe he will, to which he is ſo willing.

But doctor Duck ſaid theſe reaſons did not currere quatuor pedibus. Some of the conſpirators with Cataline were revealers of the treaſon, and allowed as witneſſes.

Doctor Reeves concluded, that although ſome of the lord Rey's witneſſes did not affirm what they might, it would encourage him to ſet a ſharper edge upon his ſword when he entered the liſts; and that the God of right would ſo weaken the heart of Ramſey, that it ſhould fail him when he took his ſword in hand.

The holy-daies of Chriſtmaſs drawing nigh, the court ordered, that either party might repair to ſir Henry Martin, and poſſeſſe him with further proofs, out of theſe witneſſes already examined, but of no other. And ſo adjourned the court till Monday the ninth of January, when after ſome ſmall debates, but no further matter or proofs, the buſineſſe was briefly determined to be referred to the king's pleaſure.

Which came to this account. That Hamilton's power with the king got all favour for Ramſey; and well rewarded in due time; and Rey having done the duty of a loyal ſubject, left the court and kingdom, and returned to his command in Sweden. But this ſtory, though tedious, will enlighten us further to the truths of the Scotiſh affairs.

Ruſhworth's Account.

TOWARDS the end of this year (1630), the marquis of Hamilton arrived at the court of England, where was at that time Mackay, lord Ochiltry, a lord in Scotland, by name Stuart, and who once bore the name of the earl of Arran, when by a parliament which contracted a by-name in that kingdom, the Hamiltons were attainted of treaſon, but afterwards both blood, honour, and eſtate were reſtored to them. This lord had no kindneſs for the marqueſs of Hamilton, but nouriſhed a diſcourſe, which Ramſey let fall to the lord Rea when they were beyond ſeas; and prevailed ſo far with lord Weſton, then lord high treaſurer of England, as to impart the buſineſs to the king, being a treaſon of an high nature (if true) to this effect; that he raiſed this new army, with deſign, when he was at the head of them, to ſet himſelf up as king of Scotland. Much credit was given to this deſign by the lord Weſton lord high treaſurer, who endeavoured to perſuade the king not to permit the marqueſs to come near his ſacred perſon, and in no kind to have the privilege to lie in his majeſty's bed-chamber, leſt his majeſties life were hazarded thereby.

The lord Weſton preſſed this home unto the king, but his majeſty kept his thoughts private to himſelf; and having a great affection to Hamilton, as ſoon as he came into his preſence, embraced him with great kindneſs, and diſcovered to him what he was accuſed of, but ſaid, I do not believe it; and that the world may know I have a confidence in your loyalty, you ſhall lie in my bed-chamber this night. But the marqueſs beſeeched his majeſty to excuſe him, till he had received a trial, and was cleared of the treaſon he was accuſed of; but the king would receive no denial, yet told him he would put the buſineſs into a way of examination; but afterwards when the examination was taken, it was found that the one affirmed the accuſation to be true, and the other as poſitively denied it, and that there appeared not then any concurrent proof of the ſame.

A report of theſe examinations was afterwards made to the king's majeſty, who was graciouſly pleaſed to refer the whole matter to a trial before the lord high conſtable, and earl marſhal, in the court of honour, of which the reader will have a full account towards the end of the next year in its proper time and place. In the mean time, the king cauſed Rea and Ramſey to be ſecured in order to that trial: ſo the marqueſs proceeded in making proviſions for the embarquing of his army, and ordering thoſe forces in Scotland to be in readineſs to be ſhipped, to come to the place of rendezvous when they received orders.

A memorial made by Mr. Juſtice Whitlock in his life-time concerning the lord Rea's diſcovery of the marquis of Hamilton's conſpiracy.

‘PResently after my return from this circuit, myſelf and the reſt of the judges of the King's Bench were ſent for by the lord-keeper to London, to adviſe with him about the affairs of his majeſty. We came thither on Monday, 22 Auguſt, except the chief juſtice, who was ſick. The matter conſulted of, was to give our opinion concerning the conference had in Germany between certain Scotiſh gentlemen, about the making the marquis of Hamilton the head of a party againſt the king and his kingdoms of England and Scotland.

‘The lord Rea, a Scotiſh baron, did impeach Ramſey and Meldrum for moving him to this conſpiracy: they denied it punctually, and no witneſs could be produced. Ramſey, a ſoldier, offered to clear himſelf by combat, that he was innocent; and the appellant accepted of his offer. The king was deſirous it ſhould be put upon a duel; and we were conſulted with, 1ſt What the offence was? 2dly Where the trial might be?

‘We all with the lord keeper were of the opinion, 1ſt, That it was an high and horrible treaſon, if that in the examinations were found true. 2dly, That the trial might be by an appeal of treaſon, upon which the combat might be joined: but the king muſt make a conſtable durante bene placito, for the marſhal could not take the appeal without him: that it muſt be after the manner of the civil law, and we were not to meddle in it. Likewiſe we were of opinion that this proceeding before the conſtable and marſhal was, as it was before the ſtatute of the 35th H. 8. cap. 2. and that ſtatute deviſed a way how to try theſe foreign treaſons in England, but did not take away the other. We were alſo of opinion that the ſtatute of 1 Mar. cap. 10. did not take it away nor intend it; and that a conviction in this appeal was no corruption of blood or forfeiture at the common law. See Doughtie's caſe in Coke's Commentaries, fol. 75, ſect. Eſcuage.’

IN order to a commiſſion under the great ſeal, dated the 24th of November, [1631] there began a notable trial, before Robert earl of Lindſey, conſtable of England; and Thomas earl of Arundel and Surry, earl marſhal of England, in the court of Chivalry, judicially ſitting in the Painted-Chamber at Weſtminſter; together with other honourable perſons, namely Philip earl of Pembrook and Montgomery, lord chamberlain of the king's houſhold; Edward earl of Dorſet, lord chamberlain of the queen's houſhold; James earl of Carliſle; Edmund earl of Mulgrave; William earl of Morton; William earl of Stratherne; Edward vicount Wimbleton; Thomas vicount Wentworth; Henry vicount Faulkland; and ſir Henry Martin, judge of the high court of Admiralty; all of counſel with the court; Gilbert Dethick being regiſter. And firſt William Seager, king of arms, preſented to the lord conſtable of England letters patents of the tenor following.

Per ipſum regem.

Which letters patents being read by the regiſter of the court, Donold lord Rea, the plaintiff, and David Ramſey, gentleman of the king's privy-chamber, defendent, made their perſonal appearance. Then the lord marſhal ſpake in defence of the court of Chivalry, and the manner of proceeding therein, according to the law and cuſtom of arms, ſhewing;

‘That it was legal and agreeable to right and juſtice, as any judicial proceſs in any other court of this realm; eſpecially when the nature of the cauſe required it. And that in theſe latter ages this kind of trial hath not bin frequently uſed, but that was to be attributed to the pious and peaceable government of the ſtate, under our moſt happy and prudent king, and his moſt illuſtrious predeceſſors, the kings and queens of England, and the obedience and fidelity of the people of England; both which are to be aſcribed to the favour of Almighty God, conferring this bleſſing upon our nation above all the nations round about us.

The lord marſhal further ſhewed; 'that it was an error in many, to apprehend, that as ſoon as an appeal is brought into this court, it was preſently to be decided by duel; when as dueling was the ultimate trial in defect of all others. And even then it was in the arbitriment of the court, whether a duel ſhall be granted or denied.'

The earl marſhal's ſpeech being ended, Arthur Duck, doctor of the civil law, made a ſpeech concerning the antiquity, juriſdiction, and neceſſity of the court of Chivalry, held by the lord high conſtable, with the earl marſhal, eſpecially in caſes of treaſon, where the truth can no otherwiſe be diſcovered.

Then Rea and Ramſey were called into the inner court, and the one ſtood on the right hand, and the other on the left of the lord conſtable, and earl marſhal.

The lord Rea preſented his appeal in writing; and his petition formerly exhibited to the king, was read in theſe words.

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble petition of Donald lord Rea.

Moſt humbly ſheweth,

'THAT whereas he having heard ſundry ſpeeches fall from Mr. David Ramſey, importing plots and practices againſt your royal crown and realms, did, according to his duty and allegiance, reveal the ſame to your majeſty; the truth whereof he is ready to maintain with the hazard of his life, and deareſt blood, if he be thereunto required. Now ſo it is (may it pleaſe your ſacred majeſty) that your petitioner being informed (by his counſel) that theſe trials, by duel, or ſingle combat, are ultimum remedium; and that a man may not appeal to this kind of divine judgment, but where all poſſibility of diſcovery by ordinary trials fail, and cannot be had. And whereas your ſuppliant, at ſuch time as he diſcloſed all the practices which he heard from the ſaid Ramſey, and did withal diſcover what he heard likewiſe from Robert Meldrum; againſt whom alſo one captain James Borthwick hath been examined, and the examination of Meldrum taken thereupon. And your ſuppliant conceiving that if Meldrum be guilty, the ſaid Mr. Ramſey cannot be innocent, your ſuppliant therefore, not out of any inclination to decline the combat (as God who knoweth his heart can witneſs with him) but only out of his ſincere deſire to have the truth diſcovered, in a caſe ſo highly concerning your majeſty's ſafety, honour and government, moſt humbly prayeth, that you would be graciouſly pleaſed, that Meldrum may be firſt proceeded againſt according to law; and if upon his tryal, the conſpiracy affirmed by your petitioner do not fully appear, he ſhall then with all alacrity (as in a caſe which otherwiſe cannot be cleared) juſtifie his aſſertions to be moſt true: either as a defendant againſt the ſaid Ramſey, who demanded the combat of him before your majeſty, or as a challenger if the court of Chivalry ſhall ſo award; and ſhall be bound in all duty ever to pray for your majeſty's long life and happy reign.'

The petition being read, the lord conſtable, with the counſel of the other nobles, declared his majeſty's pleaſure, that this cauſe ſhould be tried in this court, and gave the appeal to be read as followeth:

'IN the name of God, Amen. Before you, moſt illuſtrious and right honourable lords, Robert earl of Lindſey, conſtable of England, and Thomas earl of Arundel and Surry, marſhal of England, or your lieutenants in this court-martial: I Donald lord Rea do accuſe and challenge thee David Ramſey in the month of May or of June in the year of our Lord 1630, and in the ſixth year of the reign of our lord Charles, by the grace of God king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, being then alone in my ſhip within or near the port of Elſinore, in the kingdom of Swedeland, in the upper part or deck of the ſaid ſhip, when thou hadſt this diſcourſe or the like, and ſpakeſt theſe or the like words to me in Engliſh, viz. You told me many abuſes in the court of England, and that there was nothing to be looked for but deſolation and change of religion, and therefore you had retired your ſelf thence, ſince no honeſt man could live there, and with many ſuch diſcourſes you laboured to poſſeſs me: to which my anſwer was, the Lord mend thoſe evils, and no remedy but patience. By God, Donald, ſaid you, (I will uſe your own phraſe) we muſt help God to amend it. You told me you had brought as much gold with you as would maintain you at the rate of ſix pounds a day for three years, and you aſſured me before that time would expire, God would raiſe up ſome men to defend his church, and liberate honeſt men from ſlavery. I deſired if you could tell if the marqueſs of Hamilton would come over. You ſaid he would the morrow or next day. After I aſked you what content my lord marqueſs had at home. You ſaid, none. I aſked you what religion my lord marqueſs was. You ſaid, a good proteſtant, and before it be long he would let the world ſee his deſign was for the defence of his religion, and the glory of God, and that he ſhould have an army ſo well provided with brave men, and all warlike proviſion, that he ſhould not need to be afraid with whom he encountered. I aſked you what advantage was it to us to make a free paſſage for the goſpel in Germany, if we loſt it at home. You ſaid there were many honeſt men in our land, ſpeaking of Scotland; adding, if we had once an army over, what would you think if we ſhould take a ſtart to ſettle them alſo, for ere it be long you will hear our country will go together by th' ears. So cloſing that night's diſcourſe; he ſays at laſt, ſome ſuch thing perhaps is intended, but I will not tell you more, for my maſter's ſecrets are dear to me. The third night after, in an iſland, you told me, that Alex. Hamilton and ſir James Hamilton were to go for England, and you for Holland; and in the mean while pretended your ſelf willing to do me ſervice in England. I told you I had a promiſe of the reverſion of Orkney from the king my maſter; if the marqueſs would mediate with his majeſty for it, he would do me a great kindneſs, and I ſaid, it were good for my lord to have a friend in that place for his ends. You moreover aſked me, if there were good harbours in Orkney, or in my land, or in any part that might be fortified. I ſaid, yes. You ſaid, by God, it was to be thought upon; and you deſired leave to think upon it that night, and on the morrow you and Alexander Hamilton did deſire me to write a general letter to the marqueſs, with truſt to the bearer Alexander Hamilton, concerning Orkney, leſt letters ſhould miſcarry, with great aſſurance of true friendſhip from your maſter, if I would continue conſtant in reſolution, and ſo I gave you my letter.

'Afterwards in March laſt paſt, you came to me from the Hague in the Low-Countries to Amſterdam, where you ſtayed with me eight days, and delivered me a letter from the marqueſs, only of compliment and thanks; and you told me all went right with the marqueſs, that he had gotten from his majeſty 10000*l.* in England, and the wine cuſtoms of Scotland for ſixteen years, which the marqueſs would ſell, and all things went on without any demur or obſtacle, and the only ſtay was for want of arms, ammunition, and eſpecially powder, and deſired me to put in hard with the Swediſh ambaſſador, which I did; and you told me, that the marqueſs had writ to you, that if the arms and other proviſions were obtained, they ſhould be ſent to England, and not to Scotland; at which you did marvel, becauſe his lordſhip had changed his reſolution, being all the other proviſions were ſent to Scotland. Alſo you told me, that my lord had ſent over a man to receive them, as I deſired. I told you the letter, which Mr. Lindſey brought me, deſired the arms to be ſent to England. You ſaid, though the arms were had, yet you would not ſend them till you had further order from the marqueſs, and you deſired me to haſte to you the anſwer thereof. In the end you told me you had evil news to tell me, that the marqueſs's lady was brought to bed of a child.

'Some few days after, in March or April laſt paſt, at Delf in the Low-Countries, I told you that I had a letter from the king of Sweden to the king of Britain, deſiring ſome ſhips for the marqueſs. You ſaid the marqueſs and I muſt beware of that, for then they will think that we mean to take their land from them with their own ſhips. I aſked you, where our forces ſhould meet. You anſwered me, on the ſea. I aſked you, where we ſhould land. You ſaid in ſome part of your old maſter the king of Denmark's country. You aſked further, what think you if we ſhould plunder ſome nook of his land, and thereafter go where we pleaſe; for we think he will be the only man that will be moſt againſt us. I anſwered, I am content; for he reſts in him more than you all. I aſked if my lord was to raiſe any men in England. You ſaid, one regiment. I aſked you if they would be true to us? You ſaid that there were Engliſh that my lord was as much aſſured of as of any Scots. I aſked, where we ſhould make theſe meet. You ſaid at Harwich or Yarmouth. I aſked if they were fortified. You ſaid, that no parts of all thoſe coaſts in England or Scotland could hold us from landing. I told you that I feared Mr. Meldrum was an evil ſecretary. You aſked me wherein. I ſaid, that Meldrum had told me many things, and that I thought he had told it to others. You ſaid Mr. Meldrum knew nothing thereof when you came from England, tho' he might well ſuſpect, and that he ſpake once to you to that time, as if all were ours, and that you had great patience to hold your hands off him although he was your couſin. I told you, that I was not a ſouldier of fortune; but had bread at home, and might live without hazarding my ſelf in the fortunes of war; yet notwithſtanding that I would hazard my life and fortune with the marqueſs, only that I would know the buſineſs. You anſwered, you would tell me no more of your maſter's ſecrets; but that you would write a letter with me to the marqueſs, and when I came there, the marqueſs would infuſe in me that which you would not; withal you deſired me not to tell the marqueſs what had paſſed betwixt you and me, whereby the marqueſs ſhould have all the thanks to himſelf; adding that he was very cloſe, and that he would diſcover himſelf to them that he knew would hazard with him. That my brother-in law Seaforth knew all, and that the marqueſs truſted him much. I aſked you what was done in my buſineſs of Orkney. You told me, nothing till my coming, and ſaid, it might be I ſhould have it better cheap than to pay the duty of it; and you told me England had made a peace with Spain, very prejudicial to Holland; and that Spain and France were both ſtriving who ſhould firſt drink up England, but you hoped we ſhould prevent them both. Beſides, you told me the lack of powder was the greateſt let. As for arms we might get help thereof in every houſe, and that we had reaſonable proviſion thereof already; and that my lord had written to you that he had 90 pieces of cannon great and ſmall already provided. I deſired you to go in perſon and ſpeak to the Swediſh ambaſſador for the powder, and to advertiſe me in the Brill of his anſwer, that ſo I might aſſure the marqueſs what he might expect; and you did ſend a letter by one of your own men to the Brill, to ſhew me that you were with the ambaſſador, and hoped to have that which we ſpake of. You aſked my advice whether it was beſt to croſs the ſeas once, or to go on bravely. I anſwered, delays were not good, which you did condeſcend unto, or you uſed words and ſpeeches to that effect.

'But if thou the ſaid David Ramſey ſhall deny the premiſes, or ſay thou hadſt not the ſame diſcourſe, or to the ſame effect with me, at the foreſaid times and places; I the aforeſaid Donald lord Rea ſay and affirm, that thou David Ramſey art a falſe traitor, and lyeſt falſly. And in caſe the premiſes cannot otherwiſe be found out by the ſentence of this court, proffer my ſelf ready by the help of God, to prove and

‘ juſtifie this my accuſation and appeal, by my body upon thy body, according to the laws and cuſtoms of weapons in a duel, to be performed in the preſence of our lord the king, &c.’

Which challenge being publickly recited, the ſaid Donald lord Rea, the party challenging, threw his glove in the court, of a red or brown colour, for a pawn or pledge, in preſence of the aforeſaid lord conſtable, and Thomas lord marſhal, in confirmation of all contained in the bill and challenge.

Then the ſaid David Ramſey anſwered, in his own perſon, and ſaid, ‘ that the ſaid bill and appeal was and is falſe, and that the ſaid Donald lord Rea, the appellant or challenger, did lie falſly, and that he was ready to juſtify and prove this in duel, according to the laws and cuſtoms of arms, and of this court, by his body upon the body of the ſaid Donald lord Rea, as it ſhould ſeem good to the court.’

And thereupon in confirmation and juſtification of the premiſes, he threw his glove in the court, of a white colour, for his pawn, or pledge, in preſence of the lord conſtable, and earl marſhal aforeſaid; which gloves reſpectively Richard St. George, otherwiſe Clarenceux, king of arms, took up and delivered into the hands of the ſaid lord conſtable with due reverence; and the ſaid lord conſtable, together with the earl marſhal, committed them to the cuſtody of the aforeſaid regiſter of the court. Then the ſaid lord marſhal arreſted, as well the ſaid lord Rea the challenger, as the aforeſaid David Ramſey eſq; the defendant. And the ſaid Donald lord Rea produced ſir Robert Gordon, ſir Pierce Croſby, ſir Walter Croſby, and ſir William Forbes knights and baronets, and William Innis eſq; for his ſureties, who obliged themſelves all, and every of them, & diviſim & conjunctim, to our lord the king, for the ſaid lord Rea, body for body, that the ſaid lord Rea ſhould duly proſecute this aforeſaid challenge to the final and laſt determination of the ſame; and that in the mean time the ſaid lord Rea ſhould keep the peace of our lord the king, againſt all and every of his lieges, and eſpecially againſt the aforeſaid David Ramſey eſquire.

And the ſaid David Ramſey produced for his ſureties, the right honourable James earl of Abercorne, and Robert earl of Roxborough. Then the earl marſhal aforeſaid releaſed Donald lord Rea the challenger, and the aforeſaid David Ramſey defendent, from the aforeſaid arreſt, and at their requeſt reſpectively delivered their bonds of ſuretiſhips to be cancelled.

After this there was read in the court, the lord Rea's petition to the king, for divers noblemen and others to be of his counſel in this cauſe; whoſe names he preſented in a ſchedule annexed, as they are here recorded.

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty,

The humble petition of Donald lord Rea.

‘ HUmbly beſeeching your royal majeſty in this cauſe of appeal againſt David Ramſey in the court of Chivalry, to grant unto the ſaid petitioner, that he may have the parties, whoſe names are in the ſchedule hereunto annexed, to be of his counſel in the ſaid court. And he ſhall daily pray for your majeſty's long life and happy reign over us.’

James Hay eſq; of his majeſty's body.
William Innis eſquire.
Dr. Rives. Dr. Duck.
Mr. Selden,
Mr. Littleton, } of the Inner Temple.

Upon which his majeſty iſſued out the following order.

It is his majeſty's pleaſure, that only theſe ſhould ſerve, both for his friends to adviſe him, and his counſel to plead for him.

Ramſey's defence.

IN the name of God, Amen. In the preſence of you moſt illuſtrious and right honourable Robert earl of Lindſey, conſtable of England, and Thomas earl of Arundel and Surrey, marſhal of England, or your deputies in your court marſhal; I David Ramſey eſq; defendent, ſay and affirm, that all and every the things contained in the ſaid pretended appeal and accuſation, were and are falſe, and ſuggeſted and propoſed againſt me maliciouſly, and againſt truth, excepting what follows at the time and place under-written, I had the under-written diſcourſe with thee, or to the ſame effect, and no other, viz.

I David Ramſey being with thee Donald lord Rea, in the month of May or June, as it is in the ſaid bill mentioned, and in the ſhip there alſo mentioned, being in or near the port there mentioned, thou deſiredſt that I would tell thee, if the marqueſs of Hamilton would come over; and I anſwered he would. And you aſking me of what religion the lord marqueſs was, I ſaid, a good proteſtant, and before it be long, he would let the world ſee his deſign was for the defence of his religion, and the glory of God. And then aſking me whether he would come over with an army; I ſaid, yes, with an army of brave men, and all warlike proviſion, that he cared not with whom he encountred. Which paſſages, upon often and better recollecting of my memory and thoughts than heretofore, I do now remember. And you the ſaid Donald lord Rea, having then under your command two regiments of ſouldiers in ſervice of the king of Swedland, and then and there of thine own accord ſaying to me, thou wouldſt get leave of the ſaid king to join your ſaid two regiments with the ſaid lord marqueſs his forces, and ſerve the ſaid king in the wars under the lord marqueſs, I kindly accepted that motion of yours, and deſired to confirm it in you; and I told you, that Alexander Hamilton and ſir James Hamilton were to go for England; and you told me you had a promiſe of the reverſion of Orkney from the king your maſter, if the marqueſs would mediate with your maſter for it; and I and Alexander Hamilton did deſire you to write a general letter to the marqueſs, with truſt to the bearer Alexander Hamilton concerning Orkney; and aſſured you of the ſaid marqueſs his friendſhip, if you would continue conſtant in your reſolution, in joining your regiments with the lord marqueſs, when he ſhould come over, and you gave a letter accordingly. Afterwards in March laſt, I being then at the Hague in imploiment for providing furniture for the ſaid marqueſs his companies, which were to go over into the king of Swedland's ſervice, came to you from the Hague to Amſterdam, being earneſtly invited thereunto by letters from you; where I ſtaied with you eight days, and delivered to you a letter from the marqueſs only of complement and thanks for your offer, to join your regiment under the marqueſs his command. And I told you all went right with the marqueſs, and that I heard he had gotten from his majeſty 10000*l.* in England, and the wine-cuſtoms in Scotland for ſixteen years, which he would ſell; and all things for his coming over with his forces went on without any demur or obſtacle; and the only ſtay was, for want of arms and ammunition, eſpecially powder, and deſired you to put in hard for that with the Swediſh ambaſſador, which you did after the premiſes. And in March or April laſt, in Delf in the Low-Countries, you told me, you had a letter from the king of Sweden to the king of Britain, to deſire ſome ſhips for the marqueſs. And you ſaid further, that the king of Sweden ſaid, he had no ſhips to ſpare of his own, but he would write to our king for ſome for him; and that he the ſaid king of Sweden would allow 40000 rix dollars for the entertainment of the ſaid ſhips to be always in readineſs upon the motions of his army. You alſo aſked me, if my lord marqueſs was to raiſe any men in England. I anſwered, I heard he was to raiſe three regiments in England, and three in Scotland. You aſked me where theſe forces ſhould meet. I anſwered, on the ſea. You aſked where they ſhould land. I anſwered, I was doubtful where, becauſe the rendezvous was to be appointed by the king of Sweden. You ſaid further, that you was not a ſouldier of fortune, that you had bread at home, and might live without hazarding your ſelf in the fortunes of war; yet that you would hazard your life and fortune with the marqueſs. I anſwered, I knew no more of the marqueſs his deſigns, than I had then told you, but that I would write to the marqueſs to commend to him your forward affection to his ſervice, or to that purpoſe. I told you, that ſince my being in Holland, I did perceive the Hollanders did conceive, that England had made a peace with Spain very prejudicial to Holland; and that divers of them had ſaid ſo in my hearing: which paſſages concerning the ſaid peace, upon often and better recollection of my memory and thoughts than heretofore, I do now remember. And I alſo told you, that the lack of powder was the greateſt ſtay of the marqueſs his coming over; and you deſired me to ſpeak my ſelf to the Swediſh ambaſſador for the powder, and to advertiſe you of his anſwer, that you might aſſure the ſaid lord marqueſs what he might expect; and I did ſend one of my men to the Brill, called John Thompſon, to ſhew you I was with the ambaſſador, and hope to have what we ſpoke of.

But whereas thou the ſaid Donald lord Rea in thy ſaid pretended accuſation or appeal doſt affirm, that I ſaid other words to thee, than ſuch as are here ſet down in this my defence: I the aforeſaid David Ramſey ſay and affirm, that thou lieſt falſly, and art a falſe calumniator, and oughteſt to be puniſhed with the puniſhment of a falſe traitor; and I offer my ſelf ready to prove and juſtify, by the help of God, this my defence and exception, by my body upon thy body, according to the law and cuſtom of arms in a duel, to be performed in the preſence of our lord the king. And I humbly and inſtantly deſire, that a day and place may be aſſigned for the ſaid duel, &c.

Then was read in court the petition of David Ramſey to the king, beſeeching his majeſty to aſſign him the perſon, whoſe name was written in the ſchedule annexed, to be of counſel with him in this cauſe. The name written in the ſchedule was Mr. Dr. Eden. The witneſſes in this cauſe were commanded to make their perſonal appearance in the court, and were there examined; and divers letters written, as well from marqueſs Hamilton as from Ramſey to the lord Rea, were then produced.

Mr. Ramſey had bin releaſed from impriſonment in the Tower upon bail, and his promiſe to appear before the earl marſhal of England, or ſuch other perſons as his majeſty ſhould appoint, at ſuch time and place as ſhould be aſſigned unto him, upon three days warning; in the mean time to keep the peace, and to confine himſelf to Richmond, having the liberty of three miles walk, with this acknowledgment, that in caſe of abſenting himſelf from ſuch appearance, or breaking the peace, he will be accounted guilty of the crime, for which he ſtood committed. And for the performance of this engagement, the earls of Abercorne and Roxborough entered into a bond of four thouſand pounds to the king.

A while after Ramſey entered in the court a proteſtation of the tenor following.

‘ WHereas in obedience to his majeſty's commands, and in conformity to this honourable court, I have heretofore, contrary to ſuch intentions as ſeemed to me moſt reaſonable, procured ſome perſonages to ſtand engaged for my perſonal appearance in this court, concerning this pretended cauſe; and have, in obedience and conformity as aforeſaid, uſed the counſel of Dr. Eden, aſſigned unto me for that purpoſe by his majeſty, as defendent in the ſaid cauſe: and ‘whereas at my firſt appearance, upon ſight of my lord Rea's bill, I accepted of the trial by combat, and ever ſince avoided and waved all courſes uſually propoſed by defendents to avoid the combat, which at this preſent I am ready to entertain; and whereas ſince from the premiſes, and the lord Rea's pretences of proving new matters, the final decree in this cauſe, to my great prejudice in my other occaſions, hath bin from time to time put off, and nothing as I conceive, under favour of this honourable court, proved againſt me, either to convince me of any matter objected againſt me, or to urge me by the law of arms to ſubmit my ſelf to trial by combat, if I had a deſire to decline it: I do here again once more, and that moſt inſtantly, deſire a certain day and place to be aſſigned and decreed for the combat between the ſaid lord Rea and me, for the trial of the matter in iſſue between us in this honourable court; and I do with all humbleneſs deſire of this honourable court, that after all theſe delays uſed on the lord Rea's behalf, I may now betake my ſelf to my ſaid firſt intentions; and therefore I do proteſt, that ſo much as in me lieth, I do now diſingage, and do deſire this honourable court for ever after this time, to hold for diſengaged thoſe honourable perſonages that are bound for my perſonal appearance; and I do humbly deſire to know what his majeſty's further pleaſure is concerning me, ſince I came hither upon his majeſty's command by letters, and am here ready to ſatiſfy my loyalty as his faithful ſervant, with the hazard of my life.’

And ſo inſtantly deſiring and urging to be releaſed of his obligation, and that his ſureties might be likewiſe releaſed, he was remanded to the Tower of London, and his ſureties were releaſed, and the bonds were rendered to them.

At another ſitting, when Dr. Duck moved divers things in behalf of the lord Rea, declaring, that with due reverence he ſubmitted to the court in all things; the earl marſhal made anſwer, that the lord Rea had governed himſelf in the whole proceſs of the cauſe with much prudence and moderation, and wiſhed that Ramſey had uſed the like moderation in his defence. And he further ſaid, that now it ſeems neceſſary to lay open the ſeries of the whole buſineſs: and ſo continuing his ſpeech, he ſhewed that our ſovereign lord the king, ſo ſoon as he had knowledge of the crime objected, did uſe all diligence to find out the truth, and called the parties before him; and the lord Rea conſtantly affirmed the truth of theſe things, and offered to juſtify the ſame with the hazard of his blood and life; and Mr. Ramſey on the other part with the like conſtancy denied the accuſation, and ſaid, he would prove it falſe againſt the lord Rea by duel, if it ſeemed good unto his majeſty; and that the king obſerving the confidence of the parties, and the defect of other proofs, and the parties free choice of duel, conſulted about the way of a public duel by the authority of this court, and took care to be informed of the proceedings and cuſtoms thereof. That it was certain, that this court was the only publick judicature, to which the cognizance of treaſons committed beyond ſea appertained before the time of Henry the 8*th*; and that the ſtatute of 26*th* and 35*th* years of that king, concerning another manner of proceeding therein, was not derogatory to the authority of this court, but only ſuperadded another way of trial. That all private duels were accounted and are unlawful; but publick duels, decreed by the authority of this court, were always granted to be lawful in caſes of treaſon, when for the ſafety of the king and ſtate the truth would not otherwiſe appear. That his majeſty therefore conſented to the requeſts of theſe parties, that they ſhould fight a duel for the diſcovery of the truth in this behalf; and therefore he conſtituted and confirmed this court under the great ſeal of England. That the lord conſtable, and he the earl marſhal, according to the king's letters patents, together with thoſe noble perſons that were of counſel with the court, had heard with patience whatſoever was alledged on either ſide; and that there were three ways of determining things of this nature in this court uſed by our anceſtors.

Firſt, to abſolve the accuſed; which in this caſe, the nature, quality, and circumſtances of the fact and crime objected being conſidered, cannot be.

Secondly, to condemn the accuſed, when the truth of the crime objected evidently appeareth by witneſſes, or any other way; which in this caſe hath not been, nor ſeemeth poſſible to be, when out of the accuſation it ſelf, it appeareth, that the words were ſpoken ſecretly, and not before witneſſes.

Thirdly, by way of publick duel, to the decreeing whereof the lord conſtable and himſelf, with the aſſent of thoſe honourable perſons of counſel with the court, did intend to proceed.

Then the lord conſtable together with the earl marſhal demanded of the parties, whether they had any thing more to ſpeak or propound in this cauſe. They ſeverally anſwered they had nothing more. The forenamed lords aſked the lord Rea, whether he would finally acquieſce in his forementioned bill of appeal. Whereunto he anſwered he would therein acquieſce. Then they aſked Ramſey, whether he would acquieſce in his anſwer to the bill of appeal. Whereunto he alſo anſwered that he would therein acquieſce. After this, the regiſter read in court the lord Rea's bill of appeal, and Ramſey's defence in the preſence of the parties. Preſently the lord Rea ſealed his bill with his ſeal at arms, and ſubſcribed his name with his own hand. After the ſame manner Mr. Ramſey ſealed and ſubſcribed his anſwer.

Then the lord conſtable taking the appeal in his hands, and folding it up, put it into the glove, which the lord Rea had caſt forth in the court for a pawn in this behalf; and held the bill and glove in his right hand, and in his left hand the anſwer and glove or pawn of David Ramſey; and then joyning the bill and anſwer, and the gloves, and folding them together, he, with the earl marſhal, adjudged a duel between the parties under this form of words.

In the name of God the Father the Son and the Holy-Ghoſt, the Holy and moſt Bleſſed Trinity, who is one, and the only God and Judge of battels; we, as his vicegerents under the moſt excellent prince in Chriſt our lord and king, by whom we are deputed to this, do admit you the aforeſaid Donald lord Rea; the party challenging, and you the aforeſaid David Ramſey, the defendent, to a duel, upon every accuſation contained in this bill and the anſwer to the ſame; and we aſſign unto you the twelfth day of the month of April next following, between ſun and ſun, in the fields called Tuttle-Fields, in or near Weſtminſter, in the preſence of our lord the king, to do and perform your parts to your utmoſt power reſpectively.

And we will and enjoyn you the aforeſaid lord Rea the challenger, to be in the aforeſaid fields, and within the liſt there, between ſeven and nine of the clock in the forenoon of the aforeſaid day. And we enjoyn you the aforeſaid David Ramſey the defendent, to be in the fields in the aforeſaid liſt between nine and eleven of the clock in the forenoon of the ſaid day, upon peril attending you reſpectively in that behalf.

Which decree and final ſentence pronounced, the lord Rea craving pardon of the court, ſpake to this effect. Firſt, he gave thanks to the lord conſtable, the earl marſhal, and the reſt of the lords, that they had with ſo much patience and juſtice heard and examined this cauſe, and for the juſtice therein exerciſed, eſpecially for the ſentence already given. Then he proteſted before Almighty God and that court, that he had revealed nothing againſt David Ramſey, or any other, for malice, or hatred, or hope of reward, either gain, or honour, but only out of his faithfulneſs to our lord the king, and for the ſafety of his flouriſhing kingdoms, knowing that nothing is more pernicious to kingdoms and commonwealths than inteſtine wars. He profeſſed that if he himſelf had not revealed the premiſſes, but ſome other acquainted with the treaſon had firſt diſcovered it, he without all doubt had deſerved the death of a traytor. And whereas it might be ſaid, that he by revealing it had hazarded his own life: to this he anſwered, that he was unworthy of all honour, yea of life it ſelf, that was not ready to lay down, much more to hazard his own life for the ſafety of king and kingdom. And whereas he might ſeem in the proceſs of this cauſe to have declined a duel; he deſired to be underſtood that whatſoever was done in that behalf, he did in hope and expectation, that the treaſon, which was communicated to many, might be ſome way brought to light; for he did neither diſtruſt his own cauſe, nor fear the perſon of his adverſary, nor any other in ſo juſt a cauſe, only in this he grieved, that an adverſary, equal to him in birth, degree, and nobility, was not offered. And whereas many wondered that he would hazard his life for revealing words, whereof he was doubtful, whether they would amount to treaſon or not; he ſaid, he knew much more concerning the treaſon, than what was contained in this bill, which, by the interpoſing of authority, was for juſt cauſes yet to be ſuppreſſed.

As for the duel now decreed, he profeſſed, that he embraced the ſentence with all chearfulneſs, and deſired no further delay of the combat, than that in the mean time he might provide himſelf with ſuch neceſſaries for this duel as became his ſtock and kindred, and the combatant and champion of ſo great a king. That he had no private hatred to the perſon of David Ramſey, but was now to encounter him, being by the court declared his publick enemy. And ſo having prayed to God for his majeſty's ſafety, and happy government, and imploring the favour of the court, he made an end of ſpeaking.

After this the court aſſigned to both parties a day, whereon to make ſuch propoſitions as they would think fit.

Then the lord Rea deſired, that the crimes and words, by him objected in his bill againſt David Ramſey, might be declared treaſonable, and that Ramſey were guilty of treaſon, if he uttered thoſe words: which the court with an unanimous conſent did declare ſo, and adjudge.

Ramſey moved, that a ſhorter time, and ſome day within the 12*th* of April, might be aſſigned for the duel, ſaying that he would ſoon compel the lord Rea to confeſs the falſhood of the crime objected, if he would meet him in place convenient.

The lord marſhal anſwered, that the day was determined; and further intimated to both parties that they were to be attached and kept in ſafe cuſtody, if they gave not ſufficient caution for their appearing at the day and place appointed, and in the mean while for keeping the peace. For the performance whereof on his part the lord Rea produced ſureties, namely ſir Pierce Croſby, ſir William Forbes, ſir Walter Croſby, knights and baronets, and William Jones, eſq; who bound themſelves to the king body for body.

Then Mr. Ramſey being aſked, whether he would bring forth ſureties, anſwered, that he was ready in the word and honour of a gentleman, to oblige himſelf to whatſoever in that regard ſhould be by the court enjoyned; but as for ſureties that he had none, or at leaſt deſired none; that it was troubleſome for him to engage noble perſons, who had in other reſpects interpoſed in this behalf. Whereupon the lord Rea's advocate deſired, that Ramſey be committed to the Tower till the day appointed for the combat.

Then Robert earl of Roxborough publickly offered, and ſaid that himſelf and James earl of Abercorne were ready to put in caution for Ramſey, if the court would admit them; and Walter earl of Balclough made the ſame offer; and the court admitted them, (although the lord Rea's advocate alledged many things to the contrary) and they became bound body for body. Whereupon Ramſey was releaſed from his impriſonment in the Tower.

The lord conſtable and earl marſhal admoniſhed both parties to keep within the bounds aſſigned them, to wit, that the lord Rea ſhould not go weſtward beyond Charing-Croſs, nor Mr. Ramſey beyond Whitehall eaſtward. Theſe bounds they might not paſs without the ſpecial licence of the court, or ſome juſt and reaſonable cauſe.

The weapons, which the court aſſigned to the combatants, were a ſpear, a long ſword, a ſhort ſword, and a dagger; each of them with a point.

Then the lord Rea preſented theſe proteſtations to the court.

Firſt, he did humbly deſire of the right honourable judges the lord conſtable and earl marſhal, that his arms and weapons might be aſſigned him for to aid himſelf therewith againſt his adverſary in the day and place to him aſſigned, and alſo in any other day and place, if any ſhould be aſſigned him; and that he might have no weapon of advantage, and that he might be received into the liſts or field with thoſe arms as ſhall be aſſigned him, and armed in what ſort he ſhould pleaſe; and that he might have with him all other things needful and accuſtomed by right to aid himſelf at need againſt his adverſary, although they be not expreſsly written; and deſired that his adverſary ſhould have no other weapon, nor of other ſize than thoſe, that he the ſaid lord Rea ſhould have; and if the ſaid adverſary ſhould bring into the liſt any other weapons, or of other ſize than the court ſhould aſſign him, that ſuch weapon ſhould be taken from him, and that he be allowed no other.

It ſeemed reaſonable to the court, that he ſhould be received into the liſts armed as is fit: and as for the weapons, was to have a ſpear, a long ſword, a ſhort ſword and a dagger, each with a point, as above ſaid, and for the reſt the court would do reaſon, according to the cuſtom and law of arms.

Item, the ſaid challenger did pray, that his counſel might be received into the liſts or field with him, for to counſel him what ſhould be needful, and that he might have a chirurgeon with his ointments and inſtruments to ſerve and aid him when need required; and he did pray, that his counſel might remain with him, until the words leſſer les armes were cried.

The court willeth, that he ſhall have ſufficient counſel, a chirurgeon with his ointments and inſtruments within the ſaid liſts, as appertaineth, until the words leſſer les armes be pronounced.

Item, he did pray, that he might have, within the ſaid liſts or fields, a ſeat or pavilion, or other coverture to reſt himſelf; that he might have bread, wine, or other drink, iron-nails, hammer, file, ſciſſars, bodkin, needle and thread, armorer and tailor with their inſtruments, and other neceſſaries to aid and ſerve him in and about his armour, weapons, apparel and furniture, as need required.

The court willed, that he have a ſeat and ſuch coverture as he ſhall pleaſe, without fixing any thing in the ground, bread, wine, and other neceſſaries, in ſuch caſes requiſite, till the words leſſer les armes were pronounced.

Item, he did pray, that he might have liberty to make trial of his arms and weapons within the field, to put them off, and to put them on, and change them at his pleaſure; to nail, faſten, or looſe his arms and apparel, and other things needful; to eat and drink, and to do all other his neceſſities.

The court granted, until the words leſſer les armes were pronounced.

Item, he did pray, that after he did once come into the field and liſts, that his adverſary ſhould not be permitted to make him ſtay and attend too long, under pain of being convict.

To this the court returned anſwer, the court will do you reaſon.

Item, he did pray, that if it ſhould happen, either by the delay of his adverſary, or any other impediment, that he ſhould not be able to prove his intent upon his adverſary in the day aſſigned him, between ſun and ſun, that then he might have further time and day allowed and aſſigned him for the proof thereof on his ſaid adverſary.

To this the court anſwered, the court in this caſe will do as anciently hath been uſed according to the cuſtom and law at arms.

Item, he did pray, that the field and liſts might be well and ſafely guarded for him until the end of the battel, and as well in the night as in the day, until that with the aid of God he ſhould make good, and prove his intent upon his adverſary.

It was anſwered, the court will do herein as is right.

Item, he did humbly pray, that if God ſhould ſo diſpoſe, as that he died in the proſecution of this his rightful appeal in this behalf, that then his heirs, without any impeachment or hinderance, might take his body and give it Chriſtian burial, in ſuch place as he ſhall appoint by his laſt will and teſtament.

It was anſwered, this muſt be at the king's pleaſure.

Item, he did pray, that notwithſtanding that the cuſtom of arms will, that he ſhould bear into the field certain things neceſſary for him, that theſe, or ſome of theſe things, may be brought by others in caſe of him, and that they might be ſaved and carried back for him, if in caſe God ſhould pleaſe to give him the victory, as he may of his ſpecial goodneſs and mercy.

Hereupon this order was made by the court;

The court willeth, that you do herein according to the cuſtom of arms uſed in like caſes before this time.

Item, he did deſire, that the ſame day when with God's help he did intend to prove his intent upon his adverſary, he might have all other things neceſſary for him, and accuſtomed by right and law of arms, although they were not expreſſed in theſe his proteſtations.

To this it was anſwered, the court herein will do that which ſhall ſeem reaſonable unto them.

Item, he did pray, that theſe his proteſtations, nor the copy of them, might be delivered nor ſhewed to his adverſary, nor to any of his counſel, or other perſon, whereby his ſaid adverſary might have knowledge thereof: further praying, and deſiring, that theſe his proteſtations and demands might be graciouſly granted unto him, by thoſe honourable lords, as the right and law of arms did require.

It was anſwered, the court would herein do that which ſhould be reaſon.

Item, he did pray, that it might be lawful for him to go or ride into Tuttle-Fields, in or near Weſtminſter, at his pleaſure, and ſo often as he ſhould think fit, to view the ground which ſhould be aſſigned him for the proving of his intent, and for ſuch other ends as ſhould be moſt for his advantage for the proving of his intent upon his adverſary.

To this the court anſwered, it ſeemeth reaſonable unto the court, that at convenient times, which ſhould be ſignified and expreſſed under the hands of the lord conſtable and earl marſhal, what ſhould be lawful for him to do as was deſired.

Item, he did humbly pray, that ſince by the law and cuſtom of arms, and of the honourable court, the defendent is never to be allowed counſel, nor to have any aſſiſtants, nor to have any petitions of favour granted, except in due time he ſhall have deſired, or ſhall have proteſted that he would deſire them; and that in this caſe his adverſary publickly hath proteſted againſt the having of counſel, and all other aids and aſſiſtants in this court, as by the acts of the court appeareth; he humbly prayeth, that he might not have any counſel, nor aids, nor aſſiſtants aſſigned unto him in this behalf; and that no petitions or proteſtations (if he ſhall make any) might be granted unto him; and in this he humbly deſired the juſtice of that honourable court.

Anſwer was made, the court would do herein upon conſideration, as to the cuſtom and law of arms appertained.

The dimenſions of the weapons were as followeth.

A long ſword, four foot and a half in length, hilt and all; in breadth two inches.

Short ſword, a yard and four inches in length, hilt and all; in breadth two inches.

Pike, fifteen foot in length, head and all.

Dagger, nineteen inches in length, hilt and all; in breadth an inch.

The weapons were not to exceed this proportion; but the parties might abate of this length and breadth if they thought fit.

Theſe proteſtations and petitions were accepted and regiſtered.

Afterwards Mr. Ramſey preſented a petition to the lord high conſtable, and to the earl marſhal.

Ramſey's petition.

To the right honourable the lord high conſtable and the lord marſhal of England;

The humble petition of Mr. David Ramſey, gent. of his majeſty's privy-chamber in ordinary.

Shewing,

‘THAT in regard there can be no preſident ſhewed forth by authentical record, whereby the choice of arms was ever heretofore permitted or granted to the challenger, or refuſed to the defender, ſuitable to the cuſtom and law of all Chriſtian nations; as likewiſe in regard the challenger himſelf, as I ſuppoſe, being aſhamed of his proteſtations and demand for defenſive armour, has in good company denied the ſame, and aſcribed it to your lordſhips impoſing; he therefore according to the ſaid law of nations, and cuſtom of the kingdom, doth humbly intreat, that there be no other arms allowed for the trial, than ſuch as he hath bin already ſuitor for, (viz.) rapier and dagger, as being in the number of ſuch as your lordſhips were pleaſed to nominate, which are the moſt common in all gentlemen's opinions, and that are carried by all and every man that is acquainted with the management of them.

‘Laſtly, intreating, that if there chanced to be found any want or miſtake in the formality of this, that your lordſhips will be pleaſed to paſs over the ſame, and attribute it to the abſence of the lawyer allowed by your lordſhips, having now no other counſel than the juſtice and equity of his demand. And as in duty bound, he ſhall never be wanting, either in action or ſpeech, to ſhew his gratitude for theſe your lordſhips ſo juſt and noble favours.’

To the foregoing petition, this following anſwer was returned decimo Aprilis 1632.

The firſt part concerning my lord Rea, the lords having called ſir William Balfour, (the witneſs vouched by Mr. Ramſey) and heard him, but could not prove what was alledged.

The ſecond part, concerning the election of arms, the lords thought it was not fit to be granted, the cuſtom of this court being otherwiſe, and other arms being already aſſigned by the court.

On the 10*th* of April Rea and Ramſey appeared again before the court, ſitting in the Council Chamber at Whitehall; at which time the lord high conſtable and the earl marſhal ſignified to the parties, that it was the king's pleaſure, for certain juſt and urgent cauſes, to prorogue the day of combat, from the 18*th* of April, to the 17*th* of May; and they prorogued the ſame accordingly; and required Rea and Ramſey to appear in Tuttle-Fields, upon the day laſt aſſigned, at the hours appointed in the former day: for the performance whereof, both the challenger and the defender produced their ſeveral ſureties, and the cautions and ſureties for the former day were by the court remitted.

The lord Rea deſired to know the pleaſure of the court, whether he might uſe defenſive arms; and in caſe he might, whether according to his own diſcretion, or as the court ſhall regulate.

The judges of the court anſwered, that the offenſive weapons and their dimenſions were aſſigned by the court already; but both parties might uſe defenſive weapons at their own diſcretion.

May the 12*th* the court reaſſembled, and the parties were called, and anſwered to their names.

Then the conſtable, together with the marſhal, declared, that upon hearing and examination of this cauſe, they had not found David Ramſey guilty of treaſon, nor was the treaſon intimated made appear by the lord Rea, though he had ſo long time attempted it; yet they found that he had ſeditiouſly committed many contempts againſt his majeſty, the reformation whereof his majeſty reſerved to himſelf; and therefore the court decreed, that they (the ſaid lord Rea and David Ramſey) ſhould both be committed to the Tower of London, till by ſureties to be approved by his majeſty, they gave in ſufficient caution, that neither in their own perſon, nor by any in their families, nor by their procurement or aſſent, they would attempt any thing one againſt the other, and that ſo long, till it ſeemed good to his majeſty to ſet them at liberty; and ſo they were both arreſted by order of the lord conſtable and marſhal, and by ſerjeants at arms delivered over to ſir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower.

Then a letter was brought from his majeſty by Richard St. George, king of arms, to the lord conſtable and marſhal, by which his majeſty revoked his letters patents, given to the ſaid lords for the trial of this cauſe, not willing to have it decided by duel. And ſo there was nothing more done in it.

On the 8*th* of May this year, [1632] a period was put to the great trial in the court of honour before the lord high conſtable, and lord marſhal, between Rea and Ramſey, concerning the forementioned accuſation of high treaſon againſt marqueſs Hamilton, which begun to have a hearing in November the laſt year, and was now decreed by that court in this year to be determined by combat: which in regard it is a trial remarkable after the proceeding of the civil law, we have given the reader an account thereof at large. However, take his majeſty's thoughts of it, as it is expreſſed in this letter to the marqueſs.

James,

‘SInce you went I have not written to you of Mackay's buſineſs, becauſe I neither deſire to propheſie nor write half news; but now ſeeing (by the grace of God) what ſhall be the end of it, I have thought fit to be the firſt advertiſer of it to you. I doubt not but you have heard, that (after long ſeeking of proofs for clearing the buſineſs as much as could be, and formalities which could not be eſchewed) the combat was awarded, day ſet, weapons appointed: but having ſeen and conſidered all that can be ſaid on either ſide, as likewiſe the carriage of both the men, upon mature deliberation I have reſolved not to ſuffer them to fight. Becauſe, firſt, for Mackay, he hath failed ſo much in his circumſtantial probations, eſpecially concerning Muſchamp, upon whom he built as a chief witneſs, that no body now is any way ſatisfied with his accuſations. Then for David Ramſey, though we cannot condemn him for that that is not, yet he hath ſo much, and ſo often offended by his violent tongue, that we can no ways think him innocent, though not that way guilty whereof he is accuſed; wherefore I have commanded the court ſhall be diſmiſſed, and combat diſcharged, with a declaration to this purpoſe, that though upon want of good proof the combat was neceſſarily awarded, yet upon the whole matter I am fully ſatisfied that there was no ſuch treaſon as Mackay had fancied. And for David Ramſey, though we muſt clear him of that treaſon in particular, yet not ſo far in the general, but that he might give occaſion enough by his tongue of great accuſation, if it had been rightly placed, as by his fooliſh preſumptuous carriage did appear.

‘This is the ſubſtance, and ſo ſhort, that it is rather a direction how to believe others, than a narration it ſelf; one of my chief ends being that you may ſo know David Ramſey, that you may not have to do with ſuch a peſt as he is, ſuſpecting he may ſeek to inſinuate himſelf to you upon this occaſion. Wherefore I muſt deſire you, as you love me, to have nothing to do with him.

‘To conclude now; I dare ſay that you ſhall have no diſhonour in this buſineſs; and for my ſelf, I am not aſhamed that herein I have ſhewed my ſelf to be and loving couſin,

XXVI. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber againſt Sir DAVID FOWLIS, Sir THOMAS LAYTON, and HENRY FOWLIS, Eſquire, on a Charge of oppoſing the King's Service, and traducing his Officers of State. Hilary, 9 Char. I. 1633.

[The following account of this caſe is extracted from Ruſhworth's Hiſtorical Collections, vol. 2. page 215. In the Appendix at the end of vol. 3. page 65. of the ſame work, there is an abridged account of the ſame caſe. The proſecution was apparently promoted by lord Wentworth, afterwards the famous earl of Strafford. It produced diſagreeable conſequences to the earl; for on the trial of his impeachment for treaſon, ſir David Fowlis, and ſir Thomas Layton, two of the defendants in this caſe, were material witneſſes againſt his lordſhip on the ſecond article of the impeachment; both ſwearing to having heard him uſe thoſe emphatically threatning words to ſcme juſtices of the peace, ‘ that the king's little finger ſhould be heavier than the loins of the law.’ See Ruſhworth, vol. 8. pages 149, 154.]

In the month of February in Hilary-Term, upon an information in the Star-Chamber againſt ſir David Fowlis, ſir Thomas Layton, and Henry Fowlis, eſq; defendants, the cauſe came to a hearing.

The information being opened to the court was to this effect:

THAT whereas ſeveral commiſſions had iſſued lately out of his majeſties court of Exchequer in the 6*th*, 7*th*, and 8*th*. year of his majeſties reign, directed to the lord viſcount Wentworth, and to divers other lords, knights, and gentlemen of the beſt and principal rank and quality in thoſe northern parts, who were thereby authorized for the more eaſe of the country, to treat, commune, and compound with all and ſingular his highneſs's ſubjects of the city and county of York, and other northern counties therein particularly expreſſed, as would make fine with his majeſty for their contempts in not attending his majeſties coronation, to have taken the order of knighthood, as they ought to have done; and the ſaid lord viſcount Wentworth was by expreſs letters from his majeſty in that behalf ſpecially appointed to be collector: and albeit the ſaid ſir David Fowlis had received many gracious favours both in honour and profit, as well from king James, as his now majeſty, which might juſtly have incited and ſtirred him up to all dutiful and grateful thankfulneſs for the ſame; nevertheleſs the ſaid ſir David Fowlis moſt undutifully, and ingratefully, did not regard the ſame, but harbored ſome ſecret diſcontentment, and ill affection in his heart; for whereas the ſaid lord viſcount Wentworth, and other his majeſties commiſſioners, carefully and dutifully intended the due execution of his highneſs's ſaid commiſſions, and had by vertue thereof ſummoned, and given notice to Ralph Ewre, James Penniman, eſquires, and ſundry others dwelling and inhabiting near unto the ſaid ſir David Fowlis, to attend the ſaid commiſſioners at the ſaid city of York, for their compounding for their ſaid fines of knighthood; the ſaid ſir David Fowlis moſt undutifully endeavoured and practiſed what he poſſibly could to oppoſe his majeſties ſervice therein, and to diſſwade and divert perſons from compounding with the ſaid commiſſioners, and many times publicly declared his diſlike and diſaffection of, and to the ſaid ſervice, which was generally obſerved and noted throughout the country where he dwelt; which was by him ſo ſpoken of intent and purpoſe to cauſe men to forbear and refrain compounding, or reſorting to the ſaid commiſſioners, to make any compoſition for their aforeſaid contempts; and thereby animated and incouraged ſundry perſons to ſtand out, and refuſe to make any compoſition at all, who otherwiſe would have compounded with the ſaid commiſſioners for their ſaid fines of contempt, in not attending at his majeſties coronation to take the order of knighthood, as aforeſaid. And in farther proſecution of his ill affection, and to ſhew his diſlike of the ſaid ſervice, and the more fully to expreſs and manifeſt himſelf, and his deſire for the hindrance thereof, he the ſaid ſir David Fowlis, at a public meeting, at the houſe of the ſaid ſir Thomas Layton, in the beginning of the month of July 1632, did, in divers of his conferences with gentlemen concerning the compounding with the ſaid lord viſcount, and the other commiſſioners for their fines and contempts of knighthood, publicly affirm and ſay; ‘that Yorkſhire gentlemen had been in time paſt accounted and held ſtout ſpirited men, and would have ſtood for their rights and liberties, and were wont to be the worthieſt of all other ſhires in the kingdom. And that in former times all other ſhires did depend, and would direct all their great actions by that country. And that other counties, for the moſt part, followed and imitated Yorkſhire: but now in theſe days Yorkſhire-men were become degenerate, more daſtardly and more cowardly than the men of other counties, wanting their wonted courage and ſpirit, which they formerly uſed to have.’ Which ſaid words and ſpeeches the ſaid ſir David Fowlis then uſed and uttered purpoſely to diſſwade and diſcourage perſons from compounding for the ſaid contempts and fines for knighthood, as aforeſaid. And the more to encourage thoſe that ſtood out, and refuſed to compound, the ſaid ſir David Fowlis, at the ſame time and place, extolled and highly commended one James Maleverer, eſq; for denying and refuſing to compound with the ſaid commiſſioners for his fines of knighthood, and ſaid; ‘that the ſaid James Maleverer was the wiſeſt and worthieſt man in the country; and that he was a brave ſpirit, and a true Yorkſhireman; and that none durſt ſhew himſelf ſtoutly for the good of the country, but the ſaid Mr. Maleverer, and was to be honoured therefore;’ and did very much commend him, both there, and at other places and times, for not compounding. And the ſaid ſir David Fowlis being then told, it might perhaps prove more chargeable to the ſaid Mr. Maleverer, for his wilful ſtanding-out in that manner; the ſaid ſir David replied, ‘that the ſaid Mr. Maleverer had put in his plea thereunto, and would eaſily procure his diſcharge, both of the fines and iſſues.’ And in truth he had pleaded in his majeſties Exchequer an inſufficient plea, and after ſuch time as he had paid 156*l*. for iſſues, at laſt he compounded for his contempt. And farther to diſcourage and hinder men from compounding, the ſaid ſir David Fowlis then alſo alledged, that in other counties and ſhires they had not advanced their fines of knighthood ſo high, as was done by the commiſſioners in Yorkſhire, ſaying, that there were many in Buckinghamſhire and Oxfordſhire, who did utterly refuſe to compound: and thereupon ſhewed forth a liſt or paper of the names of ſundry perſons of thoſe two counties, that ſo refuſed to compound. And the ſaid ſir David Fowlis taking notice of Mr. Ewre's, and Mr. Pennyman's compounding with the commiſſioners, blamed and reproved them for ſo doing, ſaying, that they had by compounding done themſelves ſome wrong, and that the country hereafter would be much troubled with ſuch impoſitions. And the ſaid ſir David Fowlis farther, to beget and draw a general diſobedience in the hearts of his highneſs's people, and to cauſe them to deny and refuſe to compound for their knighthood-fines with the ſaid commiſſioners, and to draw a ſcandal upon the ſaid lord viſcount Wentworth, and to bring him into diſeſteem in the hearts and minds of the gentlemen of that country, publicly ſaid and pretended, ‘that the people of Yorkſhire did adore him the ſaid lord viſcount Wentworth, and were ſo timorous and fearful to offend his lordſhip, that they would undergo any charge, rather than diſpleaſe him; and that his lordſhip was much reſpected in Yorkſhire, but at court he was no more reſpected than an ordinary man; and that as ſoon as his back was turned for Ireland, his place of preſidentſhip of the council would be beſtowed on another man.’ And the ſaid ſir David Fowlis, and the defendant Henry Fowlis did, about the beginning of July 1632, and at other times publicly, in the hearing of ſundry knights and gentlemen, to the end to hinder his majeſties ſervice, and to render the ſaid lord viſcount Wentworth odious to the inhabitants of Yorkſhire, and the places and countries where he was employed as a commiſſioner, moſt falſely and untruly ſcandalize and wrong the ſaid lord viſcount Wentworth, to have received much money of the country for knighthood-fines, by vertue of the aforeſaid commiſſion; and that his lordſhip had not paid the ſame, either to his majeſty, or the Exchequer. The contrary whereof did plainly, clearly, and evidently appear by the ſeveral tallies and conſtats, which were produced and ſhewed in open court, teſtifying that the lord viſcount Wentworth had, a year before the ſpeaking of thoſe words by the ſaid Sir David, and his ſon, paid unto his majeſties receipts for knighthood-fines the ſum of 24500 l. beſides other aſſignments by his lordſhip diſburſed about the ſaid ſervice amounting to about 700 l. of his own money, and more than he had at that time received for his majeſty. And the ſaid ſir David Fowlis and Henry Fowlis moſt falſely and maliciouſly, not only to the ſcandal of his majeſty and his juſtice, but chiefly to wrong and ſlander the ſaid lord viſcount Wentworth, reported, gave out and affirmed in the preſence of divers knights, gentlemen and others, that when the ſaid lord viſcount Wentworth was gone into Ireland, all ſuch as had paid their fines to his lordſhip, although they had his lordſhip's acquittance for the ſame, yet they would and ſhould be forced to pay the ſame over again to his majeſties uſe. And the defendant, Thomas Layton, cauſed his officer and bailiff to levy about 39 l. iſſues upon the goods of one Mr. Wivel, who formerly compounded and paid his fine for knighthood, and had his lordſhips acquittance for the ſame; and that complaint had been made to the council at York, in the abſence of the ſaid lord preſident, that the ſaid ſir Thomas Layton's officers or bailiffs had by his privity exacted and taken 40 s. worth of the ſaid Wivel's tenants goods, by colour of the ſaid levy, for ſo levying of the ſaid iſſues, whereby the ſaid council conceived, that the ſame would much croſs and oppoſe his majeſties ſaid ſervice, and the exaction was meet to be puniſhed: and therefore did award, and ſend the king's letter to the ſaid ſir Thomas Layton (being then high-ſheriff for the county of York) for to appear, and anſwer an information exhibited againſt him, and his ſervants, for ſuch their ſuppoſed exactions in that behalf, as was lawful for the ſaid council to do; and cauſed the ſaid ſir Thomas Layton to be ſerved therewith, who immediately ſhewed it to the ſaid ſir David Fowlis: then the ſaid ſir David Fowlis thereon took upon him in a great preſence and aſſembly of divers knights and gentlemen of the county (himſelf being then one of his majeſties ſworn council in the ſaid northern parts, one of the deputy lieutenants there, and a juſtice of peace in the North-Riding, where he then dwelt) to adviſe and diſſwade ſir Thomas Layton, to yield obedience to his majeſties letter, which this court held to be a great contempt, and offence; for that he ſaid, that he held it not fit, that the ſaid ſir Thomas Layton, being high-ſheriff, ſhould appear, and anſwer the ſaid letter, before he had acquainted his majeſty firſt therewith, and known the king's pleaſure. The ſaid ſir David ſaying farther, (in ſcorn and contempt of the ſaid court and council, whereof himſelf was a member, and by his oath bound to maintain and uphold the rights and liberties thereof to his uttermoſt) ‘that the ſaid court was a paper-court, and the ſaid lord preſident, and council, had done more than they could juſtifie, by ſending for the ſaid high-ſheriff; and that, if he were in the ſheriff's caſe, he would not care a dog's turd for them.’ And the more to draw the council into diſeſteem and diſreſpect in thoſe parts, he the ſaid ſir David then alſo ſaid, that the ſaid council had nothing to do with a juſtice of peace; ſpeaking withall comparatively, that the office of a juſtice was above the council at York; the one (meaning a juſtice of peace) was by act of parliament, the other (meaning the court at York) was made but by commiſſion. And alſo the ſaid ſir David being reproved by ſome gentlemen there preſent, who much diſliked his diſcourſe, yet he anſwered, he cared not who heard it, nor if it were proclaimed at the Croſs.

To this information ſir David Fowlis made this anſwer; ‘that he hath been ſo far from oppoſing the commiſſion concerning knighthood, as that he hath, according to his power, advanced the ſaid ſervice; and that he did perſwade James Maleverer, and others to ſubmit to the commiſſioners, and compound for their fines. That he did perſwade ſir Thomas Layton to appear before the lord Wentworth, and the council, upon the king's letter, and denieth the words charged upon him. He confeſſeth he did ſay, that he knew not how his majeſty would take it to have a high-ſheriff committed, and diſgraced for executing his majeſties writ: and confeſſeth, that it appears by the information, that Mr. Wivel had made his compoſition for knighthood, and that he receiv'd his acquittance; nevertheleſs proceſs was awarded out of the Exchequer for levying iſſues, amounting to 30 l. or thereabout: whereupon this defendant did ſay, that if the lord Wentworth had paid in all the monies he had received, he might have done well to have taken order, that thoſe who had paid their money to him, ſhould be free from any trouble, and not be compelled to make double payment.’

Henry Fowlis pleaded not guilty.

SIR Thomas Layton for himſelf ſaith; ‘that a letter was ſerved upon him from the lord preſident and council, he being then high-ſheriff of the county, doing matters in the execution of his office; and that before he was in any contempt, he was within three days arreſted by the purſivant attending the court, and by him carried priſoner from his own houſe to the ſaid council, about thirty miles, and there remained in the cuſtody of the ſaid meſſenger, till he had anſwered an information there preferred againſt him, and interrogatories concerning the ſelf-ſame matter now charged upon him; and before he was diſcharged, paid the ſaid Wivel the money levyed by verture of the proceſs, and alſo paid 40 s. more, which (as was pretended) Appleby, the bailiff, exacted from the ſaid Wivel.

‘During all which time of this defendants reſtraint, he was high-ſheriff of the county of York, of all which he deſireth a conſideration might be had; albeit he might juſtly plead the dependance of the ſuit at York, yet he doth wave the ſame; and doth deny, that if the ſaid 40 s. were exacted by the ſaid bailiff, over and above the 39 l. levied upon Mr. Wivel, that the ſame, or any part thereof came to this defendant.’

And it plainly appeared to this honourable court, by good and ſufficient teſtimony then openly read; that all the particulars before-mentioned, wherewith ſir David Fowlis ſtood charged by the information, were fully proved againſt him: whereupon the court, upon grave and deliberate conſideration of all the aforeſaid premiſſes, declared; that the ſaid ſir David had many ways endeavoured and ſought to oppoſe his majeſties ſervice, and had withall greatly and highly thereby ſcandalized his majeſty, who had done him ſo many gracious favours, and affronted his ſervice, and had unjuſtly traduced his majeſties commiſſioners, and great officers of ſtate, and ſhewed exceeding malice to the lord deputy: and the ſaid ſir David ſpeaking theſe words charged upon him, to deter his majeſties ſubjects from making payment of their fines to his majeſties receiver, for knighthood money: and that the court duly weighing and conſidering the hainouſneſs of the ſaid defendant's offence therein, and declaring the ſame worthy of ſevere and extraordinary puniſhment, ordered:

That the ſaid ſir David Fowlis, being a principal offender, ſhall ſtand, and be committed to the Fleet, there to remain during his majeſties pleaſure; and that he ſhall pay a fine of 5000 l. to his majeſties uſe; and ſhall alſo publickly acknowledge his great and ſeveral offences, both to his majeſty, and the ſaid lord viſcount Wentworth; not only in this court, but in the court of York, and likewiſe at the open aſſizes in the ſame county, where this decree ſhall be publickly read. And farther; that the ſaid ſir David Fowlis is a perſon altogether unworthy of the places he holds, as one of the council of York, deputy-lieutenant, and juſtice of peace, who hath breathed out ſo much faction and diſobedience. And for that he ſought and endeavoured to draw diſeſteem and ſcandal upon that court, whereof he himſelf was a member, and upon the principal officer and member of the ſaid court, the lord Wentworth, a noble perſon of ſingular worth and merit, and worthily employed in a matter of greateſt truſt and importance: the court hath therefore ordered and adjudged, that the ſaid ſir David Fowlis ſhall, from henceforth, be held, and made incapable to have, or execute any of the ſaid places, and that he ſhall pay good damage to the ſaid lord Wentworth, relator in this court, whom this court highly commended for vindicating his majeſties honour, in ſuch a ſervice of ſo undoubted right, juſtly appertaining to the crown, and which hath been heretofore taken by many kings, his majeſties predeceſſors, conſtantly and ſucceſſively. Their lordſhips generally condemned the ſaid ſir David therefore, and for the baſe and ſcandalous report, that he ſo publiſhed againſt the ſaid lord Wentworth, ordered and decreed, that the ſaid ſir David ſhould pay 3000 l. to the ſaid lord Wentworth.

And touching the defendant Henry Fowlis, the court likewiſe thought him worthy of cenſure, and ordered and decreed, that he ſhould ſtand committed to the Fleet, and pay 500 l. fine to his majeſties uſe.

And foraſmuch as the council urged no proof againſt ſir Thomas Layton, they diſmiſſed him from any farther attendance.

XXVII. The Caſe of WILLIAM Earl of DEVONSHIRE, on an Information in the King's Bench in 1687, for aſſaulting Colonel CULPEPPER in the King's Palace.

[The following ſtatement of this remarkable caſe and of the arguments againſt the proceedings of the King's Bench is from a volume of miſcellaneous pieces by the Lord Delamer, who was acquitted of a charge of high treaſon in the reign of James the Second, and after the revolution was created earl of Warrington. See his trial in volume 4. of this collection, p. 210. The book, from which we extract the caſe, was publiſhed as the works of the earl of Warrington in 1694; and though the publication appears to have been poſthumous, yet there is not the leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect the authenticity of the contents, as the book was dedicated to Lord Warrington*'s ſon and heir by Mr.* De la Heuſe the gentleman entruſted with his education. The caſe in queſtion, from the ſtile of it, is evidently addreſſed to the houſe of lords; but whether it was by way of ſpeech, or how otherwiſe, is not explained.

After the earl of Devonſhire*'s caſe we give the proceedings of the houſe of lords upon it.*

In the article of duke of Devonſhire in Collins's Peerage there are ſome anecdotes relative to this caſe, which deſerve to be remembered, though they are not noticed in the account we ſhall lay before the reader.]

ON Sunday the 24th of April, 1687, the ſaid earl meeting with collonel Culpepper in the drawing room in White-hall, who had formerly affronted the ſaid earl in the ſaid king's palace, for which he had not received any ſatisfaction, he ſpake to the ſaid collonel to go with him into the next room, who went with him accordingly; and when they were there, the ſaid earl required of him to go down ſtairs, that he might have ſatisfaction for the affront done him, as aforeſaid; which the collonel refuſing to do, the ſaid earl ſtruck him with his ſtick, as is ſuppos'd. This being made known to the king, the ſaid earl was required by the lord chief juſtice Wright, by warrant, to appear before him with ſureties. Accordingly April 27, he did appear, and gave bail in 30000*l.* to appear the next day at the King's Bench, himſelf in 10000*l.* and his four ſureties in 5000*l.* a piece, who were the duke of Somerſet, lord Clifford the earl of Burlington's ſon, lord De-la-mere, and Tho. Wharton, eſq; eldeſt ſon to lord Wharton. The earl appeared accordingly next morning, and then the court told him, that his appearance was recorded, and ſo he had leave to depart for that time. But upon the ſixth of May he appear'd there again, and being then requir'd to plead to an information of miſdemeanour for ſtriking the ſaid collonel in the king's palace, he inſiſted upon his priviledge, that as he was a peer of England, he could not be tryed for any miſdemeanour during the priviledge of parliament: and it being then within time of priviledge, he refuſed to plead. The court took time to conſider of it till Monday, which was the laſt day of the term, and the earl then appeared, and delivered in his former plea in parchment. The judgment given by the houſe of lords, in the caſe of the earl of Arundel, 3 Car. was urged on the behalf of the earl, viz. that no lord of parliament, the parliament then ſitting, or within the uſual times of priviledge of parliament, is to be impriſon'd or reſtrain'd without ſentence or order of the houſe, unleſs it be for treaſon or felony, or for refuſing to give ſurety for the peace: and alſo, that the like priviledge was, about two years before, allow'd in the caſe of my lord Lovelace. The court over-rul'd the earl's plea, and requir'd him to plead to the information the firſt day of the next term, and to be a plea as of this term; and ſo he had leave to depart, but his ſureties were not called, for to ſee if they would continue as his bail. The next term he appeared, and pleaded guilty to the information, and ſo the laſt day of the term the court did award, that he ſhould pay a fine of 30000*l. be committed to the* King's Bench till it be paid, and to find ſureties for the peace for a year.

To all which proceeding and judgment three notorious errors may be aſſign'd.

I. The over-ruling of the earl's plea of priviledge.
II. The exceſſiveneſs of the fine.
III. The commitment till it be paid.

1. The over-ruling the earl's plea of priviledge is a thing of that vaſt conſequence, that it requires a great deal of time to comprehend it aright, and is of ſo great an extent, that more may be ſaid of it than any one man can ſay. The judgment ſeems to be very unnatural, becauſe an inferiour court has taken upon it to reverſe a judgment given in a ſuperiour, of which no ſuch preſident is to be found in regular times, ſcarcely in the moſt confuſed and diſorderly.

2. Becauſe it is in caſe of priviledge, which is the moſt tender part of every court; for if the rights and priviledges of any court are made light of, the court itſelf will ſoon come to nothing, becauſe they are as it were the moſt eſſential part of it, if not the very eſſence of the court; for what ſignifies a court, if its orders cannot be executed? It is better that a court were not, than that its priviledges ſhould not be duly obſerv'd, for without that it becomes a ſnare and miſchief to the people, rather than an advantage.

3. Becauſe by this they have ſet the feet above the head; for as they have by this declared themſelves to be ſuperior to the lords, ſo it will naturally follow, that a quarter-ſeſſions may reverſe their orders, or ſuſpend their priviledges, and a more inferiour court ſhall ſuperſede what the quarter ſeſſions does: and thus it muſt go on till the courſe of nature is inverted.

4. Becauſe they may as well deny a lord, or over-rule any other priviledge, as well as this, and ſo conſequently, when the houſe of lords is not actually ſitting, every peer muſt be beholden to the judges for every priviledge that he enjoys.

5. If this judgment be according to law, then may the King's Bench try a peer for miſdemeanor, at the very time when the houſe of lords is ſitting; and conſequently the houſe muſt want a member, if the King's Bench ſees it good to have it ſo; and what a confuſion would it make, and the conſequence of it would be, is eaſily diſcern'd. The want of one member makes that houſe think itſelf to be lame: as was ſeen in the caſe of the earl of Arundel, 3 Car. How many petitions did the lords make, and how many meſſages paſſed to and fro, between the king and them, who would not proceed to any buſineſs till he was reſtored to his place in that houſe? For they told the king, that no lord of parliament, the parliament ſitting, or within the uſual times of priviledge of parliament, is to be impriſon'd or reſtrain'd without ſentence or order of the houſe, unleſs it be for treaſon or felony, or for refuſing to give ſecurity for the peace. Surely the judges did not give that judgment for want of underſtanding that judgment of the lords; for nothing can be more expreſs and plain for it: for it ſays directly, that ſitting the parliament, or within uſual times of priviledge, no peer ſhall be moleſted, unleſs for treaſon or felony, or for refuſing to give ſecurity for the peace. The earl of Devonſhire did all that the judges could require of him, by finding ſureties for the peace; and what the judges did more, was not grounded upon that judgment of the lords, but was a manifeſt and preſumptuous invaſion and violation of the priviledges of the whole peerage of England.

It is very obvious, how the peerage has been undermined ever ſince Hen VII's time, what endeavours have been uſed to make it leſs and leſs; firſt, by multiplying the number of them; ſecondly, by raiſing people of mean extraction to that dignity, both which tend to render it contemptible. But nothing can make it more deſpicable, than that its priviledges ſhould depend upon the beck of the King's Bench: and therefore conſidering how groundleſs and without preſident it is, what they have done in the caſe of the ſaid earl, it is no more than probable, that they thereby aimed at pulling down the peerage. For, what ſeems ſo likely as it does? It carries its evidence in its face, for it manifeſtly takes away the priviledge of the peers, and till it does appear for what other end it was done, all men of ſence, and that are unprejudic'd, muſt believe it was to pull down the peerage; for all that can be pretended, is, either to ſecure the peace, or to puniſh the offence. The earl did give ſecurity for the peace, and he did not deſign to ſhift off his tryal, but that it ſhould be in its proper ſeaſon; for though it delay'd the trial, yet it brought it to the proper time, and ſo conſequently the more legal and reaſonable: but the judges muſt go out of the way of reaſon and the law, to make a breach in the priviledge of the peers. It is too commonly the diſcourſe every where, and I fear with too much reaſon, that the judges make very bold with the law; but it's plain by this judgment, that they have ſtuck the priviledges of the peers under their girdle. Whether it did proceed from ignorance or corruptneſs, will appear upon what they ſhall ſay for themſelves. It is too plain from one of them it is, and either of them renders them unmeet to ſit in that place.

I do remember, that the puny judge gave this reaſon for over-ruling the earl's priviledge. Says he, your lordſhip, and all the peers, receive all your priviledges from the king, and therefore it would be very unreaſonable to make uſe of them againſt him: and ſeeing the king is concerned in this caſe, I am of the opinion, that the plea be over-ruled. It is ſaid, that he has ſome law, and therefore it's the greater preſumption in him to judge upon the lords priviledges, who is not qualified by law to ſit as a judge in any caſe; for he is a papiſt, as every body ſays, and ſo conſequently has not taken the oaths and teſt, that the law enjoins, before he take his place on the bench.

But as to his doctrine which he laid down, ſince it does not properly come into this debate, I will only aſk him a few queſtions: whether there was not a people before there was a king? whether the king begot all his people? and if people of ſeveral nations ſhould be caſt upon an iſland, and ſeeing no probability of getting thence, they agree upon certain laws and rules for the common good, and make choice of the wiſeſt man amongſt them as their king, to rule and govern them according to thoſe laws, can it then be ſaid, that the people received their priviledges from him, or that he is not ſtrictly bound to govern them by thoſe laws and no other? I deſire to aſk this one queſtion more: whether the king is not bound, as well by his oath as by the nature of the government, to protect and defend every ſubject in his juſt rights and properties? But allowing his doctrine as orthodox, yet his reaſon is admirable; for the ſubject is not to make a defence in any caſe, if the king have any title or concern in it, all corporations muſt deliver up their charters of courſe, whenever a quo warranto is brought; and why? Becauſe it was a grant from the king, and it would be very hard to oppoſe him with his own gift. Whoever holds any thing by gift from the crown, and tho' made as ſure as the broad ſeal can make it, yet if the king think good to queſtion it, the party muſt yield it up without inſiſting upon his right, for the reaſon given by the learned judge. For the ſame reaſon every peer, if denied his writ, muſt not demand it; nay, he muſt ſurrender his patent, and renounce his title, as far as in him lies, if the king require it: and for the ſame reaſon, when any man is called to an account for his life, he muſt make no defence, but ſubmit himſelf to the king's mercy; for all we have is from the king, and nothing muſt be diſputed when it is his pleaſure to queſtion it. This is indeed to make the king as abſolute as any thing on earth can be, yet is withal to make him the moſt unjuſt prince that ever ſate on the Engliſh throne. This ſort of juſtice is learnt from children, whoſe gifts continue good no longer than the donor remains in that kind mood. Surely nothing can more reflect diſhonour upon the king; for it makes him as unjuſt and uncertain as any thing can be, both which ſhould not be in the temper, much leſs in the actings of a prince.

Another reaſon was given, I think, by the chief juſtice, or elſe by Mr. Juſtice Holloway, becauſe it was abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecuring of the peace, it was urg'd ſo far, as if the peace could not be ſecured without it. Surely all this muſt be but gratis dictum, for my lord Devonſhire, by finding ſureties, had done all that the law does require for ſecuring the peace, unleſs they had clapt him up a cloſe priſoner; which they could not juſtifie, if he tender'd ſureties: and therefore, either my lord Devonſhire is different from all mankind, and a different method muſt be made uſe of to ſecure the peace, or elſe this argument of theirs ſavours not ſo much of reaſon as of ſomething elſe, that ought to be no ingredient when they give judgment in any caſe. And it ſurpaſſes common ſence to underſtand, how over-ruling the lord's plea could tend to the ſecuring of the peace. Either the ſecurity which he had given muſt awe him to keep the peace, or the other could not; for had he broke the peace again, and repeated it ſeveral times before he came to his trial, yet that could not affect the merits of the cauſe, neither could it be given in evidence at the trial, ſo as to alter the ſtate of the fact; neither could the judges, by reaſon of it, enhaunce his puniſhment if he were found guilty, but they muſt look upon it as a diſtinct offence, and ſo might require the greater ſecurity for the peace, and for a longer time.

Indeed it is an effectual way to prevent a man from breaking the peace, to lay ſuch a fine upon him as is impoſſible to be paid immediately, and to commit him till payment.

It is too probable, that the judges, being conſcious how liable they have made themſelves to be called in queſtion for this ſawcineſs and trampling upon the law, would debaſe and bring under the credit and authority of this court; becauſe no other can take cognizance of their proceedings, ſo as to correct their errors and miſtakes. It is only here that they can be called to an account for what they do amiſs; no court can puniſh them but this; ſo that if they can once top your lordſhips, there is nothing they need ſtand in awe of, nothing to reſtrain them, but they may act ad libitum, not per legem; for, let this court be depreſt, and they may ſay, of whom then need we be afraid? By what they have done already, they have ſufficiently ſhewn to what extravagances they will proceed, when they think themſelves to be out of the reach of this court.

If once the King's Bench can ſet it ſelf as high as the judges have attempted by this proceeding againſt my lord Devonſhire, then muſt the whole nation (your lordſhips not excepted) ſtoop to all the extravagances and monſtrous judgments that every corrupt and ignorant fellow ſhall give, who ſhall chance to get up to the bench; and not only this preſent age ſhall feel and undergo the miſchief, but it will be entailed upon all ſucceeding generations. Well then, did the judges attempt that which would bring your lordſhips ſo low, and raiſe their court ſo high, to ſet it above all reach or controul; eſpecially if they did promiſe to themſelves impunity, if not reward, which they might have expected, had it been in the reign of an arbitrary prince, who would be a great gainer by the fall of this court, becauſe then the ſkreen betwixt the king and people is taken away.

This is the firſt time, that an inferiour court did take upon it to invalid the priviledges of a ſuperiour. Superiour courts do ſometimes ſet aſide the orders and proceedings of inferiour courts; and yet in that caſe they proceed with that caution, that it is never done but when there is manifeſt error, and the law not duly purſued and obſerved; but in no caſe was it known that they ever meddled with their priviledges.

If what the judges have done is good, I cannot tell what power and juriſdiction they may not pretend to, for no bounds nor limits can be ſet to the King's Bench; it may aſſume as great a power in civil affairs as the High-commiſſion does in eccleſiaſtical, in their actings not to be tyed up to any rules or method, but to vary and alter them as well as the law, when occaſion or humor ſerves. The proceedings ſhall be as ſummary, or as delatory as they think fit, and your lordſhips ſhall no more than other people be exempted from the exerciſe of that power.

Therefore if your lordſhips will not prevent the miſchief from ſpreading it ſelf over the whole nation, yet I hope you will take notice of the injury you have ſuffered in the caſe of my lord Devonſhire, and to do your ſelves right.

The law has for the moſt part left fines to the diſcretion of the judges, yet it is to be ſuch a diſcretion as is defined by my lord Coke, fol. 56. diſcretio eſt diſcernere per legem quid ſit juſtum; not to proceed according to their own will and private affection, for talis diſcretio, diſcretionem confundit, as Wingate ſays, fol. 201. So that the queſtion is not whether the judges could fine my lord Devonſhire, but whether they have kept themſelves within the bounds and limits which the law has ſet them.

It is ſo very evident, as not to be made a queſtion, whether in thoſe things which are left to the diſcretion of the judges, that the law has ſet them bounds and limits, which, as God ſays to the waves of the ſea, hitherto ſhalt thou go and no farther. For either they are ſo reſtrained, or elſe the law does ſuppoſe them to be exempted from thoſe frailties and paſſions which do attend the reſt of mankind: but as they cannot be ſuppoſed to be void of paſſions and infirmities, no leſs than other men, ſo it cannot be imagined, that the law has left men to ſo wild a juſtice as is guided by paſſion and affection; for it had been ſo great a defect in the conſtitution of this government, that long before this it would have been reformed. And as it is moſt clear, that they are thus reſtrained, ſo thoſe bounds and limits are no leſs known to them that are acquainted with the law. There are two things which have heretofore been looked upon as very good guides, 1ſt, what has formerly been expreſly done in the like caſe; 2dly, for want of ſuch particular direction, then to conſider that which comes the neareſt to it, and ſo proportionably to add or abate, as the manner and circumſtance of the caſe do require. Theſe were thought very good and ſafe directions, till it was declared, and ever ſince has been practiſed in the King's Bench, that they did not regard preſidents, but would make them; and for ought that I can learn or find, this of my lord Devonſhire is an original.

What obſcurity ſoever may be pretended in other caſes, yet in this the law has given ſo poſitive and plain a direction, that it ſeems very ſtrange, how they came to lay a fine of 30000 l. upon my lord Devonſhire.

The court of Star-Chamber was taken away, becauſe of the unmeaſurable fines which it impoſed, which alone was a plain and direct prohibition for any other court to do the like, for otherwiſe the miſchief remained; for what advantage was it to the nation, if it had not been wholly ſuppreſt? The ſhifting of hands gave the people no eaſe in the burden that lay upon them. It was all one, whether the Star-Chamber or King's Bench did cruſh them by immoderate fines. But to put all out of diſpute, the ſtatute 17 Car. ſays expreſly, that from henceforth no court, council, or place of judicature ſhall be erected, ordained, conſtituted, or appointed within this realm of England, or dominion of Wales, which ſhall have, uſe, or exerciſe the ſame, or the like juriſdiction, as is or hath been uſed, practiſed, and exerciſed in the ſaid court of Star-Chamber: and this was upon very good reaſon, becauſe thoſe great fines, impoſed in that court, were inconſiſtent with the law of England, which is a law of mercy, and concludes every fine which is left at diſcretion, with ſalvo contenemento. If the fines impoſed in the Star-Chamber were an intolerable burden to the ſubject, and the means to introduce an arbitrary power and government, as that ſtatute recites, the like proceeding in the King's Bench can be no leſs grievous, and muſt produce the ſame evil. Laws that are made upon new occaſions, or ſudden immergencies, the reaſon upon which they were made may ceaſe, and conſequently they do ceaſe alſo. But laws that are grounded upon the ancient principles of the government cannot ceaſe, becauſe the reaſon of them will ever continue; and this ſtatute of 17 Car. being ſuch, no doubt holds good, and is now in as much force as the firſt moment in which it was made; and therefore this fine impoſed on my lord Devonſhire is in open defiance of that ſtatute.

I think no man can altogether excuſe my lord Devonſhire; for my part I don't, but think it was a very inconſiderate raſh act, and I believe the indiſcretion of it abſtracted from the fine is a very ſenſible trouble to him. Yet if thoſe things were wanting which may be urged in his excuſe, the offence and puniſhment don't ſeem to bear a proportion. Could not the merits of his father be laid in the balance, nor the ſurpriſe of meeting coll. Culpepper? For my lord having been abuſed by him, a man of ſo great courage and honour as my lord Devonſhire, muſt needs feel and remember it a long time, having received no ſatisfaction or reparation made him for it. But if there were nothing of this in the caſe, could all that may be ſaid to alleviate his offence be urged againſt him with a double weight, were the circumſtances of the fact as foul and aggravating as the malice of his enemies could wiſh, yet ſurely a leſs fine might have ſerved; for the law caſts in a great many grains of mercy into every judgment, and has ever looked upon an over-rigid proſecution of the guilty to be no leſs tyranny than the proſecution of the not guilty, becauſe it is ſummum jus, and has declared that to be ſumma injuria.

But beſides all this, I do conceive with ſubmiſſion, that where the law has intruſted the judges with a power to fine, it is in a much leſs degree than they have done in this caſe.

Firſt, becauſe the law is very cautious whom and with what it does intruſt. It repoſes a great confidence in the king, yet in ſome caſes his acts are not regarded by it; as the king can do no miniſterial act, a commitment per ſpeciale mandatum dom. regis, is a void commitment. Where there lies an action in caſe of wrong done to the party, the acts of the king in thoſe caſes, according to the old law phraſe, are to be holden for none.

Secondly, becauſe liberty is ſo precious in the eye of the law, it is of ſo tender a regard, that it has reſerved the whole diſpoſe thereof to its own immediate direction, and left no part of it to the diſcretion of the judges; and what the law will not ſuffer to be done directly, it does forbid that it be done indirectly, or by a ſide-wind; and ſo conſequently the judges cannot impoſe a greater fine than what the party may be capable of paying immediately into court. But if the judges may commit the party to priſon till the fine be paid, and withal ſet ſo great a fine as is impoſſible for the party to pay into court, then it will depend upon the judges pleaſure, whether he ſhall ever have his liberty; becauſe the fine may be ſuch as he ſhall never be able to pay; and thus every man's liberty is wreſted out of the diſpoſe of the law, and is ſtuck under the girdle of the judges.

Thirdly, becauſe the nation has an intereſt in the perſon of every particular ſubject; for every man, either one way or other, is uſeful and ſerviceable in his generation. But by theſe intolerable fines the nation will frequently loſe a member, and the perſon that is fined ſhall not only be diſabled from doing his part in the commonwealth, but alſo he and his family will become a burden to the land; eſpecially if he be a man of no great eſtate, for the exceſſive charge that attends a confinement will quickly conſume all that he has, and then he and his family muſt live upon charity. And thus the poor man will be doubly puniſhed, firſt, to wear out his days in perpetual impriſonment; and ſecondly, to ſee himſelf and family brought to a morſel of bread.

Fourthly, becauſe in all great caſes, and ſuch as require a grievous puniſhment, the law has in certain awarded the judgment; and next to life and corruption of blood, a ſeverer puniſhment cannot be impoſed, than to be fined more than a man can pay, and to lye in priſon till he does: but if ſome great caſes did happen, which could not be foreſeen, it was always uſual with the judges, when any ſuch caſe came before them, to adjourn it to the parliament, which had been needleſs, if they could have puniſhed at the rate that our judges have of late done.

Fifthly, becauſe where-ever the law has ſet down a fine, either by way of puniſhment or caution, it ſeldom exceeds 2000*l.* Nay, even in that tender place of liberty, if a judge ſhall not relieve with an habeas corpus, but let the perſon languiſh in priſon, yet the third offence is but 2000 l. penalty; and I ſuppoſe that that is but inconſiderable, in compariſon of what any of the judges are worth, yet it being taken as a puniſhment, is by the law looked upon as a great ſum.

Sixthly, becauſe the law of England being a law of mercy, and very careful to prevent violence and oppreſſion, and to that end having for almoſt every offence appointed its particular puniſhment, it cannot be ſuppoſed to have left ſo great a power in the judges, as they have exerted in this caſe. True it is, ſome things are left to their diſcretion; becauſe it was not poſſible to foreſee every particular caſe that might happen. Yet they are things of the leaſt ſize that are ſo intruſted to their judgment; for (as was ſaid before) matters of any conſiderable moment were ſtill referred to the parliament; as alſo the review of what the judges ſhould do in thoſe leſſer matters, which were left to their diſcretion.

As theſe proceedings are a great wrong to the ſubject, ſo are they no leſs a diſadvantage to the king; becauſe they will make his government look very rigid and ſevere, and gives it a grim fierce countenance, which, tho' I don't ſay that it will make the people rebel, yet I am apt to believe that it will ſet them upon their guard. It's fair and gentle uſage, that prevails upon reaſonable and free-born men. It's an eaſie government that will bow the hearts of the people of England; for, ſays the ſtatute of Wil. and Mar. the eſtate of a king ſtandeth more aſſured by the love of his ſubjects than in fear of laws; ſo that the king will be on the loſing hand by theſe proceedings, becauſe it ſpoils the complexion of his government.

And the king will yet be a farther ſufferer, for if 30000*l.* be the price of a blow, it will make White-hall very empty; for he that goes thither muſt approach it with fear and trembling, becauſe he does not know but he ſhall be ruined before he comes thence; for though a man arm himſelf with all the reſolution he can, yet it cannot be proof againſt the contrivance of thoſe that intend to do him a miſchief. Eſpecially if he is not upon very good terms at court, there will never want thoſe who will endeavour to draw him into the ſnare, hoping to merit by it; and though perhaps they miſtake their aim; yet however, revenge, that is ſo ſweet, will be greatly encouraged to provoke him, becauſe he cannot hope to reek his malice ſo plentifully as this way, becauſe if his attempt ſucceed, the other is ruined: nay, if he do not ſtrike, but only defend himſelf, yet if the judges don't like the complexion of the man, they will call the fox's ears horns, and lay all the blame on his back, and pronounce him more guilty that looks over the hedge, than he that ſteals the horſe.

Since the buſineſs of my lord Devonſhire happened, I have heard him blam'd as the author of his own misfortune, and that he drew the miſchief upon himſelf; and the reaſon given, was, becauſe he ought not to have gone to court; for, ſaid they, he knew there were many there who wiſhed him ill, and therefore ſooner or later he would meet with an affront, and if he once fell into their hands, he muſt expect no quarter, becauſe coll. Culpepper, who, without any provocation of my lord's part, had ſo unneceſſarily fallen upon him, and had by drawing blood upon my lord forfeited his hand; yet not only that, but all the reſt of the judgment was pardoned; and therefore as well that as this are looked upon as buſineſſes that were laid. But in ſaying this, I only tell your lordſhips what is ſaid without doors, and I don't ſpeak it as my opinion; but ſetting the tattle without doors aſide, I do conceive, that can never be a juſt judgment which injures the king as well as the party that is puniſhed.

But the true nature of my lord Devonſhire's offence has not yet been thoroughly conſidered. The law does in all caſes give great allowances to what is done on a ſudden heat, where there does not appear any premeditation; and for this reaſon, when a man is indicted for murder, if upon the evidence there does not appear malice prepenſe either expreſſed or implyed, the party accuſed ſhall have his clergy. And for the ſame reaſon, though it be death to maim or disfigure another, yet if it be done on a ſudden heat, the party ſhall not dye for it; for in theſe and the like caſes the law thinks him to be more blame worthy who gave the provocation, than he that was ſo provoked; becauſe it was not the effect of an evil mind, but of paſſion; et actus non ſit reus niſi mens ſit rea. If therefore it be true which I have heard, that the king promiſed my lord Devonſhire, that coll. Culpepper ſhould never come to Whitehall, it will then follow, that my lord Devonſhire's ſtriking coll. Culpepper was the effect of paſſion, and not of intention, becauſe he could not expect to meet him where he did. If ſo, I conceive with ſubmiſſion, that the puniſhment and offence don't in any meaſure bear proportion.

But I am perſwaded, that the judges were reſolved upon what they have done before they heard the cauſe, in caſe my lord was found guilty; and the rather, becauſe my lord chief juſtice was haranguing the offence beforehand; for when my lord Devonſhire appeared 6. May, he told him, that to ſtrike in the king's palace was little leſs, or next door to pulling the king out of his throne. Indeed, on the laſt day of the term he did explain them thus; that the time and circumſtances might be ſuch, as it would be little leſs than the aſſaulting the king in his throne. But ſeveral have told me, who heard him, and they ſay, the firſt words of time and circumſtances were not mentioned by him 6. May; and in particular, a noble lord of this houſe is one from whom I had my information; and if it were ſo, thoſe words ſavour too much of a prejudging the cauſe.

There is no doubt, but in caſe of a fine ſet, the court may commit the party, in caſe of obſtinacy, for not paying the fine into court. Yet this is to be taken cum grano ſalis; for if the fine be immoderate, or elſe he has not the money then ready, but either offers ſecurity to pay it, or elſe prays for ſome time, and in the interim to ſtand upon his recognizance; in either of theſe caſes, to commit for not paying the fine into court is not juſtifiable.

Firſt, becauſe it is to puniſh for not doing an impoſſibility, for lex non cogit ad impoſſibilia.

Secondly, it is not juſtifiable, becauſe if the fine be paid, the law is as much ſatisfied if it be paid five years hence, as if it be paid then immediately into court; for the law does not ſuppoſe, that the moſt wealthy man does carry ſo much money about him.

Thirdly, it is very unreaſonable, becauſe it does in a great part diſable the perſon to pay the fine; for if he be a man, that manages his own affairs, his writings, that are neceſſary to make the ſecurity, may be ſo diſpoſed of, that it will be difficult to come at them. Beſides, there being a neceſſity upon him to have the money, thoſe of whom he is to have it will be very apt to hold him to harder terms; for the world is ſo unnatural and brutiſh, that one man is but too prone to make his advantages upon the misfortunes and neceſſities of another; and that proverb, homo homini lupus, is in no caſe more true than in the buſineſs of money.

Proceedings in the Houſe of Lords on the Caſe of the earl of Devonſhire after the Revolution, extracted from the Journals of the Lords.

22 April 1689.

THE earl of Huntingdon reported from the committee of privileges the caſe of the earl of Devon, which was read, viz.

“ Ordered to report, that their lordſhips are of opinion, that the pro“ ceedings againſt the earl of Devon, in the court of King's Bench, in “ Eaſter-Term, in the third year of king James the ſecond, upon an in“ formation for an aſſault upon Mr. Culpepper, wherein his lordſhip's “ plea of privilege of parliament was over-ruled, and he was fined thirty “ thouſand pounds, and thereupon committed to the King's Bench in exe“ cution, was a great violation of the privileges of the peers of this realm.

“ Their lordſhips are likewiſe of opinion, that thoſe judges, who ſat in
“ the ſaid court, when the ſaid judgments were given, and the ſaid com“ mitment made, ſhould be required to attend at the bar of this houſe to “ anſwer for the great offence which they committed thereby.”

Hereupon the houſe made theſe orders following,

“ Ordered by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled,
“ that the clerk of the Crown-Office in the King's Bench do bring into this “ houſe the records of that office, wherein the proceedings in the court of “ King's Bench againſt the earl of Devon are entered in Eaſter-Term,
“ 3 Jacobi ſecundi, upon an information for an aſſault upon Mr. Culpepper,
“ on Saturday the 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.”

“ To ſir Samuel Aſtry, clerk of the crown
“ in the King's Bench, his deputy and
“ deputies, and every of them.”

“ Upon report from the committee of privileges concerning the proſe-
“ cution of the earl of Devon, upon an information in the King's Bench,
“ it is ordered by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled,
“ that the keeper of the priſon of Newgate be and is hereby required to “ bring in ſafe cuſtody to the bar of this houſe ſir Robert Wright now in “ his cuſtody, on Saturday the 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the “ forenoon, and this ſhall be a ſufficient warrant on that behalf.”

“ To the keeper of Newgate, his deputy
“ and deputies, and every of them.”

“ Upon report from the committee for privileges concerning the proſe-
“ cution of the earl of Devon upon an information in the King's Bench, it “ is ordered by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled,
“ that ſir Richard Holloway be and is hereby required to attend this houſe
“ on Saturday the 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon;
“ and hereof he may not fail.”

“ Ordered that Mr. Petyt and Mr. Bradbury do attend this houſe on “ Saturday the 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.”

“ Ordered that Mr. juſtice Powell do attend this houſe on Saturday the “ 4th of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.”

3 May 1689.

“ Ordered that the keeper of the priſon of Newgate be, and is hereby re“ quired to bring in ſafe cuſtody, to the bar of this houſe, ſir Robert “ Wright now in his cuſtody, on Monday the 6th day of May inſtant, at “ ten of the clock in the forenoon; and this ſhall be a ſufficient warrant
“ on that behalf.”

“ To the keeper of Newgate, his deputy and “ deputies, and every of them.”

“ Ordered that Mr. Petyt and Mr. Bradbury do attend this houſe on “ Monday next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.”

6 May 1689.

This day being appointed to hear ſir Robert Wright, ſir Richard Holloway, and Mr. juſtice Powell, concerning the proceedings in the court of King's Bench againſt the earl of Devon, in Eaſter-Term, 3 Jac. II. upon an information for an aſſault upon Mr. Culpepper in Whitehall.

And the ſaid ſir Robert Wright, and ſir Richard Holloway, being at the bar, and Mr. juſtice Powell in his place, and Mr. Bradbury and Mr. Petyt (who were appointed by the houſe to attend this day) being permitted by the houſe to ſtand at the end of the clerk's table, where alſo ſtood the clerk of the Crown Office in the King's Bench, and his deputy, with the records relating to this matter; which deputy having publicly read the ſaid record,

And being aſked, "what they had to ſay for themſelves in this buſineſs?"

Mr. juſtice Powell ſaid to this effect: "It was his great misfortune, "that he was miſguided by ſome books, which he looked on as authorities, "which he finds by their lordſhips judgments are not ſo, and he humbly "begged their lordſhips and the earl of Devon's pardon. As to the fine, "he looked on 3000*l*. to be fine enough. His ſilence in that buſineſs was "his greateſt fault, for which he alſo begged pardon."

Then ſir Robert Wright ſaid to this effect: "that as to the breach "of privilege, they were miſguided by precedents, and as to the fine (which "is uſually ſet according to the quality and eſtate of the perſon fined) it "came from the puny judge thirty thouſand pounds; and ſo to him laſt, "according to the courſe of the court. And if he was miſtaken, he begged pardon; for he never had the leaſt diſreſpect to the lord of Devon."

Then ſir Richard Holloway ſpake to this effect: "he, as ſecond judge, "pronounced the fine 30,000*l*. which was ſet nemine contradicente; and if "a leſſer fine had been propoſed, he ſhould have accepted it; and did not "juſtify the proceedings, but looked on it as an exceſſive fine; and begged "my lord Devon's pardon, and ſubmitted all to their lordſhips."

And then they being aſked, "whether they had no diſcourſe together "before, concerning the ſaid fine?"

Sir Robert Wright ſaid, "we diſcourſed not of the fine, but in court."

Sir Richard Holloway alſo declared, "he had no direction from either "the king or chancellor about the ſaid fine."

Whereupon Mr. juſtice Powell ſaid, "ſir Richard Holloway may re"member there was a diſcourſe of the fine 5 or 6 days before at the lord "chancellor's, where ſir Robert Wright, ſir Richard Holloway, ſir Richard "Allibone, and himſelf were."

"This ſir Richard Holloway ſaid he did not remember."

And ſir Robert Wright denied that they met there purpoſely about the fine.

Then they withdrew.

Mr. juſtice Powell being aſked, "what diſcourſe they had at the lord "chancellor's?" ſaid, "the lord chancellor firſt propoſed twenty thou"ſand pounds; but afterwards ſaid it would be better if thirty thouſand "pounds, and then the king might abate ten thouſand. To this he de"clared his diſlike to the other judges, but not before the chancellor."

Then he withdrew.

After debate the houſe were of opinion,

"That the court of King's Bench, in over-ruling the earl of Devon's "plea of privilege of parliament, and forcing him to plead over in chief, "it being within the uſual time of privilege, did thereby commit a mani"feſt breach of the privilege of parliament.

"That the fine of thirty thouſand pounds, impoſed by the court of "King's Bench upon the earl of Devon, was exceſſive and exorbitant, "againſt magna charta, the common right of the ſubject, and againſt the "law of the land."

Ordered, that the judges this day preſent do give their opinions to-morrow, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, how the law ſtands as to the commitment of a peer upon a fine to the king.

7 May 1689.

The houſe heard the judges, what caſes and precedents there were in the law, for the commitment of a peer of this realm in execution for a fine.

And, after conſideration thereof, it is ORDERED, that this houſe will, on Wedneſday next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, take into their conſideration a queſtion ariſing upon the caſe of the earl of Devonſhire, "whe"ther a peer of this realm may by law be committed in execution for a "fine?" and that notice be given to the king's counſel of the ſaid order.

15 May 1689.

Upon reports from the lords committees for privileges, who were of opinion, "that the proceedings againſt the earl of Devon, in the court of "King's Bench in Eaſter-Term in the third year of king James the ſecond, "upon an information for an aſſault upon Mr. Culpeper, wherein his "lordſhip's plea of privilege of parliament was over-ruled, and he was "fined thirty thouſand pounds, and thereupon committed to the King's "Bench in execution, were great violations of the privileges of the peers "of this realm."

After hearing the record of the court of King's Bench, wherein the judgment againſt the earl of Devon is entered, read, and alſo ſir Robert Wright, ſir Richard Holloway, and Mr. juſtice Powell, (who gave the judgment againſt the ſaid earl of Devon) what they could ſay for themſelves to juſtify their proceedings; and notice having been given to the king's counſel, to the end that they might attend if they had any thing to offer, whether a peer of this realm might by law be committed in execution for a fine, the ſaid counſel did accordingly give their attendance, (after a weeks notice) but did offer nothing therein.

After full conſideration had of the ſeveral caſes and precedents wherein the privileges of the peers have been concerned; the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament do declare and adjudge, that the court of King's Bench, in over-ruling the earl of Devon's plea of privilege of parliament, and forcing him to plead over in chief, it being within the uſual time of privilege, did thereby commit a manifeſt breach of the privilege of parliament; and that the fine of thirty thouſand pounds, impoſed by the court of King's Bench upon the earl of Devon was exceſſive and exorbitant, againſt magna charta, the common right of the ſubject, and the law of the land; and that no peer of this realm at any time ought to be committed for the non-payment of a fine to the king.

XXVIII. The Caſe of the Bankers in the Court of Exchequer, and afterwards in the Exchequer-Chamber and Parliament, 1690, 1696, 1699.

[After the reſtoration it was uſual with a few great bankers, to accommodate the crown with large ſums of money on the credit of the growing produce, either of taxes granted by parliament, or of the hereditary revenue; the mode being, not, as it now generally is, to charge the publick revenue with annuities in perpetuity for the intereſt redeemable on payment of the principal, but to give tallies and orders of the Exchequer for paying both principal and intereſt out of the firſt monies from the funds pledged as a ſecurity. Lord Clarendon particularly explains, how ſuch buſineſs was tranſacted between the crown and the bankers. 2. Clarend. Contin. fol. ed. 315. The good faith for ſome time obſerved by the crown had eſtabliſhed ſo much confidence on the part of the bankers, that they lent their money without the leaſt ſuſpicion of ſeeing a miſapplication of the revenue appropriated to repay them. Other circumſtances too concurred to inſpire confidence; for in 1667, the king iſſued a declaration, by which he ſolemnly promiſed, that he would not "on any occaſion whatever" ſuffer an interruption of payment on theſe orders of the Exchequer; and about the ſame time they received the ſanction of a ſtatute to make them transferrable property. Bankers Caſe by Turnour, 3d. edit. 135. 19 Cha. 2. c. 12. Keble's Stat. But notwithſtanding thus pledging his royal word, the bankers were finally deceived. In 1671, when the debt to them was above a million of money, the king, having reſolved on a new war with the Dutch, and knowing that his parliament would be averſe to the meaſure, to ſupply his neceſſities reſorted to the violent expedient of ſhutting the Exchequer; which was executed, by poſtponing the payments there on orders before iſſued, with a very limited exception. The diſgrace of firſt ſuggeſting this ſtep is attributed to the earl of Shafteſbury, that of propoſing it to the king is given to lord Clifford; both of which lords were members of the then confidential council ſo well known by the name of the "cabal." At firſt the poſtponement of payment was only for a year; but it was afterwards continued ſo as to exclude the bankers from all hope of ever receiving the principal of their great debt. Theſe proceedings involved the bankers, particularly ſir Robert Vyner, in the greateſt diſtreſs; nor was the miſchief confined to them, great part of the monies they had lent to the crown belonging to other perſons; ſo much indeed, that the number of creditors to the bankers was computed to be near ten thouſand. However, after various poſtponements of payment to the bankers and their creditors, it was at length agreed by the crown to relieve the bankers; for which purpoſe the king, in 1677, granted annuities to them out of the hereditary Exciſe, equal to ſix per cent. intereſt on their ſeveral debts, but redeemable on payment of the principal.

principal. This intereſt was accordingly paid till 1683; but it then became in arrear, and continued ſo at the revolution; and the ſuits, which were commenced to enforce the payment of theſe arrears, are the ſubject of the following caſe.

The firſt proceeding was a petition to the barons of the Exchequer for payment of the arrears of the annuities granted; to which petition the attorney-general demurred. Two points were made, firſt whether the grant out of the Exciſe was good, and ſecondly whether a petition to the barons of the Exchequer was a proper remedy. On the firſt point the whole court agreed, that in general the king could alienate the revenues of the crown; but Mr. baron Lechmere differed from the other barons, by thinking, that this particular revenue of the Exciſe was an exception to the general rule. But all agreed, that the petition was a proper remedy. Judgment was therefore given for the petition, by directing payment to the complainants at the receipt of the Exchequer.

A writ of error was brought on this judgment by the attorney-general in the Exchequer-Chamber. There all the judges, who argued, held the grant out of the Exciſe good. A majority of them, including lord chief juſtice Holt, alſo approved of the remedy by petition. But lord chief juſtice Treby was of opinion, that the barons of the Exchequer were not authorized to make order for payments on the receipt of the Exchequer, and therefore that the remedy by petition to the barons was inapplicable. In this opinion he was ſeconded by lord keeper Somers, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by one of the moſt elaborate arguments ever delivered in Weſtminſter-Hall. A doubt then aroſe, whether the lord chancellor and lord high treaſurer were at liberty to give judgment according to their own opinion in oppoſition to that of a majority of the attendant judges; in other words, whether the judges called by the lord treaſurer and lord keeper were to be conſidered as mere aſſiſtants to them without voices. The opinion of the judges being taken on this point, ſeven againſt three held, that the lord treaſurer and lord chancellor were not concluded by the opinions of the judges; and therefore that the lord keeper in the caſe in queſtion, there being then no lord treaſurer, might give judgment according to his own opinion. Lord Somers, concurring in this idea, reverſed the judgment of the court of Exchequer. But the caſe was afterwards carried by error into parliament, and there the lords reverſed the judgment of the Exchequer-Chamber, and affirmed that of the Exchequer. However, notwithſtanding this final deciſion in favour of the bankers and their creditors, it appears by a ſubſequent ſtatute, that they were to receive only one half of their debt; the 12 & 13 W. 3. after appropriating certain ſums out of the hereditary Exciſe for publick uſes, providing, that, in lieu of the annuities granted to the bankers and all arrears, the hereditary Exciſe ſhould after the 26th of December, 1701. be charged with annual ſums equal to an intereſt of three per cent. till redeemed by payment of one moiety of the principal ſums. 12 & 13 W. 3. c. 12, & 15. Why ſuch a compoſition of the debt, after prevailing in the ſuits commenced to enforce payment, ſhould be accepted, we are unable to account.—It is obſervable, that part of one article of the impeachment of lord Somers is founded on his reverſing the judgment of the Exchequer without calling the barons before him; the 31 E. 3. c. 12. particularly requiring, that they ſhould be called to give the reaſons of their judgment. The ſame article criminates him for ſaying, that particular ſubjects might have rights and intereſts without any remedy for the recovery, unleſs by petition to the perſon of the king; a poſition to which effect occurs in the courſe of his argument in this caſe of the bankers. See 3 Chandl. Deb. Comm.

There are ſeveral printed reports of this caſe. Mr. Freeman, afterwards lord chancellor of Ireland, gives a ſhort note of the arguments in the Exchequer. The fifth volume of Modern Reports contains a full ſtate of the pleadings in the caſe, and of the arguments of the chief juſtices Holt and Treby in the Exchequer-Chamber. Holt's argument is alſo in Skinner's Reports, 601. Lord Somers's argument in the Exchequer-Chamber was printed ſeparately in 1733. All theſe, except the report by Skinner, we ſhall introduce in their reſpective order. We ſhall then add a copy of the printed caſe which was delivered to the lords by the plaintiff on error in parliament; for which we are obliged to the kind communication of Mr. Serjeant Hill, whoſe valuable treaſure of parliamentary caſes is well known to gentlemen of the law. It was out of our power to give the printed caſe on the part of the crown; it not being in the collection, to which we were permitted to have recourſe, though eſteemed by far the moſt perfect of any exiſting. The whole of what we ſhall offer to the reader will conclude with the judgment in parliament, and the proteſt entered upon the occaſion, both taken from the journals of the Lords.

About a year after the determination of the caſe of the bankers by the Lords, a controverſy aroſe about the diſpoſition of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, in the courſe of which the queſtion as to the right of the king to alienate the hereditary eſtates and revenues of the crown was conſidered. Dr. Davenant commenced the diſpute, by publiſhing his diſcourſe on grants and reſumptions. The object of the diſcourſe was to evince, that the grants made by king William of the Iriſh forfeitures ſhould be reſumed, and that thoſe forfeitures ſhould be applied towards payment of the public debts. In enforcing this advice, though the author argues for the propriety of a parliamentary reſumption of royal grants, when they are exorbitant, and the neceſſities of the ſtate are urgent, yet he rather inſinuates a doubt of than directly denies the ancient right of the crown to alienate its hereditary eſtates. But then he cites a record of parliament of the 11 Hen. 4. which never occurred in the argument of the caſe of the bankers, and which he conſtrues to be a ſtatutory prohibition of future alienations, except when the king ſhall be out of debt; adding, that the force of this law had been evaded by clauſes of non obſtante, but that theſe were condemned by the bill of rights. The great ability and learning conſpicuous in this performance rendered it of too much importance, not only to thoſe intereſted in the grants of the Iriſh forfeitures, but to all deriving under regal alienations of a modern date, to ſuffer the impreſſions from it to remain unreſiſted. The ſubject was accordingly undertaken by a writer, whoſe name is not tranſmitted to us, but whoſe work proved him very adequate to the conteſt. The piece we allude to was publiſhed early in 1701, by the title of "Jus Regium, or the King's Right to grant Forfeitures, "and other Revenues of the Crown, &c." It is reprinted in the 2d volume of the collection of State-Tracts for the reign of king William. The author lays a great ſtreſs on the concurrence of all the judges in the caſe of the Bankers, that in general the king could alienate; and gives a ſhort hiſtory of the ſeveral opinions advanced in the progreſs of that caſe. He alſo denies the application of the record of 11 Hen. 4. cited by Davenant. The reſult of the controverſy was unfavourable to the grantees of the Iriſh forfeitures: for by an Engliſh act of parliament, ſuch lands as had been forfeited ſince the revolution were veſted in truſtees to be ſold for the publick benefit; all previous grants of the forfeitures were made void; and the rents, directed to be reſerved to the crown on ſale by the truſtees, were appointed to be for ſupport of the government of Ireland, and to be unalienable. 11 and 12 W. 3. c. 2. Such readers, as are diſpoſed to inform themſelves further on the conteſt in parliament about theſe Iriſh forfeitures, may conſult Mr. Harris's life of king William, and the Journals of the Engliſh parliament for the years 1699 and 1700, with the 2d volume of State-Tracts during the reign of king William.

The "Bankers caſe by Mr. Turnour," which we have referred to in the preceding part of this note, was publiſhed by that gentleman ſoon after the firſt ſtoppage of payment to the bankers, in order to expoſe the injuſtice and illegality of that meaſure, and to perſuade the re-opening of the Exchequer. It is written with great ability and learning, and well deſerves to be read by every lawyer. The author animadverts on thoſe, who adviſed ſhutting the Exchequer with great ſeverity; but at the ſame time obſerves great decorum towards the king perſonally.

Upon the petition of Hornbee, Williamſon, Smith, and Stone. Hill. 1691.
In Scaccario.

KING Charles the ſecond, having taken up great ſums of money of the petitioners, or their teſtators, who were bankers, in conſideration thereof granted to them and their heirs ſeveral annuities, chargeable upon the hereditary revenue of exciſe, given to the king by the ſtatute of 12 Car. 2. cap. 24.

The ſaid annuity being for many years arrear, the petitioners exhibited their petition to the barons of the Exchequer for the ſaid arrears; whereupon two queſtions did ariſe, 1ſt queſtion. Whether this grant of the king were good to bind the ſucceſſor, ſo as to continue a charge upon the ſaid revenue?

2d queſtion. Whether the petitioners had taken their proper remedies for recovery of the ſaid arrears?

Ad primam Quæſt', Atkins, Turton and Powell, were of opinion, that the grant was good to charge the ſucceſſor.

It was admitted, that the king could not grant away his kingdom, nor put it in vaſſalage or ſubjection to the pope or any other, as is ſaid in 4 Inſt. 12, 14, 83, 202, 357.

That the king may grant an annuity or charge his revenue. 2 Cro. 78. 5 Co. 56. 7 Co. 21. 9 H. 7. 12. 2 Inſt. 58. Vaugh. 161. 4 Inſt. 29. Dyer 92. 9 H. 6. 12. *Bro. That it muſt be ſaid of whoſe hands to be received, or elſe it is not good, for he cannot charge his perſon. Nat. Brev. 52. Dy. 92. Hob. 148.

Obj. That it was out of an incorporeal inheritance.

Anſ. It is good notwithſtanding. 1 Inſt. 47.

Obj. It was pretended, that the king was deceived in his grant, as to the conſideration.

Anſ. If the king be deceived in a conſideration real executory, it will void the grant, but not in a conſideration perſonal executed. Plow. 454. Lane 3. 76. 108. 10 Co. 47. 6 Co. 56. 1 Co. 43. Yelv. 1. 11 Co. 90. Hob. 230.

That there have been acts of reſumption ſhews that the grants were good, becauſe they could not be avoided but by act of parliament.

Obj. This is but an authority, and ſo void by death, becauſe revocable.

Anſ. It is an intereſt; and a licence coupled with an intereſt is irrevocable. Dy. 176. Nat. Brev. 223. Plow. 457. Palm. Rep. 171. 172. Dyer 49.

Ad ſecund' Quæſt', all the barons held, that the remedy by petition to the barons was a proper remedy, and that it was in their power to relieve the petitioners, and give judgment for them. Kielw. 178. Stamf. 73. 75.

A petition of right lies as well for a perſonal as a real due, Plow. 377. 434. Wroth's caſe, and Nevil's caſe, 9 H. 6. 13. 1 roll. 539. Lane 38. 4 Inſt. 415.

Baron Lechmere e contra: that the king could not alien or charge this revenue. Fleta 183. 3. 549. Selden, Grotius, Pryn. 9, 390. Vindication of the liberties of Engl. Freemen.

1. It was given in lieu of a revenue unalienable but by act of parliament, viz. the court of Wards.

2. If the king may alien part, he may alien all, and then the ſubjects will bear the burden, for they muſt grant new ſupplies to ſupport the crown.

3. This charge was granted by the king at a time when he had no occaſion for money, but merely for to gratify his prodigality, being at a time when the parliament rained golden ſhowers into his lap.

It appears by the anſwer Edward the third gave the pope, that it is not in the power of the king to alien his kingdoms, &c. 4 Inſt. 13. 14.

4. The very words of the act of parliament ſhew, that it was the intent of the parliament it ſhould continue in the crown unalienable, there being the words for ever hereafter to remain to the king and his ſucceſſors ſeveral times in the act.

5. A power in the act, to enable the king to lett to farm for three years, ſhews the parliament never intended he ſhould have power to alien as he pleaſed.

6. Where the parliament intended a power in the king to alien, it is otherwiſe worded; as in the acts that give monaſteries to the crown it is ſaid, to do therewith as he pleaſed.

But judgment was given for the petitioners, upon the opinion of the other three judges.

Charles the ſecond, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to all to whom theſe preſents ſhall come, greeting. Whereas ſince the time of our happy reſtoration, we have been involved in great and foreign wars, as well for the ſafety of our government, as for the vindication of the rights and privileges of our ſubjects; in the proſecution whereof, we have been conſtrained for ſome years paſt, contrary to our inclination, to poſtpone the payment of the monies due from us to ſeveral goldſmiths and others, upon tallies ſtruck, and orders regiſtred on, and payable out of ſeveral branches of our revenue, and otherwiſe: and although the preſent poſture of our affairs cannot reaſonably ſpare ſo great a ſum as muſt be applied to the ſatisfaction of thoſe debts, yet conſidering the great difficulties which very many of our loving ſubjects, who put their monies into the hands of thoſe goldſmiths and others, from whom we received it, do at preſent lie under, almoſt to their utter ruin for want of their ſaid monies; we have rather choſe, out of our princely care and compaſſion towards our people, to ſuffer in our own affairs, than that our loving ſubjects ſhould want ſo ſeaſonable relief: and having ſeriouſly conſidered of the way and means to effect this our preſent purpoſe, we could not find any more effectual and leſs prejudicial to us in the preſent poſture of our revenue, than by granting to each of them the ſaid goldſmiths and others, to whom we are indebted as aforeſaid reſpectively, and to his and their heirs and aſſigns, an annual ſum or payment anſwerable, in value yearly to the intereſt of their reſpective debts, at the rate of ſix pounds per cent. per annum, for all ſuch monies as are due unto them: the conſideration whereof induced us to command our high treaſurer of England, to cauſe all the accompts of the ſaid goldſmiths to be ſtated and made up by Richard Aldworth, eſq; one of our auditors, to the firſt day of January, 1676, which having been accordingly caſt up and ſettled, it appears thereby that there is due and owing by us unto our truſty and well-beloved ſubject, Joſeph Hornby of London, goldſmith, the ſum of twenty-two thouſand five hundred forty-eight pounds, five ſhillings and ſixpence. In ſatisfaction whereof, according to our intent in theſe preſents expreſſed, we have reſolved to grant unto him the ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-three pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence per annum, out of that part of our revenue of Exciſe which was granted to us, our heirs and ſucceſſors for ever, by an act of parliament made in the twelfth year of our reign, intituled, an act for taking away the court of Wards and Liveries and tenures in capite, and by knights ſervice and purveyance, and for ſettling a revenue upon his majeſty in lieu thereof. Know ye therefore, that we, for the conſideration aforeſaid, and in ſatisfaction or lieu of the ſaid debt, or ſum of twenty-two thouſand five hundred forty-eight pounds five ſhillings and ſixpence, by us owing to the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, and of our eſpecial grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, have given and granted, and by theſe preſents, for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, do give and grant unto the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns, one annual or yearly rent or ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, of lawful money of England, to be yearly had, received and taken by the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns for ever, out of the rents, revenues, profits and perquiſites, emoluments and payments reſerved, ariſing, accruing or coming, or that hereafter ſhall or may be reſerved, ariſe, accrue or become due or payable to us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, out of, for or by reaſon of the duty of Exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors, within our kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, by vertue of the ſaid act of parliament; the ſaid ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence per annum, to be paid quarterly at the four moſt uſual feaſts in the year, that is to ſay, at the feaſt of the An- nunciation of the bleſſed virgin Mary, the Nativity of St. John the Baptiſt, St. Michael the archangel, and the birth of our lord God, commonly called Chriſtmas, by even and equal portions, in truſt for ſuch of the creditors of the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, as within one year next enſuing the date hereof ſhall, upon notice of theſe preſents, deliver up their ſecurities, and accept of aſſignments of proportionable parts of the ſaid yearly ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, for ſatisfaction of their reſpective debts, according to the true intent and meaning of the covenant in that behalf herein after contained, for ſo much as their proportionable parts ſhall amount unto, and in the mean time ſhall not ſue or proſecute the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs, executors or adminiſtrators, for ſuch their debts: and the reſidue and overplus of the ſaid yearly ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, to remain and be to and for the proper uſe and benefit of the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns, without any truſt or account whatſoever; the firſt payment of the ſaid ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, to commence from the feaſt of the birth of our lord God one thouſand ſix hundred ſeventy and ſix. And we do hereby, for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, authorize, direct and appoint our high-treaſurer, chancellor, under-treaſurer, chamberlain and barons of our Exchequer, and the high-treaſurer and commiſſioners of the treaſury, chancellor, under-treaſurer, chamberlain and barons of the Exchequer, of us, our heirs and ſucceſſors that hereafter ſhall be, and all other officers and miniſters of the ſaid court, and of the receipt thereof, now being, or that hereafter ſhall be, that they and every of them, in their reſpective places, do from time to time, upon requeſt of the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns, reſpectively perform all acts neceſſary for the conſtant and due payment of the ſaid yearly rent or ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, to the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns, as the ſame ſhall grow due and become payable, and of every ſuch part and parts as the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns, ſhall grant or aſſign to any perſon or perſons from time to time, according to the truſt and agreement in that behalf herein contained; and as occaſion ſhall be, levy or ſtrike, or cauſe to be levied or ſtricken in the receipt of the Exchequer, of us, our heirs and ſucceſſors from time to time, tallies of pro or aſſignment, or other tallies, as the caſe may require, and as ſhall be deſired, upon the commiſſioners, treaſurers, receivers, collectors or farmers of the ſaid duty and revenue for the time being, or upon ſuch other perſon or perſons as ought to be charged or chargeable therewith, or accountable to us, our heirs and ſucceſſors for the ſame, who are hereby required and directed from time to time to make due payment thereof accordingly, ſo that the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns reſpectively, of all or any part or parts thereof, may certainly and duly, and on every of the ſaid quarterly feaſt days aforementioned, for ever hereafter have and receive the ſaid yearly rent or ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, hereby granted out of our ſaid revenue, without any further or other warrant to be ſued for, had or obtained from us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, in that behalf, and without any accompt, impreſt, or other charge to be ſet upon the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns, or any of them, for the ſame. And if it ſhall happen at any time hereafter, that the rents, iſſues or profits of our ſaid revenue ſhall be paid into the receipt of our Exchequer, or elſewhere, to the uſe of us, our heirs or ſucceſſors, before the levying of ſuch tallies, or before payment be made to the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns reſpectively, of the ſaid yearly rent or ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, or any part thereof, according to the true intent of theſe our letters patents; then and in ſuch caſe our expreſs will and pleaſure is, and we do hereby of our further eſpecial grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, authorize and require the high-treaſurer and commiſſioners of the treaſury, chancellor or under-treaſurer, chamberlain and barons of the Exchequer, of us, our heirs and ſucceſſors for the time being, and all other officers and miniſters of the Exchequer, and of the receipt thereof, that they or ſuch of them to whom it appertains, do from time to time, as often as need ſhall be, well and truly pay or cauſe to be paid unto the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns reſpectively, out of ſuch monies as ſhall be ſo paid into our Exchequer, or elſewhere, to the uſe of us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, all ſuch or ſo much of the ſaid yearly rent or ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, as ſhall from time to time be in arrear or unpaid after the feaſt days or times of payment aforeſaid, or any of them, without any further or other warrant to be ſued for, had or obtained in that behalf, and without any accompt, impreſt, or other charge to be ſet upon him the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns, for the ſame or any part thereof. And theſe our letters patents, or the exemplification, entry or inrollment thereof, ſhall be unto the high-treaſurer, commiſſioners of the treaſury, chancellor and under-treaſurer, chamberlain and barons of the Exchequer, of us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, and all other officers and miniſters of the ſaid Exchequer, and to the commiſſioners, treaſurer, receivers, collectors, farmers, and all other officers and miniſters of our ſaid revenue of exciſe, a good and ſufficient warrant and diſcharge for all and whatſoever they or any of them reſpectively ſhall do or cauſe to be done in or about the premiſſes, purſuant to our will and pleaſure herein before declared. And our further will and pleaſure is, and we do hereby of our eſpecial grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, grant, direct and appoint, that all ſuch tallies of pro or aſſignment, or other tallies as ſhall be hereafter levied or ſtruck upon our ſaid revenue of exciſe at the inſtance and deſire of the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns reſpectively, for or towards the ſatisfaction or ſecuring the payment of the ſaid yearly rent or ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, or any part thereof, ſhall be well and truly paid and ſatisfied out of the ſaid revenue quarterly, and every quarter as aforeſaid, and ſhall be preferrable and preferred before any other quarterly payments out of the ſame, by vertue or colour of any warrant, order or direction whatſoever of any after-date, excepting only ſuch yearly ſums as are neceſſarily payable for the management of our ſaid revenue, and except the yearly ſums amounting to twelve thouſand two hundred and nine pounds fifteen ſhillings and fourpence halfpenny or thereabouts, payable thereout unto our deareſt conſort the queen, as parcel of her jointure, and the yearly ſum of twenty-four thouſand pounds payable to our dear brother James duke of York; which ſaid ſeveral ſums, we will and do hereby direct, ſhall be paid and ſatisfied unto our ſaid deareſt conſort, and to our ſaid moſt dear brother, out of the ſaid revenue, duly, conſtantly, and in the firſt place before any of the ſaid payments, or any other payments whatſoever to be made out of the ſame. And our will and pleaſure is, and the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, for himſelf, his heirs, executors, and adminiſtrators, covenant, grant and agree, to and with us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, that he the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns, ſhall and will at any time or times, within one year next enſuing the date hereof, grant and aſſign proportionable part and parts of the ſaid yearly rent or ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, unto ſuch of his creditors or others by their appointment, as will be content to deliver up their ſecurities, and take ſuch aſſignments in ſatisfaction of their debts, according to the truſts herein before expreſſed; and that he the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns, ſhall not, nor will, during the ſaid ſpace of one year, make any grant or aſſignment of all or any part of the ſaid yearly ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, unto any perſon or perſons but ſuch as are creditors of the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, or others by their appointment as aforeſaid: and that if any difference ſhall at any time or times, within the ſpace of one year and an half now next coming, ariſe between the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs, executors, adminiſtrators or aſſigns, or any of them, and the ſaid creditors, or any of them, touching the aſſigning or diſpoſing of all or any part or parts of the ſaid annuity or yearly ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, that then the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs, executors, adminiſtrators and aſſigns, ſhall and will from time to time ſubmit themſelves, and all matters and things relating thereunto, to the comptrol of the lord high treaſurer, or the commiſſioners of the treaſury for the time being, and ſhall and will obſerve and fulfil all ſuch order and directions as the lord high treaſurer, or the commiſſioners of the treaſury, ſhall from time to time make or give concerning the ſame. Provided always, and our further will and pleaſure, intent and meaning is, and is hereby declared to be, that all aſſignments to be made as well before as after the ſaid ſpace of one year, of any part or parts of the ſaid yearly ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence hereby granted, ſhall, within the ſpace of thirty days next after the execution thereof, be enrolled before the auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, or the clerk of the Pells for the time being, to the end it may appear what aſſignments have been granted, and payments may be made thereupon according to the intent of theſe preſents, and that every aſſignment not ſo enrolled, ſhall be of none effect. Provided alſo, that when we, our heirs or ſucceſſors, ſhall at entire payments have actually paid the full ſum of twenty-two thouſand five hundred forty-eight pounds five ſhillings and ſixpence, of lawful money of England, to the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns, and to ſuch perſon or perſons to whom ſuch aſſignment or aſſignments ſhall be made as aforeſaid reſpectively in proportion amongſt them, after the rate of one hundred pounds principal money, for each and every ſix pounds per ann. which they, every, or any of them reſpectively ſhall or ought to have and enjoy of the ſaid yearly ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, hereby granted by vertue of theſe preſents, or ſuch aſſignment or aſſignments as ſhall be made and inrolled as aforeſaid, and ſo after thoſe proportions and rates for greater or leſſer ſums as the reſpective caſes ſhall happen, and alſo the arrears of the ſaid yearly ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, if any be; that then theſe preſents, and the grant of the ſaid yearly ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, ſhall ceaſe and be void, any thing herein before contained to the contrary notwithſtanding. And we do hereby of our further eſpecial grace, certain knowledge and meer motion, for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, grant unto the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns; and our expreſs pleaſure is, that theſe our letters patents, and every clauſe, article, and ſentence therein contained, whereupon any ambiguity or doubt ſhall or may ariſe, that the ſame ſhall be at all times expounded and taken moſt favourably and beneficially for the advantage of the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns; and that theſe our letters patents ſhall be good and effectual in law, and ſhall be available to the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns reſpectively, for his and their receiving and enjoying the ſaid yearly rent or ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, with all the arrearages thereof in manner aforeſaid, notwithſtanding the not reciting or not mentioning, or not truly and certainly reciting or mentioning of any act or acts of parliament, whereby the ſaid revenue was given and granted unto us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, or by what title we have received or enjoyed the ſame: and notwithſtanding the not reciting or not mentioning in this our grant, any leaſe or leaſes, grant or grants, charge or charges, made of or upon, or out of the ſaid revenue, or any part thereof alone on the ſaid revenue, or on the ſame, and any other part or parts of our revenue of exciſe, or generally on our revenue, or the date or contents of ſuch leaſes or grants, or of the perſons to whom the ſame are made: and notwithſtanding that no mention be herein of the direct and certain yearly and other rents and profits of the premiſſes, or of the certain, true or direct nature of ſuch rents and profits, or how or in what manner they ariſe, become due, or payable unto us, our heirs and ſucceſſors: and notwithſtanding the not mentioning how, and in what manner the ſaid debts due from us to the ſaid Joſeph Hornby ariſeth particularly, or any miſtake in the ſtating, or in the quantity or ſum of the aforementioned debt due, or herein mentioned to be due by us to the ſaid Joſeph Hornby: and notwithſtanding the ſtatute of Henry the fourth, late king of England, publiſhed in the firſt year of his reign: and notwithſtanding ſtanding the ſtatute of Henry the ſixth, late king of England, made and publiſhed in the eighteenth year of his reign: and notwithſtanding the ſtatute of Henry the eighth, late king of England, made and publiſhed in the twenty-ſixth year of his reign: and notwithſtanding the ſtatutes or acts of this preſent parliament, made and publiſhed in the twelfth year of our reign, whereby the ſaid revenue was, or was mentioned or intended to be granted, ſettled, and confirmed unto us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, or any article, clauſe, ſentence, or reſtraint therein contained: and notwithſtanding any defect in this our grant, or any act, ſtatute, ordinance, proclamation, proviſion or reſtraint whatſoever made or provided, or any other act, matter, or thing whatſoever to the contrary hereof, in any wiſe notwithſtanding. And laſtly, our will and pleaſure is, and we do hereby of our more abundant grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, for us, and our heirs and ſucceſſors, covenant and grant to and with the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns, that due payment ſhall be made of the ſaid yearly ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, hereby granted, and all other things hereby directed to be done on our part, ſhall be from time to time done and performed, according to the true intent and meaning of theſe preſents: and that if at any time hereafter, any defect or queſtion ſhall be found or made of or in the validity of this our preſent grant, that then upon the humble petition of the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs and aſſigns, we, our heirs and ſucceſſors, will be graciouſly pleaſed to make ſuch further grant, aſſurance and confirmation of the ſaid yearly rent or ſum of one thouſand three hundred fifty-two pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and tenpence, to the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns, as by our attorney-general ſhall be approved of and adviſed, and by the council learned in the law, of the ſaid Joſeph Hornby, his heirs or aſſigns, ſhall be adviſed and deſired, and with ſuch beneficial clauſes therein to be contained, as ſhall be thought expedient and moſt conducing to the performance of our will and pleaſure herein before declared. In witneſs whereof, &c.

The argument of lord chief juſtice Treby.

THERE are two points in this caſe:

1. Whether theſe letters patents are valid in law, and ſufficient to bind the king?
2. Whether that the remedy that theſe petitioners have taken be proper?

As to the firſt, I am of opinion, that the letters patents are valid and ſufficient to bind the king.

It is objected, that the word [ſucceſſors] in the ſtatute by which this revenue is given, intends that it ſhall be fixed in the crown, and unalienable. To this I anſwer, that there are ſeveral other ſtatutes by which lands and other revenues were given to the king by the ſame words that are in this ſtatute; and yet the kings of England had always power to alien them, as appears by Berkley's caſe in Plowd. and by the ſtatute of monaſteries, Vaugh. 62. 2 Rol. Abr. 198. &c. So king Charles II. having an eſtate of inheritance in this branch of his revenue, had the ſame power to alien this, as he had to alien any other part of it.

Vid. Plowd. 234 to 243.

Skin. Rep. 601. 6. 2. 603 &c.

It has been ſtrongly objected, that if the king ſhould have a power to alien all his lands and revenues, it might be of pernicious conſequence to his ſubjects; and that then our Exchequer in England would be like the Spaniſh Exchequer, of which it's ſaid that it receives taxes and revenues from the general, only to pay them out to ſome particular perſons.

To this I anſwer, that this might be ſome reaſon to induce the making an act of parliament to reſtrain the king's power of alienation; but ſince here the parliament has thought fit to give the king ſuch a power, we ought to acquieſce and ſubmit to it.

If the barons can award the king's treaſure out of the Exchequer.

But that, which I ſhall chiefly proceed on, is the judgment, which I think to be very extraordinary, and ſuch as the barons could not give; for I do not think, that they can award the king's treaſure out of the Exchequer. Then I take this judgment to be very erroneous and deficient in ſeveral particulars.

1. It leaves out the treaſurer, who is the chief officer concerned in diſpoſing the king's money.

Plow. 378. 381.457.458.

2. The chamberlain of the Exchequer ought to have been mentioned as well as the treaſurer; and ſo is the judgment in Nevile and Wroth's caſe in Plowd. and alſo in Cotton's Records.

3. This judgment appoints tallies to be ſtruck from time to time, and orders the method of payment of the ſeveral ſums of money, which I take it the barons cannot do; for they ſeem to undertake to do what is proper work for an act of parliament, which only can appoint the treaſurer to make payments in ſuch an order. 9 H. 4. 28.

Poph. 203. 211 Noy 89. Lat. 176. 177 188. Vide 8 Roll. Ab. 771.774. 1 Rol. R. 228. Telv. 130. 2 Cro. 386. 632. Hob. 194. 3 Cro. 442.

In the next place, I take it that this judgment cannot be amended, becauſe theſe are faults in ſubſtance, and the law is very nice and curious in judgment. So if a miſericordia be entered for a capiatur, the judgment is erroneous. So it is if it be conceſſum eſt, inſtead of conſideratum eſt, &c. Latch. 177. ſo is Poph. caſu ultimo.

Now I come to the remedy, which I take to be the great and difficult point of the caſe.

And I am of opinion, that no judgment can be given upon this petition to the barons; for I do not think that the court of Exchequer has any power to diſpoſe of the king's treaſure, and therefore I cannot ſee how this judgment can have any effect. Indeed it's ſaid, that the petitioner will have a writ to the officers of the Treaſury, or to the treaſurer himſelf; and if they do not obey this liberate, that then they will enforce to it by action. But this they cannot do; for I hold that the treaſurer may chooſe, upon a bare warrant, to pay in what order he thinks fit.

Then they have ſhewn no precedent that ever any ſuch action was brought; though indeed my lord Coke, in his 4th Inſtit. 116. ſeems to hint at it, and ſo does Plo. Com. 186. and 2 H. 7. 8. 9. 10. But there the liberate always went to the ſubordinate officer, but never to the treaſurer himſelf. By the treaſurer, I mean the treaſurer of the Exchequer, and not the lord high treaſurer of England; for that great officer has long been diſcontinued; and when he was in being, the greateſt uſe of him was when he had the honour to have been your lordſhip's collegue in this place.

So that I take it, that the treaſurer may if he pleaſed pay theſe annuities to the petitioners; but whether he will do it or no, is left to his conſcience and diſcretion; but he cannot be compelled to it but by authority of parliament.

Then this remedy is not warranted by the courſe of the Exchequer. If there were any ſuch uſage there, I agree it would be the law of the land; and ſo is Rawlin's caſe, 4 Rep. and Plo. 32. But there has been no ſuch uſage there; and in this point I concur with my brother Lechmere, who perhaps has the greateſt experience in the court of Exchequer of any judge that ever ſat there; for I think I lately heard him ſay, it was ſixty years ſince he practiſed there.

5 Mod. 13.14.

I have reaſon to think, whatever Mr. Plowden ſays, that theſe liberate's were granted upon petitions to the king himſelf, and not to the barons. You may ſee abundance of them in Ryley's Placita Parliamentaria. It appears indeed in Broke, tit. Talley de Exchequer pl. 4. that upon delivery of this writ to the officer, and aſſets in the Exchequer, an action lay againſt the officer for non-payment. But that ever it could be brought againſt the treaſurer or chamberlain, was never heard of.

But, ſay they, there is a clauſe in the patent, which empowers the treaſurer, &c. to make payments, &c. and this they call a perpetual warrant.

But this makes againſt the petitioners: for if it is ſo, why do they prefer a petition to the barons of the Exchequer? If they can have their debt without a petition barely upon this patent, where there is a grant, a command, and warrant to the treaſurer and officers to pay the money, (which, ſay they, amounts to a liberate) then it's a vain thing to ſue in the Exchequer for a judgment: for it cannot be preſumed, that a liberate under the ſeal of the Exchequer, teſte chief baron, ſhould be of more force than a liberate under the ſeal of England, teſte meipſo. Reg. 192.

To clear this point, it's neceſſary to enquire into the power of the court of the Exchequer.

The power of the court of Exchequer over the king's treaſury.

I do agree that they are ſupreme auditors, and have authority over the king's treaſure; but it is in tranſitu, as upon the ſheriff's accounts, or any other of the king's officers concerning the bringing in of the king's revenues into the Exchequer; but when the money is there, it is in its center, and the barons have nothing to do with it. They are only conduits, but not products, 2 Inſt. 197. 4 Inſt. 115. And it would be of dangerous conſequence for ſo many to have to do with the treaſury, leſt (as Vernon ſays in his book) there be too many leaks in the ciſtern.

I confeſs, the court of Exchequer does uſe to enrol charters in the Exchequer, and that is the foundation of the accounts, &c. and ſo is Plowd. But whether the barons of the Exchequer have a power to comptrol and command the treaſurer is a great and arduous point. It is in effect, whether the barons ſhall have the power to turn out the treaſurer when they pleaſe; and whether the petitions, that were formerly preferred to the king, ſhall be now exhibited to the barons of the Exchequer? Which matters I muſt own I cannot be brought to imagine, though I would think as favourably as poſſible in this caſe; for I give this opinion, not becauſe I would, but becauſe I muſt.

But I take this power in the barons, to be againſt the nature and inſtitution of the court of Exchequer; for they are originally empowered by the king to get in his revenue, and 'tis for the ſake of the revenue that they have any thing elſe to do. And all they do is to convey the king's treaſure to its proper place; but they cannot diſpoſe of it; for there is no correſpondence between the barons and the officers of the treaſury.

On reverſal of attainders no reſtitution of money paid to the king.

Upon reverſal of attainders, we know there is no reſtitution of the money paid to the king; and the reaſon is, becauſe the barons cannot in ſuch caſe comptrol the treaſury. I remember ſeveral years ſince, there was a ſolicitor, who brought the rolls of a forfeited eſtate in diſpute into court; and they ordered the money to be put into the hands of the Remembrancer; for they ſaid, if it was once paid into the treaſury, there was no getting it out again.

The caſe in ſhort is no more than this:

Suppoſe the king be indebted to the petitioners, and alſo to the army, the fleets, &c. Now who ſhall direct the payment of theſe debts, the barons, or the treaſurer? Who is the beſt judge of the ſtate of the kingdom, and of its neceſſities? So that ſuppoſe there was only 4000l. in the Exchequer, and we were threatened with a foreign invaſion, how ſhall this money be diſpoſed? Says the treaſurer, to raiſe men to pay the army and our fleets, that by their aſſiſtance we may prevent the enemy from coming amongſt us. No, ſay the barons, we muſt pay the bankers with this money, though at the ſame time we open the gates, and let in Hannibal to our utter ruin and deſtruction. My lord Coke, in his 4th Inſtitut. treating of the court of the Exchequer, takes notice of the oaths taken by the treaſurer, and alſo by the barons. In the treaſurer's oath it is mentioned, that he is to keep and diſpenſe the king's treaſure ſafely; but in the baron's oath, there is not a word of this matter taken notice of: which to me is an argument that the treaſurer is judge in point of iſſuing money, whether it be due and payable or not, and to whom, in what manner, and when it ſhall be paid, &c. And this I take to be the true reaſon why no action can be brought againſt the treaſurer, becauſe he acts as a judge, and not as a miniſter of the court; for he is not attendant to it, as ſheriffs, bailiffs, &c. are. So I take it, "may be paid," is enough for the barons to ſay; but "muſt be paid," is only for the treaſurer to ſay. Cro. El. 545. Babington's caſe.

The treaſurer of the Exchequer, his oath.

The nature of his office. Vide Moore 475. 11 Co. 90.92.

Then it is treaſon to counterfeit the great or privy-ſeal, becauſe they only have to do with the king's revenue; but it was never thought treaſon to counterfeit the Exchequer ſeal, which has nothing to do with it. Plowd. Com. 223.

In the conteſts heretofore between the king and people, what was meant when they complained that the king's treaſure was miſpent and miſemployed? Not that 'twas paid away without letters patents, or taken away without the king's grant; but it was this. They blamed the treaſurer, becauſe he paid away the king's treaſure to perſons unworthy, to minions and favourites, though they had grants from the crown by letters patents: but yet it was left to the treaſurer's diſcretion to have paid them or not; which he ſhould not have done, when perhaps the public good required it.

Now I come to our authorities in our books.

I ſhall begin with 2 Ed. 3. 25. & 38 Aſſ. pl. 20. wherein it's ſaid by the chief baron, that we ſhall take conuſance of all matters that may turn to the king's advantage, but not a word concerning the diſpoſal of the treaſury. Vid. 19 H. 6. 62. 63. and 2 Roll. Rep. 301. are expreſs.

So in Stradling and Morgan's caſe, Plowd. 207. it's ſaid, that no pleas ſhall be held in the Exchequer, but for the advantage of recovery of the king's debts, and bringing in his revenues; ſo that the Common Pleas in the Exchequer, are only founded on getting in of the king's revenue. I chooſe to cite Mr. Plowden, becauſe his book is ſo mightily relied on the other ſide, I mean the caſe of Nevil and Wroth.

I believe it was the authority of thoſe caſes that raiſed all this duſt, but I ſhall anſwer them by and by; and at preſent ſhall only obſerve, that there is not one law book that gives theſe caſes the credit to mention them, I mean as to this point of proceeding by petition to the barons, &c. So in the earl of Devonſhire's caſe, 11 Rep. 92. there is no notice taken of Nevil's or Wroth's caſe, though there was opportunity enough to have mentioned them, if they thought they had been of any weight and authority. So 2 Rol. Abr. 160. and 180. and 183. the reſolution in the earl of Devonſhire's caſe is cited, but not a word of Nevil's or Wroth's.

Vide Moore 476. 2 Inſt. 555. Lit. R. 91. 2 Ro. R. 183.

In the next place, I ſhall mention ſome treatiſes concerning the court of Exchequer.

1. There is Gervaſius Tilburienſis de rebus in ſcaccario geſtis; who ſets forth the juriſdiction of the court of Exchequer, but mentions nothing of this power in the barons to comptrol the treaſury. The capitalis juſticiarius Angliæ had indeed a comptrol over the treaſurer himſelf, as appears from Spelm. Gloſſ. 71. 331. So when Hugo de Burgo, who was the laſt great juſticiary, was in diſgrace, he was charged to render an account of the miſpending of the king's revenue, which ſhews that he had a power over the treaſurer. But ever ſince this great office has been diſcontinued, the treaſurer has acted according to his own diſcretion.

The next book, that I ſhall quote, is called the Diverſity of Courts. It's mentioned in my lord Coke's preface to the 10th Report; but there is nothing of this power in the barons mentioned there, neither is it taken notice of in the Mirror of Juſtices, c. 1. ſect. 14. 4 Inſt. 110. Fleta, lib. 2. c. 25. Britt. 2. 6. Crompt. Juriſdiction of Courts, 105. which book was printed 15 years after Mr. Plowden's, nor in 2 Inſt. 551. nor in 4 Inſt. where the full authority of this court is fully ſet forth. And I can but alſo obſerve, that Mr. Prinn, in a book which he printed on purpoſe to animadvert on my lord Coke, 4 Inſt. does not take notice of any ſuch power. I ſhall beg leave alſo to mention Vernon's Conſideration on the Court of Exchequer, and Mr. Cambden and ſir Tho. Smith, who were great and learned men, though their books I confeſs are not of authority. But if there had been any ſuch power in the barons of the Exchequer, 'tis probable they would have taken notice of it.

Next, there are Savil's Reports, Lane's and my brother Hardreſs's Reports, which treat chiefly of the court of Exchequer; but yet they give not the leaſt countenance to any ſuch power. So in 1 Rol. Abr. 538. 539. in Lane's caſe, 2 Rep. 2 Rol. Rep. 294. there is not one ſyllable of it.

I ſhall conclude this point with this obſervation: that ſince there were two great powers in the barons, (as is pretended) one of bringing in money into the Exchequer, and the other of paying it out, that yet theſe books ſhould be all ſilent as to the greateſt power of paying it out, is very ſtrange and unaccountable: which indeed does induce me to believe, that there is no ſuch power in the barons, and that thoſe petitioners have mentioned in their petition the only way of having their annuities; that is, as their former payments were made (viz.) by warrant from the lord treaſurer.

Now I come to the objections.

1. They quote Ryly's Pla. Parl. pa. 251. 253. 257. 262. 337. 526. 529. &c. but, if I can apprehend them, thoſe words make againſt the petitioners.

Then Margery Parker's caſe, 9 H. 6. 12. 13. was mightily inſiſted on; and indeed at firſt I thought there was ſomething in it; but, upon a ſtrict peruſal, I find it's conſiſtent enough with my opinion, Indeed Babington mentioned here a remedy by petition to the barons, but this was only a word ſlipped out; but the court gave no regard to it, and were of opinion againſt it, that there was no ſuch remedy. And it's obſervable, that Brook in his Abridgment takes no notice of Babington's opinion, though he does of all the reſt of the caſe.

The next thing objected is, that the barons do every term ſend a liberate to the officers of the treaſury under the Exchequer ſeal, to pay money for paper, pens, and other neceſſaries for the court of the Exchequer; the charge of which, I am told, comes to 2 or 300l. per ann.

To this I anſwer, that firſt this writ goes without any judgment at all: ſo that according to this, the petitioners needed not have had any judgment. But the true reaſon of iſſuing forth this writ is grounded on this. In the treaſurer's commiſſion there is this clauſe, that he ſhall pay out ſuch ſums of money as are required pro neceſſariis ſcaccarii: but of this writ they take no further notice than as a certificate, when they make up their accounts.

Now for the precedents.

Plow. 230. 320. 2 Rol. 524. Cro. Car. 513. 528.

The court of Exchequer is guided by multitudes of precedents, 2 Rep. Lane's caſe, Mo. 565. but here they have not one precedent for ſuch a power over the king's revenue, to which the law has ſo great a regard; for there is nothing in the law ſo fenced, ſo guarded, and ſo ſecured, as the king's inheritance. Where that is concerned, there muſt be petition de droit, an inquiſition found, beſides ſearches, &c. ſo careful is the law of the king's inheritance and revenue.

9 H. 3. ſtat. 1. c. 29. 3 Ed. 1. c. 24. 25 Ed. 3.

But now here the king muſt loſe his freehold without trial, which his ſubjects ſhall not do, as appears by magna charta.

ſtat. 5. c. 4. 28 Ed. 3. c. 3. 52. H. 3. c. 22. 15 R. 2. c. 12. 16 R. 2. c. 2.

In the next place, I ſhall anſwer the caſes which indeed give life to the preſent caſe, and are the foundation of it. Firſt, as to Nevil's caſe, I obſerve the petitioners council do not agree in their title to it. Some ſay, it was grounded on a petition of right; others, that it was a monſtrans de droit; and others, that it was a complaint againſt the officers of the treaſury. But true it is, Mr. Plowden is preciſe and expreſs in the point, though it ſeems to me to be but his own private opinion: and I muſt take the boldneſs to ſay, that he is miſtaken, as will appear from theſe books, 13 H. 7. Pl. 15. 4 Ed. 4. 23. b. 1 Leo. 190. 1. And. 253. Savile 125. all which caſes happened but twelve years after Nevil's, and yet are contrary to it. By the ſame books and the ſame reaſons it appears, that Wroth's caſe ought to have no more weight than Nevil's, &c.

Therefore I conclude, that this judgment given by the barons of the Exchequer is an erroneous judgment, and ought to be reverſed.

Vide infra, the argument of the lord chief juſtice Holt, contra.

The argument of the lord chief juſtice Holt.

Holt. Ch. J. IN this caſe, here have been two points made:

1. Whether this grant be good.
2. Whether here be a proper courſe taken by the patentees.

There has indeed been a third point ſtarted by my brother that argued laſt, and that does reſpect the entring of the judgment.

Comb. 270. 271. 272.

As to the firſt queſtion, I hold the grant to be good; and all, that have argued here, have concurred in the ſame opinion. I do confeſs this is the great point of the caſe; but ſo much has been ſaid to it, that little more can be added: but I muſt ſay ſomething to it, though I cannot but repeat.

Whether and in what caſes the king may alien his revenue.

I hold that king Charles II. might charge this branch of his revenue, and my reaſon for my opinion is but ſhort.

That the law will not permit the king to do wrong to the ſubject (& a fortiori to the whole kingdom.) Vide Co. Lit. 19. b. 2 Inſt. 681. 1 Co 44. b. 7 Co. 12. b. 11 Co. 72. 1 Rol.R. 167. Noy 182. Mor. 416. Godb. 317. Dav. 75. Cro. Argum. 60. Plo. 246. 487. b. 13 Ed. 4. 8. 1 H. 7. 10.

It is, becauſe the king was ſeiſed of an eſtate in fee of this revenue; for to ſuch an eſtate a power of alienation is incident. Lit. Sect. 360. And I take it to be the intent and the expreſs words of the act, that the king ſhould have a right and liberty of alienating and charging this eſtate.

It is no objection, that this revenue was given to the king under a truſt; for notwithſtanding that, he might alien it. So ſeveral kings of England have founded corporations of charitable uſes, and yet theſe perſons incorporated might, notwithſtanding ſuch truſt, alien their eſtates; ſo may a dean and chapter theirs; ſo may a biſhop with the conſent of dean and chapter; ſo a parſon, with the conſent of the patron and ordinary, might have aliened the land of which he was ſeiſed in the right of his church: but the king has no body required to conſent to his alienations. To ſay, that he may alien by the conſent of the eſtates of the realm, is as much as to ſay, he cannot alien without an act of parliament, which he may clearly do.

And indeed this revenue comes to the king by purchaſe; for he gave a recompence for it, (viz.) part of his ſtanding revenues, it being the profits that did ariſe from his wards and liberties.

But it is objected, that this power in the king of alienating his revenues may be a prejudice to his people, to whom he muſt recur continually for ſupplies. I anſwer, that the law has not ſuch diſhonourable thoughts of the king, as to imagine he will do any thing amiſs to his people, in thoſe things in which he hath power ſo to do.

2 Sid. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. Vol. 1. Hales Pl. C. 61. 101. Co. Lit. 16. a.

But that which I inſiſt on is, that it is abſurd in its nature to reſtrain the king from a power of aliening his revenues of which he is ſeiſed in fee. It is againſt the nature of the being of a king, that he ſhould have leſs power than his people; for before he was king, he had power to alien. Now when the crown deſcended upon him, he is ſeiſed in jure coronæ; and ſhall he then have leſs power over thoſe very lands than he had before the deſcent of the crown? Shall he now be diſabled to alien by being a king? This would be againſt a common principle of law, that the deſcent of the crown takes away all diſability. Plo. 105. Dier.

Then it is repugnant to the conſtitution of the government. Suppoſe a king ſhould be under a preſent danger of being invaded: if the king could not raiſe money by alienating his revenue, the nation might periſh; for he cannot otherwiſe raiſe money than by an act of parliament, for which there might not be time: and therefore heretofore the kings of England have borrowed ſeveral ſums of money by mortgaging their lands. Cotton's Poſthum. 175.

And there ought to be a power in all governments to reward perſons that deſerve well; for rewards and puniſhments are the ſupporters of all governments; and it has been the conſtant uſage of the kings of England to reward perſons deſerving of the government out of the crown revenues, by penſions, and giving eſtates to ſupport the titles of earl and other dignities. Seld. Tit. of Honour 838. 7 Rep. 12. Calvin's caſe. And this has been allowed of by act of parliament, as appeareth by 34 H. 8. c. 20.

But ſome perhaps will ſay, I have been talking little to the purpoſe; for that they do not deny that the king might alien his own demeſnes, or any lands that came to him by deſcent or purchaſe: but ſay they, this revenue was ſettled by act of parliament on the crown, and therefore it cannot be aliened. But I do not find any ſuch diſtinction in our law-books, nor any authority from common or ſtatute law, that reſtrains the kings of England from aliening any ſort of their revenues.

Ancient demeſne lands alienable becauſe poſſeſſed by the king in his perſonal capacity.

As for the lands in ancient demeſn, they ſeemed moſt appropriated for the king's uſe of any of his revenues; for they had ſeveral privileges, all relating to the king; as, not to be impleaded out of the manor, to be free of toll for all things concerning their ſuſtenance and huſbandry, not to be impannelled on any inqueſt. And yet notwithſtanding all this thoſe lands were always alienable: and if theſe lands are alienable, what eſtates in the crown are not alienable? And our books do take notice that theſe eſtates are alienable; and ſo is Fitz. N. B. 13. c. 166. f. & 226. Staunford Prer. 38.

9 Co. 24.

See 27 H. 8. c. 24.

Then what reaſon can be given why ſome eſtates ſhould be aliened, and others not? Why may not the king as well alien theſe eſtates as he may the flowers of his crown, as appears in the abbot of Strata Marcella's caſe? For he may grant a county-palatine, which has jura regalia; ſo he has granted a power to pardon treaſon or felony, &c. Indeed theſe prerogatives are reaſſumed to the crown by the ſtatute H. 8. but the grants were not void.

27 H. 8. c. 28. 31 H. 8. c. 13. 32 H. 8. c. 24.

Then if an eſtate be ſettled on a ſubject by act of parliament, it will not be denied but that he may alien ſuch eſtate; and why ſhall not the king have the ſame privilege? It appears in fact, that he has always done it. So all the lands that belonged to the abbies and monaſteries were aliened by the king, and yet they were given to him by act of parliament, and by general words, as it is here. So the cuſtoms have been always granted and charged by the king, and yet they were granted to him by act of parliament. The authorities in our books are full to this purpoſe, as 21 Ed. 3. 47. 29 Ed. 3. Pl. 1, 2. 4 Inſt. 45. Davis 7, 14. Knighton 1684.

But it is objected, that this revenue was given in lieu of inheritances that were unalienable, (viz.) the wards, liveries, purveyances, &c.

Tho' how the nature of theſe inheritances can affect inheritances of another nature, I cannot ſee. But even theſe inheritances were always in effect alienable, for they might have been releaſed. The king's grant to be free of priſage, ſir Thomas Waller's caſe; and ſo were ſervices in capite, and purveyances, &c.

Some opinions have been urged, which ſay that the crown revenues could not be alienated, as Fleta and Bracton. But theſe books are only ornaments to the law; they are not looked on as authentick, eſpecially where the practice has been always to the contrary. But Britt. 87. is otherwiſe, and ſo is Selden 549, and 552. And Bracton himſelf in his ſecond book, c. 57. ſeems to be of another opinion, where he ſaith, that even res ſacræ are alienable by the common law, tho' perhaps by the canon law they are not to be aliened. So the ſtatute of Bigamis, c. 7. alſo admits, that the king may grant away his revenues. Forteſcue in his book de Laudibus Legum Angliæ ſays, that the government is not only regal, but legal and political, and then diſcourſes of the particulars wherein the regal power is reſtrained: and if our conſtitution had been ſo that the king could not alien his lands or revenues, it cannot be imagined but that he would have mentioned a thing ſo remarkable, eſpecially in a time when there were ſo many grants made by the crown, tho' indeed at that time there were many acts of reſumption made, as there were before and after, as in 6 H. 4. 14. and in the time of king Henry the eighth, &c. which are a great demonſtration that thoſe grants could not be revoked or avoided but by act of parliament.

Fee farm rents granted by act of parliament and why.

It is objected, that the fee-farm rents in the time of king Charles the ſecond were granted by act of parliament. But they might have been granted without that act. It was only made to encourage purchaſers, to make good the letters patents beyond all ſcruple, and to give power to ſue for the arrears of rent, and to diſtrain, &c.

Then it's objected, that if this grant of the revenue ſhould be alienable to the ſubjects, that then the king's officers of exciſe would be the ſubjects officers.

But that does not follow; they are only a means to convey to their fellow ſubjects their right, and that which is granted to them by the king's letters patents. So the juſtices in eyre, and of oyer and terminer, &c. are the king's juſtices; and yet they convey juſtice to the people. 4 Inſt. 162.

As for theſe letters patents themſelves, it's plain by the whole tenour of the patents, that the king was not deceived in his grant; and the conſideration being executed, though it be falſe, yet that will not avoid the grant. Plo. 554.

So that I conclude this point, that theſe letters patents which charge this branch of the revenue, are good and firm in law.

I come now to the ſecond point; and that is, concerning the remedy taken by the patentees.

And I hold they have taken a very proper and legal remedy. We are all agreed that they have a right; and if ſo, then they muſt have ſome remedy to come at it too.

Remedies to recoveragainſt the king. Skin. Rep. 608. 609.

The remedies at common law, to recover againſt the king, were by petition, or monſtrans de droit.

Indeed, there is a new remedy now given by ſtat. 2 Ed. 6. c. 8. and that is by way of traverſe to the king's title, 4 Rep. 54. 2 Inſt. 688.

Petition of right, the value of it.

But firſt, a petition of right is not neceſſary in this caſe: not but that a man may proceed in this way, and admit himſelf out of poſſeſſion if he pleaſeth. But it's not neceſſary, for two reaſons;

1. Becauſe a petition of right is grounded always upon a naked matter of fact ſuggeſted, and not of record; and upon ſuch a ſuggeſtion, there is a commiſſion iſſues out of Chancery. Cok. Entr. 462. 9 H. 4. 4.

But here the title is derived by letters patents which are of record; ſo that here is no matter of fact to be enquired of.

2. The patentees do not endeavour to deſtroy the king's title: but petitions of right do ſo, and are generally inconſiſtent with the king's title.

Then this annuity is not turned to a right, as if there had been an attainder, &c. Therefore why ſhould there be a petition of right?

Monſtrans de droit, where lies.

I take this remedy to be by a monſtrans de droit; and this remedy is to be ſued at common law, when the party's title appeared of record. Kell. 178. Monſtrans de droit, or ouſter le maine, (which is all one in effect) always lies where the title or right of the ſubject appears as well by matter of record as the king's title; and this appears fully, Sadler's caſe, 4 Rep. and Hob. 334.

Alſo it's plain, that a monſtrans de droit lies in the Exchequer: I think there is no doubt of that.

It is objected, that the petition ſhould be firſt ſued to the king: but by the records in Ryley's Placita Parl. 351, 257. Staundf. 72. it appears, that theſe petitions of right have been ſued to the court of King's-Bench. But indeed this petition differs from thoſe; for this being only by way of complaint, there needs no indorſement, as in the other caſes.

The next objection is, that in this precedent there was a liberate.

1. This writ is in its nature a writ of allowance, Reg. 192. But this writ does not give any manner of juriſdiction; for the court may hold plea, and proceed without it.

Power of the barons of the Exchequer to anſwer demands of the treaſurer.

2. But the next anſwer that I give to this, and which may be ſatisfactory to any body, is the ſtatute of 5 R. 2. c. 9. which directs the barons of the Exchequer to anſwer every demand, without any writ or letter from the king. So is 4 Inſt. 110. So that I take it to be very plain, that the barons might proceed here without any writ at all.

But it is objected, that the writ ſhould have been directed to the treaſurer, &c.

But this needs not be; for the treaſurer hath nothing to do with civil pleas. Reg. 137.

Indeed, Fitzh. N. B. 129. doth mention the treaſurer: but that is a common error, and the writs need not be ſo directed.

It's true, as my lord Coke obſerves, that the legitimation of any caſe may be ſuſpected that has no caſe of kin to it; and I agree to that rule. But I think I have found out ſome kindred to this preſent caſe, and that is the caſe in Coke's Entries, 93. tit. Claim of Liberties; for there the barons did allow certain liberties, and alſo the payment of a rent-charge granted by the king to my lord Hunſdon. So the caſe of Margery Parker in 9 H. 6. 13. is a conſiderable authority to this point. She had an annuity out of the Magna Cuſtuma of London, granted by the queen out of a ſum aſſigned for her dower to receive of the cuſtomers. The queen ſhall not have action againſt the cuſtomers, but muſt ſue to the barons of the Exchequer; and Margery Parker may ſue for it in the Exchequer, in the ſame manner as the queen might for her portion. Then there is my lady Braughton's caſe, which happened in 25 Car. II. My lady Braughton forſeited the keeper's place of the New-Priſon to the king, who thereupon made a ſeiſure: upon this the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter came into the court of Exchequer, and claimed the inheritance, and the king's hands were amoved. Indeed this matter was firſt ſtirred in the King's-Bench, for they gave judgment to ſeize the priſon. Now if the court of King's-Bench might hold plea there of a monſtrans de droit, becauſe the ſeizure was there; why may they not as well proceed in the Exchequer by monſtrans de droit, becauſe the money is there?

'Tis true, money comes into and iſſues out of the Exchequer without the barons: but, with ſubmiſſion, the right of bringing in, and iſſuing out of the money, belongs to the barons. And if you make the barons only judges of the right of coming in of the king's money, you make them judges but of half their buſineſs which belongs to that court; for the barons have the judicial power over the whole court of Exchequer. And to ſay that the treaſurer and his officers have no correſpondence with the barons, is not true; for all the books take notice of them, as perſons that all belong to the Exchequer.

Some have objected, that this court ought regularly to hold pleas only where the king is party; and that this court uſed to be prohibited to proceed in any pleas that do not concern the king. 2 Inſt. 551. There you may ſee what pleas they may hold.

But here the plea does concern the king; for here is the king's grant, and the ſuit is to the king: and this determination of the barons in this caſe is not thus any judgment of their own; but the king himſelf, by reaſon of ſuch his letters patents, hath obliged himſelf to make ſuch payments. As in the caſe of an obligation where debt is brought upon it, and a recovery is had; 'tis not ſo much the judgment of the court as binds the property, as the obligor himſelf, who by his bond has ſubjected his property to be determined by the judgment.

Now as to the authorities which ſeem directly to govern this point, and the objections againſt them.

1. There is ſir Tho. Wroth's caſe in Plowden, which I rely upon as a clear and full authority in this caſe, notwithſtanding all the objections that have been made againſt it.

King Hen. VIII. had appointed ſir Tho. Wroth to be gentleman-uſher of the privy-chamber to prince Edward; and he granted to the ſaid ſir Thomas for the exerciſe of the ſame office an annuity of 20 l. to be had and yearly taken to the ſaid ſir Thomas, from Lady-Day then laſt paſt, during his natural life, by the hands of the treaſurer of his court of Augmentations of the revenues of the crown for the time being, of ſuch his treaſure of the ſame revenues, as ſhould remain in the hands of the treaſurer at two times in the year, &c.

Court of Augmentations.

The chief objection againſt this caſe is, that there the grant was under the ſeal of the court of Augmentations, which was incorporated with the court of Exchequer. But that I deny, for that court was never legally united to the court of Exchequer, as was adjudged in Dier, 216. So that the objection, that ſir Tho. Wroth's grant was under the ſeal of the Augmentation court, and under the ſurvey of it, is gone.

Then it does not appear to me, that ever the court of Augmentations had any power expreſsly given them to relieve the grantees of ſuch rents. I have looked over the act of parliament, by which that court is conſtituted, but I cannot find any ſuch power. But I think, the court of Augmentations did proceed in ſuch manner, that it might be alſo reputed a court of Exchequer; and the court of Augmentations is by expreſs words made a court for the new revenues that ſhould come to the crown, which are exempted from the juriſdiction of the other court: but that which I infer from hence is, that if this new court of Exchequer did in ſome caſes relieve grantees of rents, &c. certainly the old court of Exchequer ſhall have the ſame privilege.

There are other courts which have alſo proceeded in the ſame manner; as the court of Wards did uſually hold plea of theſe matters, 2 Croke 78. Queen Elizabeth granted to Allen under her great ſeal, an annuity of 40 l. per ann. to be paid by her receiver of the court of Wards. This, being payable by the receiver, is in the nature of a rent-charge. So the court of Surveyors, erected by 33 Hen. 8. did proceed in the ſame manner, and did relieve grantees of rent-charges, &c.

As to Nevil's caſe, alſo in Plowden, I take it likewiſe to be a full authority in point. An yearly rent-charge of 3 l. 10 s. was granted to ſir H. Nevil and another for the exerciſe of the office of keeper of a park, out of a manor for their lives. One is attainted. The manor comes to the poſſeſſion of the king. The king ſhall neither have the office nor the rent: and the arrears of the ſaid annuity were paid to ſir H. Nevil at the receipt of the Exchequer, by the hands of the treaſurer and the chamberlain. I grant that thoſe lands were alſo under the ſurvey of the court of Augmentations; but that I conceive makes nothing againſt me for the reaſons before-mentioned.

Money iſſuing out of the Exchequer by order of the Exchequer.

There are ſeveral other records which have been already quoted, but I ſhall not trouble you with the repetition of them. I ſhall only mention ſome few which I think have been omitted, as Trin. 1°. Mar. Rot. 126. 2 El. Rot. 145. Mich. 13. Q. Rot. 347. Hill. 13 El. Rot. 143. P. 1 Q. Rot. 108. In all theſe records it alſo appears, that money iſſued out of the Exchequer by order of the court of Exchequer, and it is highly reaſonable that they ſhould have ſuch a power.

Suppoſe the king purchaſed land that is charged with a rent, the king muſt take the land together with it's burden; but in ſuch caſe it would be too hard to drive the grantee of the rent to his petition of right to the king. No, certainly he may come to the court of Exchequer by way of petition to the barons, who may give him relief.

It has been objected, that money which once comes into the Exchequer can never be taken out. Reg. 193. But if this is true in a general ſenſe, that none of the king's revenues that are brought into the Exchequer can be paid out, this would deſtroy all annuities, rent-charges, and other payments which the crown is obliged to make.

Reſtitution of outlawed goods and on attainder.

'Tis true, if a man be outlawed in the King's-Bench, and the party's goods are ſeiſed into the king's hands, and then the outlawry is reverſed, there can be no reſtitution. The reaſon of this is, for that the court of King's-Bench cannot ſend a writ to the treaſurer, and the court of Exchequer have no record before them to iſſue out a warrant for a reſtitution. So if an attainder be reverſed, the mean profits taken into the Exchequer cannot be reſtored for the ſame reaſon; and alſo for that the king cannot be made a diſſeiſor, and the ſtatute gives a remedy only as to parliament.

There remains after all a great objection, had it any weight, and that is, cui bono? If the patentees ſhould have judgment for them, what will it ſignify if they cannot come at any money?

As to this, I do think, that as ſoon as the writs are delivered to the officers of the Exchequer, I mean the treaſurer and chamberlain, the property is altered, and the officers become debtors to the parties, as appears by 2 H. 7. So as ſoon as a fieri fac' is delivered to the ſheriff, and upon it goods are levied, the property of the goods is altered, and the ſheriff becomes a debtor to the plaintiff. So an action of debt * will lie upon a liberate, and ſo it has been adjudged.

I ſhall only obſerve one thing more, and ſo conclude; and that is in anſwer to my brother who argued laſt, for he ſtruck very hard at the judgment given by the barons. He thought that it was very erroneous, and therefore void. But with

* Action of debt on a liberate, and why. Vide 5 Mod. 13. 14. 48. Skin. Rep. 257. 1 Salk. 323. 2 Ventr. 95. 2 Sand. 47. 344.

with ſubmiſſion, I take this judgment to be as well as it can be. And whereas it is ſaid in the judgment, that the money ſhall be paid by the commiſſioners and chamberlain of the Treaſury, it muſt be underſtood of the receipt of the treaſury, and not of the lord high treaſurer, which office is long ſince expired.

As for the levying of the tallies mentioned in the judgment, it does not hurt; it is at moſt but ſurpluſſage. But that which I inſiſt on is, that though this judgment, in reſpect of form, or any material point of it, ſhould be erroneous, yet if your lordſhips ſhould be of opinion in the two firſt points with me, you will then give a new judgment, ſuch as the court of Exchequer ought to have given; for that is the law of this place, as appears by 31 Ed. 3. c. 12. And this laſt point was ſo ruled upon a debate in the houſe of lords, and was the caſe of the King and Sainthell, 30 Car. 2.

So that upon the whole I am of opinion, that the judgment given by the barons ought to be affirmed.

Petition to the king, and not to the barons.

But afterwards the lord keeper was of opinion to reverſe the judgment, and accordingly it was reverſed. The ground upon which he gave his opinion was, that the patentees had not taken a proper remedy by petition to the barons, who have no power or comptrol over the king's treaſury, &c. and that their only remedy was by petition to the king himſelf. He inſiſted much upon the ſame reaſons and grounds which my lord chief juſtice Treby went on. (a)

(a) To avoid repetition we have omitted Skinner's report of Holt's argument. But we think it proper, to apprize the reader, that in ſeveral parts it is more full than the report which we have extracted from 5th Modern. Editor.

The argument of the lord keeper Sommers, on his giving judgment in the bankers caſe: delivered in the Exchequer-Chamber, June 23, 1696.

THE four following cauſes depending in the Exchequer-Chamber, ſtood for the judgment of the court.

The attorney general againſt
Joſeph Hornby,
Robert Williamſon,
Thomas Smith,
and
Sir Jeremy Snow.

Lord Keeper. THESE cases differ in ſeveral particulars; but as to the points which have been chiefly ſpoken to, they are the ſame.

I ſhall therefore only put the caſe, as it ſtands upon the record where Williamſon is party; which I will do ſhortly, becauſe it has been opened ſo often already, upon the ſeveral arguments.

Robert Williamſon comes before the barons, and exhibits letters patent under the great ſeal, dated 30 April, 29 Car 2. granting to ſir Robert Vyner, his heirs and aſſigns, the yearly rent or ſum of 25,003*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* to be yearly paid, received, and taken, of the rents, revenues, and profits ariſing to the king, his heirs and ſucceſſors, out of the duty of exciſe, by virtue of the act made 12 Car. 2. for taking away the court of wards and liveries, &c. and ſettling a revenue in lieu thereof; and prays that theſe letters patent may be inrolled of record.

The barons cauſe them to be read and intolled; and the letters patent are ſet forth at large in the record.

The effect of them is,

The king takes notice, that he had been conſtrained to poſtpone the payment of monies due to the goldſmiths, and others, upon tallies and orders regiſtered.

That he could not ſpare ſuch a ſum, as would ſatisfy thoſe debts; but was willing to grant to the perſons to whom he was indebted, an annual ſum anſwerable to the intereſt of their debts, after the rate of 6*l. per cent.*

To that end, he had commanded the accounts to be ſtated to the firſt of January, 1676; whereupon there appeared due to ſir Robert Vyner 416,724*l.* 13*s.* 1½. In ſatisfaction whereof, the king reſolved to grant him 25,003*l.* 9*s.* 4*d. per annum*, to be had and taken by him, his heirs and aſſigns, out of the rents, revenues and profits, which ſhould ariſe or become due or payable to the king, his heirs and ſucceſſors, out of, for, or by reaſon of the duty of exciſe, and by virtue of the ſaid act, to be paid quarterly, in truſt for ſuch of his creditors, as within a year after the date of the letters patent ſhould deliver up their ſecurities, and accept aſſignments of proportionable parts of the ſaid yearly ſum, in ſatisfaction of their debts reſpectively due, and in the mean time ſhould not ſue ſir Robert Vyner for their debts; the reſidue thereof to the uſe of ſir Robert Vyner and his heirs.

The king directs the high treaſurer, chancellor, under-treaſurer, chamberlains and barons of the Exchequer, which then were, and the high treaſurer, commiſſioners of the treaſury, &c. which ſhould be, and all other officers and miniſters of the court of Exchequer, and of the receipt thereof, in their reſpective places, upon requeſt, to perform all acts neceſſary for the due payment of the ſaid rent to the ſaid ſir Robert Vyner, his heirs and aſſigns; and to ſtrike tallies of pro, or aſſignment, or other tallies, as the caſe ſhall require, or as ſhall be deſired, on the commiſſioners, treaſurers, receivers, collectors, or farmers of the duty, who are required to make due payment accordingly; ſo as the ſaid yearly ſum may be received without other warrant. And if the profits of the ſaid revenue ſhould be paid into the receipt before the levying ſuch tallies, or payment made, then he authoriſes and requires the high treaſurer, and commiſſioners of the Treaſury, chancellor, under-treaſurer, chamberlains, and barons, and other officers and miniſters of the Exchequer, and of the receipt thereof, to whom it appertains, to pay out of ſuch monies as ſhall be paid into the Exchequer, the ſaid yearly ſum, without other warrant: and the letters patent ſhall be a ſufficient warrant for the purpoſes aforeſaid.

That tallies of pro, or aſſignment, or other tallies ſtruck upon the exciſe, at the deſire of ſir Robert Vyner, his heirs or aſſigns, ſhall be preferrable to other quarterly payments; except ſuch yearly ſums as are payable for the management of the ſaid revenue; and except certain ſums payable to the queen, and the duke of York, which are to be paid in the firſt place.

Sir Robert Vyner covenants at any time within a year, to make aſſignments of proportionable parts of the ſaid rent to ſuch of his creditors as will take the ſame in ſatisfaction of their debts, and will deliver up their ſecurities; and that he will not, during the year, aſſign any part of the ſaid yearly ſum, except to creditors, or others by their appointment; and if, within one year and an half, any difference ariſe between him and his creditors, touching the aſſigning any part of the ſaid yearly ſum, to ſubmit the matter to the high treaſurer, or commiſſioners of the Treaſury, and to perform ſuch orders as he or they ſhould make.

It is provided, that all aſſignments be inrolled within thirty days after the execution thereof, before the auditor of the receipt, or clerk of the pells; to the end it may appear what aſſignments have been granted, or otherwiſe to be of no effect.

And alſo, that when the king, his heirs or ſucceſſors, ſhall, at entire payments, have paid the ſum of 416,724*l.* 13*s.* 1½*d.* to ſir Robert Vyner, his heirs or aſſigns, in proportion among them, after the rate of 100*l.* principal money, for every 6*l. per cent. per ann.* and alſo the arrears of the ſaid yearly ſum of 25,003*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* then the grant ſhould be void.

The letters patent are to be favourably taken for ſir Robert Vyner, his heirs and aſſigns; and to be good non obſtante the not reciting of that act of parliament, whereby the revenue is granted, or the not mentioning any former grants or charges of or upon the ſaid revenue, or the not mentioning the certain yearly rents or profits of the ſaid revenue, or the certain nature thereof, or how the debts due to ſir Robert Vyner did particularly ariſe; and notwithſtanding the ſtatute 1 H. 4. or 18 H. 6. or 26 H. 8.* or the act of 12 Car. 2. whereby the revenue was granted, or any other defect.

The king covenants, that due payment ſhall be made, and all things done on his part: and that if there be any defect in the preſent grant, he, his heirs and ſucceſſors, upon petition, will make a further grant, as the attorney general ſhall adviſe.

Then Williamſon ſets forth, that by virtue of the letters patent ſir Robert Vyner was ſeized ut de feodo & jure, and was indebted unto him in 1000*l.* And that the 9th of April, 32 Car. 2. by deed of aſſignment (which he brings into court,) reciting that he had delivered up his ſecurities to ſir Robert Vyner, and had diſcharged him, the ſaid ſir Robert Vyner, grants and aſſigns to him and his heirs 60*l.* part of the ſaid yearly ſum, being his proportionable part, in ſatisfaction of the ſaid debt, under the condition in the letters patent; and prays the aſſignment may be read and inrolled; which is ordered, and the tenor is enter'd.

Williamſon further ſays, that he delivered up his ſecurities and accepted the aſſignment, in ſatisfaction of his debt, according to the intent of the letters patent; and that he never after ſued ſir Robert Vyner; and that the aſſignment was inrolled within thirty days before the auditor of the receipt; and that the principal ſum is not paid; and that the arrears of the yearly ſum of 60*l.* were paid to Lady-day 35 Car. 2. and that from that time 405*l.* is due for ſix years and three quarters, ending at Chriſtmas laſt †. Then he prays the letters patent and aſſignment may be allowed, and the arrears paid, and the yearly ſum paid for the future; and that tallies may be ſtruck as it becomes due; and that he may have the benefit of the remedies and powers mentioned in the letters patent: and avers that at Chriſtmas laſt there was ſufficient to pay his arrears, beſides what was payable for management, and to queen Catharine, and the duke of York.

To this the attorney-general demurs; and Williamſon joins in demurrer.

Whereupon the barons of the Exchequer give this judgment: that the letters patent to ſir Robert Vyner, and the aſſignment to Williamſon, juxta tenorem & effectum earundem eidem Roberto Williamſon allocentur: and that the ſum of 405*l.* being the arrears to and for Chriſtmas 1 W. & M. ſo as aforeſaid in arrear, be paid to him at the receipt of the Exchequer, by the hands of the commiſſioners of the Treaſury, and chamberlains of the receipt who now are, and by the hands of the commiſſioners of the Treaſury, treaſurer and chamberlains of the receipt for the time being, out of the treaſure ariſing from that part of the exciſe in the letters patent mentioned to be granted to king Charles II. his heirs and ſucceſſors, and in the hands of the commiſſioners of the Treaſury now being, and in the hands of the commiſſioners of the Treaſury and chamberlains for the time being; to be paid after, and beſides the neceſſary ſums for the management of the ſaid revenue, and the annual ſums payable to the queen dowager and the duke of York. And that the ſaid yearly ſum of 60*l.* from Chriſtmas 1 W. & M. be paid to Williamſon and his heirs, at the receipt of the Exchequer, by the hands of the commiſſioners of the Treaſury, treaſurer and chamberlains of the ſaid receipt for the time being, out of the ſaid treaſure ariſing from the ſaid hereditary revenue of exciſe in their hands being, ultra & poſt, &c. And that tallies toties quoties, &c. be ſtruck at the ſaid receipt, for the ſaid yearly ſum upon the commiſſioners, treaſurers, receivers, collectors or farmers of the ſaid hereditary revenue of exciſe, by the officers of the receipt of exciſe to whom it belongs, upon requeſt, &c. according to the letters patent, and the courſe of the Exchequer, ſalvo jure domini regis, & dominæ reginæ nunc ſi, &c.

* The ſtat. meant, ſeems to be 6 H. 8. cap. 15. for there is no ſtat. of 26 H. 8. applicable to the caſe: but the patents have been ſearched, and in them it is 26 H. 8.

† i. e. For the remainder of the reign of king Charles II. and the whole reign of king James II. and not quite a year of the reign of king William and queen Mary.

Upon this judgment the writ of error is brought.

There have been two principal queſtions made in the arguments upon theſe caſes.

1ſt. Whether the grants, made by king Charles II. of the ſeveral annual ſums out of the hereditary exciſe, to the goldſmiths, their heirs and aſſigns, be effectual in law, and do charge this revenue in the time of his ſucceſſors?

2d. Whether the remedies which the parties have purſued in this caſe be proper, and ſuch as are warranted by law, or juſtified by the courſe of the court of Exchequer?

I do not take notice at preſent of the objections which have been made to the form of the judgment, as it is enter'd, that being a matter of a different conſideration; becauſe, admitting the law to be for the parties who demand the arrears and growing payments of theſe annuities in this manner, if there be any error in the entring of the judgment, that is to be reformed in this court, and we are to make it ſuch as it ought to have been in the court of Exchequer.

The firſt general queſtion has been divided, as well by the council at the bar, as by my lords the judges, who argued this caſe, into two points.

1ſt, If this revenue of exciſe be ſuch an inheritance, that the king could alien the whole, or any part of it, in perpetuity from the crown?

2dly, Admitting that he might, whether it be effectually done by the grants to the goldſmiths?

My lords the judges, who have argued theſe caſes upon the writs of error, have all agreed in opinion, that the letters patent are good in law to paſs an intereſt to the patentees and their heirs, and to bind king Charles II. and his ſucceſſors.

Mr. baron Lechmere was of another opinion in the court of Exchequer.

The firſt of theſe points is a ſubject of the higheſt importance, at leaſt as to the conſequences of its determination either way; and perhaps, is not to be diſcourſed of adequately to the extent of it in an ordinary court of law.

As to my own part, being extreamly deſirous, as far as is poſſible, to avoid the repetition of what has been already ſaid very often; and having formed the opinion which I ſhall deliver in theſe caſes, upon the ſecond general queſtion; I ſhall not ſpeak at all at this time to either part of the firſt queſtion.

As to the ſecond general queſtion, whether this manner of ſuit, and the proceedings in it, be warranted by the courſe of the Exchequer; ſo that the parties here can come immediately to the barons, and demand their annuities, and thereupon the barons by their judgment, can in a regular courſe preſcribe to the treaſurer and chamberlains to iſſue money out of the receipt?——this is what I cannot hitherto be convinced of, either by what I have heard in the debate of this matter, or by what I have been able to obſerve upon the beſt endeavours I could uſe to inform my ſelf, in which I have ſpared no pains.

I take this to be a point of as great moment as ever came to be diſcuſſed in Weſtminſter hall: not ſo much in reſpect of the value of what is in demand, and of what does depend upon the ſame queſtion, (tho' that amounts to about 42,385*l.* 17*s.* 6*d. per annum*, beſides the arrears;) as becauſe it does in ſo high a degree concern the government, and diſpoſal of the publick revenue, and the treaſure of the crown; whereof the law has always had a ſuperlative care, as that upon which the ſafety of the king and kingdom muſt, in all ages, depend.

I eſteem it a great unhappineſs, that I cannot be ſo far convinced in my thoughts upon this point, as to concur with the greater number of the judges who have aſſiſted in this court: for tho' my own underſtanding muſt be my guide, which I am bound to follow in delivering my judgment; yet I am ſo ſenſible of my defects as to diſtruſt myſelf exceedingly, when I differ from ſo many learned men; and ſhould be extreamly well ſatisfied, that my opinion was not to be the meaſure by which the judgment is to be given in this caſe.

And therefore, having heard that ſome judges have made a doubt of this matter, I have already propoſed it as a point for the conſideration of all of them; whether in this court the judgments ought to be affirmed or reverſed according to the opinions of the chancellor, or the chancellor and treaſurer, when there is one; or according to the opinions of the majority of the judges, who are called to aſſiſt?

Before I proceed to deliver the reaſons, upon which I think myſelf obliged to conclude the ſame way with my lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas as to this ſecond queſtion, I will take notice of two things.

1ſt, That the nature of the debate as to this queſtion ſeemed to me to be very much changed upon his argument.

All the judges who ſpoke before him, did, as to this point, in a manner rely upon the two caſes of Nevil and Wroth to warrant their opinions. Theſe caſes, which are reported in Plowden's Commentaries, I ſhall be oblig'd to put at large hereafter, and do therefore only name them at preſent.

My lord chief juſtice Treby particularly applied himſelf to ſhew, that the proceedings in thoſe caſes were adjudged upon particular reaſons, and not at all upon the courſe of the Exchequer, or any power lodged originally in the barons by the common law; and were therefore not applicable to the caſes before the court: and therefore, as he expreſs'd himſelf, proceeding upon new topicks, he differed from them in the concluſion.

My lord chief juſtice of the King's-Bench only has had the opportunity of ſaying any thing in anſwer to his arguments. What weight they have had with any of the other judges, I do not know.

2dly, The ſecond thing I will take notice of is, that in ſeveral of the arguments much was ſaid of the ſubjects property; how it was concerned in the event of theſe caſes, and what regard there ought to be had of it.

With this I do readily agree. No man can be more tender of property, and careful to preſerve it than I have been always, and always ſhall be: but I freely own, that we, who are concerned in judicature in this reign, ought to aſcribe leſs merit to ourſelves for our care of property, than moſt of thoſe who went before us. We run no hazard in doing of it: no man has cauſe to think he ſhall be ill looked upon for giving his judgment for the ſubject according to law, though it be againſt the intereſt of the crown.

No man can think more hardly than I do, of the arbitrary ſhutting up of the Exchequer, as it is commonly called, which was the unhappy occaſion of raiſing the preſent queſtion: no man can have more commiſeration for the perſons concerned; I mean thoſe who only truſted the goldſmiths with their money, and had no ſhare in the temptation to truſt, from the unjuſt and unreaſonable profit which was made from the crown.

But I think the word property could hardly be brought into any caſe leſs aptly than it is into this.

There has been no difference of opinion, as to the intereſt and property which the ſubject takes by the letters patent, amongſt the judges who have argued in this court.

We are all agreed that the ſubject has, in this caſe, all the ſame remedies for recovering his right, which in any ſuch caſe the common law of England did ever allow, or which are given to him by any ſtatute; ſo that the ſubject is as ſafe in his property, and as ſecure in the method of coming at it, if it be detained from him, as by the Engliſh conſtitution he ought to be.

The only queſtion is, whether this be ſuch a remedy as the law allows, for recovering from the king the arrears, and growing payments of the annual ſums in queſtion?

If it be not, I am ſure none of us ought to make the parties caſe better than the law has made it. We muſt judge of property according to the rules which the law has fixed, and can make no new ones, nor invent new remedies, however compaſſionate the caſe may appear, or however popular it may ſeem to attempt it.

The queſtion then is, if an annual ſum be granted by the king, under the great ſeal, out of any branch of the revenue, to a ſubject and his heirs, in the manner of theſe grants, and the annual payments happen to be in arrear; whether by any law, now in force, the party may come to the barons of the Exchequer immediately, and they upon prayer to them, may inroll and allow the letters patent, and may thereupon order the treaſurer and chamberlains to pay, out of the Exchequer, the arrears, and alſo the growing payments for the future?

I think it may be proper to premiſe, that we are not now ſpeaking of the Exchequer in general, as it comprehends that great college of the revenue made up of all the officers of the upper and lower Exchequer; nor of the juriſdiction of the Exchequer-Chamber before the lord treaſurer and chancellor; nor of the court of Equity before the treaſurer, chancellor, and barons; but only of the authority of the court of Pleas holden before the barons: nor is the queſtion now of the barons' power over the receivers, collectors, and other officers of the revenue; but of their power over the king's treaſure, when it is lodged in the receipt of the Exchequer, and over the treaſurer and chamberlains, in whoſe cuſtody it is.

In ſpeaking to this matter, I ſhall proceed by theſe ſteps:

Firſt, to obſerve that no authors ancient or modern, who have wrote of the juriſdiction and buſineſs of the court of Exchequer, have mentioned any ſuch power to be lodged in the barons of the Exchequer, as will be ſufficient to warrant the judgments in theſe caſes.

Secondly, that theſe judgments cannot be defended by any thing which I can find, upon the beſt ſearch I can make, in any records or acts of parliament:

Nor thirdly, by any authorities in our law books.

I. As to the firſt, I will not go about to repeat a catalogue of writers who have publiſhed particular diſcourſes of the court of Exchequer. My lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas was very large in this matter, and I will avoid the affectation of naming them over again: I believe I have peruſed all of them. I have alſo looked over ſeveral manuſcripts, yet unpubliſhed, treating of that court, which were written in the time of king James the firſt, and king Charles the firſt: and I can no where find the leaſt mention of any power in the barons, to command the iſſuing of any money out of the receipt of the Exchequer.

Since then ſo many authors of learning and judgment have ſet themſelves to write, with expreſs deſign, of the juriſdiction of the court of Exchequer, and not one of them but does treat in particular of the power of the barons, in bringing in the treaſure and revenue of the crown, and of their power over it whilſt it is in tranſitu, tho' ſome of them more largely than others; and yet there is not one word to be found in any of them, which implies a power in the barons over the treaſure, when it is once lodged in the receipt; what can be more reaſonably inferred, than that ſuch a power was wholly unknown to them?

It muſt be admitted, that the power to command the iſſuing of the king's treaſure is of the higheſt nature, and of the greateſt conſequence; and therefore it cannot be believed that it was forgotten by all of them, or if it had been remembered, that it could be paſſed by without remark or obſervation.

By what was ſaid in ſome of the arguments in this caſe, it ſeemed to be taken, as if the barons of the Exchequer had been inveſted by law with a general ſuperintendency over the treaſure of the crown, and were to take care to ſee it diſtributed and anſwered to all ſuch, at leaſt, as made any juſt demand upon it, whether it was or was not brought into the king's coffers: but this is to make them much greater officers than the law has yet made them.

My lord chief juſtice Coke, when he comes to treat of the court of Exchequer in his fourth Inſtit. c. 11. ſeems to chooſe out two ancient authors, who had wrote of that court, as the foundation of his diſcourſe; which is, for the moſt part, as a commentary upon them: I mean Britton, and the Mirror of Juſtice.

Britton's

Britt. c. 1. fol. 2. b. Britton's account is ſhortly this ; our treaſurers and barons from henceforth ſhall have juriſdiction of all cauſes, which touch our debts, and our fees, and the incidents thereof, and to take conuzance of debts which are owing to our debtors, that we may come at our debts the ſooner.

When my lord chief juſtice Coke has ſet down theſe words, he then proceeds to ſet down the words of the Mirror; viz. that the Exchequer is only ordained for the king's profit, to hear and determine torts done to the king and his crown, in right of his fiefs and franchiſes, and the accounts of bailiffs, and of the receivers of the king's money, and the adminiſtrators of his goods, by the view of a ſovereign, who is the treaſurer of England. Mirr. cap. 1. § 14.

Theſe words of the Mirror are a ſhort, but effectual deſcription of the court of Exchequer ; and my lord chief juſtice Coke comments upon and expounds them in their full extent : nothing falls from him as if this account were defective, or did include only one part of the buſineſs of the court.

In the Mirror, cap. 1. § 14. we are told what is the uſe of the ſeal in the Exchequer, viz. to make acquittances, and to ſeal writs and eſtreats under green wax, iſſuing out of this place pour le prou le roy, i. e. for the king's profit. The uſe of the ſeal, to command the treaſurer and chamberlains to iſſue monies out of the receipt, was unknown when the Mirror was wrote, or this was a very defective account.

II. And as theſe ancient authors have thus confined the buſineſs of the court, ſo it does appear, in the ſecond place, by the ancient records, that the barons of the Exchequer have not intermeddled in other matters, than what my lord chief juſtice Coke, and theſe ancient authors aſſign to their juriſdiction : unleſs as their power has been from time to time enlarged by acts of parliament ; or in caſes where they have acted by particular authority given to them by writs under the great or privy ſeal ; or where they have acted by virtue of the king's anſwer indorſed upon petitions made to his perſon, either in or out of parliament ; which anſwers to ſuch petitions generally order a writ to iſſue out of Chancery, which gave a juriſdiction to the treaſurer and barons reſpectively, to act according to the effect of the anſwer. And upon this ground it is, that amongſt the abuſes and Cap. 5. § 1. No. 27. uſurpations in the ſeveral courts, which are enumerated in the Mirror, in that chapter which is entitled, Abuſion de la Commen Ley, this which follows is mentioned for one ; abuſion eſt que les miniſteres del eſcheque eient juriſdiction de autre choſe que des deniers le roy, de ſes fiews, & ſes franchiſes, ſans bre' original de le chancellery ſouth blanche cere.

It is ſo far from appearing by any ancient author or record, that the barons of the Exchequer had ſuch a power as is contended for in theſe caſes, that on the contrary it appears, their authority was very much reſtrained in that which was immediately their buſineſs, viz. matters of account depending before them ; in which they could make very few allowances, however juſt and reaſonable in themſelves, without a particular authority under the great or privy ſeal.

By the ſtatute of Rutland, 10 Ed. 1. notice is taken, that upon ſuggeſtion of the king's bailiffs, writs for divers allowances had been made to the king's grievous damage ; it is therefore ordained, that of ſuch allowances to be made from thenceforth, view ſhall be in our Exchequer ; and the ſame view being faithfully made, the ſame treaſurer and barons ſhall certify our chancellor of the due allowances ſo to be made, and that writs of allowances ſhall be made according to the ſame certificate.

The ſtatute directs that it ſhould be conſidered in the Exchequer, what allowances were proper to be made, and that the treaſurer and barons ſhould certifie the lord chancellor what they found was juſtly to be allowed ; and after all, the great ſeal was to iſſue thereupon to warrant the allowance.

Here was a new uſe appointed for the ſeal of the Exchequer, viz. to make the certificate ; but the parliament would not innovate ſo far as to make the Exchequer ſeal more than a certificate, whereupon the chancellor might iſſue a writ of allowance under the great ſeal.

This would have been a ſtrange circuity, if it had been imagined at that time, that the barons could have made the allowance by their own juriſdiction, and have ſent a writ accordingly to the treaſurer and chamberlains.

There are many inſtances to be found how much the juriſdiction of the barons was reſtrained, even in particulars, which one would think to be moſt properly of their cogniſance.

I will at preſent only inſtance ſome few, which are printed in Mr. Ryley's Placita Parliamentaria.

The executors of John Baſin petition the king, that whereas the king teneatur dicto Joh'i in 34*l.* for wax delivered to his uſe, by the hands of Roger Liſle clerk of the great wardrobe, and for which they had a bill ſigned by the then maſter of the great wardrobe ; and that a like ſum of 34*l.* was demanded of the ſaid Baſin by extents of the green wax, quod placeat d'no regi dictorum debitorum hinc inde debitam facere allocacionem : the anſwer is, habeant bre' de Cancellaria theſ. & baronibus de ſcacc. quod ſi ipſi inveniant debitum eſſe clarum, quod tunc faciant allocacionem de uno deb'o ad aliud. 35 Ed. 1. Ryley 334.

An anſwer of the ſame nature is given to another petition, very much of this kind, made by the executors of Robert de Baſynges. Ryley 326.

The citizens of York petition for an allowance of 8*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* and 102*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.* with which they are charged in the Exchequer, for wine ſold to them by Robert de Dacre the king's butler, who had acknowledged the receipt of the money before the barons : the anſwer is, mandetur per bre' de Cancellaria theſ. & baron' quod ſcrutatis rotulis videant, ſi recognitio ſit ſic facta ut dicunt, tunc exonerentur cives de eadem pecunia & Rob'tus de Dacre inde oneretur. 33 Ed. 1. Ryley 252.

In the ſame year, Ryley 248. Harcla petitioned the king for an allowance of his arrearages for the time when he was ſheriff of Cumberland, for that he could not levy the ſame by reaſon of the waſte and deſtruction which the Scots have made ; and alſo for an allowance of 38*l.* which the king owed him for wool taken to the king's uſe : and the anſwer is, de damnis quæ ſuſtinuit habeat gratiam per bre' de canc' theſaurario & baronibus de ſcaccario dirigendum ſecundum diſcretionem theſaurarii & baron.' Et de lanis captis examinentur & allocentur in arreragiis ſuis. Et ſuper hoc fiat breve de Cancellaria theſaurario & baronibus de ſcaccario.

In the ſame book, pag. 249, 250, 258, there are petitions for allowances of ſums laid out for the king's uſe, and writs under the great ſeal ordered, requiring allowance to be made by the treaſurer and barons.

Plomier petitioned that he might he permitted to account for the time he was cuſtos of the Templars land in Eſſex ; & unde incepit computari coram Rogero de Wingfield ſub cujus ſigillo rotuli ſui adhuc reſtant ſignati. The anſwer is, habeat bre' de canc' theſ. & bar' de ſcac' in quo contineatur iſta peticio, & per idem bre' mandetur, quod inſpecta peticione, ſi ſuggeſta vera ſint, procedant ad computum ſuum audiend' & ulterius faciant in hac parte juſtitiæ complementum. 14 Ed. 2. Ryley 419.

Upon petition of the tin merchants, to be allowed two days for payment of their coinage, this being alſo certified to be for the king's profit ; the anſwer is, let there be a writ to the treaſurer and barons for that purpoſe, and the like to the ſheriff of Cornwall. Ryley 248.

Upon petition for inſtallment of debts, the anſwer is ſometimes, let a writ go, commanding the treaſurer and barons to do it, juxta diſcretionem, Ryley 291. and at other times, quod ſcrutari faciant debita, & inde certificent regem, & quod interim habeant reſpectum, ſed non atterminetur ſine rege. Ryley 254.

And that the juriſdiction of the barons was originally very reſtrained, will appear yet plainer, by the ſtatute made the 26th of Edw. 1. Ryley 225. Whereby it is enacted, that the treaſurer and chamberlains of the Exchequer make a roll indented of all ſums of money delivered for the king's uſe, without warrant, ſince the beginning of the war between the king and the king of France ; one part to remain with them in the Exchequer, and the other part with the chancellor, 'pro warranto ſuo ad faciend' ſuper hoc br'ia in debita 'forma predictis theſ. & camerariis de predictis parcellis.'

I might proceed to very great numbers of inſtances where the ſubject was put to his petition, for the allowance of juſt and reaſonable pleas by way of diſcharge, upon accounting in the Exchequer ; ſome few I thought neceſſary to mention ; but I will not enlarge on this matter, becauſe I think the ſtatute 5 R. 2. cap 9. which increaſed the authority of the court of Exchequer in this point, ſhews plainly, how defective the juriſdiction of that court was, before that time, even in that which ſeemed abſolutely requiſite for the doing juſtice upon accounts.

That ſtatute takes notice, that perſons impeached in the Exchequer of debts and accounts, tho' they have offered to plead for diſcharge of thoſe impeachments according to law, have not always been received thereto heretofore, without having expreſs commandment by writ or letter of the great or privy ſeal, to their miſchief and delay, and no advantage to the king. And it is thereby ordained, that the barons ſhall from henceforth have full power, to hear every anſwer of every demand made in the Exchequer, ſo that every perſon, that is impeached or impeachable of any cauſe by himſelf, or by any perſon, ſhall be from henceforth received to plead, ſue, and have his reaſonable diſcharge, without tarrying for, or ſuing any writ or other commandment.

By this act of parliament, a power for the future is given to the barons of the Exchequer to allow a lawful diſcharge when pleaded. The natural inferences which were to be drawn from this ſtatute were ſo plain, that, to elude the force of them, two things have been urged in the ſpeaking to theſe caſes.

1*ſt*, That this act gives no new power, but was only made in affirmance of the common law.

2*dly*, That this act might be extended ſo as to give an authority to the barons of the Exchequer, to relieve the ſubject in the caſes which we have before us.

But I think both of theſe aſſertions are miſtakes ; at leaſt it muſt be yielded, upon ſecond thoughts, that if this act was merely a declaration of what was law before, ſuch declaratory laws are not to be extended by equitable conſtructions beyond the words themſelves.

As to the firſt, to prove that this act did not introduce a new law, my lord chief juſtice Coke, in his fourth Inſt. fo. 110. has been cited : I confeſs in that place he ſays two things upon occaſion of this ſtatute.

1ſt, That it does appear by this ſtatute that the parties ought, by law, to have been received to have pleaded their diſcharges, without any ſuch writ or letter.

2dly, That from thence it may be collected, that ſuch courſe of the Exchequer as tends to the diſquietneſs, miſchief, and delay of the ſubject, and no advantage to the king, is againſt law.

The firſt of theſe two concluſions of his, upon this act, is contrary to his obſervations immediately preceding in the ſame page, viz. that ſo great care was taken by the court of Exchequer, (which is the center of the king's revenue and profit,) that no man might plead for his diſcharge of any debts, account, or other demand, without having an expreſs commandment by writ or letter of the great ſeal.

As to his ſecond concluſion, it is not very eaſy to apprehend what is meant by ſaying, that a concluſion may be drawn from this act, that ſuch courſe of the Exchequer, as tends to the delay of the ſubject, and no advantage to the king, is againſt law. If the meaning be no more, than that ſuch courſe is fit to be remedied by a law, it may be juſtly collected from the act, which was made expreſly for that purpoſe : but that it can be inferred from that act, either that any thing can be the courſe of the Exchequer which is againſt law ; or that the act declares it to be againſt law, to refuſe the receiving ſuch pleas without being authorized under the great or privy ſeal, may be denied upon good grounds ; becauſe there is nothing to be found in that act, to warrant either of thoſe inferences.

1*ſt*, That the act was introducing of a new law, as to one point, viz. the admitting of perſons to plead by attornies in the Exchequer, (which they could not do before, unleſs by a ſpecial writ under the great ſeal,) is agreed by my lord chief juſtice Coke ; and is plain that it was ſo, by the Mirror of Juſtices, Abuſion N° 29. 4 Inſ. 110.

2*dly*, The words of this ſtatute are enacting, and not declaratory. They give a new power ; from henceforth the barons ſhall have power, and every perſon that is impeached ſhall be from henceforth received.

3*dly*, The words ſeem to be miſtranſlated from the original French, touts voyes n'ont mye eſte receutz, which ſhould not be rendered have not always been received ; but thus, always have not been received ; that is, have never been received.

But, 4*thly*, The petition of the commons, upon which this act is framed, and which is Rot. Parl. 5 R. 2. Nº 97. ſhews this matter plainly beyond all queſtion.

The petition does not complain of any abuſe in the barons, or officers of the Exchequer, but of a defect in the law, which the commons pray may be amended for the eaſe and quiet of the king's people.

And it is remarkable, that as the preamble of the ſtatute is drawn up, as far as it goes, almoſt in the words of the petition; ſo the enacting part is framed in the words of the king's anſwer. As the words are printed in Engliſh in the ſtatute-book, they run thus; when they offered to plead in diſcharge according to law, they have not been always thereto received heretofore: But the original French words of the petition are, n'ont mye eſte a ce receutz nient foits devant ces heures, i. e. they have never heretofore been received; which, as to this point, is a very material variance, and ſhews plainly how the French words in the ſtatute itſelf ought to have been tranſlated.

The petition does in expreſs terms give as a reaſon why they had heretofore never been received; viz. that the barons of the Exchequer declared, that they had no power to hear the pleas and anſwers of the ſaid impeachments without writs or letters of the great or privy ſeal, commanding the treaſurer and barons to do right to the ſaid parties impeached. This is what the barons had then declared to be law; nor is this declaration complained of by the petition, nor cenſured by the parliament; but a law is made to remedy this for the future, giving the barons a new power: and therefore this act, one need not doubt to ſay, was more than an affirmance of the common law.

The next chapter of this ſtatute, 5 R. 2. cap. 10. is a farther explanation of the matter we are now ſpeaking of.

Notice is taken, that perſons retained to ſerve the king, received money at the receipt, or elſewhere by aſſignment, which ſums had been put upon them as received by way of loan; and altho' they, or their heirs, or executors, have demanded to be admitted to account of the ſaid ſums, the ſame had not been granted, but they were conſtrained to purſue their grant by the great or privy ſeal to the treaſurer and barons, commanding them to account with them in that behalf, &c. And it is ordained, that of all perſons, who ſhall be retained to ſerve the king, their covenants ſhall be put into writing, and ſent into the Exchequer to remain on record: ſo that when perſons come to account thereof at the Exchequer, they ſhall be received, and have allowance on their account, according to the contents of their covenants; ſo that by the ſight of the ſame the barons ſhall do right to the party, according as reaſon demandeth. And if any thing be due to them on the ſaid account, that thereof, by certificate of the ſame Exchequer, the treaſurer and the chamberlains ſhall make payment or aſſignment, without any other warrant by the great or privy ſeal.

This ſhews what the courſe was before; and in this particular caſe makes a proviſion which is wholly new, viz. that upon a certificate of the barons the treaſurer and chamberlains may pay: in all other caſes the law is left open, and a great or privy ſeal is requiſite to warrant a payment, notwithſtanding any certificate of the barons.

So much to ſhew the ſtat. 5 R. 2. did introduce a new law.

As to the other thing which was mentioned, as if the ſtat. 5 R. 2. might be extended by an equitable conſtruction to give the barons power to order the payment of money out of the receipt, in ſuch manner as in the caſes now before the court; I muſt ſay, I cannot ſee any the leaſt colour for ſuch a notion.

The power is moſt directly reſtrained to the receiving of pleas in diſcharge of perſons impeached for debts, or accounts; and can never be extended to caſes where parties come as plaintiffs, to recover demands originally againſt the king: nor is there the authority of any law-book pretended to warrant ſuch interpretation.

If then the power of the barons was ſo ſhort and reſtrained, in matters relating to the taking and ſtating the accounts of the revenue, (which is acknowledged to have been their antient and proper buſineſs,) that they were in ſo very many caſes to expect an additional authority under the great or privy ſeal; can it be thought, that at the ſame time they were intruſted with ſuch a juriſdiction as is now contended for, of ſending orders requiring the treaſurer and chamberlains to make payment at the receipt, when perſons demanded of them to inroll and allow their grants and order ſuch payments?

I have cauſed the liberate rolls, and the bundles of petitions at the Tower, to be ſearched from the beginning of king John's time, as low as the records there go, and have had ſome extracts made of them; and during all that time, I cannot find that any payments were made at the receipt of the Exchequer, but by warrant under the great or privy ſeal.

There are infinite numbers of writs to be found, for payment of ſums of money for wages, for ſervice done, for debts owing, and for almoſt all occaſions which can be imagined to occur; but for every one of theſe, how ſmall ſoever, the warrant is either a great or privy ſeal.

In like manner, the warrants for payment of all annuities, fees, and ſalaries, tho' granted by letters patent under the great ſeal, yet were, from time to time, directed to be paid by writs under the great or privy ſeal.

If the payment was, by the letters patent, to be at the receipt of the Exchequer, the liberate went to the treaſurer and chamberlains: if it was to be paid by the cuſtomers, or the ſheriff, there was a liberate directed to the officer who was to pay, and a writ de allocatione facienda, directed to the treaſurer and barons, to allow of ſuch payment by the ſheriff or cuſtomer, which writ of allowance recited the liberate. Reg. 192, 193.

Rot. lib. 43 H. 3. m. 1. There is a liberate de theſauro noſtro dilecto & fideli noſtro Hugoni de Bigod, juſticiario noſtro mille marcas, quæ ſibi per magnates de concilio noſtro ſunt provis', percipiend' per annum ad ſcaccarium noſtrum, ad ſe ſuſtentandum in officio juſticiarii noſtri.

The great ſtation of the perſon, and the authority by which the annuity was granted, was not enough without a particular warrant for payment from the king under his ſeal.

So all along in the liberate rolls, 55 H. 3. m. 1. 1 E. 3. m. 3. 1 E. 2. m. 4. 4 E. 3. m. 3. &c. there are liberates for the ſalaries of judges: liberate de theſauro noſtro dilecto & fideli noſtro Stephano Heyne, uni juſticiar' noſtrorum in banco, vigint' libr' de termino S. Mich' prox' præterito de annuo feodo ſuo 40 librar', quas ei conceſſimus percipiend' per annum ad ſcaccarium noſtrum ad ſuſtentationem ſuam in officio juſticiar', quamdiu ſteterit in eodem. Nay the barons of the Exchequer themſelves, in thoſe ages, never once thought of directing the treaſurer and chamberlains to pay annuities and ſalaries, tho' granted to themſelves under the great ſeal; but purſued the ſame method that others did, and procured liberates for their ſalaries of 40 marks, as all other ſubjects, in the like caſes, did.

Rot. lib. 1 Ed. 2. m. 2. Liberate Will'o de Carlton, uni baron' noſtrorum de ſcaccario noſtro, vigint' marcas de termino paſchæ prox' præterito, de annuo feodo ſuo quadragint' marcarum, quod ei conceſſimus per literas patentes percipiend' in officio ſuo ſupradicto.

The like are to be found, 4 Ed. 1. m. 3. 1 R. 2. m. 15. 1 H. 4. m. 7. 1 H. 5. m. 6. And when payment was not made according to the command of theſe writs, the method was not then to go to the barons of the Exchequer, but to apply to the king by petition for another writ to enforce the former. Rot. lib. 2 Ed. 1. 20. m. 4. Mandamus vobis, quod dilecto & fideli noſtro Roger de Brabanzon, nuper capitali juſticiario Edwardi, quondam regis Angliæ, patris noſtri, ad placita coram eodem patre noſtro, liberetis, juxta tenorem brevium dicti patris noſtri de liberate quæ penes vos inde reſident in ſcaccario antedicto.

And the like writ may be found to enforce a former liberate in the caſe of the earl of Oxford, Rot. lib. 1 Ed. 3. m. 1. and in other places.

The like courſe alſo appears to be taken in the caſe of the converted Jews. 2 Ed. 2. Ryley 517.

I will make mention of one more precedent, which is the letters patent granted 2 H. 6. which are to be found in the patent rolls of that year, and alſo in a ſchedule annexed to the parliament roll. In which the king takes notice of the treaty of peace between his father and grandfather, the kings of England and France; and alſo of the marriage articles of his mother, queen Katherine, the French king's daughter, with king Henry the fifth, A. D. 1420; whereby it was agreed, that ſhe ſhould have for her dower to the value of 40,000 ſcuta per annum, of which two were to make a noble; which treaty and articles were confirmed in parliament: and then proceeds, by conſent of parliament, to grant to the queen divers lands, parcel of the dutchy of Cornwal, and county palatine of Cheſter, and alſo ſeveral annuities out of the alnage, and 2274*l.* 18*s.* 1½*d.* out of the firſt profits of the ſheriffs and eſcheators at the receipt of the Exchequer, and out of any other revenue that ſhould be order'd there, to be paid by the hands of the treaſurer, in full of her dower, until the king, or his heirs, ſhould grant to her lands and tenements to the ſame value: et quod eadem mater noſtra habeat tot & talia brevia de liberate curren', & allocat' dorman', ac alia brevia & warran', quot & qualia ei in hac parte, pro ſolutione ſummarum ſibi, ut præmittitur, conceſſarum & aſſignatarum, & pleniori execucione præmiſſorum, neceſſaria fuerint & opportuna: et quod cancellarius noſter Angliæ, ac cuſtos privati ſigilli noſtri, & hered' noſtrorum, pro tempore exiſten', brevia & warranta illa de tempore in tempus, quandocunque & quotieſcunque ex parte præfat' matris noſtræ racionabiliter fuerint requiſit', tenore præſentium fieri faciant indilate.

Per ipſum regem in concil' in parl'.

It appears by theſe, and the former records mentioned, what was the antient and conſtant method of proceedings in theſe caſes; and that it was not enough to have letters patent under the great ſeal, for granting the annuity or ſum, but that there muſt be an authority under the great ſeal or privy ſeal, to warrant any payment thereupon: otherwiſe the parliament, when they had been making ſuch an extraordinary proviſion for the ſecurity of the queen, would have taken a ſhorter method, and have ſent her to the barons of the Exchequer for ready payment in caſe of arrears.

I might alſo mention the caſe of another queen, Johan' the relict of Hen. the 4th, who in her petition in parliament, in the ſecond year of Hen. the 6th, Rot. Parl. 2 H. 6. 11, 35. (whereby ſhe prays to be reſtored to her dower, which had been ſeized in the ſeventh year of Hen. the 5th, and was afterwards ordered to be reſtored in the tenth year of his reign, but could not be done effectually without the aſſiſtance of an act of parliament,) concludes with a prayer, that for the time to come ſhe may have, en la cancellerie noſtre ſeigneur le roy, & ſes heirs & ſucceſſors, ſi bien lettres de liberate currantes, & allocate dormanz, come autres lettres patents, & choſes en celle partie al dite royne beſoignable; which is granted.

This was then the method, and has been continued to this day; and no treaſure is, or can be iſſued out of the receipt, without ſuch a warrant under the great or privy ſeal.

'Tis true, in time liberates current, and dormant writs of allowance grew more common, ſo that the ſuing out of new writs in every particular caſe became leſs frequent. And it is alſo true, that of later times, more general privy ſeals have been brought into uſe, authorizing at once the iſſuing of ſeveral payments; which has been practiſed eſpecially ſince the beginning of the reign of queen Elizabeth. But the thing in ſubſtance is the ſame: no money is iſſued out of the receipt, without the authority of the great or privy ſeal; nor is there any more waiving the applying to the perſon of the king than before: no payments being made upon thoſe general privy ſeals, but by virtue of the king's particular warrants counter-ſigned by the lord treaſurer, or commiſſioners of the treaſury.

I have ſhewn what were the methods anciently taken by ſubjects for obtaining payment of annuities granted by the crown; and that theſe methods, in the manner I have mentioned, have been continued down to this time.

It has alſo been obſerved, how narrow the juriſdiction of the barons of the Exchequer was at common law; unleſs where their authority was enlarged by writs under the great ſeal, or by the king's anſwer to petitions in parliament: and that the enlargement of their juriſdiction by the ſtat. 5 R. 2. added no new powers in relation to the matters in queſtion.

The next ſtatute, which does conſiderably enlarge the juriſdiction of the Exchequer, is that of 33 H. 8. c. 39; which gives ſeveral new powers, of great conſequence, to the Exchequer, and to ſeveral other courts which were then in being: but I did not obſerve that it was inſiſted on, that any of the clauſes of that act extend to this caſe; and therefore I will not go about to anſwer what is not, nor I think can be objected.

Indeed, if I did not miſtake my lord chief juſtice, he inſiſted that the power which the barons of the Exchequer have taken upon them to exerciſe in this caſe, muſt be warranted by the common law, as originally incident to a court of revenue.

But, upon the beſt ſearch I could make into the records of the Exchequer, I have not found any thing which does in the leaſt countenance this power ſuppoſed originally incident to a court of revenue, which has been exerciſed in theſe caſes, but was never exerciſed before: unleſs about the time of the diſſolving of the court of Augmentations, in the firſt year of queen Mary, and the annexing it to the court of Exchequer; when ſomewhat of this nature was done in the court of Exchequer, with reſpect to ſome caſes which were formerly under the ſurvey of the court of Augmentations; the reaſon of which I ſhall ſhew hereafter, and that the ſame is no way applicable to the cauſes before us.

I do not forget that it was urged, as of weight to prove this power in the barons, that the courſe is, at the end of every term, for the barons to ſend liberates down to the receipt for neceſſaries of the Exchequer. But of that an account was given by my lord chief juſtice of the Common-pleas; and I ſhall ſhew yet more clearly, that the writ imports no more than a certificate of the quantum of the expence, and has been never look'd upon as a warrant for the payment.

It is ſtrange, if this power was veſted in the barons by the common law, that no ſubject ſhould once apply to them for relief. It is plain there were occaſions for ſuch applications. Annuities we ſee were in arrear, and writs of liberate were diſobeyed; and yet nothing does appear, before the firſt year of queen Mary, that the barons ſent down writs to the treaſurer and chamberlains to do their duty, and iſſue money out of the receipt.

Since the 15th of queen Elizabeth, when ſir Thomas Wroth's caſe was, one hundred and twenty years are paſt; and ſince that time, eſpecially ſince the beginning of the reign of king James the firſt, more and greater annuities and penſions have been granted than from the foundation of this monarchy, and with as full and liberal clauſes as in the caſes now in queſtion; and annuities and penſions have been worſe paid than in antient times. Yet no man, ſince that time, has come to the barons to recover his arrears, according to theſe precedents of Nevil and Wroth: and yet, the remedy (admitting the law to have been ſo ſettled in thoſe caſes) is more ready and eaſy to be had than in any action againſt a common ſubject in any caſe. Admitting this juriſdiction might have ſlipt unobſerved in the more antient times, yet after two caſes ſettled ſo ſolemnly as thoſe of Wroth and Nevil, it ſeems very ſtrange that no patentee, who was unpaid, and could not recover the arrears of his annuity any other way, ſhould once think of deſiring the barons to inroll and allow his letters patent, and order payment to him out of the receipt.

As therefore a conſtant and fixed courſe of the Exchequer is the law of that court, and indeed the law of the land; ſo the negative argument hath its force, that what has not been at all practiſed in the court, eſpecially in relation to caſes which happen very frequently, cannot be taken to be the law, or courſe of the court.

So far are we from having infinite precedents, (which, by what is ſaid in the caſe in Plowd. 321. a. and Lane's caſe, 2 Co. 16, 17. and in Agard's caſe, Mo. 565. appear to be requiſite to give a practice the denomination of the courſe of the Exchequer,) that we are to ſeek for a precedent; except ſome few caſes, which, as I ſaid, happened upon the union of the court of Augmentations to that of the Exchequer: and of theſe not one has been cited in any law book, as an authority to prove this juriſdiction in the Exchequer; which is the matter for which they have been ſo much urged in the arguing of theſe caſes.

III. And now I will proceed to the third thing I mentioned, which was; that as none of the authors, who wrote ex profeſſo upon the juriſdiction of the Exchequer, aſſerted any ſuch power as this in the barons, and as nothing did appear in any act of parliament, or by any record, which did make out ſuch a power; ſo I conceived, that no authorities were to be found in any of our law books, which did warrant the judgments in theſe caſes. I ſhall reſerve myſelf as to the caſes of Nevil and of Wroth, and the precedents about that time till hereafter; and ſhall at preſent ſpeak to the other caſes, which have been urged as authorities, more antient in point of time.

And thoſe, as I remember, were three; Everle's caſe, the abbot of Wardon's caſe, and Margery Parker's caſe.

Some others were ſpoken of, but they are (as I think) directly againſt what they were brought to ſupport; and as theſe three only have been inſiſted on by my lord chief juſtice, I ſhall not think it worth while to take any notice of the reſt.

Everle's caſe was 33 Ed. 1. and is in Ryley 251. The caſe is this. He petitions king Edward the firſt, that he would command that an annuity of ten marks, which king Henry, father of the king who now is, had granted to him, and John his brother, et quod donum rex nunc eis per literas ſuas confirmavit, et unde habet bre' currens de liberate in cuſtodia theſaurarii & camerariorum de ſcaccario, ſhould be paid to him with the arrears.——Ita reſponſum eſt, habeat bre' de canc' theſ. & baronibus de ſcaccario, quod videant cartam & faciant juſtitiam, habito reſpectu ad breve currens.

Upon this caſe two inferences were made.

1ſt. That the court of Exchequer might hold plea of an annuity granted by the king, and might relieve the party.

2dly. That the court of Exchequer might compel the treaſurer and chamberlains to make payment of ſuch an annuity.

Let us ſee if either of theſe concluſions are warranted from this caſe; and whether upon examination it will not appear to be a ſtrong authority to ſhew, that there is no legal courſe to inforce the payment of an annuity, though granted under the great ſeal, without applying to the perſon of the king by petition.

No circumſtance is wanting to make that caſe ſtronger than the caſes before us.

There was a grant of an annuity under the great ſeal from the king's predeceſſors, as there is in this caſe: there was alſo a confirmation from the king then reigning, which is wanting in the caſes before the court: and, more than that, there was a liberate current lodged with the treaſurer and chamberlains.

If in any caſe of a demand of the arrears of an annuity, granted by the crown, the party might go to the barons for an order for payment, Everle was ripe for it.

But ſuch a method of enforcing payment was unknown at that time, as has been ſhewn already, and therefore Everle proceeds in the common courſe: he applies by petition to the king, and the king endorſes the petition, that a writ under the great ſeal ſhould be directed to the treaſurer and barons, empowering them to conſider the letters patent, and do him right, reſpect being had to the liberate.

No juriſdiction in the barons can be inferred from thence, nor power of commanding the treaſurer. The great ſeal is the commiſſion by which they act. The ſame writ, which impowers the barons to conſider the letters patent, impowers the treaſurer to iſſue the money; and that not as the barons ſhould appoint, but it was to be with reſpect to the liberate, which was to determine where the payment was to be made; whether at the receipt of the Exchequer, or by levying tallies on the inferior officers concerned in the receipt of particular branches of the revenue.

But to take off the force of ſuch an anſwer, it was urged, that this petition was not a petition of right, but of complaint againſt the king's officers. And to ſhew that it was ſo, it was ſaid, that if it had been a petition of right, it muſt have had another indorſement, viz. ſoit droit fait al partie, and then have been ſent into Chancery; and that in ſuch caſes the petition is the original upon which the proceeding is; and that petitions of right muſt be ſo anſwered.

As to this; in the firſt place, there needs not much labour to ſhew that this was not a petition of complaint. It imports nothing like it. The petitioner ſtates his caſe; he prays what he wanted, and what was neceſſary, and it was granted him; that is, a warrant under the great ſeal, impowering the reſpective proper officers, the barons, to ſee if he had right, and the treaſurer, if it were ſo, to pay him his arrears. Nobody is complained of in the petition, and nobody is blamed in the anſwer: a writ is to go, the charter is to be ſeen, and juſtice is to be done.

In the ſecond place, the anſwer given to this petition is a very proper anſwer to a petition of right. And therefore there was no ground to ſay that this was not a petition of right, becauſe the anſwer was not general, ſoit droit fait.

There are more petitions to the king in Ryley's Placita Parliamentaria, than in all the books which are printed; and throughout the whole book there is not one in twenty which is ſo anſwered; and yet nothing is ſo plain as that theſe were petitions of right.

It were endleſs to cite particulars, there being ſcarce a leaf in the book which does not ſhew what I aſſert.

And if more authorities were wanting, the bundles of petitions in the Tower, which I have cauſed to be looked into, are full of petitions of right, otherwiſe anſwered than in thoſe general words.

The truth is, the manner of anſwering petitions to the perſon of the king was very various: which variety did ſometimes ariſe from the concluſion of the party's petition; ſometimes from the nature of the thing; and ſometimes from favour to the perſon: and according as the indorſement was, the party was ſent into Chancery, or the other courts.

If the indorſement was general, ſoit droit fait al partie, it muſt be delivered to the chancellor of England, and then a commiſſion was to go to find the right of the party; and that being found, ſo that there was a record for him, thus warranted, he is let in to interplead with the king: but if the indorſement was ſpecial, then the proceeding was to be according to the indorſement in any other court. This is fully explained by Stamford in his treatiſe of the prerog. cap. 22.

3 Inſt. 215, 216. 13 Co. 19. Mo. 639. Co. Ent. 419. b. 422. a.

The caſe Mich. 10 H. 4. 4. n° 8. is full as to this matter. The king recovers in a quare impedit by default againſt one who was never ſummoned; the party cannot have a writ of deceit without a petition. If then, ſays the book, he concludes his petition generally, que le roy luy face droit, and the anſwer be general, it muſt go into the Chancery, that the right may be inquired of by commiſſion; and, upon the inqueſt found, an original writ muſt go directed to the juſtices to examine the deceit; otherwiſe the juſtices, before whom the ſuit was, cannot meddle: but if he conclude his petition eſpecially, that it may pleaſe his highneſs to command the juſtices to proceed to the examination, and the indorſement be accordingly, that had given the juſtices a juriſdiction. They might in ſuch caſe have proceeded upon the petition without any commiſſion, or any writ to be ſued out; the petition and anſwer indorſed giving a ſufficient juriſdiction to the court to which it was directed. And as the book I have mentioned proves this, ſo many other authorities may be cited.

Fitz. Traverſe 51. Bro. pet. 34.

Ex Bund. Pet. Parl. an. 4. Ed. 3. n. 64. John Ibe, abbot of Feverſham, petitions the king, ſetting forth that his predeceſſor, in the reign of Ed. 2. in regard of the good ſervice of ſir Barth. de Baddleſmere, had releaſed to the ſaid ſir B. B. for his life 4*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* of the rents, cuſtoms and ſervices of 300 acres which he held in gavelkind of the abbot and covent; and that the land remained in the king's hands by the forfeiture of the ſaid ſir B. B.; and that the rents and cuſtoms were in arrear, after the death of the ſaid ſir B. B. for four years whilſt the land ſo remained in the king's hands: and prays, that the king would be pleaſed to ſend to the barons of the Exchequer, that if by inqueſt to be taken, it ſhould be found that this rent was due to the abbot and his ſucceſſors, as the right of the church, after the death of ſir Bartholomew, the king's officers, who were in poſſeſſion of the lands during the minority of the heir, might anſwer them the rent for that time. And the petition is indorſed, ſoit ceſt peticion mande as treaſorer & barons de l' eſchequer, que eux appellez que ſont eſtre appellez, & oyes les reaſons, facent droit.

To the like effect is the anſwer to the petition of Manent Franceys in the ſame year, n. 9.

And as the indorſements upon petitions of right were various, according to the nature of the caſe, ſo above all others they were different in the caſes belonging to the revenue; and, I think, there is not an inſtance to be found where ſuch petitions were anſwered, ſoit droit fait aux parties.

Sometimes the indorſement is, mandetur iſta peticio theſ. & bar' de ſcaccario & ſequatur coram eis. Ryley 408. Or, ſequatur coram theſaur' & baronibus de ſcaccario & ibi faciant eis juſtitiam ſuper contentis in petitione. Ryley 408, 423.

So upon the petition of the abbot of Feverſham the indorſement is, ſoit ceſte peticion mande devant treſ' & barons del eſchequer, & mande a eux que oye la pleynte le dit abbe face droit. Ryley 646.

Sometimes, mandetur per breve de magno ſigillo theſ. & baron' de ſcac' quod contineat effectum petitionis, &c. Cottingham's caſe, Ryley 402.

Sometimes, habeat bre' de canc' theſ. & baronibus de ſcacc' quod fiat ſecundum formam petitionis, & ita rex vult. Walter's caſe, Ryley 259.

When there was no doubt likely to ariſe of the parties title, as in Aynſham's caſe, (who petitioned for money due for work done at Carnarvan caſtle,) the barons are not taken notice of, but the anſwer is, fiat bre' de canc' de liberate theſaurario & camerariis quod liberent ei tantam ſummam & onerent Hugonem Camerarium de Carnarvan. Ryley 251.

Sometimes the chancellor of the Exchequer is joined: as in Ryley 249. The biſhop of Ely petitions the king, that one Pecche his tenant, who held of him four knights fees, parcel of his barony, had granted the ſame fees to the king; and that he, the biſhop, was ready to make out his title: the anſwer is, ſequatur coram theſaurario cancellario & baronibus de ſcaccario, & ſi ita ſit tunc theſ. & bar' conveniant cum eo ſuper hoc, ita quod eccleſia conſervetur indemnis, & ſuper hoc fiat bre' de canc': et prius inquiratur per quæ ſervicia maneria tenentur & de quo &c. cum omnibus circumſtanciis.

Sometimes the juſtices are joined, as in the caſe of the abbot and convent of Hide, Ryley 256. Who petition, that they had, by miſtake, acknowledged the king's title upon a quare impedit brought in the king's name; and pray that they might be admitted to proſecute their right to the ſaid advowſon, or that the king upon a gracious fine would reſtore them to the advowſon: the anſwer is, fiat bre' canc' theſ. & bar' de ſcacc' quod vocatis juſticiariis audient rationes abbatis. Et ſi abbas oſtendere poterit coram eis per cartas vel monumenta vel alias evidencias quod habet jus in dicta advocatione, tunc vult rex quod theſ. & bar' per conſilium juſticiariorum capiant aliquem finem de abbate & conventu, & reddatur eis dicta advocatio non obſtante judicio inde prius reddito pro rege.]

And in the like manner on the petition of Floria, the widow of Thomas Belhouſe, the anſwer is, habeat bre' de canc' theſ. & bar' de ſcacc' quod viſa carta ſua de conjuncto feofamento &c. faciant ſecundum quod de jure fuerit faciendum, & ſecundum quod hactenus uſitatum fuerit in regno: et quod hoc fiat per conſilium juſticiariorum. Ryley 253.

That theſe were petitions of right of ſeveral natures is not to be denied, and yet the general anſwer is given to none of them.

So that when Everle's caſe is conſidered, it ſeems to be a good authority to prove, that in caſes of this nature the ſubject had a proper remedy by a petition of right to the perſon of the king. And if in theſe caſes now depending, the parties had taken the courſe to have ſued by ſuch petition, and had been ſo anſwered, Everle's caſe might have been properly cited as an authority: but then, as in almoſt an infinite number of other caſes, the anſwer to the petition is a warrant for a writ under the great ſeal; and that writ gives a juriſdiction to the treaſurer and barons to act according to the tenor of it.

The next caſe inſiſted on, was the abbot and covent of Warden's caſe. Ryley 262. That caſe is thus: the petitioners pray a remedy, quod ubi rex Henricus, pater regis nunc, per cartam ſuam eis conceſſiſſet viginti marcas annuas pro damnis quæ fecit in boſcis ipſorum tempore obſidii caſtri de Bedeford, de quibus vigint' marcis annuis ſeiſiti fuerunt ad totam vitam dicti regis Henrici, & etiam tempore regis nunc uſque ad viginti annos ex nunc, &c. The anſwer is, veniant per bre' ad ſcaccarium & oſtendant cartam, & ubi aſſignatio facta fuit ejuſdem pecuniæ, & fiat juſticia per theſ. & bar'.

Here was an annuity granted upon a valuable conſideration by the king's father: it had been anſwered during the time of the king who granted it, and for thirteen years during the reign of king Edward himſelf; and yet the payment had been ſtopped for twenty years together. No other remedy was then thought of for the grantee, but to apply by petition of right to the king: and the king's anſwer is, let a writ under the great ſeal go to the treaſurer and barons; let the charter be produced; let the petitioner ſhew upon which branch of the revenue the annuity is charged; and let them do juſtice.

One might challenge any body to produce a caſe in itſelf more like the preſent caſes than this of the abbot of Warden, or more different in the remedy taken by the parties. If the ſame method had been purſued in the caſes before us, as was by that abbot and convent, this caſe would have been a good precedent. But here the ſuitors paſs by the king, and come directly to the barons; who proceed to act without being authorized under the great ſeal, as in that caſe, and command their ſuperior officers, who, according to the precedent, ought to have been authorized, together with them, to have done their reſpective parts for the relief of the petitioner.

The next book that was cited was Trin. 9 H. 6. 12, 13. Margery Parker's caſe; and this was an authority upon which much weight was laid.

The caſe, as it appears in the book, was thus.

Margery Parker brought a writ of annuity againſt the queen, for 20*l.* which ſhe had granted to her for life, to receive de quadam ſumma aſſignata in partem dotis ipſius reginæ de magna cuſtuma London, by the hands of the collectors of the ſame cuſtoms.

The queſtion in the caſe was, if this grant, ſo worded, was an annuity, and did charge the perſon of the queen.

In the debate of that queſtion it is ſaid by Babington, that the letters patents, in that caſe, were no more than an acquittance to the cuſtomers to diſcharge them of ſo much; and that if the cuſtomers did not pay the queen, ſhe had no action againſt them; but muſt ſue for her payment to the barons of the Exchequer.

Cotteſmore ſays, if that be ſo, then the queen's perſon muſt be charged, otherwiſe the grantee would be without remedy.

Rolf ſaid, the grantee might ſue in the Exchequer for her penſion, as the queen might.

But after all this diſcourſe amongſt them, the plaintiff had judgment to recover the annuity and the arrears: ſo that no regard was had to this ſuppoſed remedy mentioned by Babington, but the judgment was given againſt the queen.

This, at moſt, was but a thing dropt by Babington, in the debate of the caſe, and ſeems to be very crude and undigeſted: for he neither ſays how ſhe was to ſue, nor whether he meant more than that ſhe was to ſue by a motion to the court, (in which vulgar ſenſe ſometimes the word ſuit is taken, as my lord chief juſtice Treby obſerved;) nor what remedy the barons could give her.

It appears to be but a ſudden ſaying: and, perhaps, the judges of the Common Pleas might not be ſo perfectly ready in the courſe of proceedings relating to the revenue, upon the ſudden ſtarting of the queſtion.

All that can be concluded of certainty from that caſe, as far as I ſee, is, that Margery Parker brought a writ of annuity againſt the queen, and had judgment to recover.

IV. Having inſiſted thus far in ſhewing that I have met with nothing in the authors, who have wrote upon the juriſdiction of the Exchequer, or in the law books, or in the records, which countenance ſuch a power as is aſſumed by the barons of the Exchequer in theſe caſes; I ſhall mention a fourth thing which confirms my opinion, viz. that in the oath of the barons, there is nothing expreſſed which does relate to any ſuch truſt lodged in them.

And, perhaps, there is not a better meaſure to be taken of what is the natural and proper buſineſs of theſe antient officers, than what is compendiouſly and ſignificantly expreſſed in the oaths, which have with great care and wiſdom been formed and inſtituted for them to take.

The oath of the lord chancellor, the oath of the lord treaſurer, and of the treaſurer of the Exchequer, (which are both the ſame,) of the keeper of the privy ſeal, of a privy councellor, of the chamberlains and other officers of the Exchequer, are as adequate deſcriptions of the duty and buſineſs of thoſe ſeveral officers, as can be met with elſewhere.

The oath of the judges does amount to a very concluſive account of their duty: and the barons of the Exchequer have a known and undiſputed juriſdiction as to all matters contained in the oath which they take.

They are truly to charge and diſcharge the people: they are upon no conſideration, nor by any ingene to let the king's right; nor to diſturb or reſpite the right of any other perſons contrary to law; nor to put the king's debts in reſpite, where they may be levied: they are to ſpeed the king's buſineſs before all others: for no gift to conceal, diſturb, or let the king's profit: to take nothing of any perſon to delay or deliver the people, but to do it, as they may, without hurt to the king: to redreſs what they think may turn to the prejudice of the king, and if they cannot to diſcover it to him.

But this great and important point of commanding the treaſurer, and other officers of the receipt to do their duty, and to iſſue money out of the receipt of the Exchequer, according to their opinions, is not mentioned in the oath; nor ſuch guard, for the king's ſecurity, ſet upon this tranſcendent power as there is upon all the reſt of their buſineſs: and yet, if they have ſuch a power, it is of a higher nature, and much greater conſequence, than all the reſt of their duty taken together.

The public treaſure is of the higheſt eſtimation in the conſideration of the law. Sir Edward Coke, 11 Rep. 91. b. ſays, it is the ligament of peace, the ſinews of war, and the preſerver of the honour and ſafety of the realm: conſequently the power of iſſuing this treaſure is of the higheſt importance.

The lord treaſurer (whoſe known buſineſs it is,) is expreſly ſworn truly to keep and diſpend the king's treaſure; but if this notion prevails, he muſt from time to time diſpend that treaſure according to the opinion and directions of other officers, who are unſworn in that point.

V. In the fifth place I ſhall obſerve, that to ſuppoſe a power lodged in the barons to iſſue writs requiring the lord treaſurer, or the treaſurer of the Exchequer to do their duty, is to ſuppoſe a direct abſurdity in the original inſtitution of the Exchequer; ſince it is to inveſt the barons, who are ſubordinate, with a right of commanding their ſuperior officers.

In the Mirror cap. 1. § 14. it is ſaid, that the buſineſs of the barons is done under the view or inſpection of a ſovereign, who is the treaſurer of England.

The words of Gervaſius Tilburienſis, ſpeaking of the treaſurer in his chapter of that officer, are; in omnibus enim & per omnia, quæ vel in inferiori ſcaccario vel inſuperiori geruntur, ipſius ſollicita diligentia neceſſaria eſt. Dial. de Scacc. lib. 1. c. 5.

Upon the conſtitution of a treaſurer, there goes a writ under the great ſeal to the barons, as well as other officers, to be attendant upon him, as my lord chief juſtice Coke ſets it down. 4 Inſt. 105.

The phraſe that he uſes to the barons is, we will and require you; ſo it appears ex parte Remem. regis, paſch. 3 Ed. 6. Rot. 4. where ſir Roger Cholmley brings into court a writing under the ſeal of the duke of Somerſet, then lord treaſurer, in that form.

The next officer in order is the treaſurer of the Exchequer, who is commonly the ſame perſon with the treaſurer of England.

Theſe two offices have gone ſo long together, that it is no eaſy matter to diſtinguiſh what is the proper buſineſs of the one and of the other. It ſeems to be the treaſurer of the Exchequer, to whom the record, which is cited by ſir Edward Coke, 4 Inſt. 105. is to be applied; becauſe he mentions that his letters patent are recited in the writ: for it is the treaſurer of the Exchequer who is conſtituted by letters patent; as the lord treaſurer is by delivery of the white ſtaff, and, as the ſame ſir Edward Coke ſays, in former times by delivery of the keys of the Treaſury. 4 Inſt. 104.

Mich. 14. Eliz. Rot. 355. ex parte Remem. reg. The queen ſends her writ to the barons, informing them that ſhe had conſtituted ſir William Cecill, lord Burleigh, treaſurer of the Exchequer, and commands them to be attending upon him, prout decet.

I might add, if it were neceſſary in a matter ſo very plain, that his ſuperiority appears in all the writs directed to them, in all which he is firſt named.

The next officer, in point of order, is the chancellor of the Exchequer.

After him are the chamberlains; which was antiently an office of very high dignity, and truſted to perſons of the higheſt quality in the kingdom: but the office being ſuch as might be executed by deputies, the chamberlains by degrees made themſelves uſeleſs, by leaving all the buſineſs to their deputies; the conſequence of which was, the office itſelf ſunk by degrees to little more than a name. This might be eaſily ſhewn, if it were not to digreſs; but that they are named before the barons in divers writs and acts of parliament is certain.

The act of 26 H. 8. c. 3. which gives the firſt-fruits to the crown, obſerves that order throughout, treaſurer, chancellor, chamberlains and barons.

I could mention many other acts and authorities. But I am ſenſible it is but an ungrateful ſubject to be leſſening the rank of officers, who preſide in one of the great courts of Weſtminſter, and at the ſame time that this is not very neceſſary; ſince it will be granted that the treaſurer of England, and the treaſurer of the Exchequer, are certainly ſuperior to the barons; which is enough for me to found myſelf upon, in ſaying that it carries a very great abſurdity, that ſuperior officers, in the proper buſineſs of their office, ſhould be under the command of other officers of the ſame court, who are acknowledged to be inferiour to them.

It muſt be confeſſed to be true, as my lord chief juſtice obſerved, that if my lord chief baron has a ſuit in the court of Exchequer, he muſt ſubmit to the judgment of the barons: and I readily own the treaſurer himſelf, and every body elſe who comes into that court as a ſuitor, muſt ſubmit to the judgment of the court; for as a ſuitor he can be conſidered no otherwiſe than any other private perſon, and is not acting in his office. But then it muſt be granted, that all the other barons together have no power of commanding the chief baron as ſuch; and conſequently nothing can be inferred from thence to take away the abſurdity which muſt enſue in ſuppoſing that the barons of the Exchequer, who in the order of the Exchequer are placed below him, can command the treaſurer to do his duty, and iſſue out the king's money according to their judgments.

It has been ſaid upon this occaſion that it is not the barons, but the king's writ, which the treaſurer muſt obey. And it is moſt true, when the king's pleaſure comes ſignified to him under the great or privy ſeal, he muſt obey it; becauſe theſe are the fixed methods whereby the king's pleaſure is to be known for the iſſuing of money: but that is no anſwer to the impropriety of his being commanded to act by writ, which comes to him under the teſte of his ſubordinate officers only; nor a proof that ſuch writ is an authority for him to act by, much leſs an obligation upon him to act according to the tenor of it.

I will only add, to ſhew the abſurdity of the notion that the barons can command the treaſurer by their judgment, that even that judgment of theirs is put under the correction of the treaſurer; for the law has made the lord chancellor and treaſurer the judges, who are to determine whether the judgments of the barons be erroneous, or not. Can any thing be more incongruous than to ſay, the barons by their judgment can require the treaſurer to do a thing, and the treaſurer can review that judgment, and determine whether it be fit for him to do it, or not?

It was ſaid further, that the treaſurer of the Exchequer is inferiour to the court held before the barons, and that he is only miniſterial as to Common Pleas. All that I ſhall ſay to this aſſertion is, that it was only ſaid, and not proved; and therefore, till I ſhall hear upon what reaſon the aſſertion is founded, I will conſider it no further.

VI. The ſixth thing which I ſhall mention is, that the Exchequer, if it be conſidered as it comprehends the whole buſineſs of the revenue, as well relating to the exitus as the introitus, may be taken as one entire body, of which the treaſurer is the head, and all the ſubordinate officers are parts and members; and in this extent and latitude it is treated of by Gervaſius Tilburienſis: but if it be conſidered in its ſeveral parts, as to what is entruſted diſtinctly to the treaſurer, and chamberlains, and what is put under the direction and government of the barons, it comprehends diſtinct courts, and ſuch as have no proper communication one with another; tho' perhaps, as to ſome things, the treaſurer, chamberlains, and barons, are intruſted jointly; as my lord chief juſtice Coke, 4 Inſt. 105. ſays they are with the cuſtody of the judicial records.

That the Receipt of the Exchequer is a court, and wholly under the treaſurer, appears by the oaths of the officers belonging to it.

Particularly in the Black Book, the oath of the writer of the tallies is, truly to write all the tallies, and counter-tallies of all payments and aſſignments in the Court of Receipt; and to give attendance and diſpatch, according to the antient cuſtom of that court.

Officers of the receipt are ſworn to be faithful and true to the lord treaſurer; as appears by the oath of the lord treaſurer's clerk, or auditor of the receipt. Book of Oaths, 20, 21

The under-treaſurer is ſworn to ſerve the king in the Exchequer, and in the receipt of the ſame; and to ſurvey and order the receipts of all ſums of money paid to the king's uſe in the ſaid receipt, and the iſſue of the ſame. Book of Oaths, 212.

The chamberlains are to enter and ingroſs the receipts of all monies received to the king's uſe at the receipt, as alſo the payments of the ſame; and not to aſſent to the deliverance of any of the king's money in the Treaſury, without ſufficient warrant. Book of Oaths, 219.

If any orders are fit to be aboliſhed or altered in the receipt, or any new orders to be made, it is to be done by the lord treaſurer; and uſually with the concurrence of the chancellor and under-treaſurer: but the barons are not conſulted, or conſenting. This appears in the Black Book, fol. 76. 13 Eliz.

If the king thinks fit to command by privy ſeal, which has been often done, that any new order or method ſhould be obſerved in any part of the receipts, it is uſually directed only to the treaſurer and the chancellor and under-treaſurer. And if it be thought proper that it ſhould be publiſhed and inrolled in the court of Exchequer, to the end that all officers and accountants might the better take notice of it, the lord treaſurer and chancellor and under-treaſurer come into the court of Exchequer, and the treaſurer commands it to be publiſhed and inrolled, together with his own aſſent to it, and the aſſent of the chancellor and under-treaſurer. But no notice is taken of the barons, tho' preſent, in any part of the buſineſs.

The whole form of this is particularly mentioned in the Black Book, fol. 82. 39 Eliz. when the lord Burleigh was treaſurer.

Add to this, that according to the conſtitution of the Exchequer, the barons are not at all privy to the ſtate of the treaſure in the receipt, nor by law ought to be made privy; ſo that all they act muſt be merely as ſuitors apply to them, without any knowledge of what there is in the receipt to anſwer the writ, or of the publick occaſions of the ſtate, from which it may be fatal to divert the money in the king's coffers.

VII. Seventhly, this method of proceeding does directly break through ſeveral received notions, which have been looked upon, in all ages, as maxims and rules of law.

As firſt, that no part of the king's treaſure could be iſſued but by warrant under the great or privy ſeal; for which reaſon it is, that the law has put ſuch guard upon theſe ſeals, that the counterfeiting them is high treaſon.

Gervaſe of Tilbury, ſays in direct terms, Dial. de ſcacc. lib. 1. c. 6. theſaurarius & camerarii, niſi regis expreſſo mandato, vel præſidentis juſticiarii, ſuſceptam pecuniam non expendunt: oportet enim ut habeant auctoritatem reſcripti regis de diſtributa pecunia. The præſidens juſticiarius was the cuſtos regni; that great officer was ſometimes called by that name, and ſometimes by other names. And leſt there ſhould be a miſtake of what is ſaid of the preſident juſticiary, he is careful to ſet the matter right by adding, that what was ſaid as to him is only to be underſtood de brevibus præſidentis juſticiarii cum rex abſens ſit, & cum ſigilli ejus impreſſione jura regni ſtatuuntur. Ibid.

I will not trouble myſelf to cite authorities to prove ſo known a poſition, as that no money can be iſſued out of the receipt but by warrant of the great or privy ſeal. I will only mention what was ſaid by my lord chief juſtice Coke, in his report of ſir Walter Mildmay's caſe, in the earl of Devonſhire's caſe: and I chooſe to mention it, becauſe the reporter was cotemporary to the judgment, given in the caſe of Wroth, if not in that of Nevil; and that his book was publiſhed ſeveral years after thoſe judgments were given.

Sir Edward Coke ſays, 11 Rep. 91. b. That it was reſolved in that caſe, that no officer of the king, nor all of them together, can iſſue out or diſpoſe of the king's treaſure ex officio, tho' it be for his honour or profit, unleſs by a warrant from himſelf. Theſe words are as appoſite to the preſent occaſion, as if they had been framed on purpoſe to deſtroy ſuch a notion as is contended for in the caſes before us.

The law has intruſted the king himſelf only with his treaſure, when once it comes into his coffers, which is the receipt; and only he, or ſuch as are impowered by his warrant, can diſpoſe of it: no court has any thing to do with it.

This caſe of ſir Walter Mildmay was adjudged, Mich. 37 and 38 Eliz. after the two caſes of Nevil and Wroth; but not ſo long after as that it could be poſſible either of thoſe caſes ſhould be forgotten: and therefore, the barons, who had ſir Walter Mildmay's caſe before them, could not but know it, if the point, now in queſtion, of the authority of the ſeal of the Exchequer, had been ſettled in thoſe caſes of Wroth and Nevil; or if in the debate of thoſe caſes it was taken to be known law, and the courſe of the Exchequer. According to ſir Edw. Coke's report, the queſtion was directly before them, what ſeals of the king might be a ſufficient warrant to iſſue out the king's treaſure. One would think upon ſuch a queſtion they ſhould not have forgot the ſeal of the Exchequer, which, as it ſeems now to be inſiſted on, is not only a ſufficient warrant, but a better and higher authority than any other, and ſuch as can inforce the iſſuing of the king's treaſure, when the great ſeal itſelf fails. Yet there is not the leaſt notice taken of the Exchequer ſeal in the book. It is laid down there firſt negatively, that every warrant of the king's is not ſufficient: as for inſtance; his warrant by word of mouth is not; his warrant under the ſignet is not; and yet, as it is obſerved there, in ſome caſes the law takes notice of the ſignet: then affirmatively the book ſays in expreſs words, the warrant which is ſufficient in law to iſſue the treaſure of the king, ought to be under the great or privy ſeal. 11 Co. 92. a.

To evade the force of this argument, it has been ſuggeſted, as if what was found in the law books, to the effect which I have mentioned, was to be underſtood only of the common and ordinary methods of iſſuing the king's treaſure.

The truth is, if the method now inſiſted on was a legal method, one would wonder it ſhould not have been a very uſual and ordinary one, ſince it is ſo very eaſy and ready for the ſubject.

I think it might be a ſufficient anſwer to this ſuggeſtion to ſay, that it is an evaſion to ſerve a purpoſe only, and has no proof or foundation for it to be found in the books.

But if the caſe, which was then before the court, be conſidered, there will appear to be no pretence for ſuch a ſurmiſe. For the queſtion there was, whether a warrant under the hands of the treaſurer, and under-treaſurer of the Exchequer, directed to the four tellers, for the payment of 100*l. per annum* to the chancellor of the Exchequer for his extraordinary and neceſſary ſervices, was good in law; payments having been made according to ſuch a warrant, and the money being demanded back again of the executors of the chancellor of the Exchequer.

Nothing could have been more natural than to have taken notice, upon ſuch an occaſion as this, that tho' the treaſurer and under-treaſurer could not by their warrant impower any payment out of the receipt, yet the barons by their judgment, and by iſſuing thereupon a writ under the Exchequer ſeal, could do it. And if the barons, on ſo fair an opportunity, had omitted to aſſert this power, yet it is very unlikely that ſir Edw. Coke (who in his Reports does not confine himſelf to the caſe before the court, but does generally lay together all the learning in the law which comes under that title, ſo as to make them in the nature of common-places,) ſhould omit to take notice of it: and 'tis yet more unlikely, that he ſhould again make the ſame omiſſion in his fourth Inſtitutes; where he particularly treats of the juriſdiction of the Exchequer, and where it was not only proper but neceſſary to take notice of it, if he did not intend to leave his work imperfect.

There was another thing ſaid by way of anſwer to this objection: that, in the caſe now depending, the judgment of the barons was not properly an iſſuing of the king's revenue, but that the revenue was iſſued by virtue of the great ſeal, and the authority of the letters patent: ſo that what the court did was but a determining of the right, a judgment that the letters patent were legal, and did bind the ſucceſſor; and therefore the barons command that the revenue be iſſued out according to the letters patent.

If it be ſo, that the letters patent, and not the judgment of the court, are the warrant for iſſuing the money in this caſe, then the authority of the barons, as to the iſſuing of money out of the receipt, is given up.

But what then becomes of the authority of thoſe caſes of Nevil and Wroth? What was the warrant upon which the money was iſſued there? For in neither of thoſe caſes was there a warrant of the great or privy ſeal. And therefore, either thoſe judgments muſt be founded upon ſome particular reaſon proper to thoſe caſes; and conſequently thoſe caſes are not to be applied as precedents for warranting the judgments now in queſtion; or elſe they prove a direct power in the barons of commanding the treaſure out of the receipt, by no other warrant but the Exchequer ſeal.

If this anſwer be conſidered the other way, and it be taken, that the great ſeal is to be the warrant to the commiſſioners of the Treaſury, in this caſe, for iſſuing the money, and not the judgment, or the Exchequer ſeal, what does this whole proceeding ſignify? What is done by this judgment? And what is to be done by the writ that is to iſſue upon it?

The authority of the great ſeal for the iſſuing money was the ſame before the judgment as it continues after: the judgment is drawn up in the words of the letters patent; and what was ſaid before under the great ſeal, is now ſaid again under the ſeal of the Exchequer; a ſeal much leſs conſidered in the law: and if after all it be admitted, that the money, if iſſued, muſt be by warrant of the great ſeal, the conſequence then muſt be, that after all theſe proceedings the thing is but juſt where it began.

If it be underſtood, that this writ is no more than a certificate to the lords of the Treaſury of the barons opinion, that the letters patent are good in law, and continue in force in the time of the ſucceſſor, it is perhaps what the barons might properly do: eſpecially, if the queſtion had come judicially before them in any ſuit depending; or, according as the ancient courſe was, if a direction had gone under the great ſeal to the treaſurer and them, to have looked into the letters patent, and conſidered of their validity. But then, it is but a certificate: it is not a judgment upon which a writ of error will lye; and we are all in a miſtake, while we are debating here as if a proper judgment was regularly brought before us.

Therefore, I take it for granted, this was ſaid only to make the thing a little more plauſible. It looked not only new, but harſh, I will not ſay abſurd, to affirm directly, that if the barons iſſued out a writ under the Exchequer ſeal, commanding the lord treaſurer to pay a ſum out of the receipt, he muſt obey it; and therefore the letters patent were mentioned. But I think it is plain, unleſs a writ under the ſeal of the Exchequer be a good warrant and diſcharge to the treaſurer and chamberlains in point of law if it be obeyed, and be compulſory upon them to obey it, the whole proceedings in this caſe are ineffectual, and carry things no farther than juſt where they were when the ſuits began.

Secondly, The judgments given by the barons in theſe caſes, are not conſiſtent with another known maxim; that when once money is paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, no court has any power over it, nor is there any legal method to fetch it back again; altho', in ſeveral caſes, if it had not been actually paid into the receipt, it might have been reſtored to the party.

To this purpoſe nothing can be more ſtrong than the common caſes of reverſals of outlawries and judgments; where, tho' by the judgment of reverſal, the party is to be reſtored to all that he has loſt; yet whatever has been actually brought into the receipt of the Exchequer is gone paſt redemption: and yet when the outlawry, or judgment is reverſed, it is to all purpoſes as if it had never been. And theſe are caſes of reſtitution which are moſt favoured in law, and the relief extended as far as poſſible.

In like manner, when upon an office, or inquiſition, a title is found for the king, and the meſn profits are paid into the receipt, if upon a traverſe, or monſtrance de droit, judgment be afterwards given for the ſubject, and an amoveas manus awarded, yet as to profits paid into the receipt there ſhall be no reſtitution.

This is ſo known, that in caſes before the barons, where there is a queſtion touching the profits of an eſtate whereof the title is found for the king, if they conceive a doubt upon a ſuggeſtion of a ſubject's right, which may hereafter appear, they will in diſcretion direct the money to remain in the chamberlains hands for a time, and not to be paid immediately into the receipt; becauſe when it is once there, it is out of their power, and cannot be brought back again.

It cannot be but that in theſe caſes the law is ſo. But my lord chief juſtice endeavoured to aſſign ſeveral reaſons, which might diſtinguiſh theſe from other caſes. He ſaid, that judgments and outlawries are reverſed in the King's Bench, and that the King's Bench cannot ſend a writ to the treaſurer and chamberlains requiring them to pay money out of the receipt; 'tis only the barons can do it: nor can the barons do it in thoſe caſes, becauſe the record of the judgment is in the King's Bench, and there is only a tranſcript in the Exchequer, upon which they cannot ſend a writ.

I can eaſily agree, that the King's Bench cannot ſend a writ to the treaſurer and chamberlains to command money out of the receipt of the Exchequer; and I think I have proved there is no ſuch power in the barons: but if the barons have ſuch a power in any caſe, I am inclined to think it would be no good reaſon why they might not exerciſe it in theſe caſes, that they have not the record itſelf, but only the tranſcript of the record; becauſe the proceſs of the Exchequer iſſues every day upon eſtreats, which are tranſcripts, or indeed extracts of records only.

As to the other caſes, of money levied upon offices or inquiſitions found, my lord chief juſtice obſerved, that there was a difference between a judgment upon a petition of right, and a judgment upon a traverſe, or a monſtrance de droit. That in the firſt caſe, the judgment was general, that the king's hands ſhould be amoved, and the party reſtored to the poſſeſſion: but in the other caſe the judgment was, that the party ſhould be reſtored una cum exitibus & proficuis inde medio tempore perceptis: and ſo he compared a judgment on a petition of right to a real action at common law againſt a ſubject, in which there were no damages; and a judgment on a monſtrance de droit to a poſſeſſory action, in which damages were recovered at common law.

To this I anſwer, that the caſes of ſubjects are not to be compared to the caſe of the king; but that at the common law, before the ſtatute of articuli ſuper chartas, the ſubject, in no caſe of an amoveas manum, could have any judgment for reſtoring iſſues, however falſe the office appeared, as ſir Edward Coke expreſly affirms. But be that as it may, yet this diſtinction makes nothing to the preſent queſtion. For in caſes of monſtrance de droit or traverſes, where the judgment is to reſtore the party to the meſn profits, it is generally expreſſed unde dicto domino regi nondum eſt reſponſum; and where theſe words are omitted, the ſame are underſtood. If the profits remain in the tenants hands, or if they are in tranſitû in the hands of the receivers, though the receivers have accounted for them, the party is reſtored to them; but if they are anſwered into the receipt, they are loſt to him. This is affirmed by my lord chief juſtice Coke, in his commentary upon the ſtatute of articuli ſuper chartas, c. 19. which act was made 28 Ed. 1. and the ſtatute de eſcheatoribus, which was made the year following. And yet the words of the ſtatute are very full, that upon an ouſter le main, becauſe there was no cauſe to ſeize, ſoient les iſſues pleinment rendus a celuy a que la terre demurt, & avera le damage reſceive.

2 Inſt. 572, 573.

It is not a very difficult matter to find out a ſeeming reaſon to ſupport a concluſion one is determined to make; but it is loſt time to diſpute of the ſtrength of ſuch arguments, where it is eaſy to come to as much certainty as is conſiſtent with the nature of the thing.

There are many of theſe judgments upon traverſes and monſtrance de droit to be found upon record, where the party is to be reſtored to the poſſeſſion, una cum exitibus & proficuis inde medio tempore receptis. If it could be made appear, that upon any ſuch judgment money was paid back out of the receipt of the Exchequer, or if any writ could be produced, requiring the treaſurer and chamberlains to make reſtitution, it would be to me a much more cogent argument, than any new plauſible reaſon which may be aſſigned. But of this there is no footſtep in any antient or modern book. If it never was done, the old known reaſon will beſt ſerve our turn, that it was becauſe the money was paid into the receipt, and then no court had power to intermeddle with it.

VIII. Eighthly, This does ſeem to be an extraordinary and anomalous method of proceeding, and ſuch as has nothing like it in any other court, either when the ſubject ſues the king, or any other ſubject.

This method of proceeding takes from the king all poſſibility of making a defence: for the attorney-general does not come in till the barons have commanded the letters patent to be enrolled; after which the attorney-general could not plead non conceſſit, as he might have done before; or if he could have pleaded that plea, no venue is laid, and conſequently no trial could be had on ſuch iſſue. And a proper defence being thus taken away, or, which is all one, the trial of it rendered impracticable, no courſe of any court can make ſuch a proceeding good.

It was confeſſed, that the legitimation of a caſe is to be ſuſpected unleſs there be another like it.

But it was ſaid, that in other courts caſes might be found, which might properly be reſembled to the proceeding in this caſe; and the caſe in Co. Ent. 93. was inſtanced. I will put that caſe as it ſtands upon the record.

A claim is put in by the lord Hunſdon, to a ſum of 18 l. 11 s. 8 d. which is charged upon the accounts of the ſeveral ſheriffs of Kent and Dorſet for the laſt year, for iſſues out of the Common Pleas and King's Bench; and for fines and amerciaments before the juſtices of aſſize; and for iſſues and amerciaments before the barons of the Exchequer, &c. (the particulars are expreſſed in the claim;) which were ſeverally ſet upon his tenants, or reſiants within his manor and hundred of Sevenoakes, and Coddeſheath: all which he claims to belong to him, the perſons, upon whom they were ſeverally ſet, being tenants or reſiants within his manor and hundred, as the ſaid ſheriff of Kent had teſtified upon his account.

And he ſets out letters patent of Ed. 4. granting to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his ſucceſſors, the return of writs, and all fines and amerciaments of tenants and reſiants within the manor, &c. and ſo proceeds to ſhew a title in the archbiſhop to the fines, &c. with which the ſheriff was charged: and then ſhews the inrollment of theſe letters patent in the Exchequer, in the third year of Ed. 4; and that Cranmer was ſeized, in right of his archbiſhoprick, of the ſaid manor, hundred, and liberties, &c.

Then he ſets forth the act for erecting the court of Augmentations, whereby all manors, &c. which H. 8. ſhould purchaſe, were put under the government of that court: after which act, Cranmer by deed inrolled conveyed the manor and liberties to H. 8. and his heirs; which grant was confirmed by the prior and covent of Canterbury. And then he ſets forth the act of 32 H. 8. c. 20. for reviving and continuing liberties and privileges in the hands of the king; by virtue whereof, &c. H. 8. was ſeized, and died ſeized: and ſo conveys a title to Ed. 6. and queen Mary: and that upon her death queen Elizabeth became ſeized; and that ſhe granted the manor, hundred, and liberties, to him and his heirs males; and that he entered and was ſeized. He then proceeds to plead an allowance in the Exchequer of theſe fines and amerciaments to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the time of Ed. 4: and ſo makes his claim; which the attorney-general confeſſes.

And thereupon, on view of ſeveral records, and for that the ſheriff of Kent, upon oath, did teſtifie the matter of fact; that the ſeveral perſons, on whom the fines and amerciaments were ſet, were tenants and reſiants in the manor and hundred of the lord Hunſdon, the barons adjudge, that the ſheriff of Kent ſhould be diſcharged of 10*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* with which he ſtood charged upon his account; and that the ſame be allowed to the lord Hunſdon; and thereupon the ſheriff had his quietus.

Upon this caſe I obſerve.

1*ſt*, That it has no relation to any money in the receipt of the Exchequer.

2*dly*, This is a proceeding in diſcharge of the ſheriff upon his account: the queſtion being only, if the ſheriff ſhould be charged with ſo much as payable to the king, contrary to what he had teſtified upon his account on oath. So that this queſtion was the proper buſineſs of the barons to determine.

3*dly*, This claim of the lord Hunſdon's was by way of defence to a demand on the king's part, and not by way of ſuit of the ſubject to recover from the king: and this demand, on the king's part, is ſo far from being founded on the record, that it is contrary to what the ſheriff had ſworn upon his account.

4*thly*, This was not a claim which came at that time originally before the court; but was founded upon antient allowances, before made in the court of Exchequer.

5*thly*, Here was no poſitive record for the king; it being only a general charge upon the ſheriff, and he having diſcharged himſelf by oath.

6*thly*, This is a caſe directly within the ſtatute 5 R. 2. which impowers the barons to allow the matter pleaded by way of diſcharge upon account.

By all which it appears, that there is no manner of reſemblance in that claim of my lord Hunſdon, to the caſes before the court; where the ſubject comes originally as a plaintiff, and makes a demand of money out of the receipt of the Exchequer.

Another caſe, cited by my lord chief juſtice, as a proceeding that might be reſembled to the caſes now before the court, was that of the lady Broughton; which is entered Trin. 24 Car. 2. Rot. 38. B. R.

There an information was exhibited againſt the lady Broughton, for divers miſdemeanours committed by her, as keeper of the Gatehouſe priſon at Weſtminſter. Upon not guilty pleaded, a verdict was found againſt her; and judgment was given, that ſhe ſhould be fined 100 marks, Et quod officium cuſtodis priſonæ prædict' capiatur in manus domini regis, quouſque curiæ hic conſtiterit cui vel quibus officium illud de jure ſpectat, vel quouſque curia hic ulterius ordinaverit, ſalvo jure cujuſcunque, &c.

Whereupon the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter come in, and ſet forth their title to be a corporation; and that king James I. granted to them and their ſucceſſors, habere priſonam & arreſtacon' & impriſonament' omnium hominum arreſtat' infra civitat' & libertat' Weſtm' adeo libere quiete & integre ac in tam amplis modo & forma prout ultimus abbas, &c. in præmiſſis habuit, to hold to them and their ſucceſſors to their uſe for ever, &c. by virtue whereof they were ſeized de libertatibus habendi priſon' & arreſtacon' & impriſonamentum omnium hominum infra' civitat' & libertat' Weſtm', ut de feodo & jure, in jure eccleſiæ, &c.

And then they ſet forth the grant by them to ſir Edward Broughton and Mary his wife, of the office cuſtod' priſone ſue prædict', ſimul cum omnibus feodis, &c. habend' to them, their executors and aſſigns, for forty years; by virtue of which they were poſſeſſed, &c. and that ſir Edward died: and that Mary, as ſurvivor, was poſſeſſed; and for divers offences, by her committed in the execution of the ſaid office, (whereof ſhe was convicted,) forfeited the ſaid office, prout the record.

Et ea de cauſa prædict' dec' & capitul' petunt & calumniant libertat' habendi & diſponendi officium prædict', &c. Et petunt allocationem libertat' prædict', ſecund' conceſſionem ſic ut prefertur factam; and make the proper averments. The attorney-general confeſſes their claim, and thereupon they have judgment.

I acknowledge that I am much to ſeek as to any thing appearing in this record, which is in the leaſt to be reſembled to the caſes before us.

Judgment was given againſt the keeper of a priſon, of forfeiture of the office for a miſdemeanour: by that judgment the office was vacant; but it did not appear to the court in whom the right was of diſpoſing, or exerciſing the office. Upon ſuch an avoidance, it was neceſſary for the ſake of publick juſtice, and to prevent the eſcape of the priſoners, that the office ſhould be taken into the king's hands, till it might appear to the court in whom the right was; but it was only quouſque, and with a ſalvo jure. So that no title to the office is found, or ſo much as alledged for the king: and when the dean and chapter, in purſuance of the very direction of the judgment, come in, and ſet out their title, the attorney-general confeſſes it, and they are put into poſſeſſion.

I do not ſee but, notwithſtanding either of theſe two inſtances, the caſes before us ſtand by themſelves; and that the argument againſt theſe kind of proceedings does ſtill remain in force, becauſe they are unuſual, and of an unprecedented nature, and ſuch as the counſel can ſcarce find a name for.

In their arguments upon theſe caſes ſome of the counſel ſaid, that the proceeding was in the nature of a monſtrance de droit.

Others, with more circumlocution, ſtiled it, an application to the court of Exchequer, ſetting forth a right to part of a revenue in charge before them, which the officers under their power refuſe to pay.

Others ſaid it was neither a petition, nor a monſtrance de droit; for thoſe were only proper when the ſuit is in diſaffirmance of the king's title, but here the ſubject claims from the king, and complains only of the officer; but they gave it no name.

My lord chief juſtice was pleaſed to ſay that this ſuit was a monſtrance de droit; and, I think, I may affirm that to be the firſt time it had a certain name. Plowden calls ſir H. Nevil's caſe, a report of a judgment given by the barons, upon the exhibiting to the court of Exchequer, by ſir H. Nevil, a deed of grant of the office of keeper.

My lord chief juſtice ſaid, that a monſtrance de droit was a common law remedy. He owned, that though ſeveral ſtatutes had enlarged the relief, which the ſubject might have in many caſes where there was occaſion to interplead with the crown; yet the caſes in queſtion did not come within the relief of any of thoſe ſtatutes, but remained the ſame as at common law. But he ſaid, this ſuit was a monſtrance de droit maintainable at common law, and was the ſubject's proper remedy when his title appeared upon record. And that the party might in this caſe maintain his monſtrance de droit, and was not put to his petition of right to admit himſelf out of poſſeſſion.

1*ſt*, Becauſe the right he claimed is not grounded on a matter of fact, but by matter of record; Williamſon claiming by a deed inrolled, and that inrollment directed by the letters patent, which is a matter of record.

2*dly*, Becauſe the party does not go about to deſtroy the king's title, but his claim ſubſiſts upon the king's title to the exciſe.

3*dly*, Becauſe his annuity is not turned to a right, nor deveſted; and therefore it was not neceſſary he ſhould go by way of petition.

I will not, at this time, enter into the particular conſideration of thoſe reaſons. Though I cannot but ſay, in the firſt place, it is far from being clear to me, when letters patent direct, that the aſſignment of one ſubject to another ſhould be inrolled within thirty days before the auditor of the Receipt, or clerk of the Pells, for a particular purpoſe, (viz. that it may appear what aſſignments have been granted,) that ſuch an inrollment does make a record; much leſs ſuch a record as is equal to that record which intitles the king. And if it be not a record of as high a nature, the ſubject is put to his petition, and in no caſe can have a monſtrance de droit; as is reſolved in Piers Partifield's caſe, 29 Aſſ. 31; and is agreed, and declared to be law in the commonalty of Sadlers caſe. 4 Co. 55. b. and 56. a.

In the ſecond place, I cannot underſtand, but that a perſon, who ſets up a title to the inheritance of a part of the Exciſe, and ſeeks to recover it from the king, does go about to defeat the king's title to that part of the revenue

Nor will I, in the third place, enter into the debate, whether, as this caſe is, the annuity be deveſted or turned to a right. Though I cannot but obſerve, that a writ of annuity, (and this ſuit is in the nature of ſuch a writ,) is the higheſt writ which ſuch a perſon can purſue; and the judgment given upon that writ is for the whole inheritance, for the time to come, as well as for the arrears: and therefore it might ſeem, that he who brings it doth admit himſelf to be deveſted of the whole.

But I will very plainly own, that after conſideration of this argument, with the beſt application I could uſe, ſeveral doubts remain with me as to the force of it.

As, 1*ſt*, Whether a monſtrance de droit, in the ſenſe it is now taken, and commonly underſtood, and as it ſeems to be applied to theſe caſes, did lie at the common law.

2*dly*, If that were to be admitted, becauſe I would not diſpute about words or names, yet I am not ſatisfied that this ſuit can properly be called a monſtrance de droit.

3*dly*, Let this ſuit have what name it will, yet I think it is not the proper common law remedy, to which the ſubject was entitled in a caſe of this nature; but that the party was put to his petition of right.

I. The firſt thing I ſhall do, is to ſhew why it ſeems doubtful to me, whether ſuch a ſuit as a monſtrance de droit, as it is now underſtood, did lie at the common law.

I will not be thought to mean, that the ſubject had not, in ſeveral caſes, a proper way of defending himſelf at common law againſt the king, and by proper application to the courts to obtain an ouſter le maine. But I do ſay, wherever the king had a direct title of freehold, or inheritance, appearing for him by matter of record; (whether that record was judicial, or miniſterial; or was a conveyance of record; or was a matter of fact found by office of record;) the ſubject at common law was put to his petition of right, and could not interplead with the king, either by traverſing the king's title, or avoiding it by ſetting up any title of his own: and in this I ſay no more than what was agreed in the commonalty of Sadler's caſe. 4 Co. 55. a.

'Tis very true, if the office did not entitle the king to the 4 Co. 56. a. b. poſſeſſion, but only to the bringing of a ſcire facias; (as if a ceſſavit per biennium, or a fine by colluſion, or the committing of waſte, was found againſt the king's tenant by inquiſition;) upon a ſcire facias brought, the party at common law might come in and defend the poſſeſſion, by ſhewing his title, and denying the matter found againſt him. For it was what the writ itſelf expreſly required; and it would have been very abſurd to ſay he ſhould not be admitted to do that which the very writ required him to do: and by the ſcire facias he was made privy, and had a day to plead. Kelw. 155. b. 158. a. b.

And therefore ſuch a traverſe, or, if that name be better liked, ſuch a monſtrance de droit, lay at common law.

In like manner, where the office contained the whole ſpecial 4 Co. 55. a. matter; ſo that tho' there might be ſuch matter found, as, if it ſtood alone, would make a title for the king; yet, if there was alſo found, in the ſame office, ſufficient upon the whole to ſhew a good title in the ſubject, the ſubject might inſiſt upon this matter, and might pray an amoveas manum: becauſe in truth the very record, upon which the king ſeized, made a title for the party.

As ſuppoſe it to be found, that A. did diſſeize me of lands 4 Co. 55. a. holden of the king, and that A. aliened in mortmain, or died without heir; in this caſe, I may pray an ouſter le main upon the very record. So, if it be found that the king's tenant, at the time of his death, held an acre of land of me by leaſe for his life. Kelw. 156. b. 157. a. 158. a.

In like manner, if the title found for the king appears, by the record, to be determinable upon performance of a condition, and that condition appears upon the record to be performed, the party might take advantage of it. 4 Co. 55. a. b.

But as the common law ſtood, wherever a title for the king only was found by matter of record, tho' it was falſe, the party could not traverſe it.

So where a title was found for the king which was true, but it was diſcloſed in the record, that the ſubject had a good right, which would avoid the title found for the king; yet in that caſe the ſubject could not have been admitted to ſhew it, but was ſo far concluded as to be put to his petition of right. 4 Co 56. a.

Lib. 1. c. 8. & lib. 4. c. 10.

I need not mention Bracton's words for this purpoſe.

Stamford's opinion is expreſly, that a monſtrance de droit was given by the ſtatute 36 Ed. 3. and did not lie at common law. Prer. Reg. cap. 21. fol. 71.

And in the caſe of the corporation of ſadlers, which has been mentioned before, as it is reported by my lord chief juſtice Anderſon, 1 And. 180. 181. num. 216. it is expreſly affirmed, that the traverſe and monſtrance de droit are both given by that ſtatute. Nor do I ſee, that any thing to the contrary of what I have ſaid is affirmed in the report of this caſe, by my lord chief juſtice Coke. Unleſs it be, that he gives the name of a monſtrance de droit to thoſe proceedings, which were always admitted to have been at the common law; that is, where the ſpecial matter was ſo found, as that, upon the ſame record, it did appear, that the right was in the party, and not in the king: whereas, in proper ſpeaking, it is not the ſubject there who comes in and ſhews his right, but the king's own record ſhews it.

But I think it very plain, that the ſtatute 36 Ed. 3. cap. 13. which gives a traverſe in caſe of offices found, does alſo give the monſtrance de droit; which my lord chief juſtice Coke himſelf, in the commonalty of Sadler's caſe, does agree was not given by the ſtatute 34 Ed. 3. cap. 14. For tho' that ſtatute gave the ſubject a traverſe in ſome caſes, where the office was found by virtue of a writ, or a commiſſion; yet it was defective, even in thoſe caſes: for upon the traverſe taken, tho' the iſſue was found for the ſubject, yet no judgment could be given without a new commiſſion de procedendo ad judicium. 4 Co. 56, 57.

The words of the ſtat. 36 Ed. 3. are, that if any one will put in a claim to lands ſeized by office, the eſcheator is to ſend the inqueſt into Chancery, and a writ is to be delivered to him to certifie the cauſe of the ſeizin there. And there the party ſoit oye ſans delaye de traverſer l'office, ou autrement monſtrer ſon droit, & illonques maunde devant le roy, a faire final diſcuſſion ſans autre maundement.

Theſe words, as I take it, gave the name of monſtrance de droit to that ſort of proceeding; and I think I may affirm, with Stamford, that no book before this ſtatute did treat any thing of a monſtrance de droit. Stamf. c. 21. prer. regis.

That it was this ſtatute which gave the ſubject a right of interpleading with the king, where an abſolute title was found for the king by office; and that the ſubject is ſtill put to his petition in all caſes out of the remedy of that ſtatute, (as in all caſes where the king is entitled by a judicial record;) is what appears plainly by the lord Hungerford's caſe, which is 4 Ed. 4. 21. 22. and alſo by 9 Ed. 4. 52. and 13 Ed. 4. 8. and by many other caſes. I need not be at the trouble of citing them all.

II. But in the ſecond place, ſuppoſe it ſhould be admitted, that a monſtrance de droit did lie at common law, yet ſtill it remains a doubt to me, how the proceeding in this caſe can be called by that name.

In caſes where an office is found by which the king is entitled to the poſſeſſion, by the ſtat. 36 Ed. 3. (and take it for granted at preſent, in ſome caſes at common law,) the ſubject may come in and interplead with the king; either by denying the title found for the king, or by ſhewing his own right, whereby he does avoid the title found for the king.

This is that kind of proceeding which is called a monſtrance de droit. And in this ſort of proceeding, the ſubject is in the nature of a defendant, and comes in and pleads to a title found for the king: and the judgment is, quod manus domini regis amoveantur. This appears 1 Co. 157. Digg's caſe; 4 Co. commonalty of Sadler's caſe; and by the caſes in Co. Entries. So is the caſe of Coningſby and Malham, in Kelway's Reports, 154. In which caſe it is ſaid, that the amoveas manus is the end of every ſuit, where a man comes in to interplead with the king; for without that judgment the land will ſtill remain in the king's hands. Kelw. 158. a.

And therefore, where that judgment cannot be given, the party ſhall not be admitted to traverſe a falſe office, or to interplead with the king, tho' the caſe be otherwiſe ſuch as comes within the remedy of the ſtatute of 36 Ed. 3.

As, where a man has a remainder, or reverſion, expectant upon an eſtate of freehold, without any rent, or profit, and a falſe office is found of the dying ſeized of ſuch a remainder, or reverſion; he ſhall not be admitted to traverſe this falſe office, becauſe the judgment cannot be given, quod manus domini regis amoveantur: as was adjudged in the caſe of the counteſs of Rutland. 2 Inſt. 688.

But in theſe caſes before us, neither does the party aſk any ſuch judgment; nor are the judgments, which are brought before the court by theſe writs of error, any thing like it.

If this be a monſtrance de droit, the judgment ought to be ſuch as the law hath ordained in caſes of that nature: but here the ſuit is plainly in the nature of a writ of annuity; the party concludes his demand in the ſame manner as in a declaration for an annuity, and the judgment is given accordingly.

III. The third thing I will conſider is, ſuppoſing it were taken for granted, that a monſtrance de droit did lie at common law; and that this ſuit of Williamſon's is ſuch a monſtrance de droit, whether yet this monſtrance de droit be the proper remedy maintainable at common law in a caſe of this nature? For, as Fineux ſays, in the caſe of Coningſby and Malham, Kel. 157. b. tho' the parties have ever ſo good a right, yet they muſt come to the poſſeſſion of what they have a right to by the ordinary method of law; for, ſays he, if a man owes me money, I cannot take it out of his purſe, nor can I recover it by an improper action.

Let us ſee then what this ſuit is for; and what was the courſe taken at common law to recover a thing of this nature.

The ſuit is for the arrears of an annuity, granted to ſir Robert Vyner and his heirs, by the king's predeceſſors, out of a branch of the hereditary revenue of the crown, and by him aſſigned to Williamſon; as alſo for the growing payments, that they may be anſwered from time to time, as they become due.

Now, as far as I can find, by the common law, in all caſes where arrears of an annuity, or annual rent or ſum, were demanded by the ſubject from the crown; (whether it was originally granted by the crown out of any part of the revenue; or was iſſuing out of lands which afterwards came to the crown;) the only remedy, which the ſubject had for recovering thereof, was by petition to the king.

The authorities are very expreſs and full in this matter.

Suppoſe a man hath a rent-charge, or a rent-ſervice, or other rent, iſſuing out of land by preſcription, or grant; and this land comes to the king by grant, or forfeiture: in all ſuch caſes the owner of the rent is put to his petition to the king, and hath no other remedy whatſoever.

In like manner, if a man be ſeized of land, and acknowledges a ſtatute, or recognizance, and before execution taken, the eſtate comes to the king by attainder: or the ter-tenant grants to the king by deed inrolled: in either caſe the conuzee is put to his petition, and has no other remedy; unleſs the whole matter be ſpecially found in the office. 4 Ed. 4. 23. Stamford de prerog. regis 75. c. 22. Kelway 155. b.

A man holds lands of the king in chief; and other lands, by knights ſervice and rent, of other lords; and dies, leaving his heir within age: the king ſeizes the body and lands held in chief; and alſo the other lands, which the anceſtor held of other lords. The heir ſhall pay his relief to the other lords when he comes to age: and as to the rent during the nonage of the heir, the lords ſhall ſue to the king by petition to have the rent of the lands which are held of them by the heir, who is in ward to the king; and ſhall have it by this means. So is 13 H. 7. 15. pl. 11. 24 Ed. 3. 24. pl. 5.

And that the law is ſo, is affirmed in all the abridgments of the caſe; and particularly Bro. Title Pet. 43. makes a ſpecial reference to the ſtatute 2 & 3 Ed. 6. c. 8. of offices.

Fitz. relief 7. traverſe 43.

And that the law continued ſo till the making of that ſtatute, does ſufficiently appear by the ſtatute itſelf. For in the ſeventh branch of that act, it is expreſly taken notice of, that, in the caſe abovementioned, the meſn lords would ſpare the rents due to them for the lands holden of them during the king's poſſeſſion; and after the heir had ſued his livery, would diſtrain upon him for the arrearages, where they ſhould have ſued by petition to the king's majeſty, to have obtained the ſame out of the king's hands. And that ſtatute enacts a new relief for the meſn lords; that they ſhould receive the rents, during the wardſhip, from the king's officers appointed to receive the profits of the ward's lands: and that ſuch officers payment, and the acquittance of the meſn lord, ſhould be a good diſcharge to the officers.

From hence it is plain, that, before this act, there was no remedy for the meſn lords, but by petition. And it may be obſerved, that the remedy given is by ſending them to the receivers in the country, and not to the receipt of the Exchequer. And this clauſe does explain the general words of the preamble of that ſtatute: which takes notice, that perſons having any rent, common, fee, or other profit apprender, out of lands, or tenements, ſpecified in ſuch offices, or inquiſitions, were without remedy to obtain or have the ſame, by any traverſe, or other ſpeedy mean, without great and exceſſive charges, during the king's intereſt therein.

And ſince that ſtatute, in the caſe of Wicks and Dennis, 31 & 32 El. 1 Leon. 190. it was holden by the whole court, that during the queen's poſſeſſion of the land, the rent-charge iſſuing out of it is only recoverable by petition: altho' the demand of the rent was agreed to be good; becauſe in his petition the party muſt ſhew that he did demand the rent.

And as the law is plainly ſo, where a perſon has a title to a rent, by grant of a ſubject, out of lands which come to the poſſeſſion of the king; ſo the caſe is to all purpoſes the ſame, where he has a title to a rent, or yearly ſum, by letters patent from the crown.

13 Ed. 4. 5. pl. 15. The king grants a rent out of his manor: the manor is not charged, but the king by petition. Theſe are the words of the book.

And as that book is an expreſs authority that this was the law, ſo was the practice accordingly.

In 18 Ed. 1. Ryley's Placita Parliamentaria 52. the abbeſs de Fonte Eboraldi ſues to the king by petition for the arrears of an annuity of 10*l. per ann.* granted by H. 3. to the abbeſs of that place, and her ſucceſſors.

In 35 Ed. 1. Ryley 329. is the petition of John Hernigod for the arrears of a rent of 7*s.* 8*d.*

So alſo was Everle's caſe, and the abbot and covent of Warden's caſe, before-mentioned.

In like manner, it appears by the ſame book, that the ſame method was to be taken for recovering a rent, &c. granted by a ſubject out of lands which afterwards came to the crown.

33 Ed. 1. Ryley 256. 257. Elſefend's caſe; & 245. the abbot and covent of Oſeney's caſe. So, where Peche, the tenant of the biſhop of Ely, who held of the biſhop, as part of his barony, four knights fees, granted theſe lands to the king, the biſhop was put to his petition to recover his ſervices. 33 Ed. 1. Ryley 249.

Upon the exile of the Jews, in the time of Ed. 1. divers lands came to the king's hands by way of eſcheat: the chief lords, of whom thoſe lands were holden, had no remedy to recover their ſervices in arrear, but by petition. 21 Ed. 1. Ryley 129.

By all theſe authorities, and by many others which I could cite, both ancient and modern, it is plain, that if the ſubject was to recover a rent, or annuity, or other charge, from the crown; whether it was a rent, or annuity, originally granted by the king; or iſſuing out of lands, which by ſubſequent title came to be in the king's hands; in all caſes the remedy to come at it was by petition to the perſon of the king: and no other method can be ſhewn to have been practiſed at common law.

Indeed I take it to be generally true, that in all caſes where the ſubject is in the nature of a plaintiff, to recover any thing from the king, his only remedy, at common law, is to ſue by petition to the perſon of the king. I ſay, where the ſubject comes as a plaintiff. For, as I ſaid before, when, upon a title found for the king by office, the ſubject comes in to traverſe the king's title, or to ſhew his own right, he comes in the nature of a defendant; and is admitted to interplead in the caſe with the king in defence of his title, which otherwiſe would be defeated by finding the office. And to ſhew that this was ſo, I would take notice of ſeveral inſtances.

That, in caſes of debts owing by the crown, the ſubject's remedy was by petition, appears by Ayneſham's caſe, Ryley 251. which is a petition for 19*l.* due for work done at Carnarvan caſtle.

So Ryley 251. the executors of John Eſtrateleng petition for 132*l.* due to their teſtator for wages. The anſwer is remarkable; for there is a latitude taken, which will very ill agree with the notion that is taken up in this caſe: Habeant bre' de liberate in canc' theſ. & camerar' de 32*l. in partem ſolutionis.*

So the caſe of Yerward le Galeys for 56*l.* Ryley 414.

In like manner, in the ſame book 253. 33 Ed. 1. ſeveral parties ſue by petition for money and goods taken for the king's uſe; and alſo for wages due to them; and for debts owing to them by the king. The anſwer is, Rex ordinavit per concilium theſaurarii & baronum de ſcaccario, quod ſatisfiet iis quam citius fieri poterit; ita quod contentos ſe tenebunt. And this is an anſwer given to a petition preſented to the king in parliament; and therefore we have reaſon to conclude it to be warranted by law. They muſt be content, and they ſhall be paid, quam citius fieri poterit.

The parties, in theſe caſes, firſt go to the king by petition: it is by him they are ſent to the Exchequer; and it is by a writ under the great ſeal, that the Exchequer is impowered to act. Nor can any ſuch writ be found, (unleſs in a very few inſtances, where it is mere matter of account,) in which the treaſurer is not joined with the barons.

So far was it from being taken to be law at that time, that the barons had any original power of paying the king's debts; or of commanding annuities, granted by the king or his progenitors, to be paid, when the perrſons applied to them for ſuch payment.

But perhaps it may be objected, that it is not to be inferred, becauſe petitions were brought in theſe caſes, that therefore it was of neceſſity that the ſubject ſhould purſue that courſe, and could take no other way. It might be reaſonable to require from thoſe who object thus, that they ſhould produce ſome precedents at leaſt, of another remedy taken.

But I think there is a good anſwer to be given to this objection. All theſe petitions which I have mentioned, are after the ſtat. 8 Ed. 1. Ryley 442. where notice is taken, that the buſineſs of parliament was interrupted by a multitude of petitions, which might be redreſſed by the chancellor, and juſtices. Wherefore it is thereby enacted, that petitions which touch the ſeal ſhould come firſt to the chancellor; thoſe which touch the Exchequer, to the Exchequer; and thoſe which touch the juſtices, or the law of the land, ſhould come to the juſtices: and if the buſineſs be ſo great, or ſi de grace, that the chancellor, or others, cannot do them without the king, then the petitions ſhall be brought before the king to know his pleaſure; ſo that no petitions come before the king and his council, but by the hands of the chancellor, and the other chief miniſters; that the king and his council may attend the great affairs of the king's realm, and his foreign dominions.

This law being made, there is reaſon to conclude that all petitions brought before the king in parliament after this time, and anſwered there, were brought according to the method of this law; and were of the nature of ſuch petitions as ought to be brought to the perſon of the king.

And that petitions did lie for a chattel, as well as for a freehold, does appear 37 Aſſ. pl. 11. Bro. Pet. 17. If tenant by ſtatute merchant be ouſted, he may have a petition, and ſhall be reſtored. Vide 9 H. 4. 4. Bro. Pet. 9.

9 H. 6. 21. Bro. Pet. 2. If the ſubject be ouſted of his term, he ſhall have his petition.

7 H. 7. 11. Of a chattel real, a man ſhall have his petition of right, as of his freehold.

34 H. 6. 51. Bro. Pet. 3. A man ſhall have a petition of right for goods and chattels; and the king indorſes it in the uſual form.

It is ſaid indeed, 1 H. 7. 3. Bro. Pet. 19. that a petition will not lie of a chattel.

And, admitting there was any doubt as to that point, in the preſent ſuits we are in the caſe of a freehold.

I will now enter into the conſideration of the two caſes, which have been principally inſiſted upon, as warranting the proceedings in the ſuits which are now depending. I mean the caſes of ſir H. Nevil and ſir T. Wroth: both of them reported by Plowden; and both adjudged in the reign of queen Elizabeth.

Indeed the pleadings in the caſes before us have been formed upon theſe precedents.

Plo. C. m. 377. Sir H. Nevil exhibits to the barons a writing of the late archbiſhop of Canterbury, dated the 15th of Nov. 22 H. 8. purporting to be a grant to him, and one ſir Edward Nevil, (lately attainted for treaſon), of the office of keeper of Aldington park, and of the rent of 3*l.* 10*d.* for the exerciſe of the office, to be received out of the manor of Aldington, habendum for their lives and the life of the ſurvivor; which grant was confirmed by the prior and covent; and prays it may be inrolled.

The barons receive the writing, and cauſe it to be read and inrolled. And thereupon ſir H. Nevil alledges, that he is three years in arrear, and that during that time the manor has been, and does remain in the king's hands; and prays that the writing may be allowed, and the arrears paid him, and the growing rent during his life.

The attorney-general demurs. And after eight or nine years depending, judgment is given, that the writing ſhould be allowed, and the arrears paid at the receipt of the Exchequer, and alſo the growing rent.

Then ſir Henry prays a writ to the treaſurer and chamberlains of the receipt to execute the judgment; which is granted.

It has been obſerved, that the queſtions made in this caſe were only,

1. If the office was forfeited by the attainder of ſir Edward?

2. Whether the annuity was not gone, tho' the office was not forfeited?

Not one word is ſaid touching the nature and manner of the proceedings throughout the whole debate of the caſe, tho' it laſted ſo many years.

'Tis true, Plowden adds a remark of his own, that thereby might be ſeen the order and form, how one, who has a rent out of lands in the king's hands, may come to it by petition to the court of Exchequer, without petition to the perſon of the king: and how he ſhall have the judgment executed: For it is not the order to command by word of mouth that the payment be made; but a writ in form aforeſaid ſhall be awarded by the barons: which is a judicial writ under the ſeal of the Exchequer, and is a ſufficient warrant to the treaſurer and chamberlains to pay the arrears, and growing rent.

This obſervation of Plowden's hath been variouſly interpreted in ſpeaking to theſe caſes, according as the perſons concluded differently.

It may be ſaid, his obſervation is an argument that he approved of the method, and looked upon it as law.

But it may be alſo inferred,

1. That it is an obſervation which he founded only on that caſe; for he ſays from this record you may ſee, good reader.

2. That it was new to him; otherwiſe he had not added ſuch a remark to his report.

3. That he looked on the other way by petition, as the known method in caſes of that nature.

4. That this was purely a reflection of his own. For he is ſo exact a reporter, that he ſets down particularly when the point is debated in court, and when he has it in private from one of the judges; as appears in the caſe of ſir Thomas Wroth, fol. 455. b.

5. He only ſays this writ is a ſufficient warrant to the treaſurer and chamberlains of the receipt to pay the money, not that it is compulſory to enforce the payment.

The other caſe of ſir Thomas Wroth was this.

Plowd. Com. 452. He exhibits to the barons letters patent, dated the 13th of October, 38 H. 8. whereby the king appointed him gentleman uſher of the privy chamber to prince Edward, and granted to him, for the exerciſe of the office, an annuity of 20 l. per annum during life, to be received by the hands of the treaſurer of the court of Augmentations, out of ſuch of the treaſure of the ſaid revenues as ſhould be in his hands. And whereas he had ſerved the prince from Lady-Day 36 H. 8. to that time, and had received no allowance, the king thereby grants for his attendance for the time paſt, as much money as the ſaid annuity of 20 l. per ann. from Lady-Day 36 H. 8. to that time amounted to, to be received as aforeſaid. And he prays the letters patent may be inrolled: and the ſame are received by the barons, and ordered to be read and inrolled.

Then he alledges that king H. 8. died the 28th of January 38 regni ſui; and that he exerciſed the office during the life of king Edward. And then ſets forth the clauſe in the act of 1 Mar. for the alteration, union, tranſpoſing, or determination of the court of Augmentations, &c. whereby it was provided, that that act ſhould not extend to extinguiſh or take away any annuity, which any perſon had title to, or ought to have, by letters patent, or other writing ſufficient, under the ſeal of the court of Augmentations, before the 7th of July then laſt: but that the ſame ſhould be paid out of the treaſure of the queen, in the court to which the court of Augmentations ſhould be annexed; or in any new court which ſhould be erected inſtead of the court of Augmentations; or, in default thereof, in any court where there ſhould be ſufficient of the queen's treaſure.

He ſays the annuity was ſo many years in arrear; and prays as in ſir H. Nevil's caſe.

And there is a demurrer; and judgment for allowing the letters patent, and for paying the arrears, and growing payments; and a writ to the treaſurer and chamberlains of the receipt accordingly.

There were five points debated, and determined in this caſe.

1. If there did not want an averment of the ſervice done to the prince, in order to entitle himſelf to the ſum granted for his attendance for the time paſt?

2 If the annuity was determinable by the nonfeazance of the ſervice to the prince?

3. If the ſervice might be done to the prince, when king?

4. If the annuity was payable during the life of ſir Thomas Wroth?

5. If this grant did bind the ſucceſſor, it not being granted by king H. 8. for him, his heirs and ſucceſſors? And this ſeems to be the great point of the caſe; the judgment being expreſſed to be given upon view of ſeveral judgments, where, without thoſe words, ſuch letters patent had been allowed.

Plowden ſets down the effect of the writ of execution; and the writ itſelf is to be ſeen at large, Co'ia Scac. Paſc. 4 Eliz. Rot. 52.

He ſays, afterwards payment was made of the arrears according to the effect of the writ. I obſerve, it is not ſaid by force of the writ.

The truth is, upon that writ nothing was paid, ſir Thomas Wroth dying not long after. But the 5th of November, 15 Eliz. Oſborn, Morris, Wroth and Clerk, his executors, produced the former writ in the court, and ſurmiſed that ſir Thomas Wroth was dead, having made his will, and them executors; and that ſir Thomas Wroth had not received any part of the arrears: and ſo prayed another writ, which was granted; and afterwards the arrears were paid.

The ſame obſervation lies upon this caſe as on the other, that in the whole debate, which laſted ſo long, nothing was ſaid as to the nature and manner of the ſuit. But by the points made in the caſe, and by the judgment itſelf, and by what Plowden tells us that Sanders chief baron added to the report, it is plain the only queſtion was upon the matter in law whether the annuity was determined or not.

All the judges, who argued before my lord chief juſtice Treby, ſeemed to lay the great ſtreſs of their arguments upon theſe caſes.

He applied himſelf to ſhew, that the proceedings in theſe two caſes are founded upon particular reaſons, and not upon the common law, or the courſe of the Exchequer. And for that cauſe it was, that they had never been cited in any law book as precedents, warranting any ſuch juriſdiction in the court of Exchequer, as was exerciſed in thoſe caſes.

He obſerved, that both theſe caſes were for annuities payable in the court of Augmentations. Sir Thomas Wroth's caſe being for an annuity granted under the ſeal of that court; and Nevil's annuity being alſo payable there. For all lands purchaſed, or to be purchaſed by king Henry the 8th, were by the ſtat. 27 H. 8. c. 27. put under the juriſdiction of that court; and the manor of Aldington was purchaſed afterwards by him, of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the 32d year of his reign; the deed of bargain and ſale being dated the 11th of Feb. in that year, and inrolled in the court of Augmentations: conſequently that manor was under the ſurvey of that court. And in the covenant againſt incumbrances, which was in that deed of bargain and ſale, there was an exception of this fee payable to ſir H. Nevil.

He obſerved further, that by the act made the firſt of queen Mary, cap. 10. and that queen's letters patent thereupon, this court was united to the court of Exchequer: and that by a clauſe in that act, all the annuities payable in the court of Augmentations were ſaved; and all ſuch unitings and annexations, &c. and all orders made by the queen touching the revenues of ſuch court, and expreſſed in ſuch letters patent, are enacted to be of the ſame force, as if declared by parliament.

That after the union, in theſe caſes the Exchequer acted according to the power given by that ſtatute, and the letters patent.

That the court of Augmentations proceeded in a ſummary way; and that many decrees of the ſame nature with theſe were to be found in the records of that court.

And he took notice, that it was remembered by a very learned judge, who argued the ſame way with him in the court of Exchequer, that my lord chief juſtice Hale had formerly declared, that theſe caſes of Nevil and Wroth did depend on particular reaſons; and were not to be urged ſo precedents of the juriſdiction of the Exchequer.

My lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench, in his argument, did very particularly apply himſelf to take off the force of this objection.

The firſt thing I obſerved him to urge, as an argument that theſe caſes were adjudged by the proper juriſdiction of the court of Exchequer, and not by any power derived to it by the union of the court of Augmentations, was drawn from Nevil's caſe; in the pleadings of which no mention is made of the court of Augmentations, or of any ſtatute relating to it.

He did admit, that the manor of Aldington, which was charged with the rent, was purchaſed by king Henry the 8*th*, and ſo under the ſurvey of the court of Augmentations; but that being made no part of the caſe, he ſaid that caſe was no otherwiſe to be regarded than as an ordinary proceeding in the court of Exchequer, by a grantee of a rent iſſuing out of lands which came afterwards to the crown.

I ſhall not here repeat what I have already ſhewn, that a grantee of a rent iſſuing out of lands, which come to the crown ſubſequent to his grant, could not proceed in this manner to recover it.

But I will obſerve as to this caſe of Nevil; Firſt, that it is not denied, but if the court of Augmentations had ſubſiſted, it had been under the ſurvey of that court, and the court of Exchequer could have had no juriſdiction over it; ſo that it came not into the governance of the Exchequer, till the diſſolution of that court.

2*dly*, That the court of Augmentations had a power of ordering payments of ſuch fees, or annuities, will appear plainly, I think, by what I ſhall ſhew preſently.

3*dly*, It appears that this fee, or annuity, had been paid not only during the reigns of Henry the 8*th*, and Edward the 6*th*, when the court of Augmentations ſubſiſted; but alſo during the whole reign of queen Mary, which was for ſeveral years after the diſſolution of that court. The arrears ſued for being only for three years, from Michaelmas, 5 & 6 Philip & Mary, (which was the Michaelmas before the death of queen Mary, who died the 17th of November 1559,) to Michaelmas the third of queen Elizabeth.

So that this grant had been allowed before in the court of Exchequer, and payments had been made upon it there for ſeveral years: and therefore there was no occaſion to take any notice of the court of Augmentations on the one ſide; or, of the other ſide, to object that it was not ſet out. But the matter of law only came under the conſideration of the court, whether, by the attainder of one of the grantees, the annuity and the office were determined. Which objection to the payment of the annuity, as it is probable, had been but lately obſerved, although ſir Ed. Nevil had been attainted 30 H. 8. for a fact alledged to be committed the 12th of July, 29 H. 8.

But my lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench did principally inſiſt upon two other points, in anſwer to what was ſaid by my lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas as to this matter.

1. That the court of Augmentations was never united to the court of Exchequer.

2. That the court of Augmentations had no ſuch ſpecial power given to it, either by act of parliament, or letters patent, for relief of grantees of rents; and conſequently, though there had been an union of that court to the court of Exchequer, yet the court of Exchequer could not derive any power of acting in ſuch a manner from that union.

To prove the firſt of theſe poſitions, Dyer 216. a. and Coke's 4th Inſt. 122. were cited. Where it is ſaid to be reſolved by all the judges, 4 Eliz. that the union was but in ſhew, and was really void. For queen Mary, by her letters patent of the 23d of January in the firſt year of her reign, having diſſolved the court of Augmentations, and by other letters patent, dated the next day, uniting the ſame to the court of Exchequer, the ſecond letters patent came too late, and were utterly void. And therefore it was argued, there could be no acceſſion of power to the court of Exchequer, by a union that was abſolutely void: but by the diſſolution of the court of Augmentations, the revenues of that court fell naturally under the government of the Exchequer; and ſir T. Wroth, and ſir H. Nevil came to the court of Exchequer, as to an original court of Revenue.

But notwithſtanding theſe books, and the weight ſuch a reſolution may ſeem to have, I think I ſhall be able to make it out clearly, that the authority, given by the act of parliament primo Mariæ, was well executed by her two ſeveral letters patent of the 23d and 24th of January; and that the court of Augmentations was thereby effectually united to the Exchequer.

For, firſt, The act of parliament did empower the queen to alter, change, unite, tranſpoſe, diſſolve, or determine the court of Augmentations and revenues of the king's crown, and the other courts therein mentioned; and to reduce the ſame, or any of them, into one, two, or more courts; or unite, or annex the ſaid courts, or any two, or more of them together; or to any other of her courts of Record; or to erect out of the ſame any other new court.

Secondly, The queen did intend to execute her power, by uniting that court to the Exchequer. That appears moſt plainly by both the letters patent, which recite the act, and declare that the queen did intend to put the act in execution. And the letters patent of the 24th do recite, that it was with that intent, viz. of putting the act in execution, that ſhe had, by letters patent of the day before, diſſolved the ſaid court: and ſhe did thereby unite, tranſpoſe and annex the ſaid court diſſolved to the court of Exchequer; and did thereby appoint all the lands and hereditaments, which at the time of the diſſolution of the ſaid court, were in the order or ſurvey thereof to be in the order or ſurvey of the court of Exchequer, according to the articles and ordinances in the ſchedule annexed to thoſe letters patent.

Thirdly, Every thing ought to be expounded favourably, that the queen's intention might take effect; eſpecially, when ſhe acts in purſuance of an act of parliament, and for the more ſpeedy and ſure anſwering of her revenue, as the intent of the act is declared to be.

Fourthly, The letters patent, though bearing ſeveral dates, may, and ought to be expounded as one and the ſame act, as in many other caſes; eſpecially when done in execution of an act of parliament.

Fifthly, As to the quaſi abſurdum & impoſſibile, in Dyer; we are not now diſcourſing upon a ſubject of philoſophy, nor ſpeaking of the natural exiſtence of things. There indeed, it would be abſurd to ſay, that what was diſſolved and annihilated one day, ſhould yet have ſuch an exiſtence as to be united to any thing the day following: but we are ſpeaking upon a legal ſubject, touching the conſtruction of a law, where fictions, and relations, and concluſions have place.

That which one act of parliament ſays ſhall be diſſolved to-day, another act may ſay ſhall be to all intents revived and united to-morrow; and all men are concluded to ſay, that the union is not real to all intents of law. And as this may be done by ſeveral acts, ſo the ſame act may ſay, that a court ſhall be diſſolved, and that the ſaid court ſo diſſolved, ſhall be united; or, in other words, may ſay that the queen by her letters patent may diſſolve a court to-day, and by letters patent of the next day may unite the ſame court to another: and when that is done, notwithſtanding the ſeeming abſurdity, it will be as really united to all intents as if it had never been diſſolved. Now that in effect is ſaid here. The act ſays, the queen may alter, change, diſſolve or determine the court; and may reduce the courts to one or more, or unite and annex the ſame to any other court. Here the queen literally purſued both parts: ſhe did diſſolve it; and ſhe united and annexed it.

The act further ſays, ſuch alterations, diſſolvings, and annexings, declared and ſet forth in ſuch letters patent ſhall be of the ſame force to all intents, as though the ſame were ſet forth and declared by authority of parliament: and if this had been done by act of parliament, nobody could have ſaid but that it had been well united.

Sixthly, All the parts and buſineſs of the court of Augmentations were actually diſtributed and ſettled in the reſpective offices of the Exchequer, according to the order of the ſchedule annexed to the letters patent of union, and have been continued to this day under theſe orders. And would it not be ſtrange, that the letters patent of the 24th ſhould be taken to be wholly void, but the ſchedule annexed to them ſhould be good and effectual, and take place, and be put in execution to all purpoſes?

Seventhly, It is expreſly and fully declared by act of parliament, that the court of Augmentations was united to the court of Exchequer. I mean the ſtat. 1 Eliz. cap. 4. § 15. for reſtitution of the firſt-fruits to the crown.

That ſtat. takes notice that queen Mary, by the act primo Mariæ, cap. 10. was empowered to alter or determine the courts of Firſt-fruits, Augmentations, and other courts therein expreſſed, or to unite the ſaid courts or any of them together, or to any other courts of Record, as ſhou'd be thought moſt convenient for the anſwering of her revenues: by authority of which act the late queen by four letters patent, whereof two bear date the 23*d of* January, in the firſt year of her reign, and the other two the 24*th day of the ſame* January, did not only diſſolve, determine, and extinguiſh the ſaid court, commonly called, the court of Augmentations and revenues of the crown, and the courts of Firſt-fruits and Tenths, and the juriſdiction and authority thereof; but alſo did unite, tranſpoſe and annex the ſaid courts ſo diſſolved, to the ſaid court of Exchequer, there to be and continue as a member and parcel of the ſaid court; and did appoint the revenues then anſwerable in the ſaid courts, to the order, rule, ſurvey, and governance of the court of Exchequer, there to be anſwered and accounted for ever, in ſuch order and form, as in the ſaid letters patent, and two ſchedules thereto annexed, is mentioned and declared.

Had the act reſted there, unqueſtionably it had done enough to make good what I hold: but the act goes on further and ſays; by reaſon of which premiſes, the ſaid perpetual revenues of Firſt-fruits and Tenths, (which was the ſubject matter of that act,) and the revenues relating thereto, were ordered and accounted for in the court of Exehequer.

Then the act proceeds to recite the act 2 & 3 Phil. & Mary, for taking away the Firſt-fruits and Tenths from the crown, and repeals that act: and enacts, that the ſame ſhall be revived and united to the crown in the ſame eſtate, degree and condition, and in as ample manner as the ſame were in queen Mary before the act of repeal: and that the ſaid revenue ſhould be in the order, ſurvey, rule, and governance of the ſaid court of Exchequer, in every degree, ſort, and condition, as they were, at and before the ſaid 8*th day of* Auguſt, in the 2 & 3 of Phil. & Mary; from which day that act took effect.

Now whether we are to depend upon the authority of an act of parliament, which does expreſly declare, that by the force of the act primo Mariæ, and by virtue of the letters patent of the 23d and 24th days of January in the ſame year, the court of Augmentations was united, tranſpoſed and annexed to the court of Exchequer; or whether we are to believe the judges in Dyer, who ſay that it was not united, does ſeem no difficult queſtion to decide.

Theſe two things muſt be obſerved.

1*ſt*, That by this act the Firſt-fruits and Tenths are put under the ſurvey and governance of the Exchequer, only as they were at the time of the act 2 & 3 Phil. & Mary; and by the ſame act it is declared, in what manner they were then annexed, and put under that governance; that is, according to the letters patent primo Mariæ: ſo that they are annexed to the court of Exchequer, in the form, and by virtue of thoſe letters patent, or not at all. And the annexation of the court of Augmentations being exactly in the ſame manner as that of the Firſt-fruits, if the one was good, the other muſt be ſo.

2dly, That if there was not ſuch an union, it may be queſtionable, if the Exchequer at this day has any juriſdiction as to the revenues which were under the ſurvey of the court of Augmentations; there being a clauſe in the act 27 H. 8. cap. 27. that, all proceſs out of the Exchequer, to or againſt any perſons, for any rents, iſſues or profits, relating to any the lands, which by that act were limited, to be under the ſurvey of the court of Augmentations, ſhould be clearly void, and of none effect.

If any thing more was neceſſary to be added after ſuch an authority, it is plain, that it was the received opinion of the whole kingdom, and of the court of Exchequer itſelf, that the court of Augmentations was united to that court. This will abundantly appear by the caſe of the executors of ſir Walter Mildmay, chancellor of the Exchequer, reported in the earl of Devon's caſe, 11 Co. 91. which caſe ariſes upon a warrant of the lord treaſurer, and under-treaſurer, for allowing to ſir Walter Mildmay 140*l.* yearly, in conſideration of the increaſe of his buſineſs, by reaſon of the annexation of the court of Augmentations and Firſt-fruits to the court of Exchequer.

I will yet add one more authority to prove this; and it is in the office of the king's remembrancer, Mich. 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. Rot. 175. and was the caſe of a lord chief juſtice of the King's-Bench.

There it is found in the accounts of the late treaſurer of the court of Augmentations, that there had been granted to ſir Thomas Bromley, chief juſtice of the king and queen's bench, an annual fee of 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* quarterly, out of the treaſure in the hands of the treaſurer of that court, for divers cauſes therein mentioned; which fee had been paid to Michaelmas primo Mariæ. And thereupon ſir Thomas Bromley comes in propria perſona ſua, & pro eo quod dicta domina regina nunc annexavit & univit dictam nuper curiam Augmentationum & revencionum corone regie huic curie ſcaccarii ſui, (prout in memorandis hujus ſcaccarii de anno primo regni ſui, viz. inter record' de termino ſci' hill' rotl' &c. ex parte hujus remem', plenius liquet de recordo,) petit quod ipſe tam de dicto annuali feodo 6l. 13s. 4d. &c. durante vita ſua, quam de 10l. ſibi de arrearagiis ejuſdem feodi a feſto annunciacon' B. Mariæ virginis anno 7. Ed. 6. debit' & ad hoc minime ſolut', ad recept' hujus ſcaccarii de theſauro dominorum regis & reginæ ibidem de tempore in tempus remanere contingen' ſatisfiat. Super quo, pro eo quod ſcrutatis rotulis & mem' dict' cur' Augm' &c. in hoc ſcaccario modo remanen', it did appear that the ſaid fee was granted, and that it had been anſwered and paid at the court of Augmentations, and that he was not ſatisfied his arrears, as he had alledged in his petition: conſiderat' eſt per barones quod eidem Thome Bromley de dicto feodo de 6l. 13s. 4d. per annum ad dictos quatuor anni terminos durante vita ſua una cum arrearagiis præd' ſibi debit' ad recept' hujus ſcaccarii de theſauro, &c. ibidem de tempore in tempus remanere contingen' ſatisfiat, &c.

Here is a judgment founded upon this very point of the union and annexation of theſe courts.

I have mentioned this caſe, becauſe it ſeems to me a very full authority; at leaſt the lord chief juſtice Bromley thought ſo. But the ſame thing does appear by the whole tenor of the proceedings of the court of Exchequer, in relation to caſes which were before of the juriſdiction of the court of Augmentations; wherein, the ſummary way, practiſed in that court, was taken up, and a great variation made from the antient manner of proceedings in the Exchequer; which amounts to a plain proof of this matter, that the court of Augmentations was really united to the court of Exchequer.

I proceed now to the ſecond thing inſiſted on by my lord chief juſtice. That, admitting it to be true that the court of Augmentations was united to the court of Exchequer, and ſo the powers of that court transferred to the Exchequer, yet it would have no conſequence to make good the point for which it was urged; viz. that in theſe two caſes of Nevil and Wroth, the court of Exchequer acted as the court of Augmentations, and by a power ſuppoſed to be veſted in the Exchequer by that union: becauſe the court of Augmentations itſelf had no eſpecial powers given to it, either by act of parliament, or by letters patent, to determine of, and give relief to grantees of annuities and rents, in the manner it is done in Nevil's and Wroth's caſes; but that all which was done in the erecting of that court was to make it a court of Record, and a court of Revenue to ſuch and ſuch lands: the conſequence of which was, that it had all the powers incident to a court of Revenue, and as ſuch could give relief in theſe caſes; becauſe in the like caſes the court of Exchequer could, and always had given relief.

And to make this out, ſeveral caſes of the like nature, decreed in the court of Augmentations, wherein relief had been given to grantees of fees and annuities, (which were found in a book of that office,) were cited as ſo many authorities for this opinion. And that, in like manner, relief was given in the court of Wards, and in the court of Surveyors, to grantees who came thither for their annuities; which were new erected courts of Revenue, and therefore, if thoſe ſeveral new erected courts acted in that matter without a ſpecial authority, it was argued, that it might be concluded to be by a right incident to them as courts of Revenue, and in imitation of what the court of Exchequer, which was the old court of Revenue, could do before by the common law.

This is an ingenious turn of an argument, which was drawn by my lord chief juſtice Treby to a contrary purpoſe, from the practice of thoſe new erected courts, if it will hold; but I think it will not.

For if it cannot be ſhewn that antiently, or at any time before the union of the courts of Augmentations and Firſt-fruits to the court of Exchequer, the barons of the Exchequer did give relief to perſons who had grants of annuities out of the Revenue, or out of lands in the hands of the king, upon application made to them immediately, in the manner we are now ſpeaking; unleſs, in caſes where the party applied to the king by petition, and the treaſurer and barons were authoriſed by the great or privy ſeal, or by ſpecial indorſement upon the petition: and on the other ſide, if it muſt be confeſſed, that as ſoon as ever theſe new courts were erected, they did conſtantly exerciſe this power: and if it alſo cannot be denied, but that as ſoon as the courts of Augmentations and Firſt-fruits were united to the court of Exchequer, and not before, the court of Exchequer began to proceed in the ſame manner as thoſe courts did, as to caſes which were before under the ſurvey of thoſe courts: the proper inference muſt be, not that thoſe courts, in the exerciſing theſe powers, did purſue the courſe of the Exchequer; but on the contrary, that the court of Exchequer, in taking up a new courſe after the union, did act according to the manner of the courts of Augmentations and Firſt-fruits.

To examine this matter a little further, three things are properly to be conſider'd.

1ſt, If the barons, as ſuch, did at any time exerciſe this power of giving judgment for the grantees of rents iſſuing out of lands in the king's hands, or of annuities granted out of the revenues of the crown, to be paid by the treaſurer and chamberlains at the receipt of the Exchequer, upon application to them.

I ſpeak of what the barons have done in the court of Pleas; for in the Exchequer Chamber, upon matters of equity, and other grounds upon which the chancellor and barons are impowered to proceed, ſome relief may be given in caſes of annuities, and rents.

2dly, If a power was veſted in the court of Augmentations, to give relief in ſuch caſes.

3dly, If by the union that power was ſufficiently transferred to the court of Exchequer.

As to the firſt of theſe points, I have ſpoken in great meaſure already, by ſhewing, 1ſt, The method taken heretofore by ſuitors, who applied by petition to the perſon of the king.

2dly, By the authorities I cited to ſhew, that in ſuch caſes the party had no relief but by petition.

3dly, By ſhewing that amongſt the records of the Exchequer, upon all the ſearch I could make, I have not found any thing of this kind before the time of the union.

I have been more particular in my ſearch during the reigns of H. 8. and Edw. 6. And in the king's remembrancer's office I find, during thoſe reigns, and ſo afterwards during the reigns of queen Mary and queen Elizabeth, writs of liberate to the treaſurer, and alſo to inferiour officers, and writs de allocatione facienda to the treaſurer and barons, paſſing the great ſeal in the ſame manner as anciently, for annuities made payable at the receipt of the Exchequer, without any alteration from the old courſe; and likewiſe writs of privy ſeal for making allowances upon accounts in the ſame manner as formerly: ſo that, as to matters properly of the juriſdiction of the court of Exchequer, the proceedings are the ſame.

I ſhall proceed therefore to the ſecond point, to ſhew that by act of parliament, and letters patent, the court of Augmentations and revenues of the crown was fully inveſted with this power to give relief in ſuch caſes as thoſe of Wroth and Nevil.

In order to this I will premiſe, that Henry the eighth, affecting power as much as any of our kings, and having great deſigns, did early in his reign endeavour to get ſome parts of the revenue of his crown more immediately under his private and perſonal direction, than the old regular conſtitution of the Exchequer would allow of.

To that end, in his fourteenth year, he procured an act of parliament, for putting divers lands under the ſurvey of perſons, commiſſioned by him, and ſtiled his general ſurveyors.

In his twenty-ſixth year, when the Firſt-fruits and Tenths were given him in parliament, he prevailed to have them anſwered in a new method, and not in the Exchequer.

The compoſitions for the Firſt-fruits might be made with the lord chancellor; and the money, or ſecurities were, in that caſe, to remain in the hanaper: or the compoſitions might be made with commiſſioners under the great ſeal; and then the ſecurities taken, and the monies paid, were to be paid and remain with the treaſurer of the king's chamber.

The value of eccleſiaſtical revenues were to be enquired of by commiſſions under the great ſeal, and a certificate was to be returned thereof, and on ſuch certificate the tenths were to be aſſeſſed by the treaſurer, chancellor, chamberlains, and barons of the Exchequer; but the money was to be paid to the treaſurer of the chamber, or as the king ſhould appoint, and his acquittances were made full diſcharges.

The treaſurer of the chamber is accountable only to the king, and not in the Exchequer. 4 Inſt. 113.

This act, and the act in the next year for diſſolving the leſſer monaſteries, having made a great change; and the king finding himſelf obliged to reward thoſe who aſſiſted his deſigns, as well as to provide for the ſubſiſtence of the abbots, priors and monks, who were turned out of their houſes; and that theſe matters would be very troubleſome, if the old common law method was to be purſued; did procure by the act 27 H. 8. cap. 27. the court of Augmentations to be erected, and made a court of Record. And there were appointed for it two ſeals, and a chancellor to have the keeping of them, who is the chief officer; and a treaſurer, attorney, and ſolicitor, and ten auditors, and ſeventeen receivers.

The duties of theſe officers are deſcribed in the oaths appointed for them.

And it is plain by the whole frame of the act, that nothing was farther from the intention of the law-makers, than to form this court upon the model of the Exchequer; on the contrary, it is made a court of Equity.

The oath of the chancellor is, in effect, the ſame with that of the chancellor of England. The oath of the treaſurer is, in effect, the ſame with that of the treaſurer of England. And the attorney and ſolicitor are ſworn to be ready, at the calling of the chancellor, to hear and determine cauſes depending before the chancellor.

The clerk is made regiſter for all decrees and orders made by the chancellor and council.

The chancellor is impowered to take recognizances, which are to have the effect of recognizances taken in Chancery; and ſuch proceſs as in Chancery is to go upon them.

And upon iſſues joined in the court, the record is to be delivered by the hands of the chancellor to the juſtices of the King's Bench, as upon iſſues joined in Chancery.

The proceſs of the court is to be after the manner of the court of the duchy of Lancaſter: and the fees of the officers, &c. are to be ſuch as in the duchy court. And all proceſs out of the Exchequer, as to any lands put under the juriſdiction of this court, is enacted to be void.

I think then, as to the firſt matter upon this act, nothing can be more clear, than that it was not intended, that this court ſhould be another ſuch court of revenue as the Exchequer was.

For, 1*ſt*, the very inſtitution of it had been uſeleſs and abſurd; for the Exchequer could have done the buſineſs as well.

2*dly*, It is in part conformed to the court of Chancery, but principally to the court of the Duchy; both which are courts of Equity.

3*dly*, It was plainly intended to be a court of Equity in its inſtitution, and to proceed by way of decrees, and act according to diſcretion: and therefore not to be like the court of Exchequer, which is a court of Law: I mean the court of Pleas, held before the barons; for the court of Equity in the Exchequer is quite of another conſideration, and the preſent caſes have no relation to it.

This ſtatute, for erecting the court of Augmentations, proceeds to appoint the treaſurer to account before the chancellor, and two of the auditors.

The treaſurer is to be allowed all ſuch ſums as he ſhall pay to patentees of any offices, fees, or annuities to be granted under the ſeal of that court: or to any other perſons, by virtue of the king's warrant, or by bill ſigned: or as he ſhall be commanded to pay by any bill ſigned with the hands of the chancellor, attorney and ſolicitor, or any two of them, upon ſuch conſideration as ſhall be thought convenient by their diſcretions.

See then how far this court is empowered to give relief to grantees of fees and annuities.

1*ſt*, The treaſurer is put under the direction of the chancellor, attorney and ſolicitor, or any two of them; and to account before the chancellor.

2*dly*, He is to be allowed ſuch ſums as he ſhall pay to patentees for offices, fees and annuities granted under the ſeal of the court; which is directly the caſe of ſir Tho. Wroth.

3*dly*, He is to pay ſuch ſums as he ſhall be commanded to pay by any bill ſigned and ſubſcribed with the hands of the chancellor, attorney and ſolicitor, or any two of them, upon ſuch conſideration as ſhall be thought convenient by their diſcretions.

By the act 37 H. 8. cap. 4. and 1 Ed. 6. cap. 14. the Chantry lands are put under the ſurvey of the court of Augmentations, or ſuch other court as the king pleaſed.

My lord chief juſtice Treby did obſerve, that the decrees themſelves of this court were ſigned on the record by the chancellor, attorney and ſolicitor, or two of them; which not being practiſed in any other court, might be very well taken up in purſuance of this clauſe, that ſo they might, within the letter of the act, be warrants to the treaſurer for payment.

I have a full authority, which will give ſtrength to this obſervation of his, that thoſe decrees were looked upon as bills ſigned within the meaning of the act; which I find, amongſt the decrees of the court of Augmentations, 4 Ed. 6. made in the behalf of the poor of St. John's, Walbrooke, upon a petition of the parſon and church-wardens, reciting a petition to the chancellor of the court of Augmentations in the ſame year, and an order thereupon, for the payment of ſome money which the king had given and appointed for the relief of poor people: and it is decreed thereupon, that the parſon and church-wardens ſhall have the ſum demanded, to be paid by the hands of the treaſurer of this court; and this bill ſigned by the hand of the chancellor, &c. ſhall be to the treaſurer of the ſaid court a ſufficient warrant.

Now without going further, I think we may reaſonably conclude ſir H. Nevil's caſe to have come within this clauſe. For the manor of Aldington came into the king's hands, 31 H. 8: and ſir H. Nevil's annuity having been anſwered till Michaelmas before the death of queen Mary, there is little doubt to be made, but that he had a decree in the court of Augmentations for it; which was the warrant for payment thereof, and which continued ſo before and after the union of that court to the Exchequer, till the objection upon the attainder of ſir Ed. Nevil was made, and taken off.

As a farther confirmation of what I ſaid, relating to the deſign which king Henry the eighth had, of making himſelf more abſolute maſter of his revenue, by excluding it from the regular juriſdiction of the Exchequer; in the thirty-ſecond year of his reign, c. 45. the court of Firſt-fruits and Tenths is erected, according to the model and ſcheme of the court of Augmentations: and in the ſame year the court of Wards is ſet up; being formed much after the ſame manner, and the whole revenue to be anſwered to the treaſurer of the chamber.

In the thirty third year of H. 8. cap. 39. an act, taking notice of the former act, made in the fourteenth year of his reign, about general ſurveyors, forms another court of General Surveyors of the King's Lands, much after the manner of the court of Augmentations, only with ſome larger powers.

The ſame act does alſo enlarge the power of the court of Augmentations, by enacting, that all payments made by the treaſurer of the ſaid court by decree or commandment of the chancellor, by aſſent of the council, for buying lands, or for recompence or ſatisfaction of debts and expences, not exceeding 200 l. to one perſon, ſhall be good againſt the king. And if perſons pretend title to lands ſold, or exchanged by the king, upon which a rent is reſerved payable in the court of Augmentations; or demand any rent out of ſuch lands: or if the king ſhall claim right to lands by him ſold, or exchanged, upon which a rent is reſerved payable in the court of Augmentations; or to any charge upon lands appointed to the court of Augmentations: the chancellor and council of the court of Augmentations ſhall have power to examine ſuch demands, and by their diſcretions to hear and determine the ſame; and to decree recompences, &c. out of the king's treaſure, where equity ſhall appear, in the caſes mentioned in that ſtatute.

Afterwards, by letters patent, in 38 H. 8. reciting the erection of the ſeveral courts of Augmentations and General Survey, and that the rules for governing of them were not ſufficiently certain, the king does thereby determine and diſſolve thoſe courts; and erects a new court, to be called the court of Augmentations and Revenues of the King's Crown: and directs that all revenues under the ſurvey of the former courts, ſhould be put under the government of this new court: and appoints the officers, and their buſineſs; and in particular, the chancellor, and general ſurveyors to take the accounts of the treaſurer, and other officers; and to make allowances for all payments of annuities, fees, &c. and to give diſcharges: and that the treaſurer ſhall pay all monies, fees, or annuities, directed by the king's letters patent; or mentioned in any warrant directed by the king; or in any warrant, or decree, or order to be made by the court, or heretofore made in the court of Augmentations, or General Survey; or granted by any letters patent ſealed with the ſeal of either of the ſaid former courts. But penſions to religious perſons, or fees, or annuities chargeable upon monaſteries, were to be paid by the receivers of the counties.

And theſe letters patent are confirmed by act of parliament. 7 Ed. 6. cap. 2.

I have been ſomewhat long in ſhewing the powers veſted in the court of Revenues and Augmentations of the Crown, by the ſeveral acts of parliament, and letters patent: but I thought it material to ſhew, that a power was clearly veſted in the chancellor and council of that court, (and that to be exerciſed in a ſummary way, according to their diſcretions,) to relieve perſons who came before them for fees and annuities; and to require the treaſurer of that court to make payment, and to diſcharge the treaſurer by their bill ſigned. Which was the thing to be proved.

I will not ſpend time to ſhew that they did conſtantly exerciſe this power, during the continuance of that court.

I have peruſed a vellum book of decrees of the court of Augmentations, in the time of H 8. which contains the firſt proceedings after the erection of the court; and alſo a book of decrees of that court, during the firſt four years of Ed. 6. which was cited by my lord chief juſtice; and alſo many decrees in the ſame reign entered upon parchment rolls, all remaining in the court of Augmentations: by which it does appear, that court acted merely as a court of Equity.

The bills, (of which there is one entered at large, with the proceedings upon it, and the minutes of the decree, and, after that, the decree itſelf drawn up,) are in Engliſh, in the form of a petition, and the caſe comes to hearing in a ſummary way, and the decree is made; and if it be for payment of money, it is decreed to be paid by the treaſurer of the court, and this decree is always mentioned to be his ſufficient warrant and diſcharge; and the decree is ſigned by the chancellor, and a quorum of the council.

Theſe proceedings ſure are not in imitation of the court of Exchequer before the barons.

Amongſt theſe proceedings there are hundreds of decrees for annuities, penſions, rents, fees, &c. So that this court was in full poſſeſſion of this authority at the time of the uniting it to the court of Exchequer.

Thirdly, The only thing which remains, is to ſhew that, by the union, this power was ſufficiently transferred to the Exchequer.

The ſame power, which the act 1 Mariæ, cap. 10. did give to queen Mary, for diſſolving the court of Augmentations, and uniting it to any other court, was by the act 7 Ed. 6. cap. 2. given to him, in almoſt the ſame words; except only that there is a new proviſo, for the further ſaving of annuities payable out of the court of Augmentations, added in the ſtatute of queen Mary.

I ſuppoſe it will be granted, that the words of that ſtatute are ſufficient to ſave the fees and annuities, payable in the court of Augmentations, from being loſt by the diſſolving, or annexing of that court.

Then the letters patent of queen Mary, which do unite, tranſpoſe, and annex that court to the Exchequer, there to be and continue as a member, and parcel of that court, do ſeem ſufficient to carry over the buſineſs and power of that court to the court of Exchequer, under ſuch orders and form as is expreſſed in the ſchedule annexed thereto.

By the 15th article of that ſchedule, ſheriffs and other accountants are to pay all annuities, fees, penſions and corodies, according to grants allowed and inrolled; unleſs they ſhall have ſpecial commandment to the contrary by the court. And as for payments of that kind to be made at the receipt, beſides that the act itſelf gave an authority, there was a general dormant privy ſeal lodged with the treaſurer and chamberlains.

And as the powers of the court of Augmentations were ſufficiently veſted in the court of Exchequer, by the act of parliament and the letters patent; ſo were the ſame, from the time of the union, exerciſed accordingly.

On the twenty-ſixth of January, 1 Mariæ, the lord chancellor, in open court, delivers the letters patent for diſſolving and uniting the court of Augmentations; which were received by the lord treaſurer, chancellor, and under treaſurer, and barons, and were inrolled 1 Mariæ Rot. 80. in the office of the king's remembrancer.

And the next Eaſter term the grantees of rents come in great numbers, and exhibit their letters patent under the ſeal of the court of Augmentations, and pray that a ſearch may be made for the decrees of that court, whereby they are intitled; and it is done: and thereupon, without more formality, the barons order that the arrears, and growing payments of the annuities ſhould be paid at the receipt of the Exchequer. The entry is Quod ſatisfiat.

Paſch. 1 Mar. Rot. 92. Pope's caſe, and very many others. Trin. 1 Mar. Rot. 27.

And all the proceedings are ſummary; ſometimes upon the oath of the party, that he was not paid in the ſame manner as in the court of Augmentations. For this, ſee Glaſcie's caſe, 1 Mar. Rot. 29; Pantwentworth's caſe, 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. Rot. 158; Mich. 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. Rot. 175. Sir Thomas Bromley's caſe; Rot. 210. Thompſon's caſe.

And very great numbers of theſe caſes are entered in the rolls of the king's remembrancer's office in the time of queen Elizabeth: Paſch. 2 Eliz. Rot. 145. Baſhe's caſe; Mich. 2 Eliz. Rot. 196. Badcock's caſe;

Hill. 3 Eliz. Rot. 148. and downwards for ſome time; tho' by degrees the number did leſſen, as the grantees died.

I ſhall ſpend no more time in ſhewing, that theſe decrees, or orders of the barons, of which ſo many are to be found after the union of court of Augmentations, were founded upon the power transferred by the union to the court of Exchequer.

I will only add, that as the caſe ſtood upon the act 1 Mariæ, admitting the court of Augmentations had been utterly diſſolved, and the revenues, which were under the ſurvey of that court, had fallen under the government of the Exchequer as the original court of Revenue; yet, nevertheleſs, the barons were ſufficiently authorized to order the payment of annuities, which were payable in the court of Augmentations, by the clauſe in the ſtatute 1 Mariæ, which ſays, that ſuch fees and annuities ſhall not be extinct, but in default of ſuch annexation, &c. ſhall be paid out of the queen's treaſure, in any of the queen's courts where ſufficient revenue ſhall be to anſwer the ſame, by the hands of the officers of the ſame court, in ſuch manner as the ſame might have been done, or been paid, in any other court or place, if this act had not been made.

The conſequence of which would have been, that as the annuities were payable before by the treaſurer of the court of Augmentations, by the order of that court; ſo, by the ſpecial authority given by this act, the court of Exchequer might direct the ſame to be paid by the treaſurer of the Exchequer; and ſuch direction, in thoſe particular caſes, would be a good warrant in point of law. And yet, no argument would be deducible from thence to maintain the judgments now before us, which relate to grants which never were under the ſurvey of the court of Augmentations.

But beſides what might be inferred from this ſtatute, the treaſurer and chamberlains of the Exchequer had a full and ample authority, under the privy ſeal, for payment of the annuity to ſir Thomas Wroth. The privy ſeal bore date the 19th of March, 2 Eliz. and indeed, it is the ſame privy ſeal, which is mentioned in the report of ſir Walter Mildmay's caſe, cited in the earl of Devonſhire's caſe. 11 Co. 91. a.

I have not been able to recover a copy of that privy ſeal; and the entries of the Pell of that year are loſt, or burnt, as moſt of them are. But it is recited in a privy ſeal, bearing date the 27th of April 1 Jac. 1. to contain, among many other things, a general authority to the treaſurer, chamberlains, and under-treaſurer for the time being, to make payment of all annuities, fees, wages, diets and rewards, and the arrearages of the ſame, as ſhould be due to any perſons whatſoever by any aſſignment, act of parliament, letters patent, or otherwiſe howſoever: and, by the ſame privy ſeal, king James does command payments to be made according to the tenor and effect of the ſaid privy ſeal of the 19th of March, 2 Eliz.

So that tho' the original privy ſeal is not to be found, yet it is ſufficiently recited in this privy ſeal of king James; and mention is made of it in the entries of the Pell in many hundred places. And the privy ſeal of the 10th of June, 1 Jac. 1. does again take notice of the ſame; and does give the like large and general power for payment of annuities, fees, &c.

And therefore, it was not at all ſtrange that the arrears of ſir Thomas Wroth's annuity were paid, when the writ of the Exchequer had certified the treaſurer and chamberlains that it had a continuance, and what was the ſum to which the arrears did amount: but it was paid by force of the privy ſeal.

It might be paid, as Plowden expreſſes it, according to the effect of the writ, but not by the authority of it.

And upon the ſame reaſon it is, that the objection drawn from the liberate, which goes from the barons to the treaſurer and chamberlains every term, pro neceſſariis ſcaccarii, (as if that inferred any authority in the barons to direct the iſſuing of money out of the receipt,) does fall to the ground. My lord chief juſtice Treby did obſerve, that in the payments made of thoſe ſums, pro neceſſariis ſcaccarii, never any notice was taken of the liberate, but the warrant was formed upon the privy ſeal, authorizing ſuch payments.

And in the entries, which are in the Pells, of this payment, all along queen Elizabeth's reign, (I mean from the fourteenth year downwards, for the other books are loſt,) the conſtant entry is, To Mr. William Billerſby, uſher of the Exchequer, upon the general privy ſeal, the 2d of March, 2 Eliz. and by liberate directed to the treaſurer and chamberlains, for the charges of the court of Exchequer, for ſuch a term.

Indeed in one place I find there is an omiſſion of mentioning the privy ſeal, but that is but the negligence of the clerk: and I find ſuch omiſſions too often made in thoſe entries, in other caſes; tho' it be plain, there was an authority under the great or privy ſeal, by other entries of like payments in the ſame books.

So that this liberate amounts to no more than a certificate of what the ſum is: the warrant for payment is the privy ſeal. Tho', perhaps, in Dial. de Scac. Lib. 1. c. 3. that particular caſe, the treaſurer and chamberlains have a greater latitude, than in any other: for Gervaſe of Tilbury reckons up thoſe payments, de minutis neceſſariis ſcaccarii, as payments they might make, ſine brevi regis.

I have been too long already; but I will add one conſideration more, which does ariſe from the inconvenience; no conſiderable argument in law: which is, that if the king's treaſure be ſo far ſubject to the adminiſtration of an ordinary court of juſtice, as that it muſt be regularly iſſued upon the application of the ſubject, who has a demand thereupon for an annuity, or any other debt, (for I do not ſee but the reaſon is the ſame;) this may turn to the weakening of the publick ſafety to a very high degree.

The barons of the Exchequer cannot, as ſuch, be conuſant of the neceſſities of the ſtate: and if they were, and knew them to be ever ſo preſſing, they muſt act according to one rule; and muſt order a penſion, granted upon no conſideration, or, perhaps, upon a very ill one, and for a pernicious end, to be paid with the very money, which ought to be employed, and, poſſibly, was provided by parliament, for ſuppreſſing a rebellion, or re ing an invaſion, or ſetting out a fleet.

For they, as a court of juſtice, have no judgment of diſcretion allowed them: whenever the party comes to pray it, the grant muſt be inrolled and allowed, and the judgment given, and the writ go.

And what is the treaſurer to do in ſuch a caſe? Is he to obey the great or privy ſeal, which requires the money for the uſes of the war, and the neceſſary defence of the realm; or the Exchequer ſeal, which requires it to be paid for the uſe of a private ſubject?

He would be under a great difficulty; eſpecially if there be ground to think, that ſuch a writ would be the foundation of an action againſt him; which, if I did not miſapprehend, was affirmed by one.

The law books may ſay, that the king's treaſure is ſacred; Co. Lit. 106. that it does reſpicere regem, & regnum; that it is anima reipublicæ, firmamentum belli, & ornamentum pacis. It is, after all, at the diſpoſition of the barons of the Exchequer. Nay it is, in ſome ſort, at the diſpoſal of the ſubject; who takes his own time to make his demands, may ſuffer his arrears to run as long as he pleaſes, and, at his pleaſure, call for them, in the midſt of a war, and to the diſappointment of the publick ſafety.

What ſhould hinder, but that all the arrears of the annuities and penſions, granted in the reigns of king James the firſt, and king Charles the firſt, ſhould be demanded in this manner; and all the debts ſecured during the late civil war? At leaſt, ſo far as the old branches of the hereditary revenue would extend to pay.

The truth is, this method does, in effect, ſet aſide the lord treaſurer, one of the greateſt officers of the kingdom. My lord chief 4 Inſt. 110. juſtice Coke has a fancy, that his white ſtaff was given him, to drive away importunate ſuitors. But this would be to little purpoſe: they have a more certain place to reſort to: 'tis but going to the barons of the Exchequer, and they will command the treaſure from him.

But the popular objection is, that to ſay this ſuit will not lie, is to leave the property of the ſubject precarious; and that if he has a right, he muſt have a remedy.

The anſwer is, that all I have ſaid goes only to this particular manner of proceeding, as being altogether new. It only relates to the new aſſumed power of the barons immediately over the revenue in the receipt of the Exchequer. It does in no ſort leſſen their known power over the revenue, while in tranſitu; nor does exclude them from any legal courſe, whilſt the revenue is in the hands of any inferior officer. It does not preclude the ſubject from ſuing to the perſon of the king, by petition of right. Conſequently, it does not tend to hinder him from the known and ordinary methods, which have been uſed in all ages, in caſes of this nature, and in which the ſubject has acquieſced for ſo many hundred years.

It does not appear to me, that this method was ever known or practiſed: and under a pretence of aſſiſting property, a new courſe of legal proceedings is not to be introduced; nor a new power placed in the barons of the Exchequer, to which none of their predeceſſors pretended.

The law muſt remain as it is, till ſome new law hath changed it. And I ſhould much doubt, whether a new law, for the more eaſy recovery of penſions granted by the crown, would be for the good either of king, or people.

If, as the common law ſtood, grants of penſions and annuities out of the revenue, be, in ſome ſort, depending upon the juſtice and honour of the crown, as to the time and manner of payment, I do not ſee that the public is hurt by it: the revenue is likely to remain the longer with the crown.

If it be ſaid, that the ſubject has a hardſhip in this caſe, and muſt go far about to recover his right; let it be conſidered how much better his caſe is, than it was at common law.

It was hard, indeed, before the ſtatute of Edward the third, when he could not interplead with the king, upon an office found. It was hard, before the ſtatute of Richard the ſecond, when he could not be allowed to ſhew his diſcharge, when he was impeached in the Exchequer, without going to the king: and ſo it was before the ſtat. 2 Ed. 6. when he had no way to ſave his term, &c. upon an office found. But yet after all the law was ſo: and whilſt it continued, the courts were to judge accordingly. And if, in caſes like this, it be thought that a better remedy ſhould be provided, the ſame method muſt be taken, of procuring a new law.

The patentees in theſe caſes, I believe, had no notion of this remedy, when the grants were made to them: this is of a later invention.

They were contented to apply for payment in the ordinary courſe, and did obtain warrants from the lord treaſurer for ſome arrears, with an expreſs clauſe in thoſe warrants, forbidding to levy further tallies, without further order.

Nor is it to be ſaid, that in the method, where the application is to be made to the perſon of the king, the ſubject is precarious; for it is to ſuppoſe, what is not to be ſuppoſed in law. It is a ſuppoſition contrary to the principles upon which the Engliſh conſtitution is framed, which depends upon the honour and juſtice of the crown.

Such kind of ſuppoſitions may be carried much further. You may as well ſay all property is precarious, becauſe you may ſuppoſe the king will make no judges; or will adjourn the terms from time to time; or will ſuffer no writs to iſſue, without which no ſuits can be.

It muſt be preſumed the crown will pay its juſt debts. But to ſay the king is not to have the ordering the courſe of payments, when the money is in his own coffers, is to deny him that, which is in every ſubject's power. It is to take from him the judgment of publick neceſſities, or, at leaſt, the means of relieving them.

I have ſhewn the reaſons for which I cannot give my opinion for the affirming of theſe judgments. But much the greater part of my lords the judges having delivered their opinions for the affirmance of them, I ſhall defer doing any thing further, till I hear the opinion of the judges upon the point referred to them: Whether, as this court is conſtituted, judgment ought to be given according to the opinion of the greater number of the judges, who are called by the lord chancellor and lord treaſurer to their aſſiſtance, notwithſtanding they themſelves are of a different opinion?

Afterwards, on Tueſday, November the 24th, 1696, the lord keeper came again into the Exchequer-Chamber, and declared, that he had received a paper from the lord chief juſtice Holt, containing the opinion of the judges upon the queſtion referred to them : and that three judges were of opinion, that the lord keeper was bound to give judgment in theſe caſes, according to opinions of the majority of the judges by him called to his aſſiſtance : but that ſeven judges were of opinion, that he was not bound by ſuch majority of opinions, but was at liberty to give judgment according to his own : and declared, that as to this queſtion, he himſelf concurred in opinion with the ſeven judges. And accordingly pronounced judgment, that the judgments given in theſe cauſes, by the court of Exchequer, be reverſed.

Proceedings on error in parliament from the Exchequer-Chamber by Robert Williamſon, plaintiff, againſt the attorney-general, defendant, being a continuation of the caſe of the bankers.
